The benefit received through reading these annual reports is described by one of the subscribers, who says: "A few days ago I received your annual report, which is more faith-strengthening and soul-refreshing than many a sermon." The following letter is also remarkable, as written by a subscriber living in Vienna: "There is a child in this city, who recently got one of your biographies of reports, and, after reading a portion, he was heard to pray, 'God teach me to pray like George Müller, and hear me as Thou dost hear George Müller.' He desired to become a preacher, but his mother objected. He is, however, now undergoing preparatory training."

Since 1830, Mr. Müller has had no stipend or salary as pastor or director, but has obtained everything he needed for himself and family from the Lord, simply in answer to prayer and faith. "I speak of my temporal necessities only, and He puts it into the hearts of His children, in various parts of the world, to supply my need. Thus I have been going on for about fifty-five years, and to the praise of God I may say that in His faithful love He has ever been mindful of me."

During the year more than one hundred thousand copies of Bibles, Testaments, and portions, have been sold, or given away among the poor. The Sunday and day schools, numbering eighty-five, entirely supported by the funds of the institution, are not only well sustained, but are enjoying much of the divine blessing. More than ever has been done of late toward aiding missionary work, more than $30,000 having been devoted to this object during the year. That the general education of the orphans is not a whit behind other similar institutions is seen by the inspector's report. "As regards the boys, hundreds of them have now a business of their own, some are partners in large houses of business, a considerable number have become teachers, and many are preachers of the Gospel."

A MOMENTOUS QUEST.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.*

"Seek ye the Lord while he may be found."—ISA. 55: 6.

The Hallelujah Chorus of Prophecy—Waiting Souls—A Search Involving Ten Thousand Dollars—Not Lightly Abandoned—How to Seek the Lord—By Earnest and Believing Prayer—The Cup at the Fountain—A Scotch Covenanter's Prayer—Through Bible Study—The Doors of the Madeleine in Paris—A Dying Soldier's Request—Through Church Ordinances—Misplaced Criticism—When to Speak—A Crisis in Disease—Missing a Fortune—An Open Diamond District—The Soliloquy of a Lost Soul—A Despairing Octogenarian.

ISAIAH stands head and shoulders above the other Old Testament authors in vivid descriptiveness of Christ. Other prophets give an outline of our Saviour's features. Some of them present, as it were, the side face of Christ; others a bust of Christ; but Isaiah gives us the full-length portrait of Christ. Other Scripture writers excel in some things. Ezekiel more weird, David more pathetic, Solomon more epigrammatic, Habakkuk more sublime; but when you want to see Christ coming out from the gates of prophecy in all His grandeur and glory, you involuntarily turn to Isaiah. So that if the prophecies in regard to Christ might be called the "Oratorio of the Messiah," the writing of Isaiah is the "Hallelujah Chorus," where all the batons wave and all the trumpets come in. Isaiah was not a man picked up out of insignificance by inspiration. He was known and honored. Josephus, and Philo, and Sirach extolled him in their writings. What Paul was among the apostles, Isaiah was among the prophets.

A CIRCULAR LETTER.

My text finds him standing on a mountain of inspiration, looking out into the future, beholding Christ advancing and anxious that all men might know Him; his voice rings down the ages: "Seek ye the Lord while He may be found." "Oh," says some one: "that was for olden times." No my hearer. If you have travelled in other lands you have taken a circular letter of credit from some banking-house in New York, and in St. Petersburg, or Venice, or Rome, or Antwerp, or Brussels, or Paris; you presented that letter and got financial help immediately. And I want you to understand that the text, instead of being appropriate for one age, or for one land, is a circular letter for all ages and for all lands, and wherever it is presented for help, the help comes: "Seek ye the Lord while He may be found."

I come, to-day, with no hair-spun theories of religion, with no nice distinctions, with no elaborate disquisition; but with a plain talk on the matters of personal religion. I feel that the sermon I preach this morning will be the savor of life unto life, or of death unto death. In other words, the Gospel of Christ is a powerful medicine; it either kills or cures. There are those who say: "I would like to become a Christian. I have been waiting a good while for the right kind of influences to come," and still

YOU ARE WAITING.

You are wiser in worldly things than you are in religious things. If you want to get to Albany, you go to the Grand Central Depot, or to the steamboat wharf, and, having got your ticket, you do not sit down on the wharf or sit in the depot; you get aboard the boat or train. And yet there are men who say they are waiting to get to heaven—waiting, waiting, but not with intelligent waiting, or they would get on board the line of Christian influences that would bear them into the kingdom of God.

Now you know very well that to seek a thing is to search for it with earnest endeavor. If you want to see a certain man in New York, and there is a matter of $10,000 connected with your seeing him, and you cannot at first find him, you do not give up the search. You look in the directory, but cannot find the name, you go in circles where you think, perhaps, he may mingle, and, having found the part of the city where he lives, but perhaps not knowing the street, you go through street after street, and from block to block, and you keep on searching for weeks and for months.

You say: "It is a matter of $10,000 whether I see him or not." O that men were as persistent in seeking for Christ! Had you one half that persistence you would long ago have found Him who is the joy of the forgiven spirit. We may pay our debts, we may attend church, we may relieve the poor, we may be public benefactors, and yet all our life disobey the text, never seek God, never gain heaven. O that the spirit of God would help this morning while I try to show you, in carrying out the idea of my text, first, how to seek the Lord, and in the next place, when to seek Him. "Seek ye the Lord while He may be found."

THE CUP AT THE FOUNTAIN.

I remark, in the first place, you are to seek the Lord through earnest and believing prayer. God is not an autocrat or a despot seated on a throne with His arms resting on brazen lions, and a sentinel pacing up and down at the foot of the throne. God is a father seated in a bower, waiting for His children to come and climb on His knee, and get His kiss and His benediction. Prayer is the cup with which we go to the "fountain of living water," and dip up refreshment for our thirsty soul. Grace does not come to the heart as we set a cask at the corner of the house to catch the rain in the shower. It is a pulley fastened to the throne of God, which we pull, bringing the blessing.

I do not care so much what posture you take in prayer, nor how large an amount of voice you use. You might get down on your face before God, if you did not pray right inwardly, and there would be no response. You might cry at the top of your voice, and unless you had a believing spirit within, your cry would not go farther up than the shout of a ploughboy to his oxen. Prayer must be believing, earnest, loving. You are in your house some summer day, and a shower comes up, and a bird, affrighted darts into the window, and wheels around the room. You seize it. You smooth its ruffled plumage. You feel its fluttering heart. You say, "Poor thing, poor thing!" Now a prayer goes out of the storm of this world into the window of God's mercy, and He catches it, and He feels its fluttering pulse, and He puts it in His own bosom of affection and safety.

A SCOTCH COVENANTER.

Prayer is a warm, ardent, pulsating exercise. It is the electric battery which, touched, thrills to the throne of God! It is the diving-bell in which we go down into the depths of God's mercy and bring up "pearls of great price." There was an instance where prayer made the waves of Gennesaret solid as Russ pavement. O how many wonderful things prayer has accomplished! Have you ever tried it? In the days when the Scotch Covenanters were persecuted, and the enemies were after them, one of the head men among the Covenanters prayed: "O Lord, we be as dead men unless Thou shalt help us. O Lord throw the lap of Thy cloak over these poor things." And instantly a Scotch mist enveloped and hid the persecuted from their persecutors—the promise literally fulfilled: "While they are yet speaking I will hear."

O impenitent soul, have you ever tried the power of prayer? God says: "He is loving, and faithful, and patient. Do you believe that? You are told that Christ came to save sinners. Do you believe that? You are told that all you have to do to get the pardon of the Gospel is to ask for it. Do you believe that? Then come to Him and say: 'O Lord, I know Thou canst not lie. Thou hast told me to come for pardon, and I could get it. I come, Lord. Keep Thy promise, and liberate my captive soul.'"

O that you might have an altar in the parlor, in the kitchen, in the store, in the barn, for Christ will be willing to come again to the manger to hear prayer. He would come in your place of business, as He confronted Matthew, the Tax Commissioner. If a measure should come before Congress that you thought would ruin the nation, how you would send in petitions and remonstrances. And yet there has been enough sin in your heart to ruin it forever, and you have never remonstrated or petitioned against it. If your physical health failed, and you had the means, you would go and spend the summer in Germany, and the winter in Italy, and you would think it a very cheap outlay if you had to go all round the earth to get back your physical health. Have you made any effort, any expenditure, any exertion for your immortal and spiritual health? No, you have not taken one step.

O that you might now begin to seek after God with earnest prayer. Some of you have been working for years and years for the support of your families. Have you given one half day to the working out of your salvation with fear and trembling? You came here this morning with an earnest purpose, I take it, as I have come hither with an earnest purpose, and we meet face to face, and I tell you, first of all, if you want to find the Lord, you must pray, and pray, and pray.

I remark, again, you must seek the Lord through Bible study. The Bible is

THE NEWEST BOOK IN THE WORLD.

"Oh," you say, "it was made hundreds of years ago, and the learned men of King James translated it hundreds of years ago." I confute that idea by telling you it is not five minutes old, when God, by His blessed Spirit retranslates it into the heart. If you will, in the seeking of the way of life through Scripture study, implore God's light to fall upon the page, you will find that these promises are not one second old, and that they drop straight from the throne of God into your heart.

There are many people to whom the Bible does not amount to much. If they merely look at the outside beauty, why it will no more lead them to Christ than Washington's farewell address or the Koran of Mahomet or the Shaster of the Hindoos. It is the inward light of God's Word you must get or die. I went up to the church of the Madeleine, in Paris, and looked at the doors which were the most wonderfully constructed I ever saw, and I could have stayed there for a whole week; but I had only a little time, so, having glanced at the wonderful carving on the doors, I passed in and looked at the radiant altars, and the sculptured dome. Alas, that so many stop at the outside door of God's Holy Word, looking at the rhetorical beauties, instead of going in and looking at the altars of sacrifice and the dome of God's mercy and salvation that hovers over every penitent and believing soul!

O my friends, if you merely want to study the laws of language, do not go to the Bible. It was not made for that. Take "Howe's Elements of Criticism"—it will be better than the Bible for that. If you want to study metaphysics, better than the Bible will be the writings of William Hamilton. But if you want to know how to have sin pardoned, and at last to gain the blessedness of Heaven, search the Scriptures, "for in them ye have eternal life."

THE BOOK FOR SEEKERS.

When people are anxious about their souls—and there are some such here to-day—there are those who recommend good books. That is all right. But I want to tell you that the Bible is the best book under such circumstances. Baxter wrote, "A Call to the Unconverted," but the Bible is the best call to the unconverted. Philip Doddridge wrote, "The Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul," but the Bible is the best rise and progress. John Angell James wrote advice to the Anxious Inquirer, but the Bible is the best advice to the anxious inquirer.

O the Bible is the very book you need anxious and inquiring soul! A dying soldier said to his mate: "Comrade, give me a drop!"

* Dr. Talmage arrived from Europe by the steamer Auraria of the Cunard line. A large number of his congregation chartered a steamer and went down the Bay to meet him. He expects to preach at the Brooklyn Tabernacle next Sunday.

"he comrade shook up the canteen, and said: There isn't a drop of water in the canteen." Oh," said the dying soldier, "that's not what want; feel in my knapsack for my Bible" and is comrade found the Bible, and read him a few of the gracious promises, and the dying soldier said: "Ah, that's what I want. There isn't anything like the Bible for a dying soldier, s there, my comrade?" O blessed book while ye live. Blessed book when we die!

THE VALUE OF CHURCHES.

I remark, again, we must seek God through church ordinances. "What," say you, "can't man be saved without going to church?" I reply, there are men, I suppose, in glory, who have never seen a church; but the church is the ordained means by which we are to be brought to God; and if truth affects us when we are alone, it affects us more mightily when we are in the assembly—the feelings of others emphasizing our own feelings. The great law of sympathy comes into play and a truth that would take hold only with the grasp of a sick man, beats mightily against the soul with a thousand heart-throbs.

When you come into the religious circle, come only with one notion, and only for one purpose—to find the way to Christ. When I see people critical about sermons, and critical about tones of voice, and critical about sermonic delivery, they make me think of a man in prison. He is condemned to death, but an officer of the government brings a pardon and puts it through the wicket of the prison, and says:

"HERE IS YOUR PARDON.

Come and get it." "What! Do you expect me to take that pardon offered with such a voice as you have, with such an awkward manner as you have? I would rather die than so compromise my rhetorical notions!" Ah, the man does not say that; he takes it! It is his life. He does not care how it is handed to him. And if, this morning, that pardon from the throne of God is offered to our souls, should we not seize it, regardless of all criticism, feeling that it is a matter of heaven or hell?

But I come now to the last part of my text. It tells us when we are to seek the Lord. "While He may be found." When is that? Old age? You may not see old age. To-morrow? You may not see to-morrow. To-night? You may not see to-night. Now! O if I could only write on every heart in three capital letters, that word N-O-W—Now!

AN AWFUL DISEASE.

Sin is an awful disease. I hear people say with a toss of the head and with a trivial manner: "Oh, yes, I'm a sinner." Sin is an awful disease. It is leprosy. It is dropsy. It is consumption. It is all moral disorders in one. Now you know there is a crisis in a disease. Perhaps you have had some illustration of it in your family. Sometimes the physician has called, and he has looked at the patient and said: "That case was simple enough; but the crisis has passed. If you had called me yesterday, or this morning, I could have cured the patient. It is too late now; the crisis has passed." Just so it is in the spiritual treatment of the soul—there is a crisis. Before that, life! After that, death! O my dear brother, as you love your soul do not let the crisis pass unattended to!

There are some here who can remember instances in life when, if they had bought a certain property, they would have become very rich. A few acres that would have cost them almost nothing were offered them. They refused them. Afterward a large village or city sprang up on those acres of ground and they see what a mistake they made in not buying the property. There was an opportunity of getting it. It never came back again. And so it is in regard to a man's spiritual and eternal fortune. There is a chance; if you let that go, perhaps it never comes back. Certainly, that one never comes back.

A SPECTATOR AT GETTYSBURG.

A gentleman told me that at the battle of Gettysburg he stood upon a height looking off upon the conflicting armies. He said it was the most exciting moment of his life; now one army seeming to triumph, and now the other. After a while the host wheeled in such a way that he knew in five minutes the whole question would be decided. He said the emotion was almost unbearable. There is just such a time to-day with you, O impenitent soul—the forces of light on the one side, and the siege-guns of hell on the other side, and in a few moments the matter will be settled for eternity.

There is a time which mercy has set for leaving port. If you are on board before that you will get a passage for heaven. If you are not on board, you miss your passage for heaven. As in law courts a case is sometimes adjourned from term to term, and from year to year till the bill of costs eats up the entire estate, so there are men who are adjourning the matter of religion from time to time, and from year to year until heavenly bliss is the bill of costs the man will have to pay for it.

POSTPONEMENT USELESS.

Why defer this matter, oh my dear hearer? Have you any idea that sin will wear out? That it will evaporate? that it will relax its grasp, that you may find religion as a man accidentally finds a lost pocket-book? Ah, no! No man ever became a Christian by accident, or by the relaxing of sin. The embarrassments are all the time increasing. The hosts of darkness are recruiting, and the longer you postpone this matter the steeper the path will become. I ask those men who are before me this morning, whether, in the ten or fifteen years they have passed in the postponement of these matters, they have come any nearer God or heaven?

I would not be afraid to challenge this whole audience, so far as they may not have found the peace of the Gospel, in regard to that matter. Your hearts, you are willing frankly to tell me, are becoming harder and harder, and that if you come to Christ it will be more of an undertaking now than it ever would have been before. O fly for refuge! The avenger of blood is on the track! The throne of judgment will soon be set; and, if you have anything to do toward your eternal salvation, you had better do it now, for the redemption of the soul is precious, and it ceaseth forever!

Oh if men could only catch just one glimpse of Christ, I know they would love Him. Your heart leaps at the sight of a glorious sunrise or sunset. Can you be without emotion as the Sun of Righteousness rises behind Calvary, and sets behind Joseph's sepulchre? He is a blessed Saviour! Every nation has its type of beauty. There is German beauty, and Swiss beauty, and Italian beauty, and English beauty; but I care not in what land a man first looks at Christ, he pronounces Him "chief among ten thousand, and the One altogether lovely." O my blessed Jesus! Light in darkness! The Rock on which I build! The Captain of Salvation! My joy! My strength! How strange it is that men cannot love Thee!

The diamond districts of Brazil are carefully guarded, and a man does not get in there except by a pass from the Government; but the love of Christ is we may all enter, and pick up treasures for eternity. O cry for mercy! "To-day, if ye will hear His voice, harden not your hearts." There is a way of opposing the mercy of God too long, and then there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin, but a fearful looking for judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversary. My friends, my neighbors, what can I say to induce you to attend to this matter—to attend to it now? Time is flying, flying—the city clock joining my voice this moment, seeming to say to you, "Now is the time! Now is the time!" O put it not off!

Why should I stand here and plead, and you sit there? It is your immortal soul. It is a soul that shall never die. It is a soul that must soon appear before God for review. Why throw away your chance for heaven? Why plunge off into darkness when all the gates of glory are open? Why become a castaway from God when you can sit upon the throne? Why will ye die miserably when eternal life is offered you, and it will cost you nothing but just willingness to accept it? "Come, for all things are now ready." "Come, Christ is ready, pardon is ready! The Church is ready. Heaven is ready. You will never find a more convenient season, if you should live fifty years more, than this very one. Reject this, and you may die in your sins.

Why do I say this? Is it to frighten your soul? Oh, no. It is to persuade you. I show you the peril. I show you the escape. Would I not be a coward beyond all excuse, if, believing that this great audience must soon be launched into the eternal world, and that all who believe in Christ shall be saved, and that all who reject Christ will be lost—would I not be the veriest coward on earth to hide that truth or to stand before you with a cold, or even a placid manner? My dear brethren, now is the day of your redemption.

It is very certain that you and I must soon appear before God in judgment. We cannot escape it. The Bible says: "Every eye shall see Him, and they also which pierced Him, and all the kindreds of the earth shall wail because of Him." On that day all our advantages will come up for our glory or for our discomfiture—every prayer, every sermon, every exhortatory remark, every reproof, every call of grace; and while the heavens are rolling away like a scroll, and the world is being destroyed, your destiny and my destiny will be announced. Alas! alas! if on that day it is found that we have neglected these matters. We may throw them off now. We cannot then. We will all be in earnest then. But no pardon then. No offer of salvation then. No rescue then. Driven away in our wickedness—banished, exiled, forever!

Have you ever imagined what will be on that day unpardoned, as it looks back upon its past life? "Oh," says the soul, "I had glorious Sabbaths. There was one Sabbath in autumn when I was invited to Christ. There was a Sabbath morning when Jesus stood and spread out His arms and invited me to His holy heart. I refused Him. I have destroyed myself. I have no one else to blame. Ruin complete! Darkness unpyting, deep, eternal! I am lost! Notwithstanding all the opportunities I have had of being saved, I am lost! O Thou long-suffering Lord God Almighty, I am lost! O day of judgment, I am lost! O father, mother, brother, sister, child in glory, I am lost." And then as the tide goes out, your soul goes out with it—farther from God, farther from happiness, and I hear your voice fainter, and fainter, and fainter: "Lost! Lost! Lost! Lost! Lost!" O ye dying, yet immortal men, "Seek the Lord while He may be found."

A DESPAIRING OCTOGENARIAN.

But I want you to take the hint of the text that I have no time to dwell on—the hint that there is a time when He cannot be found. There is a man in New York, eighty years of age, who said to a clergyman who came in: "Do you think that a man at eighty years of age can get pardoned?" "Oh, yes," said the clergyman. The old man said: "I can't; when I was twenty years of age—I am now eighty years—the Spirit of God came to my soul, and I felt the importance of attending to these things, but I put it off. I rejected God, and since then I have had no feeling." "Well," said the minister, "wouldn't you like to have me pray with you?" "Yes," replied the old man, "but it will do no good. You can pray with me if you like to." The minister knelt down and prayed, and commended the man's soul to God. It seemed to have no effect upon him. After a while the last hour of the man's life came, and through his delirium a spark of intelligence seemed to flash, and with his last breath he said: "I shall never be forgiven!" "O seek the Lord while He may be found."

RUSSIA: HER CONQUESTS AND DOWNFALL.

Identification of Names—Russia's Growth and Development—Her Future Extension—Destruction from God—The Means Employed—The Spoil.

EZEKIEL 38: 5, 6 gives us an insight into the future. It speaks of Persia, Ethiopia, and Libya (Cush and Phut). The last are the dark tribes who dwelt on both sides of the Arabian Gulf. The reference of Herodotus to an Asiatic branch of the race dwelling in Southern Asia as well as in Africa, leads us to a similar conclusion. Genesis 10: 7-10 speaks of "Gomer, and all his bands, the house of Togarmah of the north quarters, and all his bands." Of the first-called nations in Asia conquests shall be made; with the last-named nations in Europe alliances shall be consolidated. The former are known as the neighbors of the Afghans; the latter as Germany and Scandinavia.

THE SECRET SPIRIT OF RUSSIA.

It is a well-known fact that the Russian politicians and statesmen have the most astute, unscrupulous, and aggressive spirit of the age; that they have conquered as much by statesmanship as by their arms, and that the same spirit and the same intrigues shall remain the character of the Russian diplomacy. In verses 9-12 it is said that conquest, world dominion, greed after spoil, possession of silver and gold, cattle and substance, shall be the motive of their actions. And yet that mighty empire and those crafty rulers should be under the control of Jehovah. In verse 4 is said: "I will put hooks into thy jaws;" and in 39: 2 is spoken, as the Hebrew word signifies, "A hook of six teeth" (margin). "They shall know that the heavens do rule" (Dan. 4: 26).

THE EXPECTATION.

What a great army (verse 15), all riding on horses, all of them "clothed in perfection"! (verse 4.) Never was such an army assembled before. Xerxes and Napoleon had large armies, but here is one which can bear the title of Excelsior. Full of expectation is that multitude, gathered from all the nations of eastern Europe and Asia! It is a band of robbers bent upon spoil. They are like a cloud of grasshoppers to alight upon the rich fields of Judah, and to devour the accumulation of ages, and to lay hold on the riches of the world. They are filled with hatred against that Semitic race, and are eager to have their possessions. Napoleon could say: "Soldiers, look down; Italy is yours!" But here the great army has not to cross the mountain-tops, or to fight an enemy having fortified cities; they have come, they have seen, and in their expectation they have already conquered.

THE WRATH OF JEHOVAH.

The second psalm has drawn the full picture of this prophecy, there is seen the nations tumultuously assembled, and meditating vanity. The kings of the earth unite themselves against Jehovah and His Christ, but He who sits in heaven shall laugh, and scorn them all. He shall speak in His anger and in His wrath. Here we have the same manifestation: "My fury shall come up in my face. For in my jealousy and in the fire of my wrath have I spoken," saith the Lord God (Ezek. 38: 18, 19), and then the heathen may know Me, when I shall be sanctified in thee. "O Gog, before their eyes" (verse 16). It is a fact worthy our deepest consideration that, in the destruction of this great army, human agency is not mentioned. It is Jehovah who will do His own work by His own power.

THE MANNER.

In Ezekiel 39: 3-5, is said: "I will smite thee bow out of thy left hand, and will cause thine arrows to fall out of thy right hand. Thou shalt fall upon the mountains of Israel, thou, and all thy bands, and the people that is with thee; I will give thee unto the ravenous birds of every sort, and to the beasts of the field, to be devoured. Thou shalt fall upon the open field: for I have spoken it, saith the Lord God." The entire army of that world-power shall be annihilated, and that destruction shall be accomplished by plagues and catastrophes.

Ezekiel 38: 19, 20 gives us a fearful description of an earthquake. "Surely in that day there shall be a great shaking (rushing) in the land of Israel; So that the fishes of the sea, and the fowls of the heaven, and the beasts of the field, and all creeping things that creep upon the earth, and all the men that are upon the face of the earth, shall shake at My presence, and the mountains shall be thrown down," compare the same expressions, Zech. 14: 3, 4, 5. The second means of destruction mentioned in verse 21, is by mutual combat, "and I will call for a sword against him. . . . The sword of each is against his brother" (Young). The third is (verse 22) pestilence and blood. "And I will plead against him with pestilence and with blood." And the last plague seems to be the climax; the elements shall be in commotion; the heavens shall fight in behalf of Israel. Verse 22 says: "And I will rain upon him, and upon his bands, and upon the many people that are with him, an overflowing rain, and great hailstones, fire and brimstone;" calling to our minds the dire destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the overthrow of all the inhabitants of the cities" (Gen. 19: 24, 25). Napoleon never forgot Smolensk or the Beresina, and the routing of his army; yet that event will have no comparison with the defeat of Gog and his armies. Never, never was an army destroyed like this army! They all fell, and the fields of Galilee, Judea, and Bethlehem will be covered with the carcasses of that, once so fearful host of the combined power of Russia.

DESTRUCTION AT HOME.

Far away, the flower, the prowess, and the boast of the nations of Europe and Asia come to an untimely end. The widows, the orphans, the bereaved ones at home, had lost their husbands, their fathers, and their loved ones, so dear to their hearts. Will they acknowledge their sin and their folly, their rapacity and their rebellion? The answer is, No. We read that the fearful breath of Jehovah's wrath is also sent to them (Ezek. 39: 6): "And I will send a fire (pestilence) on Magog, and among them that dwell carelessly in the isles, and they shall know that I am the Lord, . . . and the heathen (nations) shall know that I am the Lord, the Holy One of Israel."

GATHERING OF THE SPOIL.

In verses 9, 10, it is mentioned that Russia and the allies must have planned this war on a most ample scale. That it was not intended for an invasion, but for a conquest. The immense baggage-tents, weapons, and other war material must have been sent by the common means of transportation; because the inhabitants of the cities of Israel will have gathered so much wood as will serve them for burning "for a period of seven years" (see Baxter's Annotations in loco), and "they spoiled their spoilers, and plundered their plunderers." What a righteous judgment, if we keep before our mind the persecution of Russia against the Jews in banishing them from her border, and spoiling them of their property.

The people of Israel will also have a general gathering of the corpses of men, and of the carcasses of the animals, during a period of seven months, carrying the bones to an appointed place, a valley called "The Multitude of Gog," in which will be a city called "Hamonah," the multitude; probably it will be a great city of the dead—a memorial through the ages for following generations. In verses 17-21 is given a picture how the winged scavengers (birds) from many lands shall be invited to come, and have a feast of the remains of those fallen ones, upon the mountains of Israel.

Let us adore and bow with reverence before the God of justice and judgment; let us believe that the reckoning day for nations surely will come. That the Lamb, sitting upon the throne, is also the Lion of Judah, and that "He shall roar out of Zion, and utter His voice from Jerusalem, and the heavens and the earth shall shake; but that the Lord will be the hope of His people, and the strength of the children of Israel." Oh, that we may be found in peace with Him!

INCIDENTS AT MEETINGS CONDUCTED BY MATEER AND PARKER.

(Mr. Spurgeon's Evangelists.)

A Suicide Prevented.—One Tuesday Evening at Portsmouth as the mission was progressing some workers were standing outside the church inviting the passersby to the meeting. A shabbily-dressed youth passed along, when one of the workers asked him in. Half-reluctant the young man came in, and took his seat in one of the back pews. As he listened to the preaching the Spirit of God touched his heart. He came again the next night, and the next. Each night the inquirers were asked to enter the vestry. Many came; but thinking himself too great a sinner, he held back until on Friday night, he could bear it no longer, and rising he stepped into the vestry, where the minister of the church led him to the Saviour. A letter of thanksgiving was received from him afterward which Mr. Mateer read at the daily prayer-meeting, in which he said: "I have been living eight years in open sin and shame in London; I lost my situation through drink, and so, friendless and fallen, I fled to Portsmouth. I became so miserable that I was on my way last night to the water to end it, when, praise the Lord, I came into your meeting, and was saved, and now I feel so grateful to God."

The Schoolmaster's Lie.—A Year or Two back a schoolmaster attended the special meetings we were holding in Yorkshire. When the after-meeting was announced to be held in the adjoining school-room, he made his way from the chapel into the crowded school-house. One of the workers accosted him with the simple question, "Are you a Christian?" "Yes," was his reply, and taking it for granted that the man spoke the truth, the worker passed on. But the school-master was ill at ease, and sat turning the question over and over again in his mind, until at last he said to himself: "Alas! it's a lie. I'm not a Christian!" He came the next night, and was deeply convicted of sin, but was too proud to come to the inquiry-meeting, and so he went home and to bed, but not to rest. The question still haunted him. "Are you a Christian?" By 11 P.M. he grew so anxious that he had to send for a Christian man whom he knew, to speak to him about his soul. And that night the worker and school-master had a blessed prayer and praise meeting over a new-found Saviour in the little bedroom.

The Christ Rejector Saved.—On Another Occasion a godless man came to the services, and was awakened. He stayed at home the next night to let his wife go. Looking round him to see how he could interest the children, he saw an old copy of the Graphic, and showed the pictures there to the young folks. He hadn't turned over many leaves before he came to a picture of a young lady rejecting a suitor. At once it seemed to flash upon him. "That's just how I'm treating it." He couldn't get rid of the thought, and he knew he ought to pray, so he dropped down on one knee, for he was too proud and ashamed to kneel on both, and asked God to save him, but his prayer was in vain, for there was pride in his heart. The following day he came himself to the meeting, and went straight into the vestry, and dropping down on both his knees this time, he asked God to have mercy upon him. The answer was immediate, and he left the room a changed man.

A Wife-Beater Blessed.—In a Town in Wales, says Mr. Mateer, "a Christian woman asked prayer for her husband. We prayed in faith that God would save him. At last she got him to come to the meetings, and one night when I came into the inquiry-room I was surprised, and rejoiced to see this poor drunkard seated there, 'clothed and in his right mind.' I asked him ow it was with him, and he replied: "Thank od, sir, He has saved me." "And when did at take place, I asked?" "To-night while you were preaching." After that night there ere no two who attended the meetings so regularly, and I used to watch with delight the y of the wife, as she sat right up in front with er husband by her side, changed from a human on to a gentle lamb."

WAR must come. We have hoped against it, ut a visit to Great Britain and the Continent his summer will convince any one that unless here be speedy providential interference, France ill not much longer keep her hand off Germany, while England and Russia cannot much onger be at peace. Nine out of ten Englishmen whom I have met want immediate arraignment of Russia. They say war must come, and the ooner it comes the better. They are glad that Mr. Gladstone is out, and Mr. Gladstone as I aw him the other day, looks as if he felt relieved it being out. Meanwhile, Frenchmen want to et back Strasbourg and Metz, and will be in iritation until Alsace and Lorraine return. When these wars break out the nations of Europe have so many grudges to settle that there will be the hemorrhage of a continent. Blessed are the United States, in being three thousand miles away from the field of inevitable strife.

This approaching collision has nearly ruined the cities dependent on the patronage of foreign tourists. This apprehension and the expectation of cholera make plenty of room for travelers, and give them the choice of places at hotels.
Besides this, the cities of Northern Europe are unusually clean, and all the laws of sanitation have been better observed. While in Spain and Southern France the pestilence has been terrific, the death-rate in the most of Europe has been very moderate. Baden-Baden, Carlsbad, and many of the German health resorts are as full as ever, the lack of American and English patronage more than made up by the coming of the more affluent classes of Spaniards, who have fled from home to escape sickness.

There is no better place in which to study character than at

THE WATERING-PLACES.

The English watering-places are to us a great fascination. Brighton is like Long Branch, Weymouth is like Cape May, Scarborough is like Saratoga, Isle of Wight is like heaven.
Brighton being within an hour and a half of London, the great masses pour out to its beach, and take a dip in the sea. But Scarborough combines more of natural and artificial beauty than any place I ever saw. It is built on terraces. Its gardens rise in galleries. Two great arms of land reach out into the sea, and hundreds of gay sailing crafts float in. A castle seven hundred years old straggles its ruins out to the very precipice. The air is tonic, and the spectacle bewitching. Of all the summer watering-places I have ever seen, in some respects Scarborough is the most brilliant, and is appropriately called "the Queen of English resorts."
But the prices are enormous, and not many could meet them.

AT ROBERTSON'S TOMB.

Brighton is best known to American theologians as the scene of the late Frederick W. Robertson's ministry. We attended his little church, which holds perhaps six or eight hundred people, but from whose pulpit he preached after death to thousands of clergymen in Europe and America, those strange, powerful, original, and melancholy sermons. In this evening of the Sabbath we worshipped in Robertson's church.

We went into "the extramural cemetery" to see his grave. Though dead thirty-two years, his tomb bears all the marks of fresh affection, on all sides vines and flowers in the highest culture.
Two bronze medallions, one by his congregation, the other by the working-people, who almost idolized him. On the one medallion his church have inscribed: "Honored as a minister, beloved as a man, he awakened the holiest feelings in poor and rich, in ignorant and learned; therefore is lamented as their guide and comforter, by many who in the bond of brotherhood and in grateful remembrance, have erected this monument." On the other medallion the working-people, whose practical friend he proved himself to be, preferred the inscription:
"To the Rev. F. W. Robertson, M.A., in grateful remembrance of his sympathy, and in deep sorrow for their loss, the members of the Mechanics' Institution and the workmen of Brighton have placed this medallion on their benefactor's tomb." How independent of time and death an earnest man lives on! That is a poor life which breaks down at the cemetery.

Many of these illustrious English preachers had insignificant looking churches. We went at Bristol to see Robert Hall's chapel. The present sexton remembered the great Baptist orator and preacher. The chapel in Robert Hall's day would not hold more than six hundred auditors, but there he preached discourses that have rung round the world, and will ring through the ages.
The size of a man's shop is not of so much importance as the style of work he turns out. Ole Bull could fiddle "the Hallelujah Chorus" on a corn-stalk fiddle. Blessed are all they who do their best, whether in sphere resounding or insignificant! But

THE ISLE OF WIGHT.

as already hinted, has a supernal beauty. If a poet you will go there and see Tennyson's summer residence, and find him sauntering among the cypresses with his inevitable pipe. If you are an invalid you will go there to bless your lungs with the soft atmosphere of its valleys. If you are fond of royalty you will either get into the Queen's Castle at Osborne, or see her equipage on its daily outing. If you are a Christian you will go to the village which Leigh Richmond has made immortal, stop at the inn called "The Hare and Hounds," and visit the grave at the northeast of the church, reading on the tombstone: "Sacred to the memory of Elizabeth Walbridge, the Dairyman's Daughter, who died
May 30th, 1801, aged 31 years. She being dead yet speaketh." Or the tomb of the schoolmaster or church clerk, whose epitaph, I should think had been written by some lad who had felt the switch of the pedagogue and took post-mortem vengeance.

"In yonder sacred pile
His voice was wont to sound,
And now his body rests
Beneath the hallowed ground.
He taught the peasant boy
To read and use the pen,
His earthly toils are o'er,
He's cried his last Amen."

Or, if you are fond of antiquities, you will go to Carisbrooke and see the room where Princess Elizabeth, heart-broken at the imprisonment and death of her father, Charles I., was found dead with her head on the open Bible, at the text: "Come unto me all ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Oh, how wonderful for all styles of interest is this Isle of Wight! The isle, twenty-three miles long by thirteen wide, is one great dream of beauty. What trees arch it! What streams silver it! What flowers emboss it! What memories haunt it!

"The sparkling streamlet, joyous, bright and free, Leaps through the rocky chine to kiss the sea."

Memorable among my wanderings of the summer of 1885 will be the day spent on the Isle of Wight. The long storm of weeks lifted that morning, and there were gardens above as well as gardens beneath, groined roof of cloud over tessellated pavements and fields. Fleets sailing the sky. Boats racing in the bay, and regattas of cloud on the sky. The scene seemed let down out of heaven on two crimson pulleys of sunrise and sunset. If you want to mingle with the jolly masses of England let loose for a holiday go to Brighton. If you want to see the highest fashion of the realm and relieve the plethora of an apoplectic pocket-book go to Scarborough.

But if you want to dream of eternal woods, and eternal waters, and eternal sunshine, make your pillow somewhere on the blissful and enchanting Isle of Wight.

From this scene we take express train for Scotland, and alight in the evening at a hotel halfway between Edinburgh Castle and Holyrood Palace.

There is something about

THE SCOTCH CHARACTER.

whether I meet it in New York, or London, or Edinburgh, that thrills me through and through.
Perhaps it is because I have such a strong tide of Scotch blood in my own arteries. Next to my own beloved country give me Scotland for residence and grave. The people are in such downright earnest. No half and half about the Scotch character. What he hates he hates.
What he likes he likes. And he lets you know it right away. He is altogether Liberal, or altogether Tory. His politics decided, his religion decided. Get him right, and he is magnificently right. Get him wrong, and he is awfully wrong. A Scotchman seldom changes. By the time he has landed fairly on his feet in this world, he has made up his mind and he keeps it made up. If he dislikes a fiddle in church, you cannot smuggle it in under the name of a bass viol. We like persistence. Life is so short that a man cannot afford very often to change his mind.

AMERICAN FOOD.

But national characteristics are gradually giving way. The Tweed is drying up. The Atlantic Ocean under steam pressure is becoming a Fulton Ferry. When I asked John Bright if he was ever coming to America, he said: "No; America comes to me." Besides that, "American breadstuffs and American meat must have their effect on European character. All careful observers know that what men eat, mightily affects their character. The missionary among the Indians compelled to live on animal food, gets some of the nature of the Aborigines, whether he will or not. The Anchor Line of steamers going to Glasgow, takes great cargoes of American meats to Scotland. The meat of animals butchered in America is kept on steamers in a cool draught, especially arranged for that purpose. The meat market of Scotland is being revolutionized. The Scotchman eating American beef, and American mutton, and American venison, becomes partly American.
English farmers deplore the coming in of so much American breadstuffs. The Englishman eating American wheat, and American rye, and American corn, must become in part American-ized. And here is an element of safety which political economists would do well to recognize.
The cereals and the meats of one nation becoming the food of the other nation, it prophesies assimilation and brotherhood. It will be very difficult for American beef to fight American beef, and American mutton to fight American mutton, and American corn to fight American corn, though it may be found on the opposite side of the Atlantic. The world is gradually sitting down at one table, and the bread will be made of Michigan wheat, and it will be cut with Sheffield knives. The rice will be brought from Carolina swamps, and cooked with Newcastle coal, and set on the table in Burslem pottery, while the air comes in through the window, upholstered with Nottingham lace. And Italy will provide the raisins, and Brazil the nuts, and all nations add their part to the universal festivity. What a time of accord when all the world breakfasts and dines and sups together!

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Silver Compromise Continues the Prominent subject of discussion in political and financial circles. Precisely what form it will assume before Congress meets in December cannot be predicted, but the feature of it that is most likely to be retained is that of the certificates. It is proposed to receive silver in bullion form at the Treasury, and issue to the depositor a treasury note for its value. In order to protect the Treasury from loss by the fluctuation of value, the note will be redeemable at the market rate only. The certificates would be negotiable, but they would have no specified face value. They would entitle the holder to receive so many ounces of silver of standard fineness, and to ascertain precisely what the certificate was worth at any time, it would be merely necessary to find out the market price of silver. It is thought that if such a scheme could be arranged, Western and Southern Congressmen would consent to suspend the coinage of the silver dollar. The proposal will need to be carefully studied before its adoption, as it contains some dangerous features. Among them is one permitting the national banks to deposit the certificates as security for their circulating notes. As the Government has to redeem the notes of a bankrupt bank, it is obvious that the certificates might not in all cases prove adequate security.

New York State Prohibition Convention Assembled at Syracuse, N. Y., on Tuesday, September 8th. Fully three thousand persons took part in the proceedings. Some discord was produced at the opening session by the strictures of some of the speakers on the attitude of the clergy and the churches toward the movement. The sweeping condemnation, however, was nullified when the chairman invited all delegates of the Convention who were also church members to hold up their hands. It was then seen that although all church members are not Prohibitionists, a large proportion of Prohibitionists are church members. The platform adopted is thus summarized by the Voice: "It declares that license, high and low, is vicious in principle, and inexpedient in practice; that Prohibition must be national in scope to be effective, and must be sustained by a party; that both the old parties court the liquor interest, and should not be supported by temperance people; that Prohibition is constitutional; that the temperance hygiene law is a wise measure, and that the temperance people insist that it be enforced; that the abuse of Prohibitionists last fall was an outrage calling for the condemnation of all good citizens; that the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is recognized as a valuable ally; that the ballot for women is demanded, but not made a test of party fealty; and that the Civil Service and labor problems, and all other governmental questions are safer in the hands of a party drawing its support from the moral and not the liquor elements." The Convention was unanimous in its nomination for the Governorship. Its candidate is Henry Clay Bascom, of Troy, the proprietor of the Vedder Stove-pattern Works; he is forty-one years old.

He is a leading member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, a Sunday-school superintendent, and local preacher. W. J. Demorest, of New York City, received the nomination for Lieutenant-Governor; ex-Governor John P. St. John attended, and made an eloquent and forcible speech.

Washington Court-House, a Prosperous Town in Ohio, the county seat of Fayette County, was completely demolished by a tornado on the night of September 8th. It is the centre of a rich agricultural district, and during the past fifteen years it has grown to be a place of considerable business importance. Shortly after eight o'clock on Tuesday night a heavy rainfall commenced, which drove every one under shelter. A few minutes afterward a tornado unparalleled in violence in that section passed over the town, extinguishing the street-lamps and leaving the place in total darkness, save for the vivid flashes of lightning which shot out of a sky densely black. The crash of falling buildings was heard in every direction, mingled with the shrieks of the wounded and the dying. The whole town was a wreck; all the public buildings except the new Court House were destroyed, including the Presbyterians, Baptist, and Catholic churches. Fifteen persons were killed, and more than three hundred wounded. The Salvation Army were holding a meeting in the Music Hall, and there was much difficulty in preventing a stampede when the roof fell in. A lodge of Odd Fellows also had a narrow escape. The money loss is enormous, as there was no insurance against such a disaster.

The Mystery of the Grant & Ward Affairs ever since the failure is to explain how the enormous sums of money were expended. A clue to the mystery was furnished by Ferdinand Ward, the junior partner in the firm, who was a witness in a suit brought by the official assignee against a Mr. Warner, one of the firm's clients. From his statement it appeared that Mr. Warner commenced with an investment with Grant & Ward of $6400. He received that back with a large profit, and invested again in the firm, and again was a gainer. Eventually he was induced to make larger ventures, and borrowed money from outsiders at two per cent per month, which he lent to Grant & Ward, receiving for it twenty per cent a month. Mr. Warner, according to Ward's statement, invested altogether fourteen millions, on which he made a profit of five millions. He received three millions, and would have received the other two if the firm had not failed at the time it did. It may be hoped that Mr. Ward will go on with these disclosures. Probably the firm had many clients of the Warner type, and the public would like to know who they were.

The Memorial to General Grant Has Been the subject of much discussion, there being considerable difference of opinion as to the form it should take. Ex-Governor Cornell, who is Chairman of the Executive Committee, has given utterance to his individual ideas on the subject. He proposes that a memorial column of commanding proportions shall be erected, containing a memorial chapel, in which the remains shall be placed. In connection with it a building to be used as a library for works relating to the Civil War and the wars with England; and thirdly a museum of war relics. He also proposes that on the walls of the buildings tablets should be placed on which should be emblazoned the names and record of services of our military and naval heroes.

The Trial of the Editor of the Pall Mall Gazette and his five fellow-defendants, on the charge of abducting a child, was continued on three days last week. The mother of the child gave her evidence glibly, but the cross-examination elicited the damaging fact that she let her child go off with a stranger, without even taking the trouble to ascertain to what locality she was going. One of the lawyers for the defence declared that when the time came he would prove that both Mrs. Armstrong, Eliza's mother, and Mrs. Broughton, one of the agents employed in buying the child, were aware that the girl was being sold for an immoral purpose, and had no reason to suppose the purchaser was not the villain creature he professed to be. The lawyer said he could also prove that the two women share the money received for her delivery into the hands of Mrs. Jarrett. It is a significant fact that the religious journals support Mr. Stead strongly, or, if disagreeing with some of his methods, they point out bitterly the anomaly that the government prosecutes the exposer of this vice, but shows no desire to attack the perpetrators of it. Mr. Stead says that if it be comes necessary he shall summon as witnesses the Archbishop of Canterbury, Cardinal Manning, John Bright, Lord Shaftesbury, and with them some titled men who have been guilty of the crimes he has exposed. As he is technically guilty of the crime of abduction, he expects to be sent to prison. The other defendants are Bramwell Booth, the son of the chief of the Salvation Army, Mr. Jacques, the sub-editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, and three women who assisted in the purchase of the girl.

The Deaths from Small-Pox in Montreal last week numbered one hundred and seventeen. The physicians reported at the end of the week six hundred cases on their books, but they admit that those figures do not represent the extent of the epidemic, as a large number of cases are concealed. One authority expresses his belief that there are not less than two thousand cases in the city. The quarter where the disease is most prevalent is the poorest and filthiest, and the houses are miserable hovels crowded with children. The rooms are close and unventilated, and large families are huddled together. They are chiefly French Canadians. It is among these people that the small-pox is raging, and a case was accidentally discovered on September 11th, where eight small rooms in a single tenement house were occupied by thirty-eight people, thirteen of whom were suffering from the disease. The French are decidedly averse to vaccination, which they stigmatize as "the mark of the beast." It is believed that compulsory vaccination would produce a riot.

The Spanish-German Difficulty is Complicated by the attitude of the Spanish people, which embarrasses the government in its efforts to achieve a pacific settlement. A newspaper correspondent in Berlin reports that the Emperor William has received a note from the King of Spain expressing the hope that Germany will recognize the prior rights of Spain to the Carolines, even to the islands which German cruisers have already occupied, and says that Spain will insert in the Gazette an ample apology in the name of King Alfonso, the government, and the country for the insults to the German embassy. The Emperor William telegraphed to King Alfonso direct that he never had the slightest intention to trench upon Spanish rights, and that he would do nothing that could in any way prejudice his friend and brother sovereign. The secret of Germany's magnanimity appears to be that it is realized in Berlin that any pressure on Spain would involve a revolution in that country and the establishment of a Republic, an event which would be unwelcome to the German Emperor and his Chancellor.

The Ravages of the Cholera in Spain are materially abating. The European correspondent of the New York Herald cables to that journal that, "without undue optimism, it is now permissible to hope that the cholera is in a fair way of disappearing, not only from Spain, but also from the two infected French seaports. After having attained in the former country a daily death rate of about two thousand, the mortality has now fallen to between five and six hundred a day. A large total truly, but a more satisfactory one than has existed any time these past ten weeks." The total number of cases reported in Madrid since September 1st was 10,666, and for the whole of Spain for the same period, 23,644. The total number of deaths from the disease throughout Spain since September 1st was 6379.

An Italian Correspondent in Philadelphia, who writes to express his thanks for the sketch of Mazzini which appeared in this journal on September 3d, and which he indorses from personal knowledge, desires us to make an addition to the facts there mentioned. He states that after Louis Napoleon made his attack on Rome in 1849, Mazzini wrote him an open letter reminding him of his crimes against France, as well as against Italy, and closing with the prediction which was remarkably fulfilled: "When France shall have wiped away the blot from her forehead which you have set there, those who are now catering to your low tastes and showering upon you their lying praises will arise and heap crimes upon you; and as an atonement for your crimes you will die in exile."

The Visit of Mr. William Noble, the Famous temperance evangelist from London, has been made the occasion of a grand temperance demonstration by the Massachusetts total abstinence societies. As the notice of the meeting did not reach the office of this journal until Friday last, we were unable to publish it last week. It was announced to take place on September 16th at Washacum Grove, and was to include the temperance men of the eight cities and one hundred and four towns of Worcester and Middlesex counties. Beside Mr. Noble, the guest of the day, several orators were expected to speak. Among them the Revs. A. A. Miner, D.D., of Boston; W. H. Boole, of New York, and E. S. Potter, of Malden. As Mr. Noble is now arranging the programme of his temperance tour, societies desiring his services should communicate with him at once to the care of Mr. J. B. Gough, Hillside, Worcester, Mass.

A Grand Centennial Temperance Celebration will be held in Philadelphia next week. Mr. J. N. Stearns, the indefatigable secretary of the National Temperance Society, informs us that the various temperance organizations and several religious denominations of the country have decided to celebrate the one hundredth anniversary of the temperance reform during the week commencing September 20th, 1835. It has issued a call for a "Centennial Temperance Conference," to be held in the city of Philadelphia, on Wednesday and Thursday, September 23d and 24th, and requests every temperance organization and church in the land to send delegates. Addresses are expected at these meetings from John B. Gough, Rev. Dr. T. L. Cuyler, George W. Bain, Miss F. E. Willard, John B. Finch, Mrs. J. E. Foster, General C. B. Fisk, Rev. Dr. A. G. Lawson, and many other popular speakers. Further information furnished by J. N. Stearns, 58 Reade Street, New York.

The World-Renowned Fulton Street Daily prayer-meeting will celebrate the twenty-eighth anniversary of its inauguration on Wednesday next, September 23d, by a public meeting. It will be held in the Middle Church, corner of Lafayette Place and Fourth Street, New York, at noon on that day. The venerable pastor who has conducted the meetings for so many years is to be congratulated on this anniversary. Few if any men are so well prepared as he by personal observation to testify that we have a prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God.

General Grant's Urbanity was One of his Most conspicuous characteristics, and many instances of it have been described since his death. A singularly beautiful illustration of it, which has never before appeared in print, was related to the editor of this journal the other day by a gentleman who witnessed it. Soon after President Lincoln's death, President Johnson and his Cabinet paid a visit to New York, General Grant being of the party. There were crowds of people everywhere eager to see the distinguished visitors, but all were especially anxious to see the illustrious hero whose name was on every tongue, and whose features were not so familiar in this city then as they were afterward. Near the conclusion of the visit it was learned that the Presidential party would embark at a certain pier at Manhattanville, and there a crowd collected. Among them were a few poor servant girls, who took their stand in the shadow of a pile of lumber. The President and his Cabinet went on board in state, but Grant was not with them, and the crowd waited on. Presently he was seen walking unconcernedly down to the pier, apparently unconscious that he was the object of every gaze. When opposite the pile of lumber he saw the girls, halted, walked across to the group, and raising his hat, shook hands affably with each, and without saying a word, walked on to the boat. It was a simple, kindly act, but the great man evidently knew that it would gratify the poor girls, and in doing it he showed his greatness. A mean man would have passed them by with disdain. It is a source of comfort to us to know that that element of true greatness was a prominent characteristic of the Son of God during His life on earth. When the mothers brought their children to Him, the disciples rebuked them, but "He was much displeased," and took the little ones in His arms (Mark 10: 13, 14).

The Birth of a Star Caused some Excitement among astronomers last week. It is in the nebula of Andromeda, and is now visible to the naked eye on the eastern horizon. On August 10th there was no sign of the star. Several astronomers say that they examined the nebula about that date, and it presented its usual cloudlike appearance. A little later a small bright point was observed in it which gradually grew brighter and more distinct, until it has now the appearance of a fully developed star. One astronomer calculates that it is thirty million times larger than the sun. Its sudden appearance is unaccounted for, and upsets all astronomical theories about the origin of stellar worlds. An American astronomer identifies it with a star which appeared suddenly three hundred and eighty years ago, and subsequently faded from vision. Reckoning backward, he calculates that if that interval regularly elapsed between its appearances it would be visible about the time of the birth of Christ, and may have been the Star of Bethlehem which the wise men saw. That, however, would not explain the Gospel narrative of its travels and halting-place. Matt. 2: 2, 9.

A Soldier's Bullet-Proof Shield is a Novel invention described in the current number of a scientific journal. For a long time generals have wished that some better means could be devised of protecting a soldier advancing against an enemy's lines than the earthen barrette, which he had to extemporize with his bayonet wherever he might be halted. The storm of well-directed rifle bullets rendered the earthwork practically worthless, and a more readily available and more efficient shelter for the common soldier was called for. Some one has come forward with a new arm of defence in the shape of a steel shield, which can be attached by a sort of sleeve at the extremity of a rifle. Each soldier, instead of having to throw up a "cover" at every place he may be halted under the fire of the enemy, carries his cover along with him, ready for use at any moment. Whether the new addition to the soldier's equipment will be of any real service remains to be practically tested, but some military men regard it with favor. Precisely such a protection is needed in spiritual warfare, and it is provided. The Christian soldier's shield has passed the test thousands of times. It is proved by innumerable testimonies to be "a readily available and efficient shelter" (Eph. 6: 16).

A Lover Threatened with a Shotgun had to postpone his courtship at Red Bend, Washington Territory, recently. It seems they have been having considerable trouble out there with their lady settlers. Every grown lady in the town was married or engaged, and there were over two hundred bachelors desiring to enter the married state. They were not able to keep a school-teacher or a servant. Before they had been in the town a month they were married. One farmer especially had experienced annoyance from this cause. Every servant he engaged left him to be married as soon as he learned the ways of the household and was becoming useful. It was necessary, however, to have a servant, and he persevered. At last he became exasperated, and having secured a new servant, he resolved to keep off all lovers. She had not been there long before he noticed a young man slinking around his place, and seizing his shotgun, he went out. "What do you want here?" he asked. "Nothing," said the fellow, coloring up a little; "nothing much. I was just calling on the girl in there. She's an old friend of my family." "Well, I'm a friend of your family, too," said the farmer, "to the extent that I don't want to kill you; but if you don't keep away from here I'll murder you." The farmer's manner was so menacing that the young man went away. But a few days later the girl was missing, and the farmer learned that she and the young man had been married by the justice that morning. His opposition to the marriage, as the bride and her predecessors doubtless knew, was due to regard for his own convenience, into which the question of their welfare did not enter; and as they preferred marriage to a life of servitude, they did not consider him. It is a pity that sinners do not show the same resolution when they are urged to quit Satan's shameful service, with its dreadful wages, and defying his opposition, begin a life of union with Christ (Rom. 6: 22, 23).

A Buried Treasure has been exhumed near Ballwin, Mo. Three weeks ago a stranger appeared at Manchester, Mo., and after remaining a few hours left in company with a laboring man belonging to the town. They went to Pond Post-Office, a village near Ballwin, taking with them a miner's outfit. All the next week they spent in digging, and at the end had excavated to a depth of fourteen feet. At that point their picks struck a stone crock or jar, and a little further digging discovered another crock of exactly the same size. They did not have the patience to open the jars in the ordinary way, but broke them with their spades and picks, when out rolled a golden treasure of coins worth not less than $35,000. A good many theories have been advanced as to how the money came there. If any suspicion had been entertained that such a treasure was hidden there it would not have been left undiscovered for a quarter of a century. A very slight clue to the spot would have been sufficient to set a crowd digging. It is not so with that "treasure hid in a field" of which the Saviour spoke. That is neglected, though the reward is priceless, and diligent search is always successful (Matt. 13: 44).

Five Days and Nights in a Mine-Hole were passed by a young man at Narrow Valley, near Lebanon, Pa., recently. On Wednesday, August 29th, a man and his son, who was seventeen years old, set out for Third Mountain in search of mountain tea. They became separated in the afternoon, and when evening came the father called for his boy, but could not find him. Next day his friends helped him to search, but found no traces of the boy. Friday, Saturday, and Sunday they explored, but in vain. All gave up except the devoted father, who again went out on Monday. He searched till evening, and was about giving up in despair when he saw a disused mine-hole near the edge of a hill, and he resolved to make a last effort. He knelt and hallowed down the hole. To his inexpressible delight he heard the voice of his son saying, "Father, I am down here." The old man aroused the neighbors, who lowered a rope one hundred and fifty feet long to the bottom of the hole. The boy was just strong enough to tie the rope to his body, and the men drew him up. He was nearly dead, having been there five days and nights. He said that in the dark he had tumbled down the air-vent, which, being zig-zagged, broke his fall and saved his life. Although he was horribly bruised, he thought he would have to starve to death. Doubtless he would have done so had his father's love been less strong and patient than it was. It was to such a search that the Saviour compared His own mission in the world (Luke 15: 4-7).

THE HISTORY OF LITTLE-FAITH.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And immediately Jesus stretched forth His hand, and caught him, and said unto him, O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?" — MATTHEW 14:31.

Why Peter was Called Little-Faith—His Faith and Doubt—I. Little-Faith's History—A True Disciple though a Faulty one—Has Great Longings—Is Daring—Apt to Look Away from Christ—Began to Sink—Knew How to Pray—II. Little-Faith Acknowledged—Is Helped to Walk—III. Little-Faith Delivered—IV. Little-Faith Rebuked—The Bona Fides of Jehovah.

THERE is only one word in the original for the phrase, "O thou of little faith!" The Lord Jesus virtually addresses Peter by the name of "Little-faith," in one word. I do not suppose that Peter had ever before dreamed of that name as applicable to himself. Possibly he had thought in his heart that his faith was strong even to assurance. Peter is strong in faith on board the ship, strong in faith even as he walks the waters; but that unexpected gust of wind, which came howling down from the mountains, took him aback, staggered him, and caused his faith to reel. Then the waters yielded under his feet, and as he began to sink he discovered his own weakness, and had his discovery confirmed by the verdict of his Lord, who surnamed him Little-faith. Let no man think of himself beyond his own experience. Experience is the true gauge; and he who boasts of an untried faith is puffed up with vain glory.

OVERESTIMATES.

When a man begins to be secure in himself he will court temptation, he will rashly venture upon needless experiments, and in the end will need to cry in plaintive accents, "Lord, save me." Learn, then, on the threshold of the text, that we are not as strong as we think we are, and that, when we are most brave and daring, we may not be quite so far removed from fear and trembling as we imagine. Alas! that unbelief should mar even Peter's faith. Let him who thinks that he can walk the waves take heed lest he sink beneath them.

Peter's mixture of unbelief was not to be justified, nor may it be used as an excuse for ourselves. We shall speak of it as a matter of fact, but not as an example; for it was an improper and unreasonable thing. The truth is that the Christian has no cause for doubting his Lord. The whole course of the Lord's dealing is calculated to inspire confidence. He has done nothing to create a suspicion of his love, or truth, or power. If we never doubt till we have cause for doubting, our life will be rich with faith. It is concerning little faith, and its faults and its unreasonableness, that I have to speak at this time; may God grant that all the Little-faith family may be helped to stronger confidence. May the Holy Ghost bless the Word, and enable many a Ruth to pick up those handfuls that are let fall on purpose for the feeble folk who glean in these fields.

I. Our first topic will be LITTLE-FAITH'S HISTORY.

It is sketched in the story of Peter. We are each one apt to act over again the part which Peter played in this narrative. Little-faith is a true disciple, though a faulty one. Not the littleness of the faith, but the faith itself is the gift of God. None but God could make a grain of mustard-seed; none but God can give even the least particle of living faith. Faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, however feeble it may be, is a fruit of the Spirit of God, and a token of the new birth. Even the faith which can get no further than to touch the hem of Christ's garment is the work of the Spirit of God; even that faith which cries, "Lord, I believe; help Thou mine unbelief" is, as to its existence, though not as to its infirmity, the creation of the most High.

Very early in its life Little-faith has great longings. See it in Peter's case. He is on board ship with his brethren while Jesus is yonder upon the waters; and Peter is so earnest to come at his Lord, and be with Him, that he is ready to plunge into the sea to reach Him. Why could he not wait as the others did? His immediate duty was in the ship with his brethren; but his vehement desires carried him above commonplace toiling and rowing. Strong faith exhibits patience where

LITTLE-FAITH IS IN A HURRY.

It was well to have longings for Jesus; but it would have been wiser to have waited while the Lord came walking over the sea to the ship. The quiet, self-possessed Christian has deep longings for his Lord; but he has the assured conviction that his Lord will come to him if he continues faithful to His present duty, and therefore he waits upon the Lord. I rejoice in the blossom of the apple-tree; it is not so valuable as the fruit, but it is exceedingly beautiful; and, even so, the eager longings of a trembling heart after the Lord Jesus are full of loveliness and fragrance, and are by no means to be despised. It is the nature of little-faith that it should be of a thirsty and eager temperament, and hasty to make a dash for present fellowship with Christ.

LITTLE-FAITH WAS DARING.

Early in her life she had intense longings, and they grew so that Little-faith was willing to venture everything to have her longings fulfilled. "If it be Thou, bid me come unto thee on these waters"—thus doth Little-faith cry to her Lord. These are big words, but they come out of a trembling heart. Men often venture all the more because their capital is so small. Souls who are little in faith are often put upon desperate measures to gain hope. O beloved, are there not some of you who would give your eyes and ears, and your very lives, to see Christ, and to taste of His love? You have come up to the Tabernacle this morning feeling that if Christ bade you plunge into the sea to find Him, you would think nothing of it. Little-faith can yet be a true hero when the Lord saith to her, "Come." It is not the sea she fears; her concern is lest the Lord should frown upon her.

At times Little-faith accomplishes great wonders. Peter, when his Master said, "Come," went down upon the waters and walked the waves with ease. The Lord puts forth His strength even when we reveal our own weakness of faith. Peter took one step, and then another upon the rolling wave, wondering all the while how ever it could be. Has not your little-faith done this? I remember the first step of faith I took, how I wondered at it, and wondered at myself. Have not you also been amazed at yourselves? Do you remember when you believed that God had saved you, seeing you had faith in Christ? Was it not a piece of daring to you? Walking on the water could not have been more venturesome. You stood upright when tempted; you held on, though sore beset by the enemy; you walked toward Jesus, though the way seemed to be on the sea; a high exhilaration upraised your spirit, you rose out of yourself; but yet down deep within there was a latent fear, a half-developed apprehension that your confidence was too good to last, that your joy was presumptuous. In your very heart you were afraid of sinking; and it was no wonder that by-and-by your fear became matter of fact.

But now comes in another bit of our history: Little-faith is too

from the Lord. Peter, as he walked those billows, took his eye off from his Master, and just then a tremendous hurricane rushed boisterously in his face, and poor Peter was alarmed. This is the danger of Little-faith. Little-faith, at the outset, is scarcely comprehensive enough; it does not take a full view of all the possible dangers and difficulties; and so when that which it has omitted comes to the front, it is very apt to be sorely troubled. Little-faith, thy hope lies in keeping thy little self wholly dependent upon thy great Lord. If thou beginnest to measure circumstances, it will go ill with thee, poor trembling creature that thou art! What have you and I to do with measuring?

Now, the moment he took his eye off his Master and thought of the wind,

LITTLE-FAITH BEGAN TO SINK.

You see him going down; he is ready to perish; the proud waters prevail against him; he has no power whatever to help himself. I should suppose that Peter being a fisherman, could swim. Why did he not strike out? Mark this, when a man begins to live by faith, if his faith fails him, even his natural ability fails with his faith. He that could swim with no faith originally, will not swim when once by faith he has begun to walk the waters. Should he fail in his walking he cannot fall back on his swimming. "Beginning to sink" is a terrible condition. Poor Little-faith, it never reckoned on this! Is that the condition of any child of God here this morning? I must confess it has sometimes been mine. There was a step, and scarce a step, between me and death. That which bore me up appeared to give way, and the waters came in even unto my soul.

Let me not finish this history of Little-faith without saying that Little-faith

KNEW HOW TO PRAY.

Though Peter did not know how to come to Christ on the waters, he knew how to come to him by prayer. Though his faith was not what it ought to be, it was where it ought to be; for his cry was to his Lord alone. He did not appeal to his brethren in the vessel, but only to his dear Master who stood so firmly on the rolling wave. "Beginning to sink," he cried, "Lord, save me." Little children are good at crying, if at nothing else, and so is Little-faith. When Jacob was greatly afraid, he became bold enough to wrestle at Jabbok. Even Little-faith has prayer for its vital breath, its native air. Where there is life, there is breath; and where there is faith, there is prayer. O soul, art thou sinking? Then cry, "Lord, save me!"

Now in this little picture, have any of you recognized yourselves? Do you long for Christ? Would you venture all things for His dear sake? Do you trust Him? Have you enjoyed happy moments when by faith you have accomplished things impossible to mere sense? Have you sometimes believed, and in that belief found an upbearing for your spirit that made you more than conqueror? Then, if at this moment there should be a collapse, and your faith should waver, pray unto the Lord. He stands fast if you do not. It is your wisdom to cry mightily in this your time of need; and as surely as the Lord liveth, He will come to your rescue. Among all the carcasses that shall be washed up on the Dead Sea shore there shall never be found the corpse of Little-faith.

At the end Little-faith will grow to full assurance, and will come up into the vessel, yea, unto heaven with Christ. Little-faith shall find its way across the Jordan, and stand in its lot in the end of the days; and perhaps among the most rapturous song that shall ever salute the Redeemer's ear will be the song of those who were weak and trembling when they were here below, and yet were kept unto the end. Therefore, have confidence!

II. I come now to the second head of my discourse, which is an interesting one—by the Lord. In my text you will observe the Saviour did not say, "O thou of no faith," or "O thou of pretended faith," but "O thou of little faith." There are times when we would give all that we have if we could only have our Master's assurance that we have even a little faith. If He does but own that it is faith, then the root of the matter is in us. I would rather have great faith than little faith; but I would rather have little faith than have great presumption, and mistake it for holy confidence. It ought to have comforted Peter, even as it did rebuke him, to hear his Lord, who could not make a mistake, acknowledge that he had faith. A pearl is a pearl, though it be no bigger than a pin's head. God's signature is as valid when he writes it small as when he uses capitals.

very solid reason at the back of it. O child of God, little as thy faith may be, yet if thou believest in Christ thou hast faith most proper and justifiable; in fact, so strong is the ground of thy little faith that the Saviour even asks thee, "Wherefore didst thou doubt?" As much as to say, "You have every reason for your faith, but what reason have you for doubting?" Oh, dear heart, if thou dost come to Christ and cast thyself on Him thou art doing the best and the rightest thing that thou canst do, and none can question thy conduct. Ask more faith, and He will give more faith, and fulfil to thee greater promises; go from faith to faith, and thou shalt receive blessing upon blessing.

Our Lord Jesus, owned little-faith because, little as it was, it ventured all for Him. Peter had thrown himself into the sea to come to his Master, and the Lord recognized that fact. He who ventures all for Jesus and on Jesus shall not find it to be a losing speculation. Though you dare not say that you have strong faith, yet you give up the world's pleasures, and its sinful gains, and its pleasing smiles, for Christ; you would not deny Him for all the treasures of Egypt; well, then, our Lord will acknowledge you as His, and bear you harmless in the end.

LITTLE-FAITH'S MERITS.

Little-faith, in the case of Peter, was coming to Jesus all the while. Peter, when he left the ship, left it to come to Jesus, and for that purpose only. The first step he took upon the sea was toward Jesus, and every other step was toward Jesus; and when he began to sink he sank that way, leaning toward his Master, and crying as he went down, "Lord, save me!" Now, the Lord Jesus always owns a faith which comes toward him, however lame it may be. If thou hast a faith which looks to thyself, a curse rests upon it. If thou hast a faith which looks to priests, it is superstition. If thou hast a faith which looks to ceremonies, creeds, prayers, and feelings, it will fail thee when most thou needest help. But if thou hast a faith whose eyes are to Jesus, whose longings are for Jesus, whose hopes are all centred in Jesus, whose steps all tend to Jesus, then thou hast a faith upon which Jesus sets His seal, and though He calls it "little," yet He calls it "faith."

Once more, the Master acknowledges this faith; for, before long, Little-faith came to walk with Jesus on the sea. I think I have seen a picture of Peter sinking and Christ stooping to save him; but I wish that some eminent artist would paint the two walking together in peace, Peter and his Lord. What joy to think that Little-faith, once drawn from the deep, stands on those foaming waves side by side with the great saving Lord! Now is Peter conformed to his Lord. Now is the servant clothed with the might of his Master. Is it not a splendid, reassuring truth, that Little-faith can grow to act like Christ? The day shall yet come when the Lord shall have so strengthened Little-faith that the things that the Lord doeth shall Little-faith do also, and the word shall be fulfilled, "Greater works than these shall ye do; because I go unto my Father."

III. In the third place I want you to notice Little-faith's deliverance.

Little-faith began to sink, but it was only a beginning. The sinking did not end in Peter's drowning, but in his Lord's saving. The text saith, "beginning to sink;" and truly that is the whole matter. None of God's people shall go beyond "beginning to sink." Oftentimes "beginning to sink" with us, is with Christ beginning to stretch out His hand. The beginning of a clear sense of our own weakness, is often the beginning of the display of the power of God.

Little-faith received its deliverance wholly from the Lord. As I have already said, it was not Peter's swimming that got him out of his trouble, nor was it any revival of Peter's faith which did it, but the Lord came to the rescue, and proved His power to help at a dead lift. So shall it be with thee, O trembling heart; in the hour of thine extremity God shall appear for thee. The Lord will provide. Out of weakness thou shalt be made strong; for He said: "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee."

It was of the Lord, and therefore it was immediate. Will you kindly note that word in the text, "and immediately Jesus stretched forth His hand." Before He rebuked him for his little faith, He delivered him from his peril. O Little-faith, thou hast but to cry, and the Lord will help thee.

It is added, he "caught him." Thus the Lord came into personal contact with His servant. See, He holds him up. O Little-faith, thou dost feel a closer union to Christ in thine hour of danger than ever before! A half-hoping, half-despairing soul lays hold on Jesus with an iron grip, and on such a poor feeble one the hold of Jesus is equally tight and strong. He will never let the sinking sinner die when once that prayer has been uttered, "Lord, save me." I hardly know of a more conscious union between a man and Christ than that which is effected when in sinking times the grip of the crucified hand is felt as our sole rescue from death. The Lord must and will stretch out His hand and catch the sinking one, and grant him the same standing as Himself.

IV. I close with

LITTLE-FAITH REBUKED.

That comes last. After the poor soul is quite rescued, and set on a sure footing, then comes the loving chiding: "O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?" This is such a gentle rebuking that it almost seems to me that the Master might say as much as this to us when we enter Paradise with Him. It might not be unkind even there to say, "Wherefore didst thou doubt?" When you and I have come up from our dying beds, and left all pain, and poverty, and sorrow far behind, we shall find ourselves in the golden-streeted city, and the Well-Beloved with us, and we shall look back on all the way whereby He led us; and then He may lovingly whisper in our ear: "Wherefore didst thou doubt?" Look back on thy pilgrim way. There is the Slough of Despond dried up; there is Giant Despair's head on a pole; there is Apollyon bound with chains; there is the river whose chill stream so often frightened thee, glittering in the eternal light. "Wherefore didst thou doubt?" You doubted about nothing. You made mountains out of molehills.

ODD PEOPLE.

Notice, dear friends, with regard to this question, "Wherefore didst thou doubt?" that it is an inconsistent thing for a believing man to doubt his God, or distrust the power of the Lord Jesus. You do believe, and if you believe, why doubt? If faith, why little faith? If you doubt, why believe? And if you believe, why doubt? Oil and water will not mix. Oh, how should faith and unbelief unite? Yet they are often found together in deadly warfare. "Oh," said a dear sister in Christ to me the other day, "I cannot doubt my God." Yet she also expressed a fear lest she should be wrong at the last. This was an odd mixture in one who knew so well the glorious Gospel; but then we are all odd in some way or other. In any case it is not meet that we believe and yet disbelieve.

Once again, how inexcusable is this doubting among you who do believe! The only excuses worth mentioning are these. Some excuse themselves because they desire to be humble. "I dare not think that these good things are true to me, I know that I am altogether unworthy of them, and I am afraid of being proud if I take them to myself." Do you not know, dear friend, that the biggest pride in all the world is doubting God? and it is the sweetest humility to trust in God as a child trusts its father. It is the lowliest action of the heart to say, "These things are good, exceeding good, and I am most unworthy; but then the Lord hath said that He gives these gracious gifts to the unworthy; and, if He hath said it, God forbid that I should question Him." Who am I that I should venture to raise a doubt about the bona fides of the Lord Jehovah?

You that have not believed in Jesus, I have tried to show the way of salvation by faith in Christ. You that have believed but tremblingly, I have pointed out to you much that ought to comfort you. And to you who can believe with full assurance, I would say, Guard that full assurance with great care; it is heaven below, it is the beginning of heaven above. The Lord, the Holy Spirit, be with you all, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

THE European correspondents of the New York papers have sent to this country amusing accounts of the great demonstration which took place on August 22d, in Hyde Park, London. They have exercised their wit upon it, and doubtless many of our subscribers have laughed over the facetious letters the papers have published. They treat the matter as a huge joke; but, rightly considered, the affair is by no means a jest. It is very much the reverse of that. The people of England—that is, the middle and lower classes are in dead earnest about it, and their indignation is at a pitch at which it cannot be safely trifled with. It is currently reported that one of the chief sinners—a man charged with having purchased children and young girls in London for immoral purposes—is the proprietor of an American journal, who has diverted himself during his visits to the British metropolis with these vicious adventures. That fact, if it is true, may explain the attitude of one paper on the subject. His name has been disgraced so often on this side, that exposure will not cause him much pain, but it is gratifying to learn that the people of England have forced their Parliament to pass a law, under which, if he repeats his crimes on his next visit, and is caught, he will be imprisoned with hard labor for two years. The American people would hear of his incarceration with unanimity.

How important the demonstration was, may be inferred from the fact that, while some reporters estimated the number of people present at five hundred thousand, there seem to have been none who placed it below seventy thousand. It is a warning that may wisely be heeded, when even seventy thousand persons are in earnest in declaring that the vicious men around them shall cease to prey on innocent women and children. The Rev. William Arthur, the author of "The Tongue of Fire," who was present, says: "I got upon a brake to obtain

of the whole concourse in the great park. A great broad belt of life—of manhood—stretched from as far as one could see on either hand. As a mere multitude, it would have been grand; as a multitude met to make for righteousness, it seemed to me one of the

for the future that my eyes ever beheld. Estimating numbers by the eye alone, is what I have long given up, except in a building. Guesses up or guesses down are generally absurdly wrong. All I know is that, calling to mind the sights I had seen, it appeared to me most to resemble for multitude the Fete de la Fraternité of 1848, in Paris, when Lamartine and his Provisional Government sat under the Arc de Triomphe, and the forces marched all up the Champs Elysées encompassed by great throngs. As among the crowds I passed up Piccadilly the streets of London never seemed to me so sweet; and when I entered my own house, I said: 'I am years younger.'

There were twelve platforms for the speakers. Our illustration on page 604 represents the scene at No. 6 platform, when Mr. Stead,

THE EDITOR OF THE "PALL MALL GAZETTE," (whose portrait appeared in this journal on August 6th), rose to speak. He received a perfect ovation. In the course of his address, he said: "I have never addressed an out-of-door meeting before in my life, and I shall never, if I grow to be as old as Methuselah, address a meeting of which I am prouder than that which I see to-day. Oh, I am proud of London this day! If I had said all that I have had to say, terrible as it was, to Paris or Berlin, there would have been no great demonstration like this.

"You have come from your crowded streets, from your busy thoroughfares, and from your steaming alleys, in order to register

upon murderous crime—to express the infinite pity that glows within the breast of every true man for sisters who have fallen, and also to express with all the force and power that lie within reach of you, an aspiration after some nobler and better future—when we shall no longer have to know that all round us, in our street, and park, and square, there are young girls who would have been pure if they could, but who, unwittingly and unwillingly, have been trapped and inveigled and rushed into vice. People say there is no need to go on with your agitation, but there is a great need to go on with your action. Just before coming to this meeting, a letter was given to me, written by an occasional member of our staff who has contributed to it ever since the paper was started. But this time he signed himself as he had never signed himself before. He says, 'I sign myself as the father of a daughter who has been ruined.' (Sensation.)

In a grand house well known to the police—because they have all the information and there is a warrant out against the man who did it—within the last few weeks, while London has been stirred with intense emotion, and the heart of the people has been throbbing with a great indignation, there has been a man, a very rich man, who has employed a young girl to decoy other young girls into his house. (Cries of 'name, name, name.') No, I will not; I would have named him willingly, but the person from whose letter I quote, said: 'I give you the names in confidence.' But I hope it will soon all come out in the police court. The girl employed by this man had brought in first and last no fewer all of whom were women unprotected by the law up to last Friday. They were all over thirteen, and virtuous. One by one they were brought into that house, out of which they departed maidens never more. But as they were thirteen years old, it will only be possible to punish him—if it is possible to punish him—under a charge of conspiracy. (Cries of 'Lynch him! lynch him!') If, instead of this crime having been committed under the old law, it had been perpetrated this week, we should have given that man two years' hard labor—from which, according to eminent judges, if vigorously enforced, very few men are robust enough to emerge alive. So be it done unto all those who make use of their wealth and the power and the influence which their position gives to ruin and blast the lives of our innocent girls."

A YOUNG man, tall and agile, with intellectual features, was nervously pacing a room luxuriously furnished. Pictures of rare value adorned the walls, and the owner appeared to have made it his study to provide facilities for comfort in every variety of posture. Herbert Leigh, however, did not avail himself of the provision. He was in that condition of mental restlessness in which bodily movement seems a necessary accompaniment to the tension of mind.

Presently the door opened, and an old man, evidently the usual occupant of the room, shuffled in in dressing-gown and slippers. He was not a specimen of happy old age. Lean and cadaverous, with a receding forehead heavily graven with the lines of anxiety and care, his eyes glaring fiercely from under bushy eyebrows, he looked a man whom it would be dangerous to provoke, and to whom the most desperate beggar would not prefer a request for alms. He shuffled slowly to a comfortable seat, sheltered by a screen, and motioning the young man to a seat opposite to him, he sat down to listen to his business.

"Mr. Thornton," Herbert began, "I have come now, as I told you I should at our interview two years ago, to ask for your consent to Ethel's marriage. You taunted me then with my poverty, and expressed your conviction that I could never earn enough to support a wife. I am now a member of a prosperous firm, and am making a sufficient income to maintain your niece in comfort. I inferred from your answer at our last interview that my poverty was your chief objection, if not your only one; now that that is removed, will you not look favorably on my suit?"

The old man listened patiently, but his stony face showed that the young man's suit was unwelcome to him. "You are too late, sir," he said, deliberately; "no definite engagement has yet been made, but my niece's hand is sought by a suitor who is in my opinion a more suitable husband for her in every way than you would be. I should be unmindful of my duty to her if I prejudiced her chances by allowing you to interpose."

"May I ask if the suitor you refer to is your son?"

"I don't recognize your right to put the question," said Mr. Thornton; "but as in a few weeks all the world will probably know, I may as well admit the fact. My son is the suitor, and he has my best wishes for his success."

"You spoke just now, Mr. Thornton, of your duty to your niece; do you think you are doing your duty toward her in promoting her marriage with a man who, as you know, is a vicious, unprincipled man, known everywhere in the city as a drunkard, a gambler, and a seducer of innocent girls? There is no need for apology in so describing him. You know the facts as every man in society knows them, and I believe Augustus is rather proud of the character. Remember that for your niece's welfare you are accountable."

"To you?" asked Mr. Thornton, with a sneer.

"You are accountable to God and to the world, sir, and neither will hold you guiltless if that marriage is solemnized. It would be wicked, sir, a most outrageous thing."

"But still I am not accountable to you, it appears. So we will, if you please, consider this interview at an end. You have made your request, and you have my answer."

At that moment a young lady entered the room, but when she saw the two gentlemen in conversation would have withdrawn, had not Herbert risen and extended his hand. She greeted him cordially, and then going to the old man where he sat, she gently kissed his forehead, and said: "How are you this morning, uncle?"

"Very poorly, my dear," he said, "and in no condition for being worried by unwelcome visitors, though Mr. Leigh does not appear to notice it. But he is going now. You need not leave."

"Ethel," said the young man, "I would not needlessly cause your uncle a moment's distress; but it is due to you to tell you what has brought me here. Two years ago I told your uncle that it was my hope some day to call you mine; but I was then only at the outset of my career, and, as he reminded me, unable to support a wife. Now, through God's goodness, I am in receipt of a good income, and can offer you a home. We have known each other from childhood, and I have reason to believe you would not look on my suit with the disfavor your uncle does. Is it not so?"

Ethel blushed deeply, and kept her eyes fixed on the carpet while Herbert was speaking; but as he finished she moved toward him, and put out her hand. He grasped it eagerly, and drawing her to his breast, embraced her tenderly. She did not resist, but turning to her uncle, as she stood protected by her lover's arm, she extended her disengaged hand to him, saying: "Uncle, we love each other very dearly."

Mr. Thornton took the proffered hand and held it caressingly. He said: "Ethel, dear, I would keep this hand for a more worthy suitor, one who has not yet dared to speak to you of love, but of whom I am sure you would approve, as I do. You know my regard for you; oblige me by declining Mr. Leigh's offer for the present. You can write to him after I have had a private talk with you."

Herbert tried to remove Ethel's hand which Mr. Thornton still held, and bending over her, he said: "I entreat you, Ethel, not to accept the suitor Mr. Thornton refers to. Reject me if you must, but do not, at the peril of a life of misery, fall into the snare laid for you. I beg—"

"Are you forgetting in whose house you are, young man, when you talk of 'snares'?" said Mr. Thornton, his eyes flashing angrily. "Will you be kind enough to relieve us of your presence, or must I summon the servants to eject you?"

"I will go, sir," said Herbert, sadly; "God protect you, my love, as I am sure He will."

It was a hard siege that Ethel had to endure, but she was too devoted a Christian to bear it unhelped. She laid her trouble before her Lord, as Heczekiah did, and in a few months she was delivered. A paralytic stroke prostrated her uncle two weeks after his interview with Herbert Leigh; and though he retained consciousness, and was still eager to win Ethel's consent to the marriage with his son, he could not exert the authority or influence he would have done if he had retained his power of speech. The young man alone had little prospect of success. Though Ethel knew little of the dark side of his character, she was aware that he was not a Christian, and that fact alone would have determined her, even had her regard for Herbert been less warm than it was. She kindly but firmly rejected the suit, and the old man went slowly down the path to the grave, grieving that his cherished scheme had failed. At the last, however, conscience asserted its sway. On the day before he died he made signs for the pad, on which he was now compelled, by his inability to speak, to write his requests, and when it was brought to him by Ethel's ready hand, he wrote: "Forgive me, Ethel, I was selfish; you are doing right; my son is no fit husband for you. May you be happy."

A few weeks after her uncle's funeral, Ethel, having passed through a stormy scene with her deprived cousin, was united in marriage with Herbert Leigh, and both entered upon a life of Christian love and usefulness.

THE SILVER LINING.

A SERIAL STORY.

Behind the Shadow.

HURRIED preparations for the coming journey occupied the good physician and his wife during all that day, which had opened with the crushing news of their darling's death. Stricken—quivering under the blow that had fallen upon them, it was necessary to attend to the day's duties, and to prepare for the comfort of others during their absence. The struggle in such circumstances is always painful, though it produces good results. The bereaved ones, absorbed by their grief, would fain shut themselves up away from the world to weep, and pour out their hearts' bitterness in tears. Driven by a sense of duty into practical action, the wound heals more quickly than it would in morbid indulgence and isolation. The memory of the lost one is cherished just as closely, the mourning is just as sincere when the brain and hand are occupied, as when the bereaved one alone in the desolate rooms weeps and laments the loss in idleness. Meanwhile the shattered nerves gather strength in the performance of duty, and the mind suffers less from the rack of unavailing grief.

Two telegrams were dispatched for assistance. Happily Dr. Arnold and his wife had many friends on whom they could count. The beneficent, helpful lives they had lived had not been without their results. There were numbers indebted to them for support in hours of trial, who would take a sad pleasure in proving their gratitude to them in their trouble. A medical friend would visit Dr. Arnold's patients; Mrs. Arnold's sister would come and superintend domestic affairs, and a telegram was sent to each. A round of professional visits must be made, and Dr. Arnold, hiding in his breast his own woe, went to minister to the suffering of others.

How changed the world seemed from its aspect but twelve short hours before. The light of the physician's life seemed to have gone out. The angel of death, with which he had contended in many a chamber, had dealt him a sudden and treacherous blow, and he shuddered as he thought of the gaping wound it had made in his home. Nevertheless, there was suffering that his skill could assuage, and with the instinctive spirit of helpfulness which was strong within him, Dr. Arnold stood by the beds of patient after patient, the same kind physician as ever, sympathetic, and apparently cheerful. Returning homeward when the last visit had been paid, he took from his pocket the letter he had received that morning, and read again the simple narrative it contained. This was the letter Dr. Arnold read as his horse went at a foot-pace down a leafy avenue in which there were no witnesses to the reader's emotion but the birds carolling merrily on the boughs above him:

LINGFORD, September 21.

"DEAR SIR: It is my most painful duty, as the clergyman of this place, to convey to you the sad tidings of a wreck off our coast, in the fearful storm of last night, and that your daughter, though rescued by a boat which went to the aid of the vessel, has sunk this morning from the effects of the wet and exposure. I think I may say all was done that human aid could do. Your daughter, with Mrs. Campbell and her little girl, were at once brought up to my house, where all restoratives that could be thought of were applied. Mrs. Campbell and her child, we hope, may recover; but I grieve to say your daughter passed away at seven o'clock this morning. I will wait, if possible, to hear from you before I make any further arrangements, and if you and Mrs. Arnold would desire to come here, I beg you will make my house your home. With deep sympathy,

"Believe me, dear sir,

"Truly yours,

"EDWARD LINDSAY."

Dr. Arnold turned his horse's head round when he had read the letter, and wiped the tears from his eyes, and rode back to the town, and dispatched a telegram to the clergyman announcing his intended visit, and then proceeded to his home to make his final preparations.

"How do you think, dear," Mrs. Arnold asked, "it was discovered who our poor darling was, and where we lived?"

"That has puzzled me, too," said the doctor; "but I suppose that Mrs. Campbell must have recovered sufficiently to give the information. Poor lady! she must have been deeply grieved."

Dr. Arnold's surmise was correct. Late in the day on which Grace had died, the clergyman entering the room in which his guest and her little daughter lay, found that she had recovered consciousness. From her he gathered the details of the wreck. It appeared that the voyage had commenced under clear skies and with a smooth sea. Mrs. Campbell and Grace had sat upon deck the greater part of the day, thoroughly enjoying the sea breezes.

About sunset, however, the wind had risen; still none thought of danger. But as the evening wore on, the wind rose higher and higher, the waves increased in strength, till about midnight the crew lost all command of the vessel, and she suddenly struck upon the rocks.

Every available hand on board was set working at the pumps or helping to bale out the water, which kept running in from the gap in the side of the vessel, and which increased in spite of all their efforts to keep it down.

Nobly the captain kept at his post, and cheered his brave men on. Again and again signals of distress were fired, but it seemed as if no help was near. When all were losing heart, the cheer of the rescuers was heard, and again the voice of the captain rang out above the storm:

"Keep on lads, help is coming!"

But the waves ran so high that attempt after attempt was made before either of the boats could come near the vessel. At last they came near enough to allow of some one being let down into one of the boats, and Mrs. Campbell and her child (whom she had throughout been clasping firmly), were lowered, then another attempt was made, and Grace was lowered, but at that moment the boat had fallen in the trough of the sea, and as she rose again a few feet farther from the ship, Grace had fallen into the sea, and had only been dragged into the boat by the almost superhuman efforts of two of the gallant boat's crew.

They were still trying to save the others when a huge wave separated the boat from the vessel, and the latter was driven with a tremendous crash upon the rocks, and falling back she plunged beneath the waves.

All hope was gone, cries and shrieks rent the air, and the noble rescuers knew that the men they had gone to rescue had sunk only a few yards from them.

The boat containing the saved ones was turned mournfully toward the shore, while the other boat waited, hoping to pick up some that might be still floating. They were rewarded by saving four of the crew, but the cries soon ceased, the waves roared on pitilessly, and many were left in their watery grave, there to remain till the sea gives up its dead.

Mrs. Campbell eagerly besought information about Grace Arnold, and Mr. Lindsay being averse even to a kind deception, told her the sad truth, and obtained from her the address of Dr. Arnold, to whom he wrote the letter already quoted.

While this interview was taking place, Jean was paying another visit to the darkened room in which lay all that was mortal of the beautiful dead girl. She was also no one knew even that she was up, yet no sort of fear entered Jean's thoughts as she stood gazing at the lifeless form that lay before her. The features were so calm and peaceful, the expression so perfectly happy and at rest, that Jean felt soothed as she looked. How she longed for the lips to part and speak to her, telling her whither her spirit had taken flight. That she was happy, Jean felt confident, and then the few words she had uttered—"Jesus—the angels—I am coming"—came back to her.

Jean hitherto had put from her all thoughts of God; when she was old, perhaps likely to die, then she would think about Him. She knew Him only as an angry God, a just God, a jealous God; no one had presented to her the love of which which passeth knowledge, that love which spared not His only Son, but freely gave Him up for us all.

She knew that she had a soul that must live forever, she knew that when death came, that soul must stand before God, and that He was the Great Judge. How could she meet Him, she who had thought so little about Him, never once tried to please Him?

The thought was very overwhelming to her, and ringing in her ears a voice seemed to say:

"It might have been you; it might have been you."

She knelt down by the bedside, and sobbed aloud. Presently the door was softly opened. It was Margaret bringing in some white flowers. She started when she saw Jean.

"Jean, is that you? I did not think you were up. What are you doing here, child?"

Even Margaret's voice was scarcely so hard as usual.

"Come," she said, as Jean got up, "go and wash your face, and come down. I want your help; there is a great deal to be done." Jean, accustomed to render prompt obedience to her sister, rose and did her bidding.

The next day was Sunday, and the calamity that had occurred had so solemnized the minds of all in the village that the little church was crowded with worshippers, some of whom were rarely seen there. Death in a frightful shape had come near to them, and even the most reckless had a feeling that a little religion was a good thing to have. The whole service seemed unusually solemn, and Mr. Lindsay paused for silent prayer when he came to the petition for those in sickness, sorrow, or any other adversity.

Then came the sermon, and every eye was fixed on the pulpit as Mr. Lindsay gave out his text, "There is sorrow on the sea." In his remarks, he said: "My friends, we must indeed all feel to-day the truth of these words, 'There is sorrow on the sea.' Never in the memory of the most aged among us has such a storm been known upon our coast, and many of you are mourning this day over unknown brother sailors, who, as you know, sank the other night, so close to shore, to rise no more. Many of you have hearts overflowing with sympathy for the wives and mothers who as yet know nothing of their loss; sympathy, too, for that father and mother who will to-morrow hear that their young daughter has been taken from them. But how many are feeling any sympathy for themselves? How many are saying, 'If it had been me, should I have been ready; ready to be ushered thus suddenly into eternity; ready to meet the just and holy God?' I would speak to each man, each woman; I would take each one by the hand and say this Sabbath morning, 'Are you ready?'"

"Think not, were those poor souls the other night ready? we must leave them with their God. Think not, is your neighbor by your side ready? but are you ready? If not, the door is open still; if not, I am sent as God's ambassador to-day to bid you come. 'Come unto Me,' Christ says, 'all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' Hear His words again: 'I am the way, the truth, and the life.' Is any one saying, 'What must I do to be saved?' Oh, hear the answer in God's own words: 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved.' To-day, O hear His voice! To-day is yours; you may never have a morrow! To-day is the day of salvation."

The little congregation was much moved by the short, simple, but pointed sermon. The people seemed riveted, and many wondered what had come to the old vicar, for he had never been known to preach such a sermon before.

He generally preached in so dry and formal a way, that his people came and went Sunday after Sunday without hearing any word that sent them to their homes longing to know more of the Christ who had given His precious blood for them. Not that Mr. Lindsay did not preach Christ, but he lacked that earnestness, that yearning for the souls of others, that makes men feel their need, that makes each one say to himself: Christ died for sinners, can I say He died for me?

Jean thought that Sunday the longest day she had ever known. In the corner of the large square pew she listened to her father's sermon, and, though his voice had a far-off sound to her, and she felt still as one dreaming, yet she knew she was hearing from his lips tidings she had never heard before. Poor child! she seemed as one blindfolded seeking for the light. Would no one guide her safely to the Good Shepherd's fold?

During the next day Jean was often in the room where the dead lay. She stood for the most part looking lovingly on the face that still bore the impress of that last glad smile which the glimpse of coming glory had called up. Could those silent lips but speak, what could they not tell her! The spirit which had animated that lovely form was now in possession of secrets which no man has ever learned. In all ages, men have sought to know them. Jesus and the Apostles and prophets spoke of them, but for the full conception of that mysterious state, there has been no ground revealed. Jean meditated, and more than once bowed her knees in earnest prayer beside the unanimate form. She retired to rest early, worn out with mental emotion, and almost immediately fell asleep. Consequently she was not present when Dr. Arnold and the bereaved mother arrived.

They were welcomed by Mr. Lindsay and his elder daughter, Margaret, and Mrs. Arnold, weary with her long journey, was easily persuaded to retire to rest. Mr. Lindsay and his guest sat long into the night talking of death and immortality. The clergyman was deeply read, but his lore was widely different from that of the Christian physician, who could tell him of the long and patient efforts of science to discover the seat of the soul in man. It was a long and solemn conversation which extended into the small hours.

The stroke of the clock aroused both gentlemen to the lateness of the hour, and they rose and shook hands with mutual respect. Mr. Lindsay, divining Dr. Arnold's feeling, after showing him the door of his chamber, gently led him to that in which Grace lay, and, telling him what he would find there, bade him good-night.

He went alone into the room, and there, where no human eye could see him, and alone in the presence of his God, he gave vent to his grief. He had loved her dearly—perhaps he did not know till now how dearly, but he must give her back to Him who had lent her to him for a time. His love had been so tender to her, that it came to him freshly now, how God's love to him was such as his for his child, only tenderer still, "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him." God was looking down upon him in his sorrow. He was pitying him now. "He doth not willingly afflict the children of men."

Early the next morning he led Mrs. Arnold to the room; as they entered and quietly closed the door, they did not see that some one was there before them.

It was Jean! She had been so bewildered the last few days, what with the events of the first terrible night, and with her own doubts and fears, that she longed for sympathy—sympathy that no one round her seemed to have leisure to give, even if they had the heart. Now she jumped up, and before Dr. and Mrs. Arnold could stop her, she had fled.

It had been arranged that the funeral should take place that afternoon, for Dr. Arnold was most anxious to see his wife safely home again, and on her account he felt it must not be delayed longer.

A sunny spot on the side of the hill was chosen for Grace's last resting-place, and nearly all the inhabitants of the little village were gathered in the old churchyard, as the small party of mourners made their way slowly up the hill. Many from a distance had sent flowers to be scattered on the coffin, and even the little children had gathered daisies to throw in, fit emblems of the sweet young girl they were to cover.

Later on in the afternoon Mrs. Arnold went alone to the churchyard to take a last long look before she left the next morning for home, when, as she drew near the grave, she thought she heard sobs, and listening, she heard between the sobs: "Oh, mother, mother!"

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 27, Eph. 1:9-14. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

What the Earnest is—The Greek Mode of Conveyance—The Handful of Soil—The Whole Possession beyond Conception—Claims to Present Perfection—Miserable Subterfuges—The Indwelling of the Sinless One—Perfect Love—Physical Life and Health—The Earthen Vessels—Evidences of Possession.

THE earnest, the pledge, the guarantee, the security, the title-deed of our inheritance—what is it, or rather what is He? Nothing less than the Holy Spirit Himself dwelling in us. Three times in Holy Scripture He is called the "Earnest." "Who hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts" (II Cor. 1:22). "Now He that hath wrought us for the selfsame thing is God, who also hath given unto us the earnest of the Spirit" (II Cor. 5:5). "That we should be to the praise of His glory, who first trusted in Christ . . . in whom also, after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance, until the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of His glory." The old Greek mode of conveying land was that the vendor should give to the purchaser a handful of the very soil itself, which he should hold as an earnest until he entered upon the purchased possession in person. In our Christian life, Satan often succeeds in confusing the children of God, by leading them to confound the earnest with the inheritance, and to discount or to deny their present experimental part in Christ, because "the redemption of the purchased possession" is not yet an accomplished fact. We have the earnest, we look for the inheritance.

What is our inheritance? The little glimpses of it which we have in the Word of God are so stupendous and so vast, that the focus of our soul's eye can hardly take them in at all.

"HEIRS OF GOD,

and joint heirs with Christ" (Rom. 8:17). What, heirs of Almightyness? heirs of Infinity? We talk of what we know not, and of which a finite being has no conception, yet "the redemption of the purchased possession" reaches out even there. Omniscience, Omnipresence, all is included in God. Who can draw the line, who can say all that God does mean in these words "heirs of God?" But the earnest? To carry out the figure this must be something of the very substance of our inheritance. God Himself in our spirit; God Himself in our soul; God Himself in our body; a mere handful, as far as our experience goes, because of the littleness of our capacity. God does not make conversion, sanctification, or any other part of our experience, to be the earnest of our inheritance; the earnest is always the Spirit of God, and nothing less in our hearts. The very life of God Himself, the Infinite, yet dwelling in the finite, the treasure, yet in earthen vessels (II Cor. 4:7), the life-giving Spirit, yet dwelling in dying bodies, something of the very same life which Jesus had on earth. "God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost, and with power, who went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil" (Acts 10:38). "The words that I speak unto you I speak not of Myself; but the Father that dwelleth in Me, He doeth the works" (John 14:10). Yet only the handful, only the earnest which is possible to us in our bodies of humiliation, and our lives, subject to be "tempted in all points" down here.

Our inheritance in Christ is perfect sinlessness, because He is without sin; what, then, is the earnest? There are Christians who claim, and even think they have attained a state of perfection in which they cannot sin, and when others point out to them the self and the un-Christlikeness of many of their words and deeds, they adopt the miserable subterfuge that these are mistakes—not sins—or else that they are human infirmities, and thus the conscience, instead of having a divine impress from the mind of God, is lowered in its tone, and becomes less sensitive. Perhaps this arises from confounding the earnest with the inheritance, and thinking that because we have the earnest now, we have also the inheritance in possession. We inherit in Christ absolute sinlessness, the earnest of our inheritance is the Spirit in our hearts, who reveals to us dwelling within us; who, in the very light of Christ, shows us what is sin in His sight, and deals with, cleanses and conquers it. Thus possessing the earnest, and letting the sinless One have His way, He not only cleanses and keeps us clean, but conforms us to His view of what sin is. And yet we cannot forget that the treasure of Christ in us revealed by the Holy Ghost, is still in an "earthen vessel," as liable in itself to sin as ever, only the life that we now live in the flesh we live by the faith of the Son of God, the sinless One; owning Him, and denying, disowning ourselves.

Our inheritance in Christ is mighty, illimitable power. "Ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you" (Acts 1:8). "God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind" (II Tim. 1:7). But, again, we have in hand only an earnest, something of the real thing; the real Holy Ghost by whom Jesus spoke, by whom Jesus did His mighty works, and yet in earthen vessels, not at our own disposal, but exactly the reverse—we at His disposal. The worker of Holy Ghost power is never the man who has the earnest of the Spirit, but the Holy Ghost who has that man at His disposal. "There are diversities of operations, but it is the same God which worketh all in all." "To one is given, by the Spirit, the word of wisdom, to another faith by the same Spirit, . . . the gifts of healing, . . . miracles, . . . prophecy, . . . etc., . . . but all these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit." The earnest of joint heirship of the very fulness of God's power, is the Holy Ghost Himself making use of us for God, and revealing Christ in us as the power of God, while we ourselves are still perfect weakness.

Our inheritance in Christ is PERFECT LOVE.

But we have only the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts, shedding light upon Jesus in us as infallible, irresistible Love, stronger than death itself. Yet, again, we have this treasure in earthen, unloving, unlovable vessels, that in this, as in all else, "the excellency of the power may be of God and not of us." God is Love, and God only; any imitation is spurious. That hard, greedy, cruel selfishness, which men call love, that grasping, demanding thing, oh, how it must hide itself away before the great reality of which it is such a caricature! God is Love, and all real love in any man is God. Christ in us is Love revealed by the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts.

Our inheritance in Christ is physical life and health. When the redemption of the purchased possession shall be a fact, and the redemption of our body (Rom. 8:23), for which we look when Christ shall come, be perfected, then the last enemy, death, shall be "destroyed" (I Cor. 15:26). Meanwhile we have this treasure also in the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead, received as the earnest of our inheritance, does, indeed, now quicken our mortal, dying bodies, by this Spirit that dwelleth in us (Rom. 8:2), just as we trust Him. But we are in ourselves as liable to sickness and death as ever. We have a handful of the real thing, the very eternal life of Jesus, in soul and body, enough for the present need of every hour, and a precious guarantee for all that is to come in the consummation. Many imagine that if they trust their bodies to the Lord for healing, they will be made invulnerable to sickness and even death; we have no such promise, but we have the real "earnest," the real life which death cannot destroy, the real membership of His body, of His flesh, of His bones, the real oneness with Jesus, physically as well as spiritually, which will outlive death; the seeds of resurrection life while still in our mortal bodies.

But have we really the earnest? Have we really and consciously accepted the Holy Ghost to dwell in us as the real "earnest of our inheritance?" "Receive ye the Holy Ghost," "Be filled with the Spirit" (John 20:22; Eph. 5:18), these commands are sufficient warrant for receiving God's precious gift already given, and that not by feeling but by faith, just as we received Jesus at the first. Only by receiving the Holy Ghost, we have a claim upon our inheritance. But how, then, can our inheritance profit us now? Thank God, it is a security on which we can trade, and the resources of our inheritance are developed just in proportion as we are tried. "We are troubled on every side" by the temptations of Satan, by the misunderstanding of friends, by the reverses of business, by the natural weakness of our bodies. What then? As the Holy Spirit, the Earnest of our inheritance reveals Jesus, we are "not distressed." Christ in us is equal to meet it all. "We are perplexed, but He who is to us 'the wisdom of God,' knows what to do, and He dwells in us to direct us. We are 'persecuted, but not forsaken,' by Him who says: 'Lo, I am with you always.' We may be 'cast down,' but not kept down, 'not destroyed.' All these things are but by which we are "bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body." It is the loving provision of our God, that "we which live are always delivered unto death for Jesus' sake." Everything may appear to go wrong, all to be at cross purposes, that the supernatural life of Christ in us may be made manifest in our mortal flesh. Christ's patience when we are provoked, shining through us. His love to those who are cold to us. His physical life when ours would fail under a physical strain. And thus we learn to see that all things are for our sakes; our outward man may perish, all the human seems to fail, strength, wisdom, talent, human love fail, yet Christ in us "is renewed day by day." And thus our light affliction which is but for a moment worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, while we look not at the things which are seen, "but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal" (II Cor. 4:18).

Mr. WILLIAM NOBLE, the Gospel Temperance Evangelist, now Visiting America.

MR. WILLIAM NOBLE,

THE GOSPEL TEMPERANCE EVANGELIST NOW VISITING AMERICA.

An Evening with Jerry McAuley—A Momentous Effect—Birth and Early Life—Runs away to Sea—Captured by the Liquor Fiend—Successful Venture in Business—Ruined by Drink—"Won't You Sign the Pledge?"—Begins Temperance Work—Signal Success—Visit to America—A Present of a Gold Watch—A Grand Send-off—Work in Theatres—Mr. Gough's Description of an Affecting Scene—Mr. Spurgeon's Tribute—Second Visit to America.

One winter evening, late in the year 1877, two gentlemen wended their way to the little room in Water Street, New York, in which Jerry McAuley held his first meetings. One was an American, the other an Englishman, and both were enthusiastic and successful temperance workers. "What place are you taking me to?" asked the Englishman. "Come and see," said the American. They entered and heard "the evangelist of the slums" speak in his plain but forcible way to his rough audience. The Englishman listened attentively, and admired the vigor and power of the speaker; but he had heard many temperance lecturers, and was himself an orator of some repute in that sphere. There seemed to him nothing unusual in the address, except that the speaker dwelt with emphasis on the necessity of the drunkard, if he would be safe, becoming a Christian as well as a total abstinence.

was to come. He was amazed as he saw, after Jerry sat down, one reformed man after another rise in different parts of the room, and testify that there was nothing that would keep the rescued inebriate true to his pledge like a strong faith in Christ. There were men there telling of their rescue from the very lowest depths of besotted drunkenness; there were thieves, loafers, and tough characters generally; and one and all ascribed their deliverance to the power of Christ. The Englishman listened in astonishment. He came out of the Water Street Mission a changed man. To use his own words, his life was revolutionized. He resolved to devote himself thenceforth to the preaching of Gospel Temperance, of Christ the Saviour from the power of sin, the Deliverer of the captives in one of Satan's strongest bonds. Grandly has he kept his resolution, and during the past seven years thousands have been brought, by the blessing of God on his labors, from sin and misery and crime into the light and liberty of the Gospel. Temperance alone had been an effective agency in his hands, but from that night in Jerry McAuley's room was dated a new departure, in which all that had gone before was dwarfed into comparative insignificance. The Englishman's name was William Noble—a name now famous the world over; his American guide, who, by the way, is also English by birth, but who, like all naturalized Americans, yields to no man in love for America, was the acknowledged king of temperance orators, John B. Gough.

The two men were warm friends then, and their friendship has continued to the present time. It is not difficult to understand why there should be a close bond of amity between such men. Mr. Noble's early experience had been similar in many respects to that of Mr. Gough. Like him, he had sunk to the lowest depths of degradation, through his bondage to the liquor fiend, and, like him, too, he had, after his own deliverance, consecrated his life and talents to the work of rescuing others from the same thralldom.

EARLY LIFE.

William Noble was born in London February 17th, 1842. His first step in life was a bad one: he ran away from school and went to sea. It was about the worst thing such a lad could have done. A merry fellow, full of life and spirit, with a way of making friends no one could resist, ready for any prank that promised fun, he was just the boy to get into trouble. In his first voyages, and afterward when he entered the royal navy, he was known as a reckless, jovial, careless fellow, the best of good companions, and able to "drink like a fish." He loved the drink with all his heart, and he was rapidly becoming an habitual drunkard.

He was throwing away life and health and all his future when, in 1860, his father purchased his discharge from the navy, and a good friend—Captain Orr, the organizer of the Woolwich Boys' movement—persuaded him to forswear liquor and make a new start in life. For a time the young man did well. He was eighteen in years, but in spirit and energy and self-reliance he was a man. He commenced business in the dry-goods trade, and in a short time was prospering beyond his expectations. He was on the highway to the acquisition of a large fortune when he had a moral relapse. He sank like a stone, and it was not long before he was standing on the London pavement a ruined man, with no thought but how he could beg or borrow a shilling to get drunk with.

One day in 1871 he was roaming through the streets in that wretched condition of mind which in the drunkard's life alternates with the fits of wild hilarity, when a good man laid his hand on his shoulder and asked him whether life was not too good a thing to be flung away as he was doing. Noble turned round and saw a naval acquaintance, Sergeant James Rae. The sergeant easily induced him to go down to Woolwich with him and attend a temperance meeting. He was melancholy, despairing, utterly miserable, and he might as well go there as anywhere. His splendid business, built up by so much effort and energy, was gone, his savings drunk away; he had nothing to do, and there were few men in England that day with a heavier heart than that the young man carried who walked into that Woolwich temperance meeting that day. "Won't you sign the pledge?" asked a gentle woman's sweet persuasive voice. "No," said Noble, adding, sadly, "it's of no use." Poor fellow! he had already signed it several times, and had broken it—in fact, his signature is stated to have appeared three times in one collector's book; but he at last signed, and resolved to ask of God the power to enable him to keep

Kind friends flocked round, and it was soon found that the young convert possessed talents of no mean order, and he was urged to take part in the temperance meetings of the day. Unclouded by the effects of drink, the natural powers of his mind shone forth, and it is recorded that even in the preliminary portion of his work as many as sixty thousand, first and last, attended at the Standard Theatre to hear him recite Gough's temperance orations.

He commenced business again in a small way, and his friends encouraged him; but the one thing that was now paramount in his mind was deadly hatred of the enemy that had wrecked his life, and a determination to fight it how and when he could. Unhappily, London is a place where that enemy stalks around everywhere, and there is no section of the city free from its accursed rule. Noble had plenty of opportunities for temperance work, and he let none slip. It was surprising how effective were the speeches of this untutored young man. The miserable drunkards who listened to him saw before them a man who could not only prescribe for them, but could tell them that he had himself been as one of them, and had been saved as he sought to save them, and they believed and were won. It was of course trying to run a business in such circumstances. The demand for Mr. Noble's services was so continuous that business was neglected, and at last, yielding to the persuasion of friends, and convinced by practical evidence that he was able to do valiant service for the cause he loved, he relinquished commercial life, and gave himself up unreservedly to the temperance work.

He was twenty-one years old then, and his fire and energy soon made their mark in the field. Applications for his services came from all quarters, for what city is there on either side the Atlantic in which innocent victims are not crying to Heaven to send them some mighty deliverer to save their loved ones from the relentless destroyer? Four years successful but exhausting labor followed, and in 1877, worn down and weary in body, but as fresh and vigorous in mind as ever, Mr. Noble determined to seek rest and recuperation by a

and a tour through the New World. If Mr. Noble expected to rest here he was disappointed, but it is doubtful whether he could rest anywhere, for a man fully given up to a great mission is never able to enjoy abstinence from work. Besides, his fame had preceded him, and the temperance people here had no mind that he should spend his time unprofitably in America. He landed on July 22d, and two hours afterward was addressing a large audience in the Cooper Institute, New York. He was introduced by "Mother Stewart," who said she had a vivid remembrance of his kindness in presiding over the largest meeting which she had ever addressed in England. Such was the effect produced by his earnest address that evening, that a large number came forward to sign the pledge among whom, strange to say, was a young man who had not long before left England, in consequence of his improvident habits, but who since his reformation has returned, and is now doing well in London.

Invitations to address other meetings poured in upon him during his first month in America, and large audiences gathered to hear his earnest addresses. From New York he went to Lancaster City, Penn., where, after speaking in the Methodist Episcopal Church, Judge Black who was present, said: "I hope that Mr. Noble may soon return to our country for a more extended visit, and labor for temperance with us. May our Father protect him during his voyage home." He afterward addressed large audiences in the Opera House. He visited the prisoners in the county gaol, and one of the new papers in reporting the service that he had there said it was one which would be long remembered. The prisoners appeared to be deeply affected, and in place of the cheers with which a public meeting is greeted when the popular heart is stirred, the sobs of these unhappy men resounded through the building, giving melancholy emphasis to the words spoken.

At Ocean Grove, N. J., on the invitation of the Methodist Episcopal Conference, he addressed an immense audience in the Memorial Tabernacle, numbers being unable to obtain admission. On this occasion he spoke about two hours, and at the close had the gratification of knowing that nearly one hundred persons had signed the pledge. It was during this visit to Ocean Grove that he received a letter from Mr. John B. Gough, giving him a cordial invitation to visit him.

VISIT TO MR. GOUGH.

Mr. Noble's visit to the house of the great temperance orator will not soon fade from his recollection. Mr. Gough received him with delight with which a veteran general welcomes a young and ardent comrade, eager to give his life in the cause to which his own years have been devoted. Mr. Noble has with reason looked back to that brief visit of three or four days spent at Hillside as bright red-letter days in his history. Nor should the fact be omitted, which Mr. John B. Gough gave prominence to his very first oration at Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle, that it was chiefly through Mr. Noble's persuasion that he was induced to pay another visit to England.

Leaving Worcester city, he proceeded to Bolton, where he spoke in Dr. Withrow's church to a large and influential audience. Dr. Withrow said that his address on the Christian Aspects of the Temperance question was "fellowship and full of sticking points," and, after thanking him in the name of the people, which a hearty God-speed in his campaign against King Alcohol. He then visited Canada and Niagara Falls, speaking in Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton, and elsewhere.

So the visit to America was a period of increased activity rather than of rest. But change of scene had done its recuperative work, and Mr. Noble turned his steps homeward. He had promised his friends in New York, however, to make a brief stay before embarking, and his first engagement was for a lecture in Dr. Talmage's Tabernacle, Brooklyn. Of the personal kindness of Dr. Talmage he retains the most lively recollections. In introducing the speaker to the audience, Dr. Talmage spoke of him as one of England's hearty workers in the cause of temperance reform. On a subsequent occasion Dr. Talmage presided over a large meeting in Association Hall, under the auspices of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, where the results of Mr. Noble's advocacy were of the most encouraging character.

He also spoke in the First Presbyterian Church, Greenpoint, Brooklyn, at the request of Mr. J. A. Stearns, Secretary of the National Temperance Society; and likewise to two crowded audiences in the South Second Street M. E. Church, and in Dr. Scudder's church, as well as others. One interesting service was held in the Navy Yard, Brooklyn.

A GRAND SEND-OFF.

On November 25th what the New York Herald termed "a noble demonstration" and "a brilliant send-off" of William Noble was held in the large hall of the Cooper Institute, New York.

The building was crowded to excess, some twenty-five hundred persons being present, all of whom paid for admission. On this occasion Mr. John B. Gough was the principal speaker. He said he deemed it a great privilege to meet his friend Noble on this probably his last appearance before an American audience. After a characteristic address he presented Mr. Noble with a valuable gold watch, on which was inscribed, "Presented to William Noble by John B. Gough, at Cooper Institute, New York, November 25th, 1877, on behalf of his American friends."

He was also presented with a finely bound copy of the "Poets of America," on behalf of Mother Stewart. Mrs. Emma Gates Conklin presented him with an elegant copy of the "Centennial Temperance Bible" for Mrs. Noble; and with other gifts an American organ, from Messrs. Smith & Co., of Boston, an instrument which he afterward found of great value in conducting his various meetings. On "Thanksgiving Day" his final meeting was held at the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association, Brooklyn. Rev. Dr. Cuyler presided, and his estimate of the value of the work done by the English advocate of temperance may be gathered from the following letter, written in an album presented to Mr. Noble on this occasion:

"I give you, my dear Noble, the following old version of Psalm 125:

"Who sticketh to God in stable trust,
As Zion's mount he stands full just—
Which moveth no whit, nor yet can reel,
But standeth forever as stiff as steel."

With love to Britain's workers—in 'League and Alliance' for the right, yours teetotally, THEO. S. CUYLER.—Nov. 29th, 1877."

There was a numerous attendance of the leading friends of temperance in Brooklyn and New York, the names of whom are appended in the album. The Rev. Dr. Talmage wrote the following:

Mr. Noble: We have enjoyed your visit, and are sorry it was so brief, but hope you will have a safe return, and that you will come again. Grace, mercy, and peace be with you.—T. DE WITT TALMAGE.—Brooklyn, November 27th, 1877."

It was during this visit to New York that Mr. Gough took Mr. Noble down to Jerry McAuley's mission, as already described. Up to that time Mr. Noble's work had been confined exclusively to temperance. Henceforward he became reckoning his work less than half done when the rescued man signed the pledge. To all who came to him he had the same message—there is no safety, no sure hope of permanent deliverance out of Christ. His work became distinctively Gospel temperance work, and the two have gone hand in hand in every effort he has since made.

THE WORK AT HOXTON HALL.

Mr. Noble arrived in London on December 12th, 1877, and his first step was to hire the largest theatre in London—the S'andard—on Sunday evenings for Gospel temperance services. The immense building was crowded from the first with workmen, street-peddlers, and the lowest classes. Vast numbers were rescued, and the services were so greatly blessed that a movement was made to acquire a building in which services could be held every night in the week. Provisionally, Mr. Noble received an offer for renting, with option of purchase, a large building long known as the Hoxton Music Hall, which was being used as a variety theatre. It is situated in the midst of a dense population, where such a work as he could do was urgently needed. After some deliberation this hall was taken, and from the day of opening in March 1879 the Blue Ribbon Army, or the Gospel Temperance Band, have made this their headquarters.

A true idea of the nature of the work there may be gathered from the pledge card issued, on which there is the following inscription: "Gospel Temperance Movement."

THE BLUE RIBBON ARMY.

With charity to all and malice to none. I, the undersigned, promise by divine assistance to abstain from all intoxicating liquors as a beverage, and to discountenance their use in others. Lord, help me to keep this pledge for Jesus' sake."

Perhaps a better description can hardly be given than that of Mr. J. B. Gough, who in the course of an oration at Sheffield thus spoke of it: "William Noble is doing a grand work at Hoxton Hall, in the north of London. I went there to one of his meetings, and took with me Dr. William Taylor, of New York. I never shall forget it. There were from one thousand to fifteen hundred, among whom were some low, debased, ragged, wretched creatures; the gallery filled with those who probably came to look on just out of curiosity. Dr. Taylor had asked me where I would take him that night; I said, 'To the Hoxton Music Hall.' 'Oh, dear me!' said he, 'you don't go to such places as that, do you?' 'Oh yes,' I said, 'I shall go to-night.' 'What do they do?' 'They sing.' 'Well,' he said, 'I will go with you; I will trust you.' I said, 'They are going to sing now, when we stood on the platform; and they sang, 'Oh, I am so weary of sin.' My heart went out to them, poor, wretched, sinful creatures, steeped to the very lips in impurity, crying out as they lifted their soiled hands and stained arms, 'I am weary of sin.' Then Mr. Noble said, 'Let us sing our favorite hymn,' and they sang, 'When I survey the wondrous cross.'"

"Dr. Taylor and I sat like a couple of boys. We were deeply affected, and could not help it. Oh, no, we did not want to help it! And when Mr. Noble said, 'Those who will sign the pledge, come forward!' they came. 'Now,' he said, 'before you take the pledge we will have two minutes of silent prayer.' I said to myself, 'This is a risky business with all those roughs up yonder,' but you could have heard a whisper during the whole two minutes. You heard some sighs and some soft aspirations, and that was all. Well, I never had my heart so stirred in my life as I did when I looked upon them and realized the work that was being accomplished by the means of William Noble. The whole country ought to help him and support him in that grand and noble work."

MRS. NOBLE.

It is only just to say that, since Mr. Noble's work began in Hoxton, he has been vigorously sustained in his efforts by Mrs. Noble, to whom he was married on November 7th, 1865, who has done much among the poor of the neighborhood that can only be successfully attempted by a Christian woman. Although naturally shrinking from publicity, she has not hesitated to take a leading part in meetings held specially for the benefit of those who are attracted to the Hall by the novel services. She has visited them in their homes, and with words of loving sympathy has won them to attend religious services and social meetings. In all weathers she has been instant in season and out of season in supporting her good husband's hands, and the help she has rendered has been of the most valuable character.

A vast amount of correspondence has grown out of the work in which Mr. Noble is engaged, and this she has taken upon herself, heavy though it occasionally may be. The courage she displays in her efforts to help on the work in which her husband is engaged is truly remarkable. She has been seen frequently in some of the lowest neighborhoods of London, visiting the saloons of the district, distributing tracts, and inviting loiterers in the bar to come to the theatre, where they would hear what would do them good. Her work is the more praiseworthy when it is remembered that she is not in strong health.

THE PRESENT VISIT TO AMERICA

which Mr. Noble has undertaken will, we trust, be as successful as his former tour. As we stated in our news columns, Mr. Noble is on his way to Australia and Africa; his stay will therefore necessarily be limited at the most to a few months. But as he crosses our continent we hope that the opportunity of hearing one of the most effective Gospel temperance speakers of our day will not be missed by any of our cities. To those to whom Mr. Noble is unknown he is able to present an introduction from one whom all Christian people respect, and to whom not a few are under obligation for spiritual good—the great preacher of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, Charles H. Spurgeon. Mr. Spurgeon's letter is thus worded:

To Christian Friends in America:

DEAR FRIENDS: It will be most right and useful for you all to receive Mr. Noble and work with him in his Gospel temperance campaign. He has done grand service in England, and is fitted for abounding usefulness anywhere and everywhere. He needs no introduction, for he is his own best commendation through the exceeding usefulness of his life. I hope that his visit to other lands will be fraught with untold blessing to thousands, both as to temperance and the Gospel. I rejoice in all that Mr. Noble has done, and I desire for him every blessing that I could wish for myself.

Your servant, for Christ's sake,

C. H. SPURGEON.

Mr. Noble has an apparently inexhaustible store of anecdotes. His work has been so wide and extensive that he has seen every side of life, and has necessarily witnessed many thrilling and pathetic occurrences. Some of these we hope to publish in an early number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Bible Progress was Illustrated last Week at the regular meeting of the Board of Managers of the American Bible Society, in a way that makes the predictions of America's blasphemous look absurd. At the meeting letters were read from Dr. Elias Riggs, of the European Turkey Mission of the American Board; from the North China Mission, commending Dr. Blodgett's work in rendering the Mandarin Scriptures into Easy Wenli; from Dr. Gulick, forwarding a unique copy of the New Testament in the Ningpo Colloquial; from Dr. Trumbull, of Valparaiso; from Mr. Milne, still detained in Argentina; from Mr. A. B. King, of Liberia; from Rev. J. M. Kyle, of Rio de Janeiro, respecting the proposed new version in Portuguese; from the Methodist Episcopal Mission in Bremen, and Rev. W. H. Gulick, of San Sebastian; and from Rev. W. L. Whipple, of Persia, with an account of the celebration at Oromiah of the formation of the Mission to the Nestorians.

ALL THE WORLD AKIN.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, September 20, 1885.

"And hath made of one blood all nations of men."—Acts 17:26.

One Common Stock—Yet there are Differences—In the Temper of Nations—Effect of American Atmospheric Tonic—Difference in Intelligence—Effect of Low Conceptions of the Deity—Impressions of Europe—A Mighty Struggle for Bread—The Sufferings of Ireland—A Typical Case—Human Brotherhood—Widowhood and Orphanage—The Difference the Bible Makes—The Greatest Name in Europe—The Greatest Pictures—A Goody Fleet of Ships—An Optimistic Forecast.

SOME have supposed that God originally made an Asiatic Adam and a European Adam and an African Adam and an American Adam, but that theory is entirely overthrown by my text, which says that all nations are blood relatives, having sprung from one and the same stock. A difference in climate makes much of the DIFFERENCE IN NATIONAL TEMPER.

An American goes to Europe and stays there a long while, and finds his pulse moderating and his temper becoming more calm. The air on this side the ocean is more tonic than on the other side. An American breathes more oxygen than a European. A European coming to America finds a great change taking place in himself. He walks with more rapid strides, and finds his voice becoming keener and shriller. The Englishman who walks London Strand at the rate of three miles the hour, coming to America and residing for a long while here, walks Broadway at the rate of four miles the hour. Much of the difference between an American and a European, between an Asiatic and an African, is atmospheric. The lack of the warm sunlight pales the Greenlander. The full dash of the sunlight darkens the African.

Then, ignorance or intelligence makes its impression on the physical organism—in the one case ignorance flattening the skull, as with the Egyptian; in the other case intelligence building up the great dome of the forehead, as with the German. Then the style of god that the nation worships decides how much it shall be elevated or debased, so that those nations that worship reptiles are themselves only a superior form of reptile, while those nations that worship the natural sun in the heavens are the noblest style of barbaric people. But whatever be the difference of physiognomy, and whatever the difference of temperament, the physiologist tells us that after careful analysis he finds out that the plasma and the disk in the human blood have the same characteristics; so that if you should put twenty men from twenty nationalities abreast in line of battle, and a bullet should fly through the hearts of the twenty men, the blood flowing forth would, through analysis, prove itself to be the same blood in every instance. In other words, the science of the day confirming the truth of my text that "God hath made of one blood all nations of men."

IMPRESSIONS OF EUROPE.

I have thought, my friends, it might be profitable this morning if I gave you some of the moral and religious impressions which I received when, through your indulgence, I had transatlantic absence. First, I observe that the majority of people in all lands are in a mighty struggle for bread. While in nearly all lands there are only a few cases of actual starvation reported, there is a vast population in every country I visited who have a limited supply of food, or such food as is incompetent to sustain physical vigor. This struggle in some lands is becoming more agonizing, while here and there it is lightened. I have joy in reporting that Ireland, about the sufferings of which we have heard so much, has far better prospects than I have seen there in previous visits. In 1879, coming home from that land, I prophesied the famine that must come upon, and did come upon the deluged fields of that country. This year the crops are large, and both parties—those who like the English Government and those who don't like it—are expecting relief. I said to one of the intelligent men of Ireland: "Tell me in a few words what are and what is the Land Relief enactment." He replied: "I will tell you. Suppose I am a landlord and you a tenant. You rent from me a place for £10 a year. You improve it. You turn it from a bog into a garden. You put a house upon it. After a while I, the landlord, come around and I say to my agent: 'How much rent is this man paying?' He answers, '£10.' 'Is that all?' Put his rent up to £20.' The tenant goes on improving his property, and after a while I come around and I say to my agent: 'How much rent is this man paying?' He says: '£20.' 'Put his rent up to £25.' The tenant protests and says, 'I can't pay it.' Then I, the landlord, say, 'Pay it or get out,' and the tenant is helpless, and, leaving the place, the property in its improved condition turns over to the landlord. Now, to stop that outrage the Relief Enactment comes in and appoints commissioners who shall see that if the tenant is turned out he shall receive the difference of value between the farm as he got it and the farm as he surrenders it. Moreover, the government loans money to the tenant, so that he may buy the property out and out if the landlord will sell." Mighty advancement toward the righting of a great wrong! But there and in all lands, not excepting our own, there is a far-reaching distress. And let those who broke their fast this morning and those who shall dine to-day remember those who are in want, and by prayer and practical beneficence do all they can to alleviate the hunger swoon of nations.

THE BROTHERHOOD OF MAN.

Another impression was—indeed the impression carried with me all the summer—the thought already suggested, the brotherhood of man. The fact is that the differences are so small between nations that they may be said to be all alike. Though I spent the most of the summer in silence, I spoke a few times and to people of different nations, and how soon I noticed that they were very much alike! If a man knows how to play the piano, it does not make any difference whether he finds it in New Orleans or San Francisco or Boston or St. Petersburg or Moscow or Madras; it has so many keys, and he puts his fingers right on them. And the human heart is a divine instrument, with just so many keys in all cases, and you strike some of them and there is joy, and you strike some of them and there is sorrow. Plied by the same motives, lifted up by the same success, depressed by the same griefs. The cabmen of London have the same characteristics as the cabmen of New York, and are just as modest and retiring. The gold and silver drive Piccadilly and the Boulevards just as they drive Wall Street. If there be a great political excitement in Europe, the Bourse in Paris howls just as loudly as ever did the American gold-room.

The same grief that we saw in our country in 1864 you may find now in the military hospitals of England containing the wounded and sick from the Egyptian wars. The same that sat down in despair after the battles of Shiloh and South Mountain poured their grief in the Shannon and the Clyde and the Dee and the Thames. Oh, ye men and women who know how to pray, never get up from your knees until you have implored God in behalf of the fourteen hundred millions of the race just like yourselves, finding life a tremendous struggle! For who knows but that as the sun to-day draws up drops of water from the Caspian and the Black seas and from the Amazon and the Mississippi, after a while to distil the rain, these very drops on the fields—who knows but that the sun of righteousness may draw up the tears of your sympathy, and then rain them down in distillation of comfort o'er all the world?

Who is that poor man carried on a stretcher to the Afghan ambulance? He is your brother.

If in the Pantheon at Paris you smite your hand against the wall among the tombs of the dead you will hear a very strange echo coming from all parts of the Pantheon just as soon as you smite the wall. And I suppose it is so arranged that every stroke of sorrow among the tombs of bereavement ought to have loud, long, and oft repeated echoes of sympathy all around the world. Oh, what a beautiful theory it is—and I am a Christian theory—that Englishman, Scotchman, Irishman, Norwegian, Frenchman, Italian, Russian, are all akin. Of one blood all nations! That is a very beautiful inscription that I saw a few days ago over the door in Edinburgh, the door of the house where John Knox used to live. It is getting somewhat dim now, but there is the inscription, fit for the door of any house hold—"Love God above all, and your neighbor as yourself."

I was also impressed in journeying on the other side the sea with the

in countries. The two nations of Europe that are the most moral to-day and that have the least crime are Scotland and Wales. They have by statistics, as you might find, fewer thefts, fewer arson, fewer murders. What is the reason? A bad book can hardly live in Wales. The Bible crowds it out. I was told by one of the first literary men in Wales: "There is no bad book in the Welsh language." He said: "Bad books come down from London, but the cannot live here." It is the Bible that is dominant in Wales. And then in Scotland just open your Bible to give out your text, and there is a rustling all over the house almost startling to an American. What is it? The people opening their Bibles find the text, looking at the context, picking out the referenced passages seeing whether you make right quotation. Scotland and Wales Bible-reading people. That accounts for it. A man, a city, a nation that reads God's Word must be virtuous. The Book is the foe of all wrong-doing. What makes Edinburgh better than Constantinople The Bible.

Oh, I am afraid in America we are allowing the good book to be covered up with other good books! We have our ever-welcome morning evening newspapers, and we have our good books on all subjects—geological subjects, botanical subjects, physiological subjects, theological subjects—good books, beautiful books and so many good books that we have not time to read the Bible. Oh, my friends, it is not matter of very great importance that you have family Bible on the centre-table in your parlor. Better have one pocket New Testament, the passages marked, the leaves turned down, the binding worn smooth with much usage, than fit too handsome to read! Oh, let us take a whisk broom and brush the dust off our Bibles! Do you want poetry? Go and hear Job describe the war-horse, or David tell how the mountain skipped like lambs. Do you want logic? Go and hear Paul reason until your brain aches under the spell of his mighty intellect. Do you want history? Go and see Moses put into a few pages, stupendous information which Herodotus, Thucydides, and Prescott never reached after. And, above all, if you want to find how a nation struck down by sin can rise to happiness and to heaven, read of that blood which can wash away the pollution of a world. There is one passage in the Bible of vast tonnage—"God so loved the world that He gave his only begotten son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Oh, may God fill this country with Bibles and help the people to read them!

I was also impressed in my transatlantic journey with the wonderful power that Christ holds among the nations.

THE GREAT NAME IN EUROPE

to-day is not Victoria, nor Marquis of Salisbury, nor William the Emperor, nor Bismarck, the great name in Europe to-day is Christ. You find the crucifix on the gate-post, you find it in he hay-field, you find it at the entrance of the sanatorium, you find it by the side of the road.

THE GREATEST PICTURES

In all the galleries of Italy, Germany, France, England, and Scotland are Bible pictures. What are the subjects of Raphael's great paintings? The Transfiguration, "The Miraculous Draught of Fishes," "The Charge to Peter," "The Holy Family," "The Massacre of the Innocents," "Moses at the Burning Bush," "The Nativity," "Michael, the Archangel," and four or five exquisite Madonnas. What are Tintoretto's great pictures? "Fall of Adam," "Cain and Abel," "The Plague of the Serpents," "Paradise," "Agony in the Garden," "The Temptation," "The Adoration of the Magi," "The Communication," "Baptism," "Massacre of the Innocents," "The Light into Egypt," "The Crucifixion," "The Madonna." What are Titian's great pictures? "The Flagellation of Christ," "The Supper at Emmaus," "The Death of Abel," "The Assumption," "The Entombment," "Faith," "The Madonna." What are Michael Angelo's great pictures? "The Annunciation," "The Pirits in Prison," "At the Feet of Christ," "The Infant Christ," "The Crucifixion," "The Last Judgment." What are Paul Veronese's great pictures? "Queen of Sheba," "The Marriage of Isaac and Rebecca," "Who has not heard of Dürer's 'Dragon of the Apocalypse'?" The mightiest picture on this planet is Rubens' "Scourging of Christ." Painter's pencil loves to sketch the face of Christ. Sculptor's chisel loves to present the form of Christ. Organs live to roll forth the sorrows of Christ.

THE PICTURE GALLERIES.

The first time you go to London go into the great picture-gallery. As I went and sat down before "Christ Descending the Steps of the Rectorium" at the first I was disappointed. I said: "There isn't enough majesty in that countenance, not enough tenderness in that eye," but as I sat and looked at the picture it drew upon me until I was overwhelmed with its power, and I staggered with emotion as I went out into the fresh air, and said: "Oh, for that Christ I must live, and for that Christ I must be willing to die!" Make that Christ your personal friend, my sister, my brother. You may never go to Milan to see Da Vinci's "Last Supper," but, better than that, you can have Christ come and sup with you. You may never get to Antwerp to see Rubens' "Descent of Christ from the Cross," but you can have Christ come down on the mountain of His suffering into your heart and abide there forever. Oh, you must have Him! We are all so diseased with sin that we want that which hurts us, and we won't have that which cures us. The best thing for you and for me to do to-day is to get down on our knees before God and say: "Oh, Almighty God of God, I am blind! I want to see; my eyes are palsied. I want to take hold of thy cross; have mercy on me, O Lord Jesus." Why wilt thou live on husks when you may sit down to this white bread of heaven? Oh, with such God and with such a Christ and with such a Holy Spirit and with such an immortal nature, awake up!

Once more, I was impressed greatly on the other side the sea with the wonderful triumphs of the Christian religion. The tide is rising, the tide of moral and in the world. I think that any man who keeps his eyes open, travelling in foreign lands, will come to that conclusion. More Bibles than ever before, more churches, more consecrated men and women, more people ready to be martyrs than ever before, if need be; so that instead of there being, as people sometimes say, less spirit of martyrdom now than ever before, I believe where there was once one martyr there would be a thousand martyrs if the fires were kindled—men ready to go through flood and fire for Christ's sake. Oh, the signs are promising! The world is on the way to millennial brightness. All art, all invention, all literature, all commerce, will be the Lord's.

These ships that you see going up and down New York Harbor are to be brought into the service of God. All those ships I saw at Liverpool, at Southampton, at Glasgow, are to be brought into the service of Christ. What is that passage, "Ships of Tarshish shall bring presents?" That is what it means. Oh, what when the vessels of the sea come into the service of God! No guns frowning through the port-holes, no pikes hung in the gangway, nothing from cutwater to tailrafter to suggest atrocity. Those ships will come from all parts of the seas. Great flocks of ships that never met on the high sea, but in wrath will cry "Ship ahoy!" and drop down beside each other in calmness, the flags of Emmanuel streaming from the topgallants. The old slaver, with decks scrubbed and washed and glistened and burnished—the old slaver will wheel into line; and the Chinese junk and the Venetian gondola, and the miners' and the pirates' corvette, will fall into line, equipped, readorned, beautified, only the small craft of this grand flotilla which shall float out for the truth—a flotilla mightier than the armada of Xerxes moving in the pomp and pride of Persian insolence; mightier than the Carthaginian navy rushing with forty thousand oarsmen upon the Roman galleys, the life of nations dashed out against the gunwales.

Rise, O sea, and shine, O heavens, to greet this squadron of light and victory! On the glistening decks are the feet of them that bring good tidings, and songs of heaven float among the rigging. Crowd on all the canvas. Line-of-battle ship and merchantmen wheel into the way. It is noon. Strike eight bells. From all the squadron the sailors' songs arise. "Surely the isles shall wait for thee, and the ships of Tarshish to bring thy sons from afar, their silver and their gold with them, to the name of the Lord thy God, and the Holy One of Israel."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

An Advocate Whom the Devil Fears.—Bailie Ross stated at a recent meeting: "I heard of a woman who had given her heart to the Lord. Shortly after her conversion the devil came and tempted her, saying, 'This salvation which you think you have is all nonsense; it is far too easy a way of being saved,' to which the wise woman replied, 'I am not able to argue with you; I will refer you to my Advocate.' The devil deserted her, for he knew that he dare not refer to her Advocate" (Rom. 8:34; 1 Tim. 2:5; 1 John 2:1).

Hiding Among the Rafters.—Mr. E. Payson Hammond related the following incident: "A gentleman seeking for objects of charity found his way into the upper room of a tenement house. It was vacant. He saw a ladder pushed through the ceiling. Thinking that perhaps some poor creature had crept up there, he climbed the ladder, drew himself through the hole, and found himself under the rafters. There was no light but that which came through a bull's-eye in place of a tile. Soon he saw a heap of chips and shavings, and on them a boy about ten years old. 'Boy, what are you doing here?' 'I'm a-hiding.' 'What are you hiding for?' 'Where's your mother?' 'Please, sir, mother's dead.' 'Where is your father?' 'I don't know—out somewhere; but look here.' He turned himself on his face, and through the rags of his jacket and shirt my friend saw that the boy's flesh was bruised and his skin was broken. 'Why, my boy, who beat you like that?' 'Father did, sir.' 'What did he beat you like that for?' 'Father got drunk, sir, and beat me 'cos I wouldn't steal.' 'Did you ever steal?' 'Yes, sir, I was a street-thief once.' 'And why don't you steal any more?' 'Please, sir, I went to the mission-school, and they told me there of God and of heaven and of Jesus; and they taught me 'Thou shalt not steal,' and they taught me 'Thou shalt not kill,' and I'll never steal again if my Father kills me for it. But please, sir, don't tell him.' 'My boy, you must not stay here; you'll die. Now, you wait patiently here for a little while; I am going away to see a lady. We will get a better place for you than this.' 'Thank you, sir.' As my friend went away he heard the boy, bruised, battered, forlorn, friendless, motherless, as he was, singing

Gentle Jesus, meek and mild,
Look upon a little child;
Pity my simplicity,
Suffer me to come to Thee.
Fain I would to Thee be brought,
Gracious Lord, forbid it not.
In the kingdom of Thy grace,
Give a little child a place."

The gentleman went away, came back again in two hours, and climbed the ladder. There were the chips, and there were the shavings, and there was the boy, with one hand by his side and the other tucked in his bosom underneath the little ragged shirt—dead."

Jamie, Who Became Captain of the "Great Eastern."—This incident was related by Mr. Hammond: "In a very small village there lived a little Scotch boy named Jamie. His mother loved him, and he loved his mother. The little boy wanted to be a sailor. His mother did not like the idea of losing her little Jamie, but he had read so much about sailors and about foreign lands he said: 'Oh, mother, I do want to be a sailor!' And his mother at last said, 'Jamie, you shall go.' She gave him her blessing, and added: 'Jamie, wherever you are, whether at sea or on land, never forget to acknowledge your God; and give me a promise that you will kneel down every night on ship-board and say your prayers and trust in God.' Little Jamie looked up to his mother, the tears trickling down his cheeks, and said: 'Mother, I promise you I will.' The boy went on board a ship bound for India. The first night, when the sailors had gone to their berths, seeing little Jamie kneel down to say his prayers, a sailor went up to him, and giving him a box on the ear, said: 'None of that here, sir!' Now, among the crew there was another sailor, a swearing man, who said to the man that had struck the boy, 'Come on deck and I will give you a thrashing,' and they went on deck. Now, I am not approving of the fight, but these men did fight, and the swearing sailor beat the one who had boxed the little fellow. Then they came back again into the cabin, and the swearing man said: 'Now, Jamie, say your prayers, and if he dares to touch you I will dress him!' Well, the next night Jamie said to himself, 'I don't like to make any disturbance on board ship; I will say my prayers in my berth; I won't kneel down before the sailors; I will get into my hammock and say my prayers to myself. Mark the effect of this on the swearing sailor. The moment he saw little Jamie get into his hammock without saying his prayers, he went up and took him by the neck and dragged him out of the hammock, and said: 'Kneel down at once, sir. Do you think I am going to fight for you, and you not say your prayers, you young rascal?' During the whole voyage back to London little Jamie had in that reckless, thoughtless sailor, a man who looked after him like a father, and every night saw that he knelt down and said his prayers. Now let me tell you a part of little Jamie's history. Some years ago the largest steamboat ever seen was built—the Great Eastern. Who do you think was the captain of that great ship? They wanted the cleverest captain they could find in England, and they selected little Jamie. When the great ship came back, after fulfilling her mission, the captain knelt before Queen Victoria, who said: 'Rise, Sir James Anderson; and Sir James Anderson was none other than the little boy I have told you of.'

THE SECOND COMING OF CHRIST AS RELATED TO ISRAEL.

By Rev. S. H. Kellogg, D.D.

Israel as a Sign—Prophecies Already Fulfilled—The Point of Difference—A Chronological Connection—Predicted by Zechariah—The Same Teaching in the New Testament.

I HAVE been requested to read a paper on this occasion upon the Second Coming as related to Israel. By way of introduction, I may say that Israel, the seed of Abraham according to the flesh, is a sign of the Second Advent. By this it is meant that the history of Israel from the beginning until now, their condition as they live among us to-day, is such as to be a pledge and prophecy that the Lord Jesus Christ, the rejected Messiah of Israel, will verily come again in the very same literal manner as He came the first time in the flesh; in the same literal manner as in the flesh He left the earth, and ascended from Mt. Olivet to the right hand of God. And the argument lies in this way.

FULFILLED PROPHECIES.

We open the Bible, and we find that everything that has befallen Israel from the beginning until now has been predicted long before it happened, and everything that has been predicted concerning them while in their state of apostasy from God has so far been fulfilled. If they sinned, they were to be scattered among all nations. So they were. They were to suffer cruelly in their exile; so they have suffered; and so they are still suffering to-day.

The point might be illustrated indefinitely, but this must suffice. Every prediction with regard to Israel from the beginning to the present time has so far been fulfilled literally. This is the premise of our argument. The conclusion is this: The predictions concerning Israel's Messiah and their relation to Him must also be fulfilled, and fulfilled in the same way.

As regards the predictions of the Messiah's First Coming, every Christian knows and admits that the law has held good. Not a prediction can be named, admitted by the universal consent of the Church to refer to that First Coming, but has been fulfilled literally. Messiah was to be born of a virgin. It seemed impossible; yet so it came to pass. He was to die, and yet to live forever; in appearance, again, impossible. Yet both have come true, for He died and rose again to everlasting life in resurrection. His hands and feet were to be pierced; so they were. They were to part His raiment among them, and for His vesture to cast lots; so they did. They were to smite the Judge of Israel upon the cheek; so they did. But there is no need of multiplying illustrations of facts so familiar. Like all the predictions touching Israel, so all the predictions concerning Israel's Messiah, so far as these relate to His First Coming, have been fulfilled literally.

But now turning to the prophets again, we find much about yet another coming of Israel's King—prophecies which have never been fulfilled, and which stand in closest relation to a predicted restoration of Israel in the latter days. He who came to suffer is to come to reign. So is the letter of the Word.

Many tell us, however, that the restoration of Israel shall take place long centuries before the coming of the Lord; will, in fact, introduce the expected "Millennium," which age of universal righteousness must then run its long course before the Lord Jesus can rightly be expected. As opposed to this, we maintain that the Word of God, whenever it speaks of the two events, the restoration of Israel and the second appearing of the Lord Jesus, the Messiah, always represents them as in close chronological connection. If not simultaneous, one is the immediate signal for the other. This we believe to be taught in the following Scriptures: Isa. 26: 19 compared with Rev. 20; Isa. 25: 8 compared with 1 Cor. 15: 54; Isa. 59: 20, 21 compared with Rom. 10; Dan. 12: 1 compared with Rom. 11: 26; Dan. 12: 3 compared with Matt. 13: 36-43; Zech.

12: 10 compared with Rev. 1: 7 and Matt. 24: 30.

PREDICTED BY ZECHARIAH.

If we examine the latter part of the prophecy of Zechariah we shall find yet more explicit reference to the glorious personal advent of the Lord, in connection with that last terrible tribulation which shall usher in the final repentance and restoration of Israel of which he writes.

STILL UNFULFILLED.

As to the meaning of this phraseology, be it observed first, that it is utterly impossible to refer this standing of the Lord "upon the Mount of Olives" to anything in the First Advent of our Lord. At no time during the life of our Lord on earth was there any such gathering of the nations against Jerusalem as is here described. Nor could it refer to a providential coming of the Lord when Jerusalem was destroyed, for such a supposition is wholly inconsistent with the context.

Of the siege against Jerusalem which is predicted here, it is said (14: 2) that "half the city shall go forth into captivity, and the residue of the people shall not be cut off from the city." This is no description of the massacre and captivity which attended the destruction of Jerusalem under Titus. Neither was the issue of that tribulation such as that which is here foretold as the issue of this. For it is here said that that great conflict shall end in the final and everlasting repopulation of the land. No providential coming of the Lord that history has ever seen can be intended here. The prophecy can be fitted to no past historical event except by the most extreme violence to its plainest statements. Neither can the language be applied, according to the usage of Scripture symbolism, to a coming of the Lord by His Spirit. Where in the Scripture symbolism is there anything which would warrant one in saying that the standing of the feet of the Lord "upon the Mount of Olives" denoted a revival of religion?

The words must then refer to the future. They naturally and most obviously describe the personal presence of the Lord of Israel at the time and the precise spot mentioned in the parable—the very place, it may be observed, whence Christ ascended. They must refer to the future, second appearing of Jesus.

REITERATED BY CHRIST.

Again: in Luke 21: 24 et seq. the Lord predicts the destruction of Jerusalem and the accompanying calamities. He said that Jerusalem should be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles should be fulfilled. Surely no man can say that this is the spiritual Jerusalem, the New Testament Church—the ready resource of interpreters in so many other places. For the prophecy has in large part passed into fulfillment, and has been fulfilled in the literal Jerusalem, in the land of Palestine. That city is trodden down of the Gentiles now, and has been ever since 70 A.D. But the words naturally imply that a time is coming when this state of things shall cease. Israel's restoration is clearly assumed.

But is there anything here about the Second Advent? Let us look at Matthew's account of the same discourse (Matt. 24: 30). He tells us that our Lord said explicitly, "And then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven; and then"—observe that he quotes the words used by Zechariah of the repentance of Israel—"then shall all the tribes of the earth (or of the land) mourn, and they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." Is not this a re-affirmation of that which we have already seen to be the teaching of the Old Testament Scriptures? and that by the authority of our Lord Himself? Surely He places together the restoration of Israel and His Second Coming.

Nor is this the only passage where we may perceive a reference to the same truth. For it is written that just before His death, when taking solemn leave of the apostate nation, He closed an awful series of woes in these words: "Ye shall not see me henceforth till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord."

We conclude, then, that there is abundant evidence that the Scriptures of the Old and the New Testament agree in representing the future restoration and conversion of Israel as accompanied by or taking place in closest connection with the glorious return of the Lord Jesus to judge and reign. And according to this inspired teaching with how much reason could Paul say concerning Israel (Rom. 11: 15): "If the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be but life from the dead?" To all which our hearts respond, Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus!

RECEPTION OF DR. TALMAGE.

ON Tuesday, September 15th, a formal welcome was tendered in the Brooklyn Tabernacle to Dr. Talmage, who, as announced last week, arrived on Monday, September 14th, in New York, from a two months' tour in Europe. The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher presided.

Never in the history of the Brooklyn Tabernacle had there been such an immense audience. From seven o'clock, the hour at which the doors were opened, a steady stream of humanity poured into the church, filled the galleries and the main floor, crowded around the organ and choir, filled the many aisles and the wide, semicircular corridor, and stretched far out into the street. It was not a gathering representative of any particular sect or church, but it was an assemblage of the Christian people of Brooklyn. That it was from the Christian people of the city rather than from Dr. Talmage's congregation was demonstrated by the presence of the clergymen of different denominations who were there to welcome the great divine.

The platform in the church was profusely decorated with flowers for the occasion. A large floral arch over six feet high composed of white and red roses, astreax, smilax, camellias, acacia roses, carnations, and chrysanthemum roses was stationed in the centre of the platform beside the presiding officer's chair. On the arch were inscribed in red roses the words, "Welcome Home." On either side of the platform were immense stands of gladioli palms, ferns, and other plants. Immediately above the organ was a large floral urn surmounted by red and white roses.

At fifteen minutes to eight o'clock the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher entered the church. His appearance was the signal for loud applause, which was continued until he blushingly hid himself in the pastor's room adjoining the platform.

At eight o'clock the sound of cheering was heard through the open door of the Tabernacle. Every head was turned downward to catch a glimpse of Rev. Dr. Talmage as he entered the church. The dense crowd gave way on either side, and a storm of applause greeted him. The solemnity usually observed in a church was for a moment forgotten. The sound of the organ from which welled forth the strains of the well known "Hail to the Chief" mingled with the applause, and the welcome was happy and most spontaneous. Dr. Talmage himself appeared to feel it as he walked down the aisle. Mr. Beecher rose to meet him, and the two ministers shook hands heartily amid the plaudits of the assembled thousands. The organ played "Home Again," and when the audience had sung "Praise God from whom all blessings flow" every one thought the welcome most complete.

The scene on the street during the first part of the welcoming exercises was a remarkable one. The church was crowded in every part before eight o'clock, but long after that hour people kept coming toward the Tabernacle. When they found that entrance was impossible they stood before the door. Soon the crowd increased to great dimensions, and extended nearly the length of the block.

Mr. Beecher, in the course of his address, said: "Things are often done quietly, with a good faith behind them, that would hardly bear close scrutiny or exposure. I was notified by several despatches and letters to be present here this evening, and was further informed that I was to preside upon this very joyous and happy occasion. The first message said that I would not be called upon to make a speech. That was pleasant news, as I did not want to make a speech. The second, which was a telegraphic message, also said that I would not be importuned to speak. This was also gratifying to me, but it occurred to me that perhaps the Board of Trustees had met in secret session, and had unanimously decided that it would be best for all concerned if I did not speak, and they took this somewhat covert and novel, but none the less forcible, manner of expressing their decision. [Laughter.] However, I am in a very amiable mood this evening. When the gentleman who has had charge of this meeting up to this time was leading me down the aisle awhile ago, he kindly remarked to me, by way of commiseration, I presume, "Dr. Talmage will take the tall chair; you take the one by the flowers." [Laughter.] It certainly is very proper that he should have the high chair, and I am contented at any time if I can sit where there are flowers.

"Brooklyn is a good place for ministers, both because they get all the chastisement they need and all the encouragement and affection from their flocks necessary to sustain them. My good friend Dr. Talmage has totally escaped the former. [Laughter.] He is never criticised; never. [Laughter.] It is wonderful what an affection the newspapers of the country have for him, and we, who toil in humble places, wonder what art he uses to make such a great record in the service as he has made, and yet escape criticism. [Laughter.] Yes, Brooklyn is a good place for ministers. I have tried it for fifty years, and if I had it all to do over again I believe I should come to the same city. Brother Talmage has served a long time in this city, and he has found this true, in practical experience, no doubt, as I have. Year by year he has gained, and he was never so strong as he is now, and never was he so widely read, in his printed sermons, as he is to-day. They are printed in nearly all the languages on the face of the earth, and who is so inconsiderate as not to have been moved in pity at the jealous criticisms that have been heaped upon one who has lived so good and useful a life? I join you heartily in the meeting which your trustees have called together to-night, and extend to Dr. Talmage the right hand of Christian fellowship, and cordially greet him, on his happy return to his beloved people."

Musical selections followed Mr. Beecher's speech, and then Mr. Theophilus Olena, acting Mayor of Brooklyn, welcomed Dr. Talmage on behalf of the city. He was followed by Rev. Charles Hall, D.D., who delivered a cordial address.

MR. BEECHER. Now there will be a welcome to their beloved pastor by the children of the infant class. "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings He hath ordained praise." We will listen to a word by Miss Nellie Waller.

Mr. Nichols here conducted to the platform a bright-eyed, fair-haired little girl, who bore a large basket of exquisite flowers. Stepping up to Dr. Talmage, she made a neat little presentation speech, in which she expressed the pleasure of the Sunday-school that the pastor was back again among his people.

After an address by the Rev. E. P. Ingersoll, Dr. Talmage rose to respond to the various expressions of welcome and good-will.

DR. TALMAGE'S ADDRESS.

MR. BEECHER AND FELLOW-CITIZENS: In this form of salutation I greet you, because this is not a church meeting, it is not even a religious meeting, but an expression of generous kindness on the part of a great community toward one of its own citizens—a meeting presided over by one who, when I first came to Brooklyn, went out of his way in his own pulpit to utter generous words at my coming, and who, when our first church was consumed, within a half-hour had his messenger on the ground offering for our occupancy Plymouth Church, with everything from grand auditorium to lecture-room, not excepting the baptistry [laughter and applause], and who at that time said to a lady of this church, who had in her hand a subscription book: "Now go for Mr. Claflin," advice which brought very large response. Beside that, I bethink myself that we are to-night in a building toward the construction of which every Protestant and Catholic church and Jewish synagogue in Brooklyn grandly contributed [applause], men with a creed and men without a creed; and while in this place we believe some things very vigorously, if we should ever so far forget ourselves as to infract any of the great laws of Christian brotherhood, these walls and pillars would cry out: "Silence, you stupid bigot!" I thank God that I live in this city, and that I live now and amid people whose representatives are to-night on and around this platform. [Applause.] Through the conspiracy of your friendship and love you have made this hour the supreme hour of my life. There comes in every man's Christian work a time that may be called the supreme hour. Your supreme hour, Mr. Chairman, was two years ago, when in the Academy of Music you had an ovation which would have upset any man's head had it not been firmly planted between his shoulders. [Laughter.] From what I have heard you say in public I think you are under a delusion as to what o'clock it is in the day of your life, for instead of being five o'clock in the afternoon, it is only half past one or a quarter to two at the latest. [Applause.] In Norway at a certain season no sooner does one day close than another day begins, and I hope that about twenty or thirty years from now in your life the two twilights may melt into one, the twilight of earth's evening and the twilight of the heavenly morn.

What kind of a time did I have this summer? Splendid! The Atlantic for the most part was opaline, or a sea of glass mingled with fire, but for twenty-four hours going and forty-eight hours coming the Atlantic got its back up, and some of us sat with elongated visage, looking out upon a great sea of ipecac; and what made the matter worse, some of our friends who are here to-night walked around on the deck provokingly well. But I did not get as far below par as those people who say that they are so sick they would like to be thrown overboard.

What did I see? Saw everything. I saw the Queen. Instead of being the grum and unattractive person that her pictures sometimes represent her to be, she had a countenance beaming with kindness, and was no more assuming than if she had but one dress in all the world, and that a cheap calico. I saw the Prince of Wales and the beautiful Princess, who, it is said, when she walks through the hospitals casts from her smile a blessing upon every cot, and wounded soldiers get up on their elbow and with their last breath say, "God bless her!" I saw William E. Gladstone, and saw him in his best mood—his domestic mood—at the christening of his grandchild. We saw a great many people of all ages and of all conditions. We saw the great foreheaded German under the shadow of the Berlin Palace, and we saw the Frenchmen tumultuous in their joy at the unveiling of a statue on their great fête day. We heard the crackling of Irish wit at the table of Sir Thomas McClure and Sir David Taylor, and we mingled with Scotchmen who are eminent for learning and goodness, among them Professor Simpson, who entertained us at his home, and from whom three weeks ago to-day we parted on Princess Street, Edinburgh, and who is on the platform to-night taking a trip across the ferry, going home next Thursday. May God continue his voice and pen in the exposition of science and religion.

We found everywhere that the best password in Europe is the word America. [Applause.] That opens all the doors and that wins all the suavities. The fact is, they have their kindred on this side the sea. Brothers and sisters on that side, brothers and sisters on this side. They have forgotten all the unpleasantness we had in 1776, and I have no doubt they will forgive us the fact that yesterday in the boat race the Puritan came in sixteen minutes before the Genesta.

Fellow-citizens of all callings and professions and trades, men of the law, men of the healing art, men of the editorial chair, men of merchandise, men of mechanism, and all the wives and mothers and sisters and daughters of the dear homes of Brooklyn, you cannot understand how deep an impression you have made upon me by the flowers and the music and the speeches and the genial appearance of your own countenances. You have put me under everlasting obligation, and have mortgaged me for industrious Christian service all my life long. Shoulder to shoulder let us stand in the great work of trying to make the world better, and then may we rest not very far apart in the adjoining gardens of the dead, and may God grant us all to rise in the resurrection of the just, when the heavens are no more.

Mr. Beecher next introduced Professor Simpson, of Scotland, who came over with Dr. Talmage, and who entertained the Tabernacle pastor on the other side. He spoke as follows:

PROFESSOR SIMPSON'S ADDRESS.

Your chairman asked me if I could talk English. I said in my boyhood I used to talk Scotch only, but I dare say to-night we will understand each other. Up to this particular moment I thought I was the most fortunate man in creation because such a sight as this I don't know as it has ever been seen in America before; it has not been seen, I believe, on my side of the Atlantic. We have no place in Edinburgh where it was possible for the people who wanted to hear Dr. Talmage to get near him. I ventured myself that Sabbath afternoon, having with me some of my own family and a daughter of the Lord Mayor of London, all very eager to hear your great pastor; but I could not get within a street's length of the place where the crowds were gathered around the doors. We counted ourselves extremely fortunate that he was good enough to come and take dinner with us in our county house in Midlothian. At that dinner-table there was a little maid from the far-off highlands of Sutherlandshire who asked: "Is the Dr. Talmage who is to be at dinner to-day the great Dr. Talmage whose sermons we all read?" When she was told "Yes," she clapped her hands and said, "I will write to my mother that I had the honor of waiting on Dr. Talmage." From the highest to the lowest we hold his name in reverence and in love.

Mr. Beecher announced that after the benediction Mr. Talmage would take his position on the left of the platform, and would there receive those who desired to shake hands with him. A large number of people pressed about Dr. Talmage for a personal greeting, while the vast audience slowly melted away to the notes of an organ finale.

DRAWN HOME BY YOUNG MEN.

When Dr. Talmage emerged from the Tabernacle on his way home he found that his friends among the young men of the congregation had one remaining mark of respect and esteem to show him. An open barouche stood in front of the right-hand entrance, and into it he got with Professor and Mrs. Simpson and a number of floral trophies. A thousand of those who had attended the reception pressed around to say something pleasant. When the doctor was seated every man present cheered till the sounds shook echoes from all the neighboring streets.

Trustee Stratton mounted the box as coachman, and the whole team of fifty young men scampered away at a very creditable trot. Away they went, down Lafayette Avenue to South Oxford Street, and down South Oxford Street to Dr. Talmage's house, near DeKalb Avenue. There they gave three cheers for Dr. Talmage and three cheers for Mrs. Talmage.

When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Unpopularity of the Silver Dollar, which has increased since the withdrawal of the one-and two-dollar notes, is, it is stated, an incidental, not the primary, object Mr. Manning had in view in issuing the order. The reduction of the gold reserve in the Treasury held against the notes rendered it necessary to reduce the number of notes in circulation. He also desired, if possible, to force the silver dollars out of the Treasury, which is heavily taxed to accommodate them all, and he wants to keep them out.
The plan he has adopted is producing the effect desired; and although he was aware that it would also have the effect of rendering the coins still more unpopular than they were before, he repudiates the allegation that he was working for that object. Mr. A. J. Warner has gone to Washington to consult with the Secretary about his "compromise," and it may be hoped that some solution will be found at the conference.
The continued coinage of two millions a month is becoming a very serious danger to the national finances.

The Removal from Office of George B. Bacon, the chief weigher of the Brooklyn District, by the Collector of the New York Custom House, and the appointment of George H. Sterling in his place, is an event which promises to have an influence on the political future far outweighing the importance of the office. Since the Presidential election no appointment has been made which has produced such a sensation. Mr. Bacon, it appears, has been a most efficient officer.
The district covers the whole water front of Brooklyn, and the chief weigher controls some three hundred appointments. Mr. Bacon has conducted the affairs of his office so honestly and impartially that importers have for a long time been in the habit of accepting his weights and selling their goods by them, a very unusual evidence of confidence. Nor has he been "an offensive partizan," for no employé was asked to what political party he belonged, nor did any of them know how their chief voted. His successor is said to be the proprietor of a gin-mill in Brooklyn, though he appears in the directory as a real-estate agent. There has been no violation of the law in the removal and appointment, as the office is not covered by the civil service act; but the spirit of the law has been violated, that consideration may not weigh with the Democrats at the Custom House, but another consideration may be worth their attention—the men whose votes carried the State of New York last November cannot be counted upon at future elections if such appointments continue to be made. Their feeling with regard to this change is one of unmitigated disgust.

The Frauds Discovered in Indiana appear to be more serious than was at first supposed.
The Township Trustees were authorized and required to "provide suitable houses, furniture, apparatus, and other articles and other educational appliances necessary for the thorough organization and efficient management of the schools." Apparently they were ready to deal with an agent from Chicago, when he came to them. In some cases taking blackboards, but in most cases nothing, they issued township obligations for large sums over their signatures.
The agent is said to have negotiated the orders, dividing the proceeds with them. It appears that the sufferers will be the holders of the bogus orders, as a Township Trustee can only bind the township for indebtedness created for articles purchased and actually secured by the corporation. In most of these cases there was not even a pretence of delivering any goods to the township. Some of the trustees have already joined the Canadian colony, and a bank at North Vernon and another at Harrison have been compelled to close their doors through the swindle. It is feared that the frauds will aggregate at least a million dollars.

A Collision Between Two Ocean Steamships on Saturday near the bar of New York Harbor caused much excitement in the city. The Republic, of the White Star Line, which was char-
quarter of two on Saturday afternoon on her voyage to Queenstown. While she was still in the bay, proceeding slowly outward, the Auran-ia, of the Cunard Line, was seen following her rapidly and making for the same passage over the bar that the pilot of the Republic intended to use. The Republic whistled to notify the Auran-ia of her claim to right of way. The Auran-ia, however, trusting to her superior speed, shot right across the Republic's bows, and it seemed for a minute as if the Republic would cut into the Cunarder's side and sink her. The pilot of the Republic, however, tried to avoid a collision by reversing engines and setting the helm so as to carry her bows away from the Auran-ia. That action saved the Cunarder from a crash that would have cut in her side; but the Republic suffered. In passing, the Auran-ia struck her, cutting a large gash in her bows four feet wide at the top and one foot wide at the bottom, which was about two feet from the water's edge.
The Republic rolled heavily twice, and then righted. A sail was thrown over the gash in the bows to keep the water out, and she returned to her dock for repairs, while the Auran-ia, with a heavy dent on her side, proceeded on her voyage.
This account, of course, is that of the Republic, and it may be contradicted by the report of the Auran-
ia; but it seems clear, in any case, that both ships were racing for the narrow channel over the bar, a practice which captains enjoy, but which does not conduce to the safety of the passengers.

A Revolution in Eastern Roumelia Broke out on Friday last. This is another step in the "drying-up" of the Euphrates predicted in the Bible. Eastern Roumelia was left much to its dissatisfaction under Turkish rule, when the Berlin Conference rearranged the affairs of the Sultan's dominions. It was given an autonomic government, though forming an integral part of the Turkish Empire. The Governor-General was appointed by the Porte, subject to the approval of the treaty powers. On September 19th the whole population, almost to a man, rose in rebellion, seized the Governor-General, deposed the government, and proclaimed a union with Bulgaria. A provisional government was established. The revolt was so well planned that no disorders or bloodshed occurred, everybody being in sympathy with the movement except the government officials. Immediately after the organization of the provisional government the militia was sworn in, taking the oath of allegiance to Prince Alexander of Bulgaria.

The insurgents, acting under the order of the provisional government, have occupied all the strategic points on the Turkish frontier, blown up all the bridges which would likely be used by a force advancing from Turkey to the relief of the deposed government, and destroyed the telegraph wires leading into Turkey.

A Panic Has Set in Among English Officials in Dublin. When the Conservative administration came into power a few weeks ago its advent was hailed effusively by Mr. Parnell, and it was believed that a treaty of peace had been arranged between the government and the Irish malcontents. Police activity was relaxed, and the Lord Lieutenant somewhat ostentatiously went about Dublin unattended. Last week the aspect of affairs changed. Distrust prevailed among the authorities of Dublin Castle. The officials who were specially protected last year by the detectives and the police, and who dispensed with their escorts when Lord Spencer was replaced, are now under strict protection again in consequence of information, supplied to the authorities by informers, that two nationalist emissaries are at present in Dublin. Their arrival was known to the detectives, who so closely watched them that they were scarcely able to move. The recent declaration of Mr.
Parnell shows that there can be quietness and security only by the concession of local self-government to Ireland, and that concession neither the Conservatives nor the Liberals are prepared to grant. It may be hoped that the agitation will be limited to the Parliamentary struggles, and will not again degenerate into terrorism.

Mr. Gladstone's Manifesto, Issued Last Week, gives the Liberal key-note to the approaching campaign. It is in the form of an address to his constituents in Scotland. Practically Mr. Gladstone admits the wide divergence existing between the two sections of the Liberal party, which are led respectively by Mr. Chamberlain and the Marquis of Hartington; but expresses the conviction that the whole party can unite in enfranchising the soil, establishing local government, equalizing the taxation on land and personality, and in suppressing by the strictest rules, or, if necessary, by severe laws, the practice of obstruction in Parliament. There appears to be a marked falling off from the ringing utterances with which the great Liberal leader was wont to inspire his followers at the opening of the campaign. One Liberal journal disrespectfully likens the manifesto to "the tinkling of a sheep's bell in a fog," when a trumpet blast had been expected.

The Prosecution of Mr. Stead, the editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, was resumed on Monday, September 14th, but nothing material was elicited. The case was then adjourned until Saturday next, when it is expected that the prosecution will rest its case. The English newspapers containing the report of the first day's proceedings are now received. They show conclusively that the motive of the prosecution is malicious. The offence charged against Mr. Stead and his co-defendants is nothing more than that of taking the child Eliza Armstrong away from the custody of her parents, of chloroforming her, and of subjecting her to physical examination. It is not pretended by the prosecutors that the girl was injured or ill-treated in any way, or that she did not return to her home as pure as she left it. Whatever was done to her was done, it is conceded, without evil intent, and solely for the purpose of showing how easily the ruin of young girls in London might be accomplished, and often is accomplished.
One able editor says that Mr. Stead may possibly be convicted of a technical crime, but his conviction will involve no disgrace, and will only react upon those who are laboring for it.
The ablest counsel are engaged on both sides, and the result will be looked for with interest.

The Rev. M. Baxter and Mrs. Baxter Arrived safely from Europe on Saturday last by the steamship City of Chester. Mrs. Baxter preached on Sunday at the Twenty-third Street Tabernacle, of which Rev. A. B. Simpson is pastor. She has promised to take part in the Convention on Faith Healing and Holiness to be held in that church during the week commencing October 5th, of which notice was given in our issues of August 20th and 27th. On October 19th it is expected that a similar convention will be held at Philadelphia, in which she hopes to participate. Inquiries respecting it may be addressed to Dr. Clift, at the Kemuel Faith Home, Philadelphia. Friends in other cities are taking advantage of her visit to arrange for similar conventions, and of these due notice will be given. Mr. Baxter proposes to give lectures on the Coming Great Events of Prophecy and the Signs of the Times and the Speedy Advent of Christ in various cities. Any invitations to him to deliver one or more lectures in any place can be addressed to him at the office of this paper. We understand that Mr. Baxter does not accept remuneration for his lectures, nor charge his travelling expenses.

Successful Revival Services in Washington Territory have been conducted by the Rev. A. P. Graves. At Spokane Falls the work was marked in the consecration of believers and conversions. Some prominent young men were brought out of darkness into light. At Colfax, after two weeks' meetings, more than a hundred were added to the different churches. Besides others, nineteen young men united with the Baptist Church. At Dayton he found strong infidel elements. Months ago it had been proclaimed that a successful revival could never again be conducted in that town. Scores were saved and added to the Church. At Walla Walla, with churches very sadly backslidden, he began work, and soon was permitted to see rich displays of God's grace—many believing, and large numbers being added to the Church. He is now beginning a campaign of revival services among the towns and cities that line the shores of Puget Sound, and asks the prayers of all Christians for God's blessing upon the people.

The Moral Record of the State of South Carolina is thus summarized by a contemporary: "South Carolina prohibits divorce absolutely. It prohibits the sale of liquor in the rural districts, allows it in incorporated towns with the privilege of local option, of which about half the towns avail themselves. It forbids the running of all freight trains and of all passenger trains except such as carry the United States mail on Sunday. It classes duelling with murder, and disfranchises the lottery-ticket dealer."

The Rev. Frank White, one of Mr. Spurgeon's students, and pastor of a large congregation for many years, is visiting America for a few weeks to give his well-known lectures on the Parables, the Tabernacle, and the natural history of the Bible, illustrated with beautiful dissolving views. Any communications will reach him if addressed to the care of Rev. George F. Pentecost, D.D., Tompkins Avenue and McDonough Street, Brooklyn, N. Y. These lectures have attracted immense audiences in various parts of Great Britain. They have been found a valuable means of disseminating Scripture knowledge. Mr. White is a very able and powerful speaker.

A Romantic Family Reunion Took Place at Washington, N. J., a few days ago. Thirteen years ago a young married couple lost their eldest son, a child six years old. Search was made for him in every direction in which it was thought possible that he might have strayed, but without success. Nothing was heard of him until recently, when the postmaster at Paterson, N. J., received a letter from a young man at Vera Cruz, Penn., who said that he had reason to believe that his parents, whose names he did not know, resided at Paterson or the vicinity. Publicity was given to the letter, and the parents, who were residing at Washington, N. J., made inquiries, which resulted in the identification of the young man at Vera Cruz as their long-lost son. On the day that he was lost he had crept into a freight-car on the railroad, and had been carried away unobserved. When his presence in the car was discovered there was no way of finding out at what place he had entered it, and all that the boy could tell them was that his own name was Philip, and his father's name, he thought, was Anthony. Inquiries were made for a Mr. Anthony, but without success. The boy was sent to the poor-house, and when he was big enough to work he went to earn his own living. He had always hoped that some day he would find his parents, but it was not until some description of Paterson fell into his hands that the young man obtained a clue. The place seemed to touch a chord in his memory, and he wrote to the postmaster with the result described. It was his father's first name that was Anthony, which accounted for the failure of the inquiries thirteen years before. There is no happier family to-day in the State. The Saviour said that there is joy in heaven when a wanderer is restored; but, unhappily, there are few wanderers from the fold of God who are as prompt to seek restoration when they are told the way (Jer. 5 : 3).

A Lady Drowned while She Slept was Buried at Bayonne, N. J., last week. Her body was found in Newark Bay on September 10th, and it was at first thought that she had committed suicide. When the body was identified, however, the suicide theory was exploded. She was of a singularly happy disposition, and had no trouble that would incline her to self-destruction. It was ascertained that she had been suffering from malaria, which had the effect upon her of rendering her extremely drowsy. On the day of her disappearance she set out for a long walk along the sands, which, owing to indentations, are treacherous when the tide comes in. It is believed that the drowsy spell must have come on her during her walk, and that she sat down to rest upon a rock which is first surrounded by the tide, and is finally covered at high water, and that she fell asleep, and did not wake until her escape was cut off. The knowledge that there are thousands of sinners sunk in spiritual slumber under circumstances as perilous to their souls as those of the sleeping girl ought to inspire every Christian to unceasing work (Eph. 5 : 14).

A Dove in a Church Surprised a Congregation at New Haven, Conn., on September 2d. The Rev. M. Clark, pastor of the East Haven Congregational Church, was reading the first chapter of St. John's Gospel at the morning service, and had reached the thirty-second verse, "I saw the Spirit descending from heaven like a dove, and it abode upon Him," when a beautiful white dove flew in at the gallery door and alighted on the pulpit. A minute later it perched on the pastor's shoulder, and then flew to some other part of the church. It caused some emotion in the congregation, as during the service it continued flying from one part of the church to another. Ultimately it flew again to the pulpit, and Mr. Clark caught it, and after speaking a few words about the emblematical character of the bird, held it in his hands while he pronounced the benediction. The dove belonged to a young lady in the congregation, who had made a pet of it, and it had followed her to church. The coincidence of its entrance during the reading of that particular passage of Scripture provoked much comment. It may be hoped that the life-giving presence of which the dove is a type may be earnestly sought by that and all other churches. His coming is assured; it will not be a coincidence (Luke 11 : 13).

How a Nine Days' Warning was Treated is told in "Mary Howitt's Reminiscences." She relates that one of her friends belonged at college to a dissolute set of young men, who met regularly to turn religion into ridicule. On one occasion a member of the club, whose face was white with sudden terror, entered the room in which the others were assembled, and was immediately questioned as to the cause of his changed appearance. He said that it was produced by a dream. He had dreamed that he was breathing stifling, oppressive air in a large, gloomy hall, which was densely thronged with undergraduates, their gowns wrapped round them, and their countenances indicative of suffering and extreme dejection. Inquiring where he was, a melancholy young man replied, "This is hell," at the same time unfolding his gown and revealing in his breast a transparent heart as of crystal, in which burned a fierce flame. "Cannot I escape?" asked the terror-stricken dreamer. "You have a chance for nine days," answered the gloomy figure, folding his arms within his gown and concealing his burning heart. The undergraduate awoke full of horror, and in order to dispel the strong, painful impression, sought the society of his friends. They laughed at his disordered fancy, drank deep, and persuaded him to spend the ensuing nine days with them in especial gaiety. On the ninth day, however, whether from the natural effects of excessive debauch or in solemn fulfilment of the warning, he suddenly died. This was practical confirmation of the inference which is drawn from Christ's parable of Dives and Lazarus, that when ordinary warnings fail, extraordinary warnings would fail too (Luke 16 : 31).

The Killing of the Famous Elephant, Jumbo, on September 15th, had its pathetic features. The animals in Barnum's show were being taken, after their evening exhibition at St. Thomas, Ont., to their cars for transportation to the next place on the route. All were safely on board except Jumbo and his favorite companion, the little trick elephant Tom Thumb. They were proceeding down the railroad track to their car, when the head-light of a locomotive was seen five hundred yards away and rapidly approaching. Jumbo's keeper urged the huge beast to quicken his pace, but when Jumbo saw the impending danger, which was not until the locomotive was almost upon him, he grasped his little friend in his trunk and hurled him far out of danger. The little beast struck against a box-car with sufficient force to break his leg, and lay there whining like a wounded puppy. Jumbo made an effort to save himself then, but it was too late, and he was crushed. Thus Jumbo died like a hero, having displayed the heroic quality of self-sacrifice for his companion. We naturally respect that quality, whether it is manifested by a man or an animal, for it proves a truly noble nature. Yet it is strange that men listen unmoved to the story of the greatest manifestation of it the world has ever seen—the story of the Cross—even though the sacrifice was made for them (Lam. 1 : 12).

A Dog Broke up a Revival Meeting in Virginia recently. A despatch from Richmond, Va., to the Sun says that on September 6th a series of services commenced in Prince George County, which it was intended should be continued for several days. During the first service, however, a pet dog belonging to one of the members of the church entered the building, and making his way to the platform, went behind the pulpit desk, and began munching the sacramental bread. The leader of the meeting saw the dog, and going up to him administered a vigorous kick. The dog retreated, howling loudly, whereupon the owner of the animal, who had no knowledge of the dog's offence, went to the preacher and expostulated with him. He then left the church; but his son took up the quarrel, which became violent, and angry words were used on both sides. The dispute waxed so furious that only the consciousness of the place and time prevented blows being struck, and the meeting was closed, and the project of holding others was abandoned for the present. One of the ministers expressed his conviction that the devil was in the dog, and he may have been right. In any case the dog was doing the devil's work, and, unhappily, he did not lack coadjutors. It is a pity that the parties to the dispute did not heed the apostolic warning applicable to their case (11 Cor. 2 : 10, 11).

THE NECESSITY OF GROWING FAITH.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"We are bound to thank God always for you, brethren, as it is meet, because that your faith groweth exceedingly, and the charity of every one of you all toward each other aboundeth."—2 THESSALONIANS I : 3.

Little-Faith Should Grow—Progress at Thessalonica—Paul Recognized it—The Growth in Faith—I. A Subject for Thanksgiving—What Strong Faith Produces—Much Needed Just Now—II. An Object for Diligent Endeavor—Growth an Evidence of Life—Will Tend to Joy and Comfort—How to Attain it—Avoid Frequent Change of Doctrine—Keep in the Open—Seek Knowledge and Experience—The Uses of Meditation—A Hymn Altered—Prayer, Obedience and Exercise—III. The Centre of Other Graces—The Quickest way to Win a Sinner—Heroes Required.

LAST Lord's-day I tried to say cheering and encouraging words to "Little-faith." I trust that the Holy Spirit, the Comforter, did thereby strengthen some to whom the Saviour said, "Oh thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?" But none of us would desire to remain among the Little-faiths; we long to press forward in our march to the better land. My prayer at the commencement of this discourse is, that we may each of us rise out of our little faith into of assurance, so that those who love us best may be able to say: "We are bound to thank God always for you, brethren, as it is meet, because that your faith groweth exceedingly."

The Church of Jesus Christ at Thessalonica did not commence under very propitious circumstances. Remember that oft-quoted text about the Bereans: "These were more noble than those in Thessalonica, in that they searched the Scriptures daily whether those things were so." That record does not relate to the converts in Thessalonica, but to those Jews who heard Paul preach in the synagogue, and refused to test his teaching by a reference to the Old Testament. They were not a noble sort of people, and yet from among them there were taken by almighty grace a certain company who were led to believe in the true Messiah. Thus they became more noble than even the Bereans; for we do not hear of a church in Berea, neither was an epistle written to the Bereans. Thessalonica received two epistles, bright with hearty commendations. Paul praised the Philipians, but the Thessalonians he praised yet more, thanking God at every remembrance of them, and glorying in them among the Churches of God for their patience and faith.

Before I plunge into the sermon I should like to pause and ask whether we as Christian men and women are such that Paul could say of us, "We are bound to thank God always for you, brethren, as it is meet, because that your faith groweth exceedingly, and the charity of every one of you all toward each other aboundeth." What think you? Could your pastor bless God for you? Could your nearest and dearest Christian friend feel that he was bound to thank God always for you? If not, why not? Oh that we may rise into such a happy state that we shall be cause of gratitude in others!

So, then, we come to our text, and the subject runs thus: for us to grow in faith is a subject for devout thanksgiving; and, in the second place, it is an object for diligent endeavor. Thirdly, if we greatly grow in faith it will be the source of other growths; for as faith increases love, patience, and every other virtue will flourish.

I. For us to grow and increase in faith is A SUBJECT FOR THANKSGIVING.

Paul gives a commendation of the Thessalonian Church which is exceedingly warm and hearty. One critic says the words may be regarded as somewhat extravagant, after the mode of the Apostle when he wishes to be emphatic. He writes fervently: "Your faith groweth exceedingly, and the charity of every one of you all toward each other aboundeth." It is an intense and unreserved commendation. This church was not absolutely perfect; for, because of the love of every one toward another, and their great kindness toward the poor, certain unworthy persons encroached upon their liberality. To use a very rough word, cadgers were multiplied among them, as they always are where generosity abounds. Shame that it should be so. Read chapter 3, verse 11: "For we hear that there are some which walk among you disorderly, working not at all, but are busybodies." There had been also among them here and there a person of loose life and of sharp business dealings, and to such he spoke in the First Epistle; but these flies in the pot of ointment did not destroy its sweetness. They were so few comparatively that Paul speaks of the whole body with approbation.

STRONG-FAITH.

The blessing of increased faith is of unspeakable value, and therefore praise should be largely rendered for it. Little faith will save, but strong faith is that which builds up the Church, which overcomes the world, which wins sinners, and which glorifies God. If we were invoking blessings upon a church we could scarcely ask for a larger boon than that all the brethren might be strong in faith, giving glory to God. Strong-faith ventures into large endeavors for Christ, and hence missions are projected; Strong-faith carries out the projects of holy zeal, and hence daring ideals are turned into facts; Strong-faith is a shield against the darts of error, and hence she is the object of the contempt and hatred of heresy. Oh that the night of Little-faith were over, and that the day of glorious faith would come! Soon would our young men see visions, and our old men dream dreams, if faith were more among us.

Paul thus fervently gave thanks to God because the blessing came to the Church at a remarkably seasonable time. The people of Thessalonica had risen against the Church and persecuted it; thus, without were fightings, but within there were no fears; for the brethren were firm in faith and fervent in love. The Church was subject to constant tribulation; but its faith grew exceedingly. Has it not often been so with the Lord's people?

WE NEED IT MUCH

just now. This is a time of depression in trade, when many are suffering want, and almost all find their means decreased. We need to be rich in faith, for we are growing poor in pocket. Many children of God cannot find employment wherewith to earn their bread. This is, moreover, a time of abounding vice. Perhaps never in our memories were any of us so shocked as we have been of late by the discoveries of unspeakable abominations. We need that our faith should grow exceedingly, for sin runs down our streets in torrents. It is also a period of grievous departure from the faith once delivered to the saints. Looking back to our younger days, we are amazed at the progress of error. We mourned in those days that men trifled with the doctrines of the Gospel; but what shall we now say, when men deride those doctrines, and mock at them as antiquated fables? I cannot speak emphatically enough upon the abounding dangers of the times: they demand of us that we be not of doubtful mind, but that we take firm hold of infallible truth, and endure as seeing Him who is invisible. He that cannot say "I believe, and am sure" is one born out of due time.

II. In the second place, it is worthy to be an object for diligent endeavor. If you have it not, LABOR TO ATTAIN IT.

As the merchantman seeketh goodly pearls, so seek a growing faith. Covet earnestly the best gifts and the noblest graces. Why? Because the proof of faith lies in the growth of faith. If thou hast a dead faith it will always be the same; but if thou hast the faith of God's elect it must grow. Life in its earliest stages is ever attended with growth. Brother, thou must have more faith, or we shall fear that thou hast no faith; thou must have more love, or else for sure thou hast no love at all. That which does not grow unto God does not live unto God. We ought to have more faith because God's truth deserves it. It ought to be the easiest thing in the world for us to trust God; to believe every word of the Lord should be an act to which we need not be exhorted; it should be as natural as for the lungs to breathe, or the heart to beat.

Moreover, we ought to grow in faith because it will be so much for our own

and strength, and joy. Does Little-faith know what it might be, and do, and enjoy if it could only quit its littleness? There are many ways of being a Christian, as there are many ways of being an Englishman; but all are not equally desirable. I may be an Englishman in banishment, or in the workhouse, or in prison; but I prefer to be an Englishman at home, in health, and at liberty. So you may be a Christian, and be weak, timorous and sad; but this is not desirable; it is better to be a happy, holy, vigorous, useful Christian. As your being an Englishman does not depend on your health or wealth, so neither does your salvation turn upon the strength or joy of your faith; yet much does depend on it. Why not glorify God on the road to heaven? Why not have foretastes of it now? It is not my desire to go through the world in miserable style, singing always—

"Do I love the Lord or no?

Am I his, or am I not?"

Infinitely do I prefer so to trust God that my peace may be like a river, and my righteousness like the waves of the sea. Do seek the utmost degree of faith; for if this be in you and abound you shall not be barren or unfruitful. Heaven lies that way. More faith, more rest of heart. To grow heavenly we must grow more believing.

HOW TO ATTAIN IT.

The question is, How is this to be done? How is my faith to be made to grow exceedingly? It is the work of the Holy Spirit; but still He uses us for the increase of our own faith. If we are to grow in faith certain evils are to be avoided with scrupulous care. Avoid continual change of doctrine. If you have a tree in your garden and you transplant it often it will yield you scanty fruit. Those who are everything by turns, and nothing long, are "ever learning, but never able to come to the knowledge of the truth." Unstable as water, they shall not excel. Those brethren who believe this to-day, and that to-morrow, and the other thing the next day, do not believe anything in downright earnest; they cannot grow; they are not rooted and grounded. Like the moon, they are always changing, and what light they have is cold and sickly. He who can change his religion has none to change. Those who prefer philosophy to Christ never knew Him.

PERILOUS EXPERIMENTS.

Then, again, if you had a tree and did not transplant it, but began to dig away the earth from it, removing the ground in which it stood, you would impoverish it, and prevent its fruitfulness. I know certain professors who are giving up the ground which their souls should grow in. One doctrine after another is forsaken, till nothing is held to be important. They do not believe much now, and they are on the line to believe nothing at all. The experiment of the Frenchman who had just brought his horse to live on a straw a day when it died is being repeated among us, faith being literally starved to death. What low diet do some men prescribe for their souls! How can your faith grow when vital truths are abandoned, or held with feeble grasp? Oh for a band of Puritan believers! Oh for a troop of spiritual Ironsides!

Next, a tree cannot grow if it is shut from sun, and rain and dew. Without heavenly influences we must be barren. Plant a little tree right under a great oak, so that it is always in the shade, and it cannot grow; clear the big tree away, or the sapling will dwindle to death. Some men's faith cannot grow because it is overshadowed by worldliness, by tolerated sin, by love of riches, by the pride of life, by cares of lower things. The pursuit of Christ crucified must be all-absorbing, or it will be ineffectual. To know what you believe, and to abide steadfast in it, is the way to be robust in faith. Men whose hearts are not in their trades, men who chop and change—these are the men whose names appear in the Gazette; are not many spiritual bankruptcies due to the same cause?

There are methods which the spiritual husbandman uses to cause faith to grow. First, faith grows by an increase of knowledge. Many persons doubt because they are not instructed. A great deal of unbelief vanishes when knowledge, like the morning sun, drives away the mists.

Better still than mere knowledge, which alone would puff you up, faith

GROWS BY EXPERIENCE.

When a man has tried and proved a thing, then his confidence in it is largely increased. Take a promise and test it, and then you will say: "I know THAT is so." When you have tested it again, and again, and again, nobody will be able to shake you, for you will say: "I have tasted and handled of this good Word; I have made it my own, and I am not to be driven from it." The experienced Christian is the established Christian. The man who has proved all things is the man who holds fast that which is good. God give grace to increase our faith by knowledge and by experience!

Faith also grows by much meditation and walking with God. If you want to believe in a man you must know him. Half the disputes between Christian people arise from their not knowing one another. There is a hymn of Mr. Sankey, which I venture to alter thus:

"When we know each other better,
The mists will roll away."

When we know each other our suspicions, prejudices and dislikes will speedily disappear. I am sure it is so with our God. When you walk with Him, when your communion with Him is close and constant, your faith in Him will grow exceedingly. Some of you, I am afraid, do not give five minutes in the day to meditation. You are for that. In London life men get up in a hurry, even as they went to bed in a hurry and slept in a hurry. They swallow their breakfast in a hurry; they have no time to digest it; the bell is ringing at the station, and they must hurry to catch the train. They reach business in a hurry; they hurry through it, and they hurry to get back from it. Men cannot think, for they have barely time to wink their eyes. As to an hour's meditation and reading the Scriptures, and communing with God, many professors nowadays would think they committed robbery against the God of this world if they took half-an-hour out of His service to give it to fellowship with the world to come. If our faith is to grow exceedingly we must maintain constant intercourse with God.

Another way of increasing faith is by much prayer. We must be careful to render obedience to God. A man cannot trust God while he lives in sin: every act of disobedience weakens confidence in God. Faith and obedience are bound up in the same bundle. He that obeys God trusts God; and he that trusts God obeys God. He that is without faith is without works; and he that is without works is without faith. Do not oppose faith and good works to one another, for there is a blessed relationship between them; and if you abound in obedience your faith shall grow exceedingly.

Again, faith grows by exercise. The man who uses the little faith he has will get more faith; but he that says: "I have not enough faith for such and such work," and therefore shrinks back, shall become more and more timid, till at last, like a coward, he runs away. Go forward with thy little faith, and to thy surprise it shall have grown as thou hast advanced. Accomplish much, and then endeavor something more, and something more. I have often used an illustration taken from a person who teaches the art of growing taller. I do not believe in that art: we shall not add a cubit to our stature just yet. But part of this professor's exercise is, that in the morning, when you get up, you are to reach as high as ever you can, and aim a little higher every morning, though it be only the hundredth part of an inch. By that means you are to grow. This is so with faith. Do all you can, and then do a little more; and when you can do that, then do a little more. Always have something in hand that is greater than your present capacity. Grow up to it, and when you have grown up to it, grow more.

III. Finally, this growing faith becomes

THE CENTRE OF OTHER GRACES.

"Your faith groweth exceedingly, and the charity of every one of you all toward each other aboundeth." A firm faith in Gospel verities will make us love one another, for each doctrine of truth is an argument for love.

Firmness in the faith ministers toward the unity of the Church. I am always afraid of a church that is made up of mixed elements, when some are Calvinistic, some Arminian, some Baptist, and some Pædobaptist. When the minister who holds them together dies they will disintegrate. When certain reasons that now make them cohere cease to exist the Church will divide like quicksilver, each little bit breaking into smaller bits, and so they will go rolling about in innumerable factions. But given a church that holds the truth firmly, with deep and strong faith, then, if the pastor dies, or twenty pastors die, they believe in a pastor who lives for ever, and whoever comes or does not come, the truth they hold holds them in living unity. I cannot imagine a greater blessing for you as a church in years to come than for each man and woman to be intelligently established in the truth you have received.

This faith breeds patience in men, and patience assists love. Truth to tell, God's people are, some of them, a singular tribe. A countryman was accustomed to say that if God had not chosen His people before they were born He would never have done so afterward. There is truth in that saying. Therefore if a man loves his fellow-Christians as an act of mere nature, he will often feel himself baffled; he will say: "They acted very unkindly to me. Who can love people that are so ill-mannered, so ungrateful?" But when faith is strong you will say: "What is that to me? I love them for Christ's sake. If I am to have a reward, it shall come from my Lord Christ. As for God's people, I love them despite their faults; over the head of the mistaken judgments they form of me I love all my brethren."

is not to be always censuring them, but to love them better. The quickest way to win a sinner is to love him to Christ; the quickest way to sanctify a believer is to love him into purity and holiness. Only faith can do this. May faith, therefore, grow exceedingly; for faith by working patience helps us to bear with others.

If there be anything grand, and good, and desirable, anything Christ-like, anything God-like, the way to it is to let your faith grow exceedingly. If this church is to become a missionary church more and more, as I pray God it may, your faith must grow exceedingly. If you are to stand fast as a break-water in these times of departure from the faith once delivered to the saints, your faith must grow exceedingly. If you are to be made a blessing to this wicked city, and shine like a light-house over this sea of London, your faith must grow exceedingly. If God has brought you as a church, together with other churches, to the kingdom for such a time as this; if you are to achieve your destiny, and work for God and glorify His name, your faith must grow exceedingly. The man who is timorous and faint-hearted, let him go home; he is not fit for the day of battle. The age requires heroes. The chicken-hearted are out of their place in this perilous century.

You that know what you know, and believe what you believe, whose tramp is that of fearless warriors, you have a high calling—fulfil it. You shall see what God will do for you and with you; and it shall be written in the pages of eternity that at such a time the Church grew in its faith, and therefore God used it for His glory. May it be so. God bless you each one for His name's sake. Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

BALLADS OF THE CITY.

AMONG the gems of this charming work, a notice of which appeared in these columns on September 10th, is one which lack of space prevented our inserting then, but which cannot fail to interest our readers. It is the account the young student gives of his visit to a Salvation Army meeting. The young man was prejudiced at the very commencement. The sight of the banjo and the tambourines seemed strangely out of place in a religious assembly to a man who enjoyed his own meeting, sitting in his own cosy pew. Then the shouting and the loud singing shocked him. He says:

"I had rather get good
In a civilized way.
So this meeting had grated
Somewhat on my heart,
And ere long I had waited,
I thought to depart."

But before he left he saw a young man rise, with a face that told of years of dissipation, and declare that in that place he had been saved. An old man followed, who said he was the father of the last speaker, who had been the terror of his later years, and the student saw the old man take the young one to his heart and thank God for the change. Other similar scenes of rare pathos follow, and then the student's prejudices give way:

"My smiles could not hide
The fast-gathering tears,
And I cheered, laughed, and cried,
As I had not for years.
And I thought, 'not amiss
Are this tumult and shout;
Folks who save men like this,
Know what they're about.'"

The young man's heart was true, and so long as good was done, he was ready to bless the method, whether his taste approved or not. There are many other passages which show that Mr. Carleton has a genuine admiration for efforts to do good, and does not wait to inquire before he gives it expression whether the world has given those who make them the stamp of respectability. Many such beautiful poems might be quoted, but doubtless our readers will like to buy the book for themselves. Pp. 180; price, 5s. Published by Messrs. Harper & Brothers, New York.

YACHTING.

The interest taken in the contest between the representative vessel of the American yachting squadron and the Genesta, the representative of the English fleet of yachts for the renowned trophy, will render a book about yachts and yachting very welcome to a larger number of people. Captain Roland F. Coffin has produced such a work in his history of "The America's Cup"; how it was won by the Yacht America in 1851, and has been since defended." Captain Coffin has witnessed every contest since the first one at Cowes, and is therefore able to give a complete history of the friendly international struggle for supremacy in this department of sea sailing. Pp. 155; price, $1. Published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons.

ON THE FOUR GOSPELS,

is a work by J. G. Bellett, the aim of which is to place before Christian students the distinguishing features of each of the Gospels, their peculiarities, and the points in which they differ from each other. In Matthew, for example, he points out that the Gospel being prepared expressly for Jewish readers, the Evangelist dwells chiefly on the evidences that Christ was the expected Messiah, and that He fulfilled the predictions of Moses and the prophets. Mark is the Gospel of service portraying Jesus in His life of ministry. Luke, again, is the Gospel of the Son of Man, showing Christ in His social life, mixing with men, and teaching, and blessing them. John's design is to present Christ as the Son of God the Heavenly Stranger descended into a blind and corrupt world to redeem it by His love. There is no attempt made to follow the lines of modern criticism in Mr. Bellett's work. Pp. 504; price, $1.25. Published by J. A. Whipple, Boston, Mass.

GOSPEL WORK AMONG CANADIAN INDIANS.

MORNING-LIGHT, whose portrait appears above, is chief of the Minsi or Wolf tribe of Indians, who made themselves notorious in the Revolutionary War of 1776 by taking up arms for the English against the patriotic Americans. As a natural consequence, when the war was over they received an intimation that they had better go where they belonged, and live in Canada under the British flag, which they had chosen to follow. They were losers by the change, for their English friends failed to provide for them as well as they had fared on the American soil.

In 1831 the Methodists sent some preachers among the tribe, and one of them, named Harris, had Morning-Light among his congregation. He was then only sixteen years old, but he conceived a great respect for the religion of the pale-faces; but some injustice which the tribe suffered shortly afterward at the hands of the white men obliterated the impression. Nine years later, however, he and several of his braves embraced Christianity, and were baptized at a camp-meeting by the Rev. S. Waldron. Morning-Light has since then been a warm friend of the mission, and is now engaged in raising funds to build a church and school. He wisely abstains from fire-water, and boasts that he has not tasted it for forty years.

Upright-Woman, one of the Owen's Sound band of Ojibways, a Christian of some attainments, relates a touching story of the struggle of one of the braves of her tribe under spiritual conviction. He had been one of the most unruly of the band, and was suspected of being guilty of some outrages which imperilled the safety of the tribe. He was impressed by the preaching of the mission preacher, but the doctrines of Christianity were so antagonistic to his own queer code of morals that he saw he could not embrace the pale-face religion and live up to it without a complete change of life. He had a long and bitter struggle with himself, but one day, after a period of prolonged meditation, he was seen carrying his musket, tomahawk, and blanket to a retired place in the woods, where he laid them down, and stretching out his hands toward heaven (see illustration), he consecrated himself and them to the God of the pale-faces. The change in his conduct afterward showed that he was sincere.

DISAPPOINTED AMBITION.

IN the recently published life of the late Thomas Carlyle by his friend, James Anthony Froude, is found a very significant passage. Mr. Carlyle, when a comparatively unknown school-teacher, fell in love with Jane Welsh, a beautiful and accomplished young lady, the only daughter and heiress of the famous physician, Dr. John Welsh, of Haddington. Miss Welsh was the belle of the town, and many wealthy young men there and in Edinburgh had been suitors for her hand. But she rejected them in favor of the rough and poor school-teacher, in whom her true insight detected signs of the commanding genius which many years later received the homage of the world.

She did not pretend to a passion she did not feel, but openly acknowledged that her motive in marrying him was ambition. She was sure he would become the most distinguished man of his day, and was willing to endure the hardships of alliance with him that she might share in his future triumphs. Late in life, when she was driving about London in her own carriage, and money was abundant in the Carlyle home, and her husband was admired and courted by the wealth and aristocracy of Europe, she said to a friend: "Mr. Carlyle has succeeded beyond my wildest dreams, and—I am miserable." She had found, as thousands before her have found, that the world's prizes are dead sea fruit, nothing but ashes. She found no delight in her husband's possession of wealth and fame, to the achievement of which she had given many years of toil and hardship (Eccles. 2:22, 23).

How severe were the privations which the accomplished lady underwent no one knows, but one incident affords an indication of their character. Her difficulties were serious. She says in one of her letters: "Being an only child, and brought up to great prospects, I was sublimely ignorant of every branch of useful knowledge, though a capital Latin scholar and very fair mathematician." In these circumstances Mrs. Carlyle learned to sew, to mend, and even make her own and her husband's clothes, to cook, make bread, and clean house.

THE FIRST LOAF

Mrs. Carlyle ever made was the cause of bitter tears. Thirty years after the event it was still fresh in her memory. In giving consolation and encouragement to a friend in trouble she thus wrote of her first attempt at the making and baking of that loaf: "Knowing nothing about the process of fermentation or the heat of ovens, it came to pass that my loaf got put into the oven at the time that myself ought to have been put into bed; and I remained the only person not asleep in a house in the middle of a desert. One o'clock struck, and then two, and then three; and still I was sitting there, in the midst of an intense solitude, my whole body aching with weariness, my heart aching with a sense of forlornness and degradation. That I, who had been so petted at home, whose comfort had been studied by everybody in the house, and who had never been required to do anything but cultivate my mind, should have to pass all those hours of the night in watching a loaf of bread, which might not turn out bread after all! Such thoughts maddened me, till I laid down my head on the table and sobbed aloud."

LITTLE TOTTIE'S RESCUE.

Two ladies sat on the beach at a quiet sea-side town one beautiful summer's day, conversing, while a little girl, the child of one of them, paddled in the surf. The conversation turned upon the prevalent style of ladies' dress, which the mother of the child pronounced grossly indecent. "The skirts," she said, "are so spare and so tightly made that some fashionable ladies show the shape of their limbs every step they take. For my part, I should be ashamed to be seen in such dresses. I cannot understand how modest women can bring themselves to wear them."

"I do not take your view," said her companion; "it is merely a conventional prejudice, though I do not like the fashion. I like to move freely, and would not wear any dress that would impede my movements; but I do not object to them on moral grounds. So far as my ideas on the matter go, I see no more moral impropriety in wearing a dress that does not conceal the shape of the lower limbs than in wearing one with tight sleeves, which reveal the shape of the arms, or a dress with no sleeves at all, such as ladies wear at balls and parties. It is a mere conventional notion about the parts of the body that may or may not be visible. I would obey the notion, but I cannot see anything moral in it."

"That is sheer nonsense," said the first speaker; "that comes of your Vassar experience. You will know better some day. I feel as if I should sink into the earth with shame if I exposed so much as my ankles to the light of day. But where is little Tottie? I cannot see her anywhere," and the mother rose excitedly to look for her daughter.

The child was not in sight, and the mother uttered a scream of dismay and ran along the shore to a point from which she could see the seaward side of a high rock. There stood the little one on a jutting point of the rock, waving her arms and shouting with delight as the water flowed all around the stone on which she stood. She was queen of the island. Not another living thing on it; and though it was only a patch of bare rock less than two feet square, she was glorying with childish delight at her fancied supremacy. Her mother looked at her in terror. It was of no use calling her, for the water was too deep for the child to wade back; beside which the rocky bed was a very uncertain foothold for a child's steps.

What was to be done? The mother hesitated not a moment. Sitting down on the beach she stripped off her shoes and stockings, and waded into the water, rounding the point of the high rock to the place where her daughter was standing on her little island. She was not a minute too soon, for before she reached the spot a wave dashed clear over the jutting rock, almost washing the little one off. Seizing the child and holding her securely with one hand, while she raised her flowing draperies with the other, she made her way back to the beach in safety, uncertain for the moment whether to kiss and hug her darling in an ecstasy of thankfulness, or to scold her for her temerity.

"It seems," said her companion, mischievously, "some people who have not been spoiled by Vassar experience do not hesitate to expose their limbs when there is need for it."

"Would you have had me let the little darling drown?" asked the mother, indignantly. "I would have done far more than that to save her."

"Oh, you need not apologize to me; I think you did quite right; but I was amused at your readiness to cast your principles overboard in a crisis."

"When you know what it is to be a mother you will understand that there is nothing she will not cast overboard to save her child."

Tottie Rescued by her Mother.

Parents generally will agree with that mother's remark, and the fact enables us to form some conception, inadequate though it is, of what the love of God for a sinful world must be when He gave His only-begotten Son to suffer and die for its salvation (John 3:16).

THE SILVER LINING.

Jean's Conflict.

THE hysterical cry of "Mother! Mother!" which startled Mrs. Arnold as she stood by her daughter's new-made grave came from one whose heart was as heavy, after many years of bereavement, as was the sorrowing mother whose loss was but a few days old. Jean Lindsay was feeling now in her budding womanhood more severely than perhaps she felt in her childhood, when her bereavement was fresh, how severe and disastrous to her life was the loss she had sustained by the death of her mother. Her soul hungered for sympathy, wise counsel, and guidance, which none can give as a mother can.

Her father was absorbed in his study and his work, and was, moreover, less sympathetic in his old age than he had been in his youth; and even then he had been hard and cold. Age had not mellowed him as it does some people. Rather, it had seemed to petrify him, carving hard, rugged lines on his face and hardening his heart to all sorrows save those of sickness and bereavement. Jean's woes he would have regarded as almost sinful. What were her sorrows compared with those which he had undergone, or with those of thousands of the poor around her? She had every comfort that she could require—a pleasant home and a sure provision—while others were in sickness and poverty, uncertain whether or not the next meal could be provided. Mr. Lindsay thought that Jean's was an enviable lot, and would have reproved her had she told him that she was not happy. With her sister Margaret she would have fared worse; and, truth to say, Margaret was the last person in the world to whom Jean would have gone for sympathy. She felt herself alone—utterly alone, and her warm, girlish nature was chilled by the consciousness of her solitude.

Probably the spectacle of Mrs. Arnold's grief and the sight of the loving mother whose affection the dead girl had enjoyed brought her own deprivation more conspicuously before her, and had wrung from her the despairing cry of "Mother! Mother!" If Jean had only known of One whose love passes the love of women she would not have been so melancholy. The relief of pouring out the heart into the ear of One who is ever ready to listen to the cry of the weakest of His children would have been hers, and with the constant sense of His loving care and guidance she would no more have felt alone in the world. As it was, she had no resource but that empty and unavailing one in which she was then indulging.

It was a pitiful sight, and Mrs. Arnold's motherly heart was touched by it. Her own heavy burden seemed to incline her all the more readily to extend a pitying and a helpful hand to the poor, desolate girl lying prone on the mossy grave, crying helplessly, "Oh, mother, mother!" Going up to her noiselessly, she sat down and put her hand in hers.

"My poor child, what is it?"

Jean looked almost scared at the sight of Mrs. Arnold, and would have run away if Mrs. Arnold had not held her back.

"Tell me what it is, dear; you have lost your mother?"

As Jean did not answer, Mrs. Arnold continued: "Tell me about her; I should like to hear."

Jean looked up into the sympathizing, motherly face, and regained confidence; then little by little told her all her story—how unhappy she was, how unsatisfied. Mrs. Arnold, in reply, told her about Grace, till the sorrowing mother was herself comforted in trying to comfort the motherless girl. She told her she would like to be her friend; like her to visit her and know her other daughters; and, better still, she pointed her to a Friend who would be with her always, One from whom no height nor depth could separate her.

Jean felt with Mrs. Arnold near her she would soon learn to be good. She did not know then how God would teach her Himself, and how she must learn to trust in Him alone, leaning on no earthly props.

Early the next day Dr. and Mrs. Arnold set off on their return home. Mr. Campbell himself came down from Scotland to fetch his wife and daughter, and soon the family at the Vicarage had once more settled down in their old quiet ways.

The days of excitement were over, Lingford seemed duller than ever, Jean thought, and her few duties more monotonous than ever, but she tried to keep up a brave heart.

Mrs. Arnold had told her that to be a Christian was something more than bearing the name—that it meant trying to follow in His footsteps, and trusting in Christ. She would not find the way was always smooth, for our Saviour had Himself told us that it was a very narrow path; there would be many difficulties in the way, many battles to fight.

Poor Jean had little calculated what sort of battles these would be. Her sister saw there was some difference in her, but did not understand what it was. Perhaps if Jean could have summoned up courage to go to her and say, "Margaret, I want to begin my life afresh, 'I want to be a follower of Christ,' the sisters might both have softened and become helpers, instead of hinderers, to each other. As it was, Margaret only thought her cross and sullen, for Jean kept all her feelings to herself, and would fly to her room to shed bitter tears of disappointment over her continual failures, her oft-repeated outbursts of angry feeling. It might have been easy, Jean thought, for such as Grace to be good; her home had been all peace, her mother so good and kind. If she could only be somewhere else, then it might be possible to serve God; but at Lingford it was quite impossible. Should she give up trying? But there was a force in her nature that did not like giving in over anything. Others found comfort in religion, why should not she? She resolved to try again, and would often stroll out to Grace's grave and sit there to ponder her difficulties.

One day, when she was specially troubled, slipping her little Bible into her pocket, she ran off to her favorite spot. Opening it, her eye fell on the words, "Put on the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to stand."

"Surely," she thought, "this is just what I need." Often had she heard and read those words, and they had conveyed no meaning; now she felt how fully they suited her. As a child, she remembered being taken to a museum, and being shown the figure of a man clad in full armor, and the vision came up before her now. How completely the ancient warrior was covered, and, what was more, he carried a shield as a further protection. She, too, was a warrior; she aspired to be a soldier of Jesus Christ; how could she expect anything else but defeat so long as she neglected to put on her armor? Then and there she put up the simple petition: "Lord, clothe me in this armor, teach me how to use the shield of faith, the helmet of salvation."

From that day she began to give up leaning so much on her own strength, and to find out, very slowly, it is true, the lifelong lesson of the faithfulness of God's promise, "As thy day, so shall thy strength be."

As the vicar's daughter she had been expected, as a matter of course, to take a class in the Sunday-school. She was naturally fond of children, so the work was not really irksome to her; but now she began to think she had been trying to teach an unknown language. It was true that she had talked to the children about Jesus Christ; she had told them He had lived and died, and how good He was; but she told it as she might have told the story of Alexander the Great. It was the life and death of a great man who had lived many centuries ago, that the children would never have guessed they had any personal interest in Him. Now she knew she must herself go first to the great Teacher before she could presume to teach; and when one day she had riveted their attention as she had never done before, telling them of all Jesus had suffered for them, her heart felt a new thrill of love to Him as she taught the little ones to say in lisping accents, "Christ died for me."

Before the winter passed away Jean's lot had brightened. A correspondence with Mrs. Arnold had begun, and the light it brought into the heart of the motherless girl was making itself felt in her life. The duties of the day had never been associated in Jean's mind with religion. The martyrs who laid down their lives in time of persecution were religious heroes; the missionaries who went into heathen lands to preach Christ to the savages and endured hardship and faced danger without prospect of earthly reward were to her an exalted type of Christian. She could imagine men and women doing that from religious motives, though she was well aware that she had never found in religion any force or sustaining power that would have enabled her to do as they had done; but it had never occurred to her that there was any religion in bearing patiently the crosses of petty vexation and annoyance at home.

Mrs. Arnold's letters illumined these daily trials for her. She learned from them that in bearing cheerfully undeserved censure, in restraining the tongue so ready to justify herself and to hurl back defiance in return for unjust blame, she was doing something for Christ's sake which He would see and acknowledge. She could do that—ay, do a thousand times more than that, now that the heavens were no longer blank to her. That Jesus was living, was actually cognizant of her existence, and knew her inmost individual heart, not as one of a million, but as a friend and brother, was a fact which she was long in realizing; but when it had once gained possession of her, it was never again forgotten for a moment. Prayer became the delight of her life. The days were gone when the formal repetition of stereotyped phrases was the idea she had of devotion. She talked with God as a man talks with his friend, assured that her prayers were heard. The pent-up heart poured itself out, and all the story of her loneliness and her empty, desolate life was told upon her knees, as she had never told it to any mortal. Even the telling of it gave relief, and when she arose from her knees and opened her Bible she found messages of comfort and encouragement scattered over every page. No longer were they dull, familiar though they were. They had life and meaning in them, as the living words of One to whom she had been speaking. "Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in me," were some of the words she read at the very beginning of this time of new light. They were dear to her ever afterward as the first that she seemed to hear from her Saviour's very lips. As she read them a quiet, peaceful restfulness filled her soul, and kneeling down again, with her New Testament open before her, she wept her thankfulness and begged for pardon that her heart had ever been troubled through unbelief.

Mr. Lindsay noticed a staid cheerfulness in his daughter's manner as these hours of communion with God began to influence her life. There was no hilarity, no girlish frivolity, but a deep stream of joy seemed to be springing up within her that transformed her countenance and made her every word a soothing, cheering power in the little family. He was thankful for it, but had no conception of its origin. He had been a religious teacher for many years, but the religion he felt and taught was a religion in which doctrine and duty were in the foreground, and love seemed to have lost its proper place. He would have gone to the stake without a tremor for his faith; but the ecstasy, the delight of sonship, the glorious liberty of the children of God, had never filled his heart. It was no wonder that Jean's, warm clinging nature had been repelled by religion as her father taught it, and had gone out with open arms to the presentation of a loving Saviour which Mrs. Arnold had held up before her.

The winter had melted into spring, and the spring had changed to summer, when, to Jean's delight, an invitation came to her from Mrs. Arnold to visit the family in their home. Mr. Lindsay had received by the same mail a letter from Dr. Arnold confirming and seconding his wife's invitation, so that Jean's acceptance might be retarded by no obstacle in her father's reluctance. He discussed the matter, as he did all the details of his life, with his elder daughter, and the issue of their consultation was a gracious permission to Jean to go to her new friends.

Jean had never been away from home before, so that the visit was something of an undertaking for her; but the prospect of being near to Mrs. Arnold, of learning more from her than her letters, brief as so busy a lady necessarily had to make them, could tell her, was a pleasure in anticipation more than counterbalancing her dread of meeting two young ladies as accomplished and clever as she was sure Helen and Kate Arnold must be. She need not, however, have felt any timidity at all. Both Helen and Kate had learned to love her before they saw her. Mrs. Arnold, it is true, had too much delicacy to show them the letters she had received from Jean; but she had described her so fully, had spoken so pitifully of her desolate condition and of her winsome ways, that her daughters had a welcome ready for her when she arrived which lacked no quality of true friendship.

The three girls were sitting together one morning, about three weeks after Jean's arrival, reading and working by turns, when a letter for Helen was brought in, and that young lady was soon immersed in its contents. "You must know," said Kate Arnold, in a mock-confidential tone to Jean, "that my sister, innocent and staid as she looks, is in correspondence with a young unmarried gentleman in Australia, and this is one of his letters. They are always writing to each other, and have a perfect mine of secrets between them."

"Do not be so absurd," said Helen, looking up from her letter, and laughing gaily. "Do not take any notice of her, Jean. My correspondent is only our brother Ralph, and he writes to me instead of to Kate, because Kate is so dilatory in replying; and when she does write she has so much to say, that she crosses her letters, so as not to pay double postage. Ralph does not like crossed letters, and he does not like to wait a year for a letter at all. That is why I am his correspondent. I think it is a real shame to have a brother all alone out in Australia and leave him for months pining for news of home." And Helen returned to her letter.

A minute or two afterward the two girls, who were quietly sewing, were startled by a merry peal of laughter from Helen's corner. "Kate—Jean," she called, "do listen! Did you ever hear such a commission as this absurd fellow gives me? Let me see—no, I think I must not read his very words. The fact is, he asks me to find him a wife. Fancy the ridiculous idea of his setting me to select and propose, and do his courting for him! Why, if he were living here it would be hard enough to make love by proxy; but think of my having to do it so effectually that the lady would be willing to go all the way to Australia to him. She had need love him very much."

"You ought to feel honored by the confidence he reposes in you," said Kate. "It is not every gentleman who would be satisfied to accept a wife of some other person's choosing. Why, you might send him our Irish scrub-woman. Let us hear the kind of lady he wants. I presume you will not be so self-confident as to dispense with my assistance?"

"No; I will consult you, Kate; but, of course, the final decision will rest with me if I undertake the commission. I am in some doubt whether I ought to do it, it is such a serious matter. I shall have the lives of two people in my hands, and it would be dreadful if they did not agree, or—what is the proper word?—affiliate."

"Why does he not choose for himself; there are ladies in Australia."

"Yes; but Ralph does not seem easily pleased. He is anxious to have a young lady from home; and he determined to come home for the purpose of finding one; but when he found how much money he would lose, and how his business would suffer, he decided to give the commission to me. Oh, dear, this is the most difficult undertaking I ever had thrust upon me!"

The entrance of Dr. and Mrs. Arnold put an end to the conversation for the time; but that night there was an earnest discussion in the bedroom occupied by the two sisters. Ralph's letter was carefully read, and a serious consultation held. The same thought was in the minds of both, but each hesitated to give utterance.

At last Kate, putting her mouth close to Helen's ear, as if afraid the very walls might hear, whispered:

"Do you think Jean would go?"

ELISHA AT DOTHAN.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 4, 2 Kings 6:8-23. Golden Text, ver. 16. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Elisha's Ministry Unrestricted—His Services to the King of Israel—Tells Him His Enemy's Secrets—Benhadad Suspects His Servants of Treachery—The Secret Discovered—An Expedition Against Elisha—The Protecting Forces—Faith Joined with Consecration—The Capture of the Syrian Army—Treated Magnanimously.

ELISHA's ministry of faithfulness and love was continuous. God gave him to detect the evil in Gehazi's heart which had made it impossible for God to use him in the raising of the Shunamite's son. He had shown the sons of the prophets, when the borrowed axe fell into the water, that God could make iron swim to help one of His children who trusted Him out of a difficulty. But the prophet's ministry was also to

THE COURT OF ISRAEL.

Oh, how one sees the yearning of God's heart over these sinful kings of Israel, who stood in the place which He held among His people until they had rejected Him, that He should not reign over them (1 Sam. 8:7). Prophets were sent to them—clear, personal, direct messages from God—miracles were wrought in their behalf; and yet, in spite of all, they did not yield to God. And such is the history of every unsaved soul; God is not the Author of their ruin; "I would, but ye would not" is ever the sad truth; "ye will not come unto me that ye might have life" (John 5:40).

"The king of Syria warred against Israel"—still the same Benhadad who had been the scourge of Israel for over fifty years. He "took counsel with his servants," men used to war, "saying, In such a place shall be my camp." No doubt his tactics were good, his judgment was not at fault, and yet in some mysterious way he found himself checkmated by the king of Israel. "The man of God sent unto the king of Israel" just in time to warn him, and he "saved himself then not once nor twice." Benhadad

among his servants, and that heavy bribes might be too great a temptation to those whom he took so closely into his council. His heart was "sore troubled," and the old man made an appeal to them calculated to touch their hearts: "Will ye not shew me which of us is for the king of Israel?" The enemy who so baffled him was where he least suspected. All his calculations were made with man, and yet this very Benhadad must have heard much of the God of Israel. One of his servants knew the truth, and said, "None, my lord, O king: but Elisha, the prophet that is in Israel, telleth the king of Israel the words that thou speakest in thy bedchamber." What was this? The king of Syria was marching against a nation, and contending with an army; should one single, insignificant man baffle him in all his counsels? It was too derogatory to his kingly pride, and all his enmity turned against that single man. "Go and spy where he is, that I may send and fetch him," was his command.

Oh, how little he took into account that a man of God cannot be touched without God Himself being touched! "He that toucheth you toucheth the apple of His eye" (Zech. 2:8). It was going to be an unequal contest, not man with man, but man with an Almighty God, who kept His servant under the shadow of His wings. When it was told the king, "Behold, he is in Dothan," he sent "thither horses, and chariots, and a great host," to take one single man! But Elisha walked everywhere unarmed, and attended ordinarily by only one servant; why, then, this force in order to take him? Men of the world have no conception of God. They can only conceive of some supernatural power lodged in and exercised by certain human beings. They have no idea of the God who created heaven and earth actually interfering in the things of our human life here on earth. Accordingly Benhadad arrayed force against force, and thought by numbers to overpower what he conceived to be some material power in Elisha. The whole city was compassed about with the Syrian army; Elisha knew it, but it did not trouble him.

In the early morning his servant (Gehazi's successor) went forth and discovered that they were hemmed in by a hostile force. He came running back to his master, and saying, "Alas! my master! how shall we do?" Elisha was by no means discomposured; he saw things in the light of God, and said, "Fear not: for they that be with us are more than they that be with them." This is faith. Elisha measured against the besieging host of the king of Syria, and he came to the same conclusion as David, "The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear? The Lord is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid" (Ps. 27:1)? As the Psalmist, "The Lord is on my side; I will not fear: what can man do unto me" (Ps. 118:6)? As Paul, "If God be for us, who can be against us" (Rom. 8:31)? But his servant had never seen things, as he did, in the light of God, and so he prayed, "Lord, I pray Thee, open his eyes, that he may see." And the Lord opened the eyes of the young man; and he saw: and, behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha. "The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear Him, and delivereth them" (Ps. 34:7). It is glorious to have God all round us, between us and evil; but oh, how much more glorious to have God indwelling! "Greater is He that is in you, than he that is in the world" (1 John 4:4). Distrust grieves God; Elisha's habit of life was to see God first in everything, and thus he was made so independent of men and things. Oh, if we could only learn habitually to acknowledge God, habitually to recognize His overruling hand, habitually to welcome every trial of faith as a new opportunity for Him to manifest His powers and love in working out our deliverance, our lives would be one glad sunshine, one unbroken joy, one constant triumph—God's triumph, not ours. Paul's testimony is, "Thanks be unto God, which always leadeth us in triumph in Christ" (1 Cor. 2:14, Rev. Ver.).

The Syrian troops entered the city and "came down to him." Was not Elisha now in danger? He did not act as though he were. In the most perfect quiet, without doing a single thing himself, he "prayed unto the Lord, and said, Smite this people, I pray Thee, with blindness. And He smote them with blindness according to the word of Elisha. And Elisha said unto them, This is not the way, neither is this the city: follow me, and I will bring you to the man whom ye seek. But he led them to Samaria." What a sight! The prophet who trusted in the Lord completely master of the situation, leading his enemies, who to a man were all at his mercy, just whatever he would! When a man is so wholly given up to God that he himself is nothing, God can thus use him. There was neither assumption, nor self-reliance, nor self-will about Elisha; thus he could be God's hand, God's voice, God's heart to the people. It would be a terrible thing if men who had their own ends in view could have the same power with God which Elisha had, to make a whole army blind, or a whole army to see! But God, in great measure, mercifully restricts the gift of faith to those whom He fills with Himself, so that faith may work by love, and His own ends, not ours, may be gained. While again and again we are told to ask and receive (Matt. 7:7, 8; Mark 11:24; John 14:13, 14; 16:23, 24), yet

promises of answered prayer. "When ye stand praying, forgive (Mark 11:25); "He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do; because I go unto my Father. And whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son" (John 14:12, 13); "If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you" (John 15:7); "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you . . . that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain; that whatsoever ye shall ask of the Father in my name, He may give it you." Unbelief and an unsundered will often go together; consciousness of self and unconsciousness of God.

Elisha kept faith with his blind enemies; he led them to the man whom they sought, and yet more—he, the man whom they sought, led them. Instead of being pursued by them, he walked at their head, so strangely God reverses things when all is put into His hands. Was it only caprice in Elisha which made him lead them to Samaria? Surely not; surely under the guidance of the God before whom he stood Elisha led them to the royal city of Israel to show them how complete was the power of the God of Israel. Once within the walls of Samaria Elisha prayed, "Lord, open the eyes of these men that they may see." It must have been a revelation to the Syrians of the nearness and the power of the Almighty God, that at a word of prayer, spoken in faith by the prophet, their whole army should become blind, and their whole army recover sight. Men who had cavilled beforehand, and had, perhaps on scientific grounds, declared that miracles could not be wrought by God in answer to prayer, could say nothing when their own eyes were closed or opened in answer to prayer. "The Lord opened their eyes, and they saw; and, behold, they were in the midst of Samaria," their sight was indeed restored, but they were all prisoners. It might seem to them that it was only in order that they might by a refinement of cruelty on the part of the children of Israel be more alive to their impending fate. But they were to learn that God is

A GOD OF LOVE.

The king of Israel, as might have been expected of him, said, "My father, shall I smite them? shall I smite them?" A man who knows nothing of God is ready enough to tread upon a fallen foe. Elisha answered, "Thou shalt not smite them: wouldst thou smite those whom thou hast taken captive with thy sword and with thy bow?" As though to say, "How much less these whom God has delivered into thine hand." "Set bread and water before them, that they may eat and drink, and go to their master." This is God's way of warfare. "If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat; and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink: for thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head, and the Lord shall reward thee" (Prov. 25:21, 22). It is probable that these words were well known, but inspired literature was not in fashion in Jehoram's court. Nevertheless he "prepared great provision for them: and when they had eaten and drunk, he sent them away, and they went to their master." How far any of them were really converted to God it is difficult to say, but they could never forget the power of the God of Israel; and these troops, "the bands of Syria," were totally disarmed of their enmity; they "came no more into the land of Israel."

THE attention of the Christian community of America will be directed during the ensuing week to the subject of faith-healing by the assembling, on Monday next and the five following days, of the great convention in which Mrs. Baxter, Dr. Clift, the Rev. A. B. Simpson, and other eminent believers from this country and Europe will meet to seek light on the manifestation of the Lord's power and grace, which has in these last days filled the hearts of His people with joy and thankfulness. It is, therefore, fitting that the portrait appearing in this number of the CHRISTIAN HERALD should be of a man whom God has used in a very remarkable manner in this work.

One of the first events which brought Captain Pennington's name into prominence among the rapidly-increasing section of the Christian Church, which has learned to look to God for the healing of the body as well as the salvation of the soul, was the remarkable recovery of a lady who was a passenger on board his ship three years ago.

THE SCENE ON THE SHIP

as she lay in Charleston harbor, on that May day, 1832, was one of the saddest in the world. A loving and devoted husband was carrying on board his dying wife, whose best hope was that she might live long enough to reach her home in the North before she died. It could scarcely be called a hope, for it did not include expectation. Three of the most eminent physicians in the South had been consulted, and they expressed their unhesitating opinion that there was not the slightest hope. But with that longing that dying people often experience, she wanted to die at home, and though she had an overpowering horror of being buried at sea, she persuaded her husband to let her make the voyage. He shared his wife's apprehension, and privately made arrangements with the shipping agents for having the body placed on ice in the too probable event of life departing during the voyage.

The lady's disease was a very painful as well as a critical one, and the Captain witnessed with deep sympathy the arrival of the apparently dying lady. Her husband was touched by the Captain's kindness, and invited him to visit his wife in her state-room. There was no need of a physician to tell any visitor to that room that death was hovering very near to the pallid sufferer lying there. The Captain looking at her felt that; but he was a man of strong faith, and he unhesitatingly told her that he felt sure that even from the brink of the grave, where she was, God was able to save her. He asked permission to pray with her then and there, and did so. It was not a common sight, that of the brave, hardy sailor, who had won distinction in many battles, and whose energy and endurance had saved his own life more than once in seasons of peril from shipwreck, kneeling in that cabin pleading with God for that flickering life. It was on a Tuesday night that that solemn, earnest prayer was offered, and on the following Saturday, when the vessel arrived at her pier in New York, that lady who had been carried on board in a dying state walked briskly down the gang-plank by her husband's side, and took the cars for her home. God had honored the sailor's confidence in Him, and had fully restored her to health. The Captain whose sublime faith had been thus rewarded was no common man, though his previous career had not been of that character which would have prepared his friends for such conduct.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

Lewis Walker Pennington was born at May's Landing, N. J., on October 16th, 1833. He is, therefore, now fifty-two years old. His father was the captain of a vessel, and had been so since his seventeenth year. He had no fancy, however, for his little boy to follow the same profession, but intended that he should have a good education, and choose for himself an occupation ashore. Accordingly, he was sent to school, and on Sundays attended, at his parents' desire, the Presbyterian Sunday-school in the village. The boy remained dutifully at home until his thirteenth year, but gave many indications of his inherited predilection for the sea.

To the boy's delight, his father, in 1846, consented, at his earnest solicitation, to take him with him on his next voyage, which was from New York to Charleston, S. C., New Orleans, and Havana. During that voyage his future career was determined. The eagerness with which the lad set himself to learn everything about the management of a ship, the intelligence he displayed in learning how to get the latitude and longitude of a vessel and locate her on the map, and his general aptitude for a seafaring life, proved him a born sailor, and his father, noticing this, bowed to the inevitable. At the end of that voyage he was sent to school again to study astronomy and navigation, with the expressed intention of fitting him for the career he had chosen. In 1848 he went a second voyage with his father, and after that, though only fifteen years of age, he deemed himself sufficiently experienced to ship himself as an able seaman. Apparently that was not too high an estimate of his capacity, for when he went among strangers his abilities were recognized, and by the time he was eighteen he attained the dignity of first mate.

On his return to Philadelphia the young man, then in his eighteenth year, was made sailing-master of the schooner Nebraska, bound for Matagorda, Tex. At that place he decided to locate, and after several voyages in Matagorda Bay he was given the command of the steamer Delta. That was a promotion of no little importance, and Captain Pennington, duly appreciating his dignity, proceeded to get married and, though not yet twenty years of age, to set up a home of his own.

The next year, 1854, will be always memorable in the Gulf States for the terrific hurricane which, on September 17th, wiped out the city of Matagorda and wrecked over forty steamers and sailing vessels. The Delta did not escape disaster, though, happily, all lives on board of her were saved by the presence of mind of the young captain, who then, for the first time, learned practically, as he has since often noticed metaphorically, how wise it is to pour OIL UPON THE WATERS.

The steamer had sprung a leak and sank rapidly to the water's edge, but the cargo of lumber she had on board kept her from going to the bottom. The crew were clinging to what was now little more than a raft, and were in momentary danger of being washed off by the waves which dashed upon them with mighty power. The captain remembered that he had aboard a can containing about five gallons of oil, and he ordered his men to lash him to the weather side of the wreck, with the oil at his side. He poured out small quantities at a time, which spread over the waves and thus prevented their breaking over the nearly submerged vessel. Thus protected, they drifted for two miles safely, and at last landed without loss of life on the Texas coast.

It was a scene of desolation which met the young captain's gaze as he approached the home he had left not long before a scene of Southern beauty. His house had been carried away completely, with the rest of the city, and his wife, who was sick, had been saved from death only by the daring of a physician, who, unable to stand upright before the hurricane, had crawled on his hands and knees until he reached the ditch where the wind had carried her, and had borne her to a place of safety. Being thus stripped of all his possessions, Captain Pennington decided on moving North. He settled in his native town of May's Landing, N. J., and resumed his professional duties.

Not long afterward Captain Pennington had another narrow escape from death. While his ship was in the harbor of Port Au Prince he and all his crew were attacked with yellow fever. They were carried ashore and taken to the hospital, where they remained for thirty-two days. At the end of that time the only survivors were Captain Pennington and one seaman. Every other officer and sailor had died of the dreadful scourge.

THE OUTBREAK OF THE WAR

stirred the young sailor's blood, as it did that of all other patriotic young men, North and South, and he promptly placed himself at the disposal of the Government. He reported for duty to the Brooklyn Navy Yard, and was appointed to the command of the schooner Henry James, of the mortar flotilla under Commodore (now Admiral) Porter. On March 20th, 1862, Captain Pennington was with his ship in the fleet that commenced the bombardment of Forts Jackson and St. Philip. The terrific fight which ensued has been too often described to need repetition here. It is sufficient to state that Unionists and Confederates alike acknowledged, as Commander A. T. Mahan states in his excellent work on this period of the war,* that the mortar fleet, of which Captain Pennington served was noted for the effective service it rendered. After these battles the fleet was ordered up the Mississippi to the attack of Vicksburg, and there Captain Pennington was conspicuous. Later his gallantry at Sabine Pass won for him a substantial recognition from the Government. On November 29th, 1862, he received a document signed by Gideon Welles stating that the Department, as a mark of its appreciation of his gallant conduct, appointed him Acting Volunteer Lieutenant in the Navy of the United States, the appointment to take date from September 25th. He took a prominent part in the important naval operations which followed; was made commander of the U. S. Steamer J. P. Jackson, which was the flagship of the Mississippi Sound, and in her he took part in the battles of Fort Gaines and Fort Morgan, and the fight at the entrance of Mobile. He was subsequently appointed to the command of the gunboat Kennelbec, and afterward of the gunboat Owasco. On March 3d, 1865, he again heard from the Secretary of the Navy. This communication informed him that, in recognition of his distinguished services, he had been appointed, by the consent of the Senate of the United States, Acting Lieutenant-Commander, which was the highest grade to which a volunteer could aspire.

At the close of the war he was urged to continue in the navy, but he decided to return to the merchant service, and tendered his resignation. It was not until November 12th, 1869, however, that it was accepted. The following record appears on a document which he received after that date, and attests the

of his services. It is signed by the Secretary of the Navy, and dated Washington, November 12th, 1865: "The war for the preservation of the Union having, under the beneficent guidance of Almighty God, been brought to a successful termination, you, having served with fidelity in the United States Navy from the 22d day of November 1861 to this date, are hereby honorably discharged, with the thanks of the Department." One story of which deserves to be told as an evidence of the American daring which distinguishes the captain, must conclude this portion of the narrative. In 1863, after the battles of the Mississippi River and the Sabine Pass, Captain Pennington received a brief leave of absence, in which he came North to visit his family. He took passage on board the unarmed steamer, Western Metropolis, from New Orleans to New York. While off the Tortugas, a group of small islands in the Gulf of Mexico, Captain Pennington's attention was called by the captain of the Metropolis to a line of black smoke on the horizon. "That is a blockade-runner," said the captain of the Metropolis. "Let us take her," said Captain Pennington. But there was a difficulty. The Metropolis, though a swifter vessel than the British ship, had neither guns nor ammunition. But Captain Pennington thought they might run her down, and persuaded the other captain to let him try what he could do. Chase was given, and soon the Britisher was being overtaken. Meanwhile Captain Pennington had donned his uniform, had girded on a sword which he was taking home as a trophy, and with a speaking trumpet in his hand stood on the bridge. Two other naval officers and six sailors, also, like Captain Pennington, on leave, were placed where they could be seen, and was mounted to represent a gun and placed in the fore-castle. Captain Pennington hailed the British ship and ordered him to heave-to, if he did not want to be blown out of the water. The British captain obeyed, and waited while Captain Pennington came on board. The vessel proved to be a blockade-runner, as had been supposed, with a crew armed with Enfield rifles, and Captain Pennington informed the British captain—who, by the way, was an old acquaintance of his own—that it was his duty to seize his vessel and take him and his officers and crew prisoners. The Britisher, knowing that Captain Pennington was in the navy, and supposing his ship was a war-vessel, submitted at once, and he and his officers and crew were sent, six at a time, on board the Metropolis and locked up in the state-rooms, while the blockade-runner and her cargo were carried as a prize to Key West. The British captain swore vengeance when he learned that he had been unnecessarily frightened into surrender, but as twenty-two years have elapsed without his threats being executed, it may be supposed that Captain Pennington is now safe.

A SHIP ON FIRE.

In 1869, after four years of activity in the merchant service, Captain Pennington was in command of the steamer Thames, bound from New York to Galveston, Tex. When off Cape Hatteras the alarming discovery was made that by spontaneous combustion the cargo was on fire. There was a great deal of hay on board, and the flames soon made such progress that all hope of saving the ship was abandoned. It was in the middle of the night, and for a time panic reigned among crew and passengers. As the first boat was lowered and manned one of the masts fell, and then terror seemed to madden the crew. They rushed to the side, intent on saving themselves, whatever might become of the passengers. Providentially, Captain Pennington retained his courage and composure. With a revolver in his hand he took his stand by the remaining boats, threatening to shoot the first man who disobeyed orders. The act restored discipline, and the passengers were got safely into the boats. The captain saw every one off, and then ran to get a compass, the only man left on the blazing ship. His peril was extreme, for the fact of his being there was overlooked by the men in the boats until he was seen standing on the deck, his figure thrown out in strong relief by the flames behind him. One of the passengers raised a shout of "There's the captain left behind!" The first officer turned and saw him, returned to the ship's side, and took him on board. How near he was to death may be inferred from the fact that his clothing and hair were singed by the flames. They were twenty miles from land, and were in the open boats for eleven hours; but, providentially, every one on board was landed safely.

CONVERSION.

Up to this time Captain Pennington had led the free, jovial, careless life only too common among seafaring men. He had been to Sunday-school as a boy, and religion was always spoken of respectfully in his father's house; but he had never felt any religious impressions. He was a good husband and father, and a strictly moral man. He had a sailor's love for "a glass of good liquor," though he seldom drank to excess. It was, however, notorious that when angered and provoked there were few men on shipboard whose oaths could compare with Captain Pennington's in lurid force and energy. But he was, withal, an exceedingly kind and courteous man. Few husbands, we think, could, after so many years of married life as Captain Pennington has enjoyed, count upon their wives giving such a testimony to their uniform kindness as that given a few days ago by the white-haired, but still beautiful Mrs. Pennington, who said, with honest pride: "In all the years of our married life, neither before nor since his conversion, has my husband ever uttered one cross or unkind word to me." Nevertheless, Captain Pennington was an unconverted man, with no belief in historical Christianity and no respect for its great truths. His wife, however, was earnest in her endeavors to bring him under the influence of the Gospel.

In the spring of 1881 she succeeded in inducing him to go to the Brooklyn Tabernacle to hear Dr. Talmage. To use his own expression, he did not "take any stock in Talmage," but to oblige his wife he went. It was on Sunday, March 20th. He was utterly careless and indifferent when he entered the church, and took his seat in the gallery with his wife and two friends; but before the service was over he was so deeply impressed that when the invitation was given for those to rise who desired prayer the captain rose to his feet. He even went down to the front of the platform and knelt while one of the members prayed with him. But he left the building unconverted. On the next evening a service conducted by Philip Phillips was held in the Tabernacle, and Captain Pennington attended. He listened attentively, for the impressions he had resisted the previous night still rankled within him. "As Dr. Talmage spoke," says the captain, "I felt in my heart that every word he said meant me." The Holy Spirit moved him so powerfully that he could not remain in his seat. Rising half reluctantly, he seemed to be driven to the place where men were weeping and praying for salvation. The struggle that followed was severe. So strong was his emotion that sight and strength failed, and the captain almost fell over from sheer collapse. He cried earnestly to God for help and light. His prayer was heard. He seemed to himself to be emerging from a dungeon into liberty and sunlight. He knew that Jesus had saved him, and taking Dr. Talmage by the hand he stood forth and declared what Jesus had done for him. On the following Wednesday he testified again before an audience of five thousand people, and not long afterward Dr. Talmage publicly welcomed him into his church.

CHRISTIAN WORK.

Captain Pennington's nature was not of that character which would let him be idle under so mighty a force. He began immediately to work for Christ. On the streets and on the piers, where he was well known, he stood up, not to preach, but to declare what a treasure he had found, and to urge others to seek the same Saviour. God blessed the message to many souls, who could not but be struck with wonder when so well-known a man as Captain Pennington avowed his conversion.

The living power which had entered into the captain's heart seemed to permeate his entire being and to affect every act of his daily life. He had been ashore for some time acting as Port Captain of the Clyde Line of steamers, having previously resided at Panama as Port Captain of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company.

Soon after his conversion, however, he was again sent to sea in command of the Morro Castle, of the Clyde Line. During this voyage an incident occurred which made a deep impression on his mind and led him to meditate much on the unlimited power of prayer. His vessel was bound from New York to Charleston, N. C. For two days and nights she had been

SURROUNDED BY A DENSE FOG.

The captain, almost worn out by loss of rest and by anxiety, was about to enter the pilot-house, about four o'clock in the morning, when the thought occurred to him that he had the privilege of committing the responsibility which was weighing upon him to an all-wise God. He turned into his own room and, kneeling down, besought God's help. It was no vague prayer, but a definite petition that God would remove the fog, and as he rose from his knees the captain felt assured that his prayer was heard. Entering the pilot-house his cheerful face was noticed by the officers of the watch, who inquired what had happened. The captain said that he expected the fog to clear immediately. His attention was called to the fact that there was no sun nor any sign of anything that could lift it. The captain told them that he had prayed about it, and he believed that his prayer would be answered. His hearers, however, would have had more faith in a gleam of sunshine, and one of them, as he went out of the pilot-house, muttered an expression of contempt for prayer in such cases. The captain followed him to speak a word of reproof, when both saw three vivid flashes of lightning, which seemed almost to strike the ship. The sailor stopped his ridicule and staggered back in amazement as he saw the fog completely dispersed by the electric flash. We understand that one of the officers on board was so impressed by the occurrence that it ultimately led to his conversion.

HEALING.

The captain's desire for Christian service led him frequently to visit the prisons and hospitals at the ports at which he stayed. While seeking to lead the sick and afflicted to the Saviour he did not forget their physical needs, and in his prayers for them besought the blessing of healing, with the full conviction that "no good thing would God withhold from those who walk uprightly" (Ps. 84 : 11). He had the happiness in one case of seeing a sufferer from St. Vitus' dance, whose contortions from head to foot rendered him a pitiable object, completely cured in answer to his prayer. In another, a withered limb which had necessitated the use of crutches for two years was restored, and the sufferer gladly threw away his crutches and walked. Six months afterward the captain saw him going about his work a well man, having in all that time had no occasion to use a crutch.

Several cases have been reported in these columns as they occurred. One number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD containing a narrative of healing fell into the hands of a husband on whose heart a heavy affliction was preying. His beloved wife had been for five months in a critical mental condition, the result of physical causes, and was rapidly becoming worse, owing to insomnia. The narrative inspired the distressed husband with hope, and he immediately wrote to Captain Pennington begging for his advice and his prayers. Captain Pennington replied, quoting our Saviour's words on the gift of healing, and praying that the afflicted lady might receive healing for the mind and conversion for the soul through faith. A few days afterward, he received the news of the lady's complete recovery.

Many other cases of healing might be mentioned, but enough has been said to show the way in which Captain Pennington has been used of God in this matter. To himself they seem the least important feature of his Christian work. His delight is in leading the sin-sick soul to the Great Physician, but to sufferers from physical maladies he delivers the message that the Lord has borne their sicknesses and they may receive healing from Him.

STORMED AND TAKEN.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, September 27, 1885.

"And Abimelech gat him up to Mount Zalmon, he and all the people that were with him; and Abimelech took an axe in his hand, and cut down a bough from the trees, and took it, and laid it on his shoulder. . . . And all the people likewise cut down every man his bough, and followed Abimelech, and put them to the hold, and set the hold on fire upon them; so that all the men of the tower of Shechem died also, about a thousand men and women."—JUDGES 9: 48, 49.

ABIMELECH is a name malodorous in Bible history, and yet full of profitable suggestion. Buoys are black and uncomely, but they tell where the rocks are. The snake's rattle is hideous, but it gives timely warning. From the piazza of my summer home, night by night I saw a lighthouse fifteen miles away, not placed there for adornment, but to tell mariners to stand off from that dangerous point. So all the iron-bound coast of moral danger is marked with Saul, and Herod, and Rehoboam, and Jezebel, and Abimelech. These bad people are mentioned in the Bible, not only as warnings, but because there were sometimes flashes of good conduct in their lives worthy of imitation. God sometimes drives a very straight nail with a very poor hammer.

THE ASSAULT.

The city of Shechem had to be taken, and Abimelech and his men were to do it. I see the dust rolling up from their excited march. I hear the shouting of the captains and the yell of the besiegers. The swords clack sharply on the parrying shields, and the vociferation of two armies in death-grapple is horrible to hear. The battle goes on all day, and as the sun is setting Abimelech and his army cry "Surrender!" to the beaten foe. And, unable longer to resist, the city of Shechem falls; and there are pools of blood, and dismembered limbs, and glazed eyes looking up beggingly for mercy that war never shows, and dying soldiers with their head on the lap of mother, or wife, or sister, who have come out for the last offices of kindness and affection; and a groan rolls across the city, stopping not, because there is no spot for it to rest, so full is the place of other groans. A city wounded! A city dying! A city dead! Wail for Shechem, all ye who know the horrors of a sacked town!

THE LAST CITADEL.

As I look over the city I can find only one building standing, and that is the temple of the god Berith. Some soldiers outside of the city in a tower, finding that they can no longer defend Shechem, now begin to look out for their own personal safety, and they fly to this temple of Berith. They get within the door, shut it, and they say: "Now we are safe. Abimelech has taken the whole city, but he cannot take this temple of Berith. Here we shall be under the protection of the gods." O Berith, the god! I do your best now for these refugees. If you have eyes, pity them. If you have hands, help them. If you have thunderbolts, strike for them.

But how shall Abimelech and his army take this temple of Berith and the men who are there fortified? Will they do it with sword? Nay. Will they do it with spear? Nay. With battering arm, rolled up by hundred-armed strength, crashing against the walls? Nay. Abimelech marches his men to a wood in Zalmon. With his axe he hews off a limb of a tree, and puts that limb upon his own shoulder, and then he says to his men, "You do the same." They are obedient to their commander.

Oh, what a strange army, with what strange

equipment! They come up to the foot of the temple of Berith, and Abimelech takes his limb of a tree and throws it down; and the first platoon of soldiers come up and they throw down their branches; and the second platoon, and the third, until all around about the temple of Berith there is a pile of tree-branches. The Shechemites look out from the window of the temple upon what seems to them childish play on the part of their enemies. But soon the flints are struck, and the spark begins to kindle the brush, and the flame comes up all through the pile, and the red elements leap to the casement, and the woodwork begins to blaze, and one arm of flame is thrown up on the right side of the temple, and another arm of flame is thrown up on the left side of the temple, until they clasp their lurid palms under the wild night sky, and the cry of "Fire!" within, and "Fire!" without announces the terror, and the strangulation, and the doom of the Shechemites, and the complete overthrow of the temple of the god Berith. Then there went up a shout, long and loud, from the stout lungs and swarthy chests of Abimelech and his men, as they stood amid the ashes and the dust, crying: "Victory! Victory!"

NOVEL TACTICS.

Now, I learn first from this subject the folly of depending upon any one form of tactics in anything we have to do for this world or for God. Look over the weaponry of olden times—javelins, battle-axes, habergeons—and show me a single weapon with which Abimelech and his men could have gained such complete victory. It is no easy thing to take a temple thus armed. I saw a house where, during revolutionary times, a man and his wife kept back a whole regiment hour after hour, because they were inside the house and the assaulting soldiers were outside the house. Yet here Abimelech and his army come up, they surround this temple, and they capture it without the loss of a single man on the part of Abimelech, although I suppose some of the old Israelitish heroes told Abimelech: "You are only going up there to be cut to pieces." Yet you are willing to testify to-day that by no other mode—certainly not by ordinary modes—could that temple so easily, so thoroughly have been taken. Fathers and mothers, brethren and sisters in Jesus Christ, what the Church most wants to learn this day is that any plan is right, is lawful, is best, which helps to overthrow the temple of sin, and capture this world for God. We are very apt to stick to the OLD MODES OF ATTACK.

We put on the old-style coat of mail. We come up with the sharp, keen, glittering steel spear of argument, expecting in that way to take the castle, but they have a thousand spears where we have ten. And so the castle of sin stands. Oh, my friends, we will never capture this world for God by any keen sabre of sarcasm, by any glittering lances of rhetoric, by any sapping and mining of profound disquisition, by any gunpowdery explosions of indignation, by sharp shootings of wit, by howitzers of mental strength made to swing shell five miles, by cavalry horses gorgeously caparisoned pawing the air. In vain all the attempts on the part of these ecclesiastical foot soldiers, light horsemen, and grenadiers.

UNCONVENTIONAL WARFARE.

My friends, I propose this morning a different style of tactics. Let each one go to the forest of God's promise and invitation, and hew down a branch, and put it on his shoulder, and let us all come around these obstinate iniquities, and then, with this pile, kindled by the fires of a holy zeal and the flames of a consecrated life, we will burn them out. What steel cannot do fire may. And I, this morning, announce myself in favor of any plan of religious attack that succeeds—any plan of religious attack, however radical, however odd, however unpopular, however hostile to all the conventionalities of Church and State. We want more heart in our song, more heart in our alms-giving, more heart in our prayers, more heart in our preaching. Oh, for less of Abimelech's sword, and more of Abimelech's conflagration! I have often heard

"There is a fountain filled with blood" sung artistically by four birds perched on the Sunday roost in the gallery, until I thought of Jenny Lind, and Nilsson, and Sontag, and all the other warblers; but there came not one tear to my eye, nor one master emotion to my heart. But one night I went down to the Africa Methodist meeting-house in Philadelphia, and at the close of the service a black woman, in the midst of the audience, began to sing that hymn and all the audience joined in, and we were floated some three or four miles nearer heaven than I have ever been since. I saw with my own eyes that "fountain filled with blood"—red agonizing, sacrificial, redemptive—and I heard the crimson plash of the wave as we all went down into it:

"For sinners plunged beneath that flood Lose all their guilty stains."

Oh, my friends, the Gospel is not a syllogism, it is not casuistry, it is not polemics, or the science of squabble. It is it is warm-hearted invitation; it is leaping, bounding, flying good news; it is efflorescent with all light; it is rubescent with all glow; it is arborescent with all sweet shade. I have seen the sun rise on Mount Washington, and from the Tip-top House; but there was no beauty in that compared with the day-spring from on high, when Christ gives light to a soul. I have heard Perea sing; but there was no music in that compared with the voice of Christ when He said: "Thy sins are forgiven thee; go in peace." Good news! Let every one cut down a branch of this tree of life and wave it. Let him throw it down and kindle it. Let all the way from Mount Zalmon to Shechem be filled with the tossing joy. Good news! This bonfire of the Gospel shall consume the last temple of sin, and will illumine the sky with apocalyptic joy that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners. Any new plan that makes a man quit his sin, and that prostrates a wrong, I am as much in favor of as though all the doctors, and the bishops, and the archbishops, and the synods, and the academical gowmsmen of Christianity sanctioned it. The temple of Berith must come down, and I do not care how it comes.

THE POWER OF EXAMPLE.

Still further, I learn from this subject the power of example. If Abimelech had sat down on the grass and told his men to go and get the boughs, and go out to the battle, they would never have gone at all, or, if they had, it would have been without any spirit or effective result; but when Abimelech goes with his own axe and hews down a branch, and with Abimelech's arm puts it on Abimelech's shoulder, and marches on—then, my text says, all the people did the same. How natural that was! What made Garibaldi and Stonewall Jackson the most magnetic commanders of this century? They always rode ahead. Oh, the overcoming power of example! Here is a father on the wrong road; all his boys go on the wrong road. Here is a father who enlists for Christ; his children enlist.

I saw, in some of the picture galleries of Europe, that before many of the great works of the masters—the old masters—there would be sometimes four or five artists taking copies of the pictures. These copies they were going to carry with them, perhaps to distant lands; and I have thought that your life and character are a masterpiece, and it is being copied, and long after you are gone it will bloom or blast in the homes of those who knew you, and be a Gorgon or a Madonna. Look out what you say. Look out what you do. Eternity will hear the echo. The best sermon ever preached is a holy life. The best music ever chanted is a consistent walk.

STRONG LEVERAGE.

I saw, near the beach, a wrecker's machine. It was a cylinder with some holes at the side, made for the thrusting in of some long poles with strong leverage; and when there is a vessel in trouble or going to pieces out in the offing, the wreckers shoot a rope out to the suffering men. They grasp it, and the wreckers turn the cylinder, and the rope winds around the cylinder, and those who are shipwrecked are saved. So at your feet to-day there is an influence with a tremendous leverage. The rope attached to it swings far out into the billowy future. Your children, your children's children, and all the generations that are to follow, will grip that influence and feel the long-reaching pull long after the figures on your tombstone are so near worn out that the visitor cannot tell whether it was in 1885, or 1775, or 1675 that you died.

Still further, I learn from this subject the advantages of

CONCERTED ACTION.

If Abimelech had merely gone out with a tree-branch the work would not have been accomplished, or if ten, twenty, or thirty men had gone; but when all the axes are lifted, and all the sharp edges fall, and all these men carry each his tree-branch down and throw it about the temple, the victory is gained—the temple falls. My friends, where there is one man in the Church of God at this day shouldering his whole duty there are a great many who never lift an axe or swing a bow.

Oh, we all want our boat to get over to the golden sands, but the most of us are seated either in the prow or in the stern, wrapped in our striped shawl, hold a big-handled sunshade, while others are blistered in the heat, and pull until the oar-locks groan, and the blades bend till they snap. Oh, religious sleepy-heads, wake up! While we have in our church a great many who are toiling for God, there are some too lazy to brush the flies off their heavy eyelids.

THE MALINGERERS.

Suppose, in military circles, on the morning of battle the roll is called, and out of a thousand men only a hundred men in the regiment answered. What excitement there would be in the camp! What would the colonel say? What high talking there would be among the captains, and majors, and the adjutants! Suppose word came to headquarters that these delinquents excused themselves on the ground that they had overslept themselves, or that the morning were damp and they were afraid of getting their feet wet, or that they were busy cooking rations. My friends, this is the morning of the day of God Almighty's battle! Do you not see the troops? Hear you not all the trumpets of heaven and all the drums of hell? Which side are you on? If you are on the right side, to what cavalry troop, to what artillery service, to what garrison duty do you belong? In other words, in what Sabbath-school do you teach? in what prayer-meeting do you exhort? to what penitentiary do you declare eternal liberty? to what almshouse do you announce the riches of heaven? What broken bone of sorrow have you ever set? Are you doing nothing? Is it possible that a man or woman sworn to be a follower of the Lord Jesus Christ is doing nothing? Then hide the horrible secret from the angels. Keep it away from the book of judgment. If you are doing nothing do not let the world find it out, lest they charge your religion with being a false-face. Do not let your cowardice and treason be heard among the martyrs about the throne, lest they forget the sanctity of the place and curse your betrayal of that cause for which they agonized and died.

SWORN TO SERVICE.

May the eternal God rouse us all to action! As for myself, I feel I would be ashamed to die now and enter heaven until I have accomplished something more decisive for the Lord that should meet me. I would like to join with you in an oath, with hand high uplifted to heaven, swearing new allegiance to Jesus Christ, and to work more for His kingdom. Are you ready to join with me in some new work for Christ? I feel that there is such a thing as claustral piety, that there is such a thing as insular work; but it seems to me that what we want now is concerted action. The temple of Berith is very broad, and it is very high. It has been going up by the hands of men and devils, and no human enginery can demolish it; but if the fifty thousand ministers of Christ in this country should each take a branch of the tree of life, and all their congregations should do the same, and we should march on and throw these branches around the great temples of sin, and worldliness, and folly, it would need no match, or coal, or torch of ours to touch off the pile; for, as in the days of Elijah, fire would fall from heaven and kindle the bonfire of Christian victory over demolished sin. It is kindling now! Huzzah! The day is ours!

FALSE REFUGES.

Still further, I learn from this subject the danger of false refuges. As soon as these Shechemites got into the temple they thought they were safe. They said: "Berith will take care of us. Abimelech may batter down everything else; he cannot batter down this temple where we are now hid." But very soon they heard the timbers crackling, and they were smothered with smoke, and they miserably died. And you and I are just as much tempted to false refuges. The mirror this morning may have persuaded you that you have a comely cheek; your best friends may have persuaded you that you have elegant manners. Satan may have told you that you are all right; but bear with me if I tell you that if unpardoned you are all wrong. I have no clinometer by which to measure how steep is the inclined plane you are descending, but I know it is very steep. "Well," you say, "if the Bible is true I am a sinner." Show me some refuge; I will step right into it.

I suppose every person in this audience this moment is stepping into some kind of refuge. Here you step in

THE TOWER OF GOOD WORKS.

You say: "I shall be safe here in this refuge." The battlements are adorned; the steps are varnished; on the wall are pictures of all the suffering you have alleviated, and all the schools you have established, and all the fine things you have ever done. Up in that tower you feel you are safe. But hear you not the tramp of your unpardoned sins all around the tower? They each have a match. They are kindling the combustible material. You feel the heat and the suffocation. Oh, may you leap in time, the Gospel declaring: "By the deeds of the law shall no flesh living be justified."

"Well," you say, "I have been driven out of that tower; where shall I go?" Step into this tower of indifference. You say: "If this tower is attacked it will be a great while before it is taken." You feel at ease. But there is an Abimelech, with ruthless assaults, coming on. Death and his forces are gathering around, and they demand that you surrender everything, and they clamor for your immortal overthrow, and they throw their skeleton arms in the windows, and with their iron fists they beat against the door, and while you are trying to keep them out you see the torches of judgment kindling, and every forest is a torch, and every mountain a torch, and every sea a torch, and while the Alps, and Pyrenees, and Himalayas turn into a live coal, blown redder and redder by the whirlwind breath of a God omnipotent, what will become of your refuge of lies?

AN IMPREGNABLE REFUGE.

"But," says some one, "you are engaged in a very mean business, driving us from tower to tower." Oh, no! I want to tell you of a Gibraltar that never has been and never will be taken; of a wall that no Satanic assault can scale; of a bulwark that the judgment earthquakes cannot budge. The Bible refers to it when it says: "In God is thy refuge, and underneath thee are the everlasting arms." Oh, fling yourself into it! Tread down unceremoniously everything that intercepts you. Wedge your way there. There are enough hounds of death and peril after you to make you hurry. Many a man has perished just outside the tower, with his foot on the step, with his hand on the latch. Oh, get inside! Not one surplus second have you to spare. Quick, quick, quick!

Great God, is life such an uncertain thing? If I bear a little too hard with my right foot on the earth, does it break through into the grave? Is this world which swings at the speed of thousands of miles an hour around the sun going with tenfold more speed toward the judgment-day? Oh, I am overcome with the thought, and in the conclusion I cry to one and I cry to the other: "Oh, time! Oh, eternity! Oh, the dead! Oh, the judgment-day! O Jesus! O God!" But catching at the last apostrophe, I feel that I have something to hold on to; for "In God is thy refuge, and underneath thee are the everlasting arms." And, exhausted with my failure to save myself, I throw my whole weight of body, mind, and soul on this divine promise, as a weary child throws itself into the arms of its mother; as a wounded soldier throws himself on the hospital pillow; as a pursued man throws himself into the refuge; for "In God is thy refuge, and underneath thee are the everlasting arms." Oh, for a flood of tears with which to express the joy of this eternal rescue!

"EXCUSE me, sir, that bank ain't safe." The words were addressed to a gentleman in clerical attire who, leaning against a big tree, was watching the water of a wide river as it ran among the reeds and water-lilies at the foot of the bank. He turned slightly at the words and saw Abel Snawley, a laborer on the farm. He had just been paying a pastoral visit to Abel and his wife, both of whom seemed to him sunk in indifference and formalism. Their conception of their situation toward God was summed up in the notion that if they were regular at church every Sunday morning and were not guilty of open sin, they were "all right," and had no need of any "new-fangled notions about conversion which the new clergyman had brought into the parish." The visit had been a failure, and the preacher felt depressed as he stood there idly watching the river.

"Thank you, Abel," he said, as he rose to an upright position and moved away from the edge. "I had no idea it was dangerous. Is the river very deep here?"

"Not so very," said Abel, "but it's the reeds and the willows as make it bad; they twine around your feet and hold you like a net, or mayhap trip you up, and you lie on your face and can't get up. I had a son drowned just there ten years ago. He was standing just where you were, and there was a slide, and in he went. We never knew till it was too late. I can't bear to see any one there ever since."

"And so you warn folks, eh, Abel? Well, that's kind of you, and just what I should expect of a good-hearted man. Why, I might have slipped in and lost my life just as your son did if you had not taken the trouble to warn me."

"Don't mention it, sir. 'Tain't no trouble; it's duty, that is."

"Do you know, Abel," said the clergyman, as he turned and walked back with the old man, "that's just how I felt this morning when I came to your house? I felt you were standing in a dangerous place, and you did not know it was dangerous. Many have fallen in there and have been lost forever. I want you to be safe, so I came to warn you. That is my work, you know, to tell people of their danger. 'Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.' You know who said that, Abel?"

"That's a new way of looking at it, sir. I'll think about it." And Abel did think of it, and sought and found safety in Christ.

THE RE-OPENING OF THE EASTERN QUESTION.

THE seething complications of European politics have during the past few days evolved a new development. The revolution in East Roumelia, quietly and peacefully as it has been accomplished, is a matter of no slight importance to many nations; and, though as yet it has not been attended with bloodshed, may lead to a long and sanguinary struggle. In any case, it must involve the opening of the interminable Eastern question, which has a peculiar fascination for European statesmen, and which has already been the cause of several wars. It may be that diplomacy will settle this difficulty as it has settled others, but that is a presumption by no means assured. To the student of prophecy watching the movements of the nations and considering events in the light of the predictions of God's Word, this revolution will be a subject of unusual interest, on account of the influence it cannot but exert in bringing the nations of Europe into that grouping which they must assume before the final consummation.

The startling announcement of the revolution published on Friday last is the product of several causes working together, some of which are obvious, and others are merely suspected. It is no wonder that an intelligent race should rebel against the effete and corrupt despotism of the Sultan, but there is good reason for doubting whether the people would have rebelled had not some motive power been applied below the surface. The hand of Russia has probably been at work for some time nourishing and organizing the prevalent discontent, and it is this suspicion that arouses the jealousy of other nations, who would probably have no thought of interference if they believed that the citizens were acting on their own spontaneous desires.

To the Berlin Conference the people of Eastern Roumelia owed their existence as a separate State. That conference gave them practical autonomy but placed them under the executive control of the Sultan. The object sought was to give Turkey a rampart on the north of Constantinople which would be an effectual barrier to Russian aggression. It included the control of the Balkan Mountains, through the passes of which Muscovite troops would naturally be led in any attack on the Turkish capital. The diplomatists at Berlin were well aware that Bulgaria would be little more than a puppet in the hands of Russia, and if Roumelia had been joined with Bulgaria and the Balkan passes in the hands of Bulgarian soldiers, offered as they are by Russian volunteers, Adrianople would lie at the mercy of a sudden forward movement by a Russian expeditionary column, which, once entrenched in the old Ottoman capital, would cut off the Sultan from his western provinces, and block the march of an Austrian force to his assistance in the event of the Vienna Government's deciding to interpose.

The New York Sun, in a lucid article on the rebellion, thus describes the situation: "It was well understood by the Turks that the treaty wrung from them at San Stefano [which was cancelled by the efforts of the Earl of Beaconsfield and the Marquis of Salisbury, now the Prime Minister of Great Britain, when they went to Berlin] left them strategically helpless, and rendered their retention even of a foothold in Europe impracticable. Should Abdul Hamed fail at this juncture to make the most strenuous endeavors to keep the control of the Balkans, he will be certain to provoke an outburst of popular resentment like that which cost Abdul Aziz his throne and his life. Not only must he insist on his right to quell by force the Roumelian revolt, and thus preserve the means of defence that the Berlin Congress gave him, but he must act with the utmost promptitude, if he would prevent the flame of insurrection from involving the whole Balkan peninsula.

"The Servian rebellion proved that you cannot let a fire get under way in any quarter of south-eastern Europe without setting the whole region between the Danube and the Aegean in a blaze. Already the Servian army has been mobilized, and King Milan will find it impossible to long repress the excitement of his subjects and their passionate desire for extension southward. In Macedonia eruptive forces are so active that protracted hesitation on the part of Turkey, or the semblance of reluctance on the part of the great powers to sanction Ottoman coercion, would produce an explosion. . . .

"The Porte will lose no time in applying a touchstone to the sincerity of the other signers of the Berlin treaty by demanding their sanction of the enforcement of the rights conferred upon Turkey by that instrument. The existence of Turkey, considered as a European power, is unmistakably at stake. A glance at the map will show that the partition of Bulgaria and the erection of its southern section into a new principality under distinct relations to the Sultan was commended to Lord Beaconsfield by strategic reasons of the gravest character.

"It will be noticed that as yet Prince Bismarck is silent. When he speaks we shall know whether there is an inflexible determination on the part of the central powers to stifle the insurrection. But should his reticence be prolonged it would be construed as an indication of a purpose to let the conflagration get fairly started, and thus bring about the final expulsion of the Turks from Europe."

The Times says: "The Porte has now a perplexing problem presented to it—a problem that recalls the one it undertook to solve in 1877, with results to itself so disastrous. The revolution in Roumelia, though hitherto bloodless, has led to unquestionable infractions of the treaty of Berlin. No doubt Prince Alexander, in assuming sovereignty over 'South Bulgaria,' as he quietly rechristens Eastern Roumelia, does so, as his proclamation announces, in accordance with the wishes of its entire population. But whatever the popular ardor for annexation to Bulgaria, the treaty of July, 1878, recognized Eastern Roumelia as an integral part of the Turkish Empire. Prince Alexander's act in confirming the provisional governor who had been set up at Philippopolis was a violation of the treaty, as are his measures to punish opponents of the new sovereignty he assumes. The Porte is entitled by treaty not only to political but to military authority in Roumelia, garrisoning and fortifying all its frontiers, if necessary, although the public peace is to be preserved by native and local constabulary and militia. Yet we now see the Roumelian militia mobilized for junction with the Bulgarian Army, many Russian officers being found in both, and Prince Alexander's troops have occupied the Balkan passes.

"But while these gross violations of the Berlin treaty would justify Turkey in marching its army into Eastern Roumelia and restoring its authority, it has remained for several days in a dilemma. It finds treaty stipulations on one side and fears that the sympathy of Christendom is on the other. The very supposition that the rising has been purely local, not originating beyond the borders of the two countries involved, has grave suggestions of its own. Why should not other surprises occur and other movements as dangerous? While the single Turkish army corps now at and around Adrianople, re-enforced by a like body of troops at and near Constantinople, could easily disperse Prince Alexander's combined militia forces and hold the line of the Balkans, the first move of this sort might stir up a general uprising in the peninsula to aid the Roumelians, and Macedonia and Albania might be in arms.

"Turkey's last war took from her more than half the area in Europe absolutely dominated by her, and nearly one half the population. She may well pause before a contest that might lead to further dismemberment."

From the prophetic standpoint the situation is one of intense interest. Nothing can be clearer than the prediction that the empire of the Sultan must melt away. The Euphrates is to be dried up (Rev. 16:12), and that process, which has been steadily going forward for more than half a century, has made another advance in this rebellion. Again: The ten kingdom which will constitute the reorganized Roman world are believed by prophetic expositors to include Bulgaria, which in the condition it was in two weeks ago would have been too insignificant relatively to occupy a place of such importance. Now, however, with Roumelia added to it, it is by no means an insignificant state, but one whose influence is increased by the fact that its people are a race of brave, hardy soldiers, who would form a valuable contingent in the great army which the Napoleonic Antichrist will gather for the final great battle of the world's history.

Readers who have studied the Rev. M. Baxter's work on prophecy, entitled "Forty Coming Wonders," will remember that nearly twenty years ago he expressed the opinion that prophecy clearly indicated the erection of the Bulgarian kingdom and its subsequent aggrandizement and extension as one of the events which would precede the final universal convulsion. On all hands signs are accumulating that the end of this dispensation is now near at hand.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Fish Without Eyes.—At a Recent Meeting Mr. A. Campbell said: "In America there are underground lakes, and in these lakes there is a kind of small fish. When some naturalists examined these fish they found they had no eyesight. True, the mark where the eyes should be was there, but it was useless. It had lost the power of sight through being in constant darkness. And similarly you will find that if you who are not Christians will not listen to the voice of conscience, that conscience will become seared instead of sensitive, and will not speak to you as it once did."

Handsome Gift by a Poor Woman.—Mr. Quarrier said: "A woman came to me the other day with an offering of some stockings which she had knitted for the children in the Homes under my care. Her husband had been out of work for a long time, and every little thing in the house had been sold or pawned to maintain the family. Still, through all her poverty she had found time and means to knit and bring these stockings to me, and I thought, 'I have not found so great faith, no, not in Glasgow.' Did the Lord forget her? No; He found employment for her husband, and they are now restored to circumstances of comparative comfort. 'He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord.'"

An Old Quarrel Made up.—"I Knew a Little girl in Boston who was very anxious about her soul. Her mother was glad to see her little girl thus concerned, but no one took her by the hand and told her how she might come to Jesus. One day she came bounding down-stairs looking very happy. Her mother was grieved to see her so careless after she thought she had been sorry for her sins, and she said: 'My child, I am sorry to see you have lost all your conviction.' 'God and I have made up, mamma,' she said. Dear friends, I wonder how many of you can say, like this little girl, God and I have made up. 'For if when we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of His Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by His life' (Rom. 5:10).

"Let Go the Twig."—Mr. Ferrie said: "At the time of a recent revival I heard of a young lady who was in great anxiety about her soul. She had been trying in many ways to make herself better, but always failed. She went to the minister and told him how she had been trying to live a Christian life, but had always failed. 'Now,' he said, 'not until you are willing to give up this trying will you ever be saved. You must believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and trust yourself to Him.' 'I don't know what you mean; I do not understand anything of it; it is all dark to me.' That night she had a dream; she thought she was falling over a precipice, and e clutched wildly at a twig to save herself. she said so she seemed to hear a voice, saying, 'Let go the twig and I will save you.' 'Jh, save me! save me!' she cried. 'I cannot let you unless you let go the twig.' 'I cannot let go the twig,' she cried. 'Well, I cannot let you!' In desperation she let go the twig and fell into her Redeemer's arms. The sense of relief awakened her, and now she knew how she could be saved, and there she gave up trying, and let the Lord save her."

An Eagle's Fatal Feast.—Mr. Barr, an Evangelist, remarked: "An eagle was far up in the air, when suddenly its keen eye caught sight of the carcass of a buffalo floating in a stream. It suddenly pounced down upon it, and began to feast on the putrid flesh. It feasted so long that when it tried to rise it could not, for its feet were frozen to the body. Down it went with the current, until it was dashed to pieces in the rocks below. Just so it is with the pleasures of the world and those who feast upon them. They may look pleasant at first, but when one fully indulges in them they get so much tied down to them that, although they may be willing, they cannot disentangle themselves until they get power from on high. Without divine aid they must be 'dashed in pieces like a potter's vessel.'"

Father Holding the Rope.—Mr. Hammond said: "A botanist was once standing on the edge of a precipice, and looking down he saw a very rare flower which he much wished to possess; but, alas! it was beyond his reach. He went in search of a boy, and taking him to the edge of the precipice, he said: 'If you allow me to tie this rope round your body and put you down there to gather that flower for me, I will give you this piece of money.' The boy hesitated a moment and then said: 'If you allow me to go home for father to hold the rope I will go down.' On permission being granted, the boy quickly ran home, and soon returned with his father, and now without the slightest fear he went down, knowing that his father had a firm hold of the rope, and would never let him fall. So, dear friends, could we not, with the simple faith of this little boy, trust our Heavenly Father, knowing that if we trust ourselves to Him He will never let us fall?"

A Boat Near the Rapids.—An Evangelist related the following: "On a beautiful summer evening I took a small boat and sailed down a quiet river. I had got a good way down the stream when I heard voices calling to me from the shore. They were foreigners, and I took no notice of them, for I thought they were only trying to make fun of me. Soon I heard a rushing of water, but I thought it came from a mill that was not far distant; so I went on my way, regarding neither the call nor the sound of rushing water, until I suddenly found myself at a spot where the gently flowing stream became a rushing torrent, and I saw that I was close to the rapids. You may be sure I strained every nerve to save myself, and it was with the utmost difficulty that I got my little craft into smooth water again. Now, dear friends, I call to you from the shore, Beware of danger. Trifle not with sin; for if you are once drawn into this current of iniquity how hard you will find it to return. Perhaps you will be unable to do so, and, going over the rapids of Time, will be lost forever!"

An Immediate Answer to Prayer.—Mr. Hammond said: "When I was addressing a meeting at Memphis, Tenn., on one occasion, when there was a great spirit of prayer prevailing, a gentleman began to weep bitterly soon after entering the church, and continued to weep during the address. In the after-meeting I said to him, 'My friend, what is the matter?' He still continued to sob in a convulsive manner without replying to my question. I then said to a lady next to him, 'Do you know this gentleman?' 'Yes,' she said; 'he is my husband.' 'May I ask if you ever spoke on the subject of religion together?' 'No, never,' she replied; 'religion was never mentioned between us.' 'Did you never pray together?' 'No, never.' Turning to the gentleman, who was still weeping, I shook him by the shoulder and said, 'Will you cease crying and tell me how long it is since you were under this deep conviction?' Gaining a little control over his feelings he replied, 'Since I came in at that door.' He there and then yielded himself to Christ as his Saviour."

Maggie's Dying Appeal.—Mr. Stuart Related: "A little girl at a Sunday-school recently professed to give herself to Jesus. Her father, although a bigoted Roman Catholic, said: 'I cannot take Maggie from the Sunday-school, there is such a great change in her since she went.' Many, many times she pleaded with her father to come to Jesus, and after two years of a Christian life little Maggie was laid upon her death-bed. Her father sat by her side one night—the last upon earth for little Maggie—and she began to sing softly,

'Jesus loves me, this I know,
For the Bible tells me so;
Little ones to Him belong,
They are weak, but he is strong.'

Opening her eyes, she said: 'Father, will you meet me in heaven? I am going there'; and then, in more earnest tones, she said: 'Oh, father, if you don't come to Jesus you will never meet me again! Oh, friends, there is a time when your child will come to Jesus, and if you do not come that little one will rise up to condemn you, for you cannot go to hell without trampling on the blood of Jesus.'

A VISIT TO THE CHOLERA DISTRICT IN SPAIN.

WHEN you leave the neighborhood of the French frontier to penetrate Spain you find few travellers in the trains, and at a little distance from the railway stations civil guards and civilians lie in wait for travellers or luggage, and they oblige them to submit to the fumes of disinfectants so abominable that women often faint, and men cough, sneeze, and retch, under this novel torment of the inquisition of cholera.

The Navarrese at the first outbreak of cholera in South Spain in May and June established such rigorous land quarantines, lazarets, and fumigations on the Ebro and on their railway lines and roads that they remained free from cholera until the month of July, when the epidemic crept in from the South, via Saragossa and Logrono. Many villages still kept up their cordons, and, in defiance of all the orders from Madrid, threaten to shoot any one approaching their districts, guarded night and day by the armed peasantry. At Pamplona, capital of Navarre, great precautions were kept up until very lately, and no one is allowed to enter the fortified city without submitting to fumigation. All the gates but two are closed, and at these two entrances you have to pass a medical inspection and fumigation, and your luggage is not allowed out of the preventive fumes for several hours. The old capital of Navarre was pretty free from cholera until July, when a fugitive was taken ill, and at once removed to the hospital, where he died. Since a few cases have occurred, but the inhabitants of Pamplona show no signs of scare. The cafés are open to a late hour, the promenades full of loungers, and on the ramparts as many people as usual stroll about, lazily gazing at the splendid panorama of mountains that surround this antiquated frontier stronghold.

The horror-stricken country lies to the south, and extends south-west of Stella and north-east of Logrono, in most of the villages and little towns. In that part of Navarre the daily average of cases for three weeks in forty-two infected places has been two hundred and seventy and four hundred, and the deaths one hundred to two hundred. The epidemic began near the Ebro, and moved simultaneously north and north-east. In every place it presented the same features. A case occurred, and was soon followed by several others, and instantly the panic began; the wealthier inhabitants took to carriage, cart, or train, and fled to France, or to the Basque Provinces, while the poorer remained, in general refusing medical assistance, and putting their faith in prayers, rosaries, processions, and even pilgrimages. The village priests gallantly stood at their posts, and often had to protect the doctors against popular wrath. Most of the infected places got up sanitary cordons against their infected neighbors, and the Government delegates here, as all over Spain, could not enter any cholera-stricken village, even to bring relief and medical assistance, except when accompanied by strong escorts of civil guards. Puenta la Reyna, a place about three hours from Pamplona, once upon a time Don Carlos's headquarters, has cruelly suffered, and the epidemic attacked just as many of the well-to-do people as of the poor. The priests and the authorities behaved well and strove to keep down popular superstition, but they had much trouble in inducing many families to accept proper remedies. In these villages it seems to be the habit to inter the dead toward night-fall, and but few relatives or neighbors accompany the dismal procession, which passes along headed by the priest and the sexton carrying a cross, and holy water.

If some places show resignation and composure, like Puenta la Reyna and Tudela, towns of some importance, others, on the contrary, are the scene of terrible panics, and tales are told of villages deserted by half the inhabitants, and even by the doctor and local authorities, who left the sick to die uncared for, until the Civil Governor had to send soldiers and guards to bury corpses that had been abandoned in deserted houses or farms for several days. In a place called Montegudo, situated in a wild outlying district, cholera broke out one night in July, and by sunset the next day, out of eight hundred inhabitants, seventy were down with the disease. The two doctors, the vicar, and his two curates did their best, and the very grave-diggers had to get assistance to bury more than twenty-five bodies on the second night. The cholera in three days carried off about three hundred persons of both sexes at Montegudo, and the remainder of the inhabitants went and lived in huts in the woods and rocks, where many more succumbed.

At Tafalla cholera had not made its appearance, though it was raging above and below that place. The inhabitants tried a novel preventative. One morning, about the middle of August, just after daybreak, all the faithful assembled in the principal church, and in the street outside; the church was brilliantly illuminated, a High Mass was sung, and a stately procession was formed, in which all classes took part. The priests were preceded by choristers, by children of both sexes, nuns, and friars, and the local authorities, civil guards, and soldiers added to the splendor of the ceremony. The fifteen banners representing the fifteen Mysteries of the Holy Rosary were carried by wealthy residents, and the banner of the Town Council and the image of St. Sebastian, patron saint of the district, were also borne aloft, and more than two thousand people followed, carrying tapers and candles lighted. The most curious feature in the procession was the Holy Wax, two thousand five hundred metres of which were used to make a cordon—a sanitary and holy, blessed cordon—which the priests placed round Tafalla, across roads, fields, and gardens, to keep away the dreaded plague. Some unbelieving hand must have cut this barrier, for the cholera has since made its appearance.

The people say: "More women than men die; more people get attacked in the night; strong men lie down in perfect health and wake in the agonia del colera; so few escape. The cura is the only remedy; he helps the pobrecitos to die in peace with God. The doctors, ah! the fiends! they give bad drugs and will not even taste them, and some say it all comes by the water—the Arga and the Ega are perhaps poisoned; and the old folks say it was so thirty years ago."

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION, $1.50.

The thanks of the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are tendered to the subscribers who have expressed a wish to introduce the paper to their friends. As in former years, a concession in terms will be made in order to render this kindly project as light a burden as circumstances will permit. Any subscriber may have THE CHRISTIAN HERALD mailed every week to any address in the United States or Canada, from this date to the end of the year, by sending twenty-five cents to this office. The large quantity of direct Christian teaching contained in fourteen numbers of the paper has only to be realized in order to recommend this low offer to the acceptance of all Christians desiring the increased circulation of religious literature. The publishers are encouraged to make the concession by the large response a similar offer brought last year, and by the letters of hearty thanks which were afterward received from persons too poor to subscribe for themselves, and from unconverted persons to whom God had blessed its perusal.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The New York State Republican Convention assembled at Saratoga on September 22d. Not for many years has a Convention been anticipated with so much interest. The split in the Republican party last year, which gave the State and Presidency to the Democrats, was a matter so momentous to the whole country that both parties waited anxiously to see whether it would be reduced or widened by the Convention. Senator Miller, who was made temporary Chairman, made a speech offensive to the "Mugwump" in its violent antipathy to the South, and its direct tendency to revive sectional issues. The merely accidental importance of the speaker, however, and the knowledge that the next election to the Senate would probably relegate him to fitting obscurity, minimized the mischievous effects of his remarks. The section of the party which is understood to accept the leadership of ex-Governor Cornell acquired control of the Convention, and on the following day a ticket was nominated, on which all sections of the party can unite. The "Mugwump" leaders and their journals, which last year advocated the election of the Democratic ticket, are now outspoken in their approval of the Republican nominations. The selection for Governor is Ira Davenport, who in 1881 was elected Controller of the State, and is now Member of Congress for his district. General Joseph B. Carr is the nominee for Lieutenant-Governor. He is now Secretary of State, having held that office for two terms, and being the only candidate on the Republican State ticket last year who was not defeated.

The Nominations Made by the Democratic State Convention, which met in Saratoga on September 24th, do not command a complete unanimity of approval in that party. In spite of declarations to the contrary, the ticket nominated is regarded by prominent leaders as a censure on the national administration. That President Cleveland's policy has offended certain influential members of his party in this State was well known, and this ticket is understood to be an expression of resentment. The nominee for the Governorship is Governor David B. Hill, who in 1882 was elected Lieutenant-Governor, and succeeded Mr. Cleveland when the latter was elected to the Presidency. Mr. Edward Cooper, it is stated, was rejected on religious grounds, though the County Democracy was strongly in his favor. The influence of Tammany Hall, the rural delegates and the liquor-dealers turned the scale in favor of Governor Hill. Roswell P. Flower, who was nominated for Lieutenant-Governor, has since declined the nomination. The contest will be a severe one. The Democracy will receive no help from Republicans this year, as it did three years ago, when Mr. Hill was elected to the Lieutenant-Governorship, and there are many Democrats who are so dissatisfied with the nomination, and the supremacy of Tammany Hall which it implies, that they will abstain from voting. On the other hand, the Republicans, though united this year, will have to bear the loss of the Prohibition vote, which promises to be heavier than ever before. An effort has been made to draw the Prohibitionists into the Republican camp, but hitherto without success.

The Newly-Appointed Weigher of the Brooklyn district, whose instalment in office recently evoked protests from the Independent Republicans and Democratic friends of Civil Service Reform, has been suspended from the public service by an order from the Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Manning has asked for a report of all the facts, in order that there may be an investigation. That is a mere matter of form, as no man understands better than the Hon. Daniel Manning why Sterling was appointed, and what his appointment was intended to effect. The merits of this case are now so well known that it has come to be regarded as a test case, the treatment of which will show whether the Administration will adhere to its civil service pledges.

The Resignation of Mr. Dorman B. Eaton of the Chairmanship of the Civil Service Commission does not, it now appears, result from a difference of opinion between himself and the Administration. Nor is it a confession of failure. Mr. Eaton expresses his conviction that the reform has fairly vindicated itself, but, foreseeing the probability that it will have to sustain a fierce attack in the national Legislature, he wishes to be liberated from the restraints of office, in order that he may render it effective support. The President, in the course of his reply to Mr. Eaton's letter of resignation, used the following significant words: "I believe in Civil Service Reform and its application in the most practicable form attainable, among other reasons, because it opens the door for the rich and the poor alike to a participation in public place holding. And I hope the time is at hand when all our people will see the advantage of a reliance for such an opportunity upon merit and fitness instead of a dependence upon the caprice or selfish interest of those who impudently stand between the people and the machinery of their government."

Europe in a Fever State is the Substance of a cablegram from the European correspondent of the New York Times, who has hitherto been well informed. He describes the consternation produced by the revolution in Roumelia as affecting every court in Europe, and causing apprehension of a widespread conflagration in which many nations may be involved. He says: "There is first of all an imminent likelihood of collision between the Turks and the Bulgarians on the Roumelian border, about which extreme nervousness exists and report of which is expected hourly. Next, there is the probability of an uprising of Slavs in Macedonia, excited as they are by events across the frontier. Then there is the menace of a movement by the Serbians on one side and by the Greeks on the other. Each is wild with jealousy of Bulgaria, and distracted with that savage territorial lust which the scent of Ottoman blood always engenders.

Lastly loom up the gigantic threatening forms of Russia and Austria. Each is loth to enter into war. Each is indignant at an adventure who stirred up the trouble, and yet each it bound by the very law of its existence to march into the field once the fighting begins. Never was a grave problem more dangerously involved, never was prophecy more nearly impossible." The general opinion appears to be that should Turkey interfere to recover her lost province, or any of the powers who joined in the treaty of Berlin attempt to enforce its provisions, Russia may be expected to send an army for the protection of Bulgaria and her newly-acquired territory. Thus a general European war is threatened, the very immensity of which may operate to avert it.

The Deaths from Small-Pox in Montreal and its suburbs last week averaged above forty a day. The total list at the close of the week was nine hundred and forty-eight in Montreal alone since the beginning of the outbreak, or during six months and a half 52 more deaths than the worst twelve months of the last epidemic. The Health Officers reported that up to September 14th 728 people had died of the disease, of whom 641 were French Canadians, 52 Irish Catholics, and 35 Protestants. Sir A. P. Caron, Minister of Militia, being in town on Friday, a deputation from the Citizens' Committee waited upon him at the Windsor to request him to break up the camp at Laprairie. Small-pox has broken out in St. Johns, where another military camp of fifteen hundred men has been established.

The Serious Illness of the Earl of Shaftesbury was announced by cable on Friday last. It was so worded as to indicate that there was no probability of his recovery. The venerable nobleman, whose benevolence and active support of religious and philanthropic institutions have won for him the title of the lay bishop, was born in 1801. He achieved distinction by his devotion to social, industrial and intellectual reform movements, and was comparatively indifferent to politics as such. He agitated for laws reducing the hours of labor to ten; for improving workshops, factories, and lodging-houses; for the protection of children, and for improving the sanitary and moral condition of the humbler classes. He was chosen President of the Ragged School Union from its formation in 1844, of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and of the Victoria Institute. His life has been one of vast usefulness, and his name is honored by the virtuous and intelligent people of the civilized world. On Monday he was reported dying.

Mr. Stead, Editor of the "Pall Mall Gazette," and the other defendants in the trial for abduction, were on Saturday last held for trial by a jury. Mr. Vaughan, the judge who conducted the preliminary hearing, indulged in strong animadversions on the defendants in announcing his decision. He said that nothing could justify their doings nor the publication of the nauseous articles in the Pall Mall Gazette. He acquitted Mr. Bramwell, Booth, and Mrs. Coombe of the charge of indecent assault, but committed them, as well as the rest of the prisoners, on the other charges. Mr. Stead, believing that the judge's mind was already made up to hold him for trial, refused to call witnesses. He was not defended by a lawyer, and when about to read his own defence he was interrupted by the judge, who would not allow him to proceed until he had seen the manuscript. He then refused to allow Mr. Stead to read the first twelve pages, which explained his motive. The part of the defence dealing with the "crime" itself was read, and Mr. Stead succeeded in convincing those who heard him that the woman whose child he was charged with abducting had consented to the sale of her daughter for an immoral purpose. The whole of the defence was published in the Pall Mall Gazette, but the names of the titled criminals were not mentioned, except that of the King of the Belgians, who, Mr. Stead alleged, paid a procuress in London a yearly salary of $4000 for services rendered.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers in the South with the CHRISTIAN HERALD to the amount of $9 have been received since our last acknowledgment: From Warren, N. H., $5; from Bristol, Pa., $4. We are sincerely glad to say that this fund is now larger than in any former year, and it is doing more good. Friends who have sent us the names of ministers who would be thankful to receive the paper through this fund must please understand that the names are placed on our list in the order in which they are received, and one name is added to the list for a year for every dollar received.

The Christian Convention on Faith-Healing will assemble, as already announced, on Monday next, at the Twenty-third Street Tabernacle, New York, and will continue in session through the week. Three meetings will be held each day, commencing respectively at 10 A.M., 3 P.M., and 7:30 P.M. A very large attendance is expected. Christian friends who have witnessed the manifestations of the Lord's power in the healing of disease, and who are seeking further light, are availing themselves of this opportunity of hearing Mrs. Baxter, whose extensive experience at Bethshan enables her to speak authoritatively on the subject. Speakers will be present from Washington, D. C., Philadelphia and Boston. Dr. Talmage has invited Mrs. Baxter to preach at the Brooklyn Tabernacle next Sunday night, which she has promised to do. She will take part in Conferences on Faith-Healing in Brooklyn, October 12th to 16th; Philadelphia, October 20th to 24th; Buffalo, N. Y., October 27th to 30th.

Mr. William Noble, the English Gospel Temperance evangelist, preached on Sunday, September 20th, to a vast congregation, in the largest Methodist Episcopal Church in Worcester, Mass. He has received several invitations to hold meetings in New York City, where efforts are being made to secure united action among the churches in his work. An invitation from Pittsburg, Pa., for a three weeks' mission, has also been sent to him. This day (Thursday), a large mass-meeting of temperance workers is to be held in Boston to welcome him.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Commenced Revival service in Orange, N. J., on Sunday, September 20th. A prominent Christian citizen of Orange some months ago commenced working with the view of securing a visit of the evangelists to Orange. A definite promise was at length obtained from them, and twenty-two of the church societies of Orange and East Orange joined in the undertaking, agreeing to supply the necessary funds. The skating rink was secured, the necessary alterations made, and a choir of five hundred voices was selected. George A. Newman, leader of the choir at the Central Presbyterian Church, of Orange, was constituted musical conductor, and J. Roland Mix was designated as the organist. Immense crowds congregated at every service, hundreds being unable to obtain admission.

The School for Christian Workers at Springfield, Mass., opened on the 9th inst., with very encouraging prospects. Students were in attendance from Canada, New England, the Middle, Southern and Western States. The design of this institution is to train laymen to be secretaries of Young Men's Christian Associations, superintendents of Sunday-schools, and helpers to pastors. Among the lecturers are Mr. D. L. Moody, Rev. A. J. Gordon, D.D., Professor M. B. Riddle, D.D., and Rev. J. H. Vincent, D.D. Information respecting the school may be obtained from the Secretary, Rev. S. L. Merrell, 144 Buckingham Street, Springfield, Mass.

A Royal Missionary is soon to Commence labor in Africa. A nephew of Cetewayo, the late King of Zululand, has been undergoing preparation for missionary work in Stockholm, Sweden. He was converted several years ago through God's blessing on the labors of the missionaries, and was convinced of his call to the work of preaching the Gospel. He has been six years at Stockholm, and has given evidence of his piety and fitness for ministerial service. Great things are hoped from the influence his exalted station will give him over his own people.

A Gold Mine Sold for Fifty Dollars Thirty years ago was reported last week to be producing large quantities of the precious metal. It appears that before the war a prospector named Duncan held some land in Georgia, which he had acquired under the belief that it contained gold. He was, however, disappointed, and in 1855 he sold the property for fifty dollars. It passed from one owner to another, and gold was at last found there. Then there were lawsuits about it, and the war stopped operations. After the war a New York company worked it, but could not make it pay. A few months ago a practical miner secured a lease of the property, and set about finding the lost "chute." A correspondent who visited the spot last week asserts that the miner has been successful, and has come upon the ore in bunches or pockets from three to five feet apart, every bushel of which yields gold worth a thousand dollars. People in the neighborhood are now looking back regretfully to the time when the Findley Gold Mine could have been bought for fifty dollars. They did not know its value then, and let the opportunity pass by them. So many are doing this day with an offer infinitely more to be desired than the acquisition of gold. The time will come when they will look back with heart-breaking remorse to the time when they rejected the offer of the Gospel, made without money and without price (Luke 19: 42).

A Man was Shot by a Dog at Milford, N. Y., last week. The man was leaving his house with his gun in his hand loaded and cocked, intending to shoot two hawks which had been carrying off his chickens, when he saw a strange dog enter. He tried to drive the dog out, but the animal crept under a table and would not leave. The man grasped the gun by the barrel and attempted to push the dog out with the stock. Immediately the dog became infuriated and seized the weapon with his teeth, biting at it savagely. In the struggle that ensued a piece of the wood was broken out and the trigger-guard was dislodged. In another minute the dog had the trigger between his teeth biting the metal and discharging the gun. The charge lodged in the man's leg, inflicting a very severe injury. The sufferer now regrets his lack of forethought in not shooting and killing the dog at once after he had discovered its ugly and dangerous character. There are crises of moral conflict when safety can only be secured by prompt and decisive measures, and when mercy is ill-timed, as in the case of the Israelites who suffered the Canaanites to live among them (Judges 2: 2) in spite of God's warning. The newly-converted man who does not immediately and rigorously cut off from himself all evil habits and other spiritual enemies of his peace has generally cause afterward to lament his lack of decision (Rom. 6: 12, 13).

An Undemonstrative Husband Caused His wife some chagrin on board a train recently. A Chicago journal says that in a railroad accident near that city a lady was shaken very severely, and could not speak for some time, although conscious of what was taking place around her. Some of the passengers thought she was dead. Her husband feared so too, but instead of giving way to unavailing grief, he flew around doing all he could for his wife's recovery. When she was pronounced out of danger, she said, reproachfully, "John!" "Well, Samanthy?" "You didn't beller a bit there when they all thought I was dead." "Well, Samanthy," said John, in some confusion, "ye see I was flying around trying to bring ye to. I didn't have no time to beller." "Yes, John," said the old lady, feebly, with a suggestion of tears in her voice, "but couldn't ye beller a little bit now, John, jist fer the looks of things?" "Why, Samathy, if I was to beller now, folks would say I was doin' it 'cause ye was goin' to git well." "I never thought o' that," said the old lady, sadly. "I wish to goodness, John, ye'd had bellered some at the right time, then! 'Twould have been real comfortin' to me." The old lady seems to have made the common mistake of gauging emotion by outward signs. Young Christians often make that mistake. They doubt the genuineness of their conversion if it has not been accompanied by the tears and terrible distress which others exhibit (Joel 2: 13).

The Pall which Covered General Grant's remains at his funeral has been cut up into small morsels and is being readily sold to relic-seekers. Even the soil excavated from the site of his tomb finds purchasers. The extent to which this craze for relics of great men prevails is not generally known. Arlo Bates, of the Boston Courier, says that an application was made to him recently by a woman who went to Concord, Mass., and asked for some of Ralph Waldo Emerson's old clothes to use in a "poets' rug," made of patchwork. Mr. G. J. Lathrop, writing in the Rochester Union, says: "I can corroborate this story, because when I owned and lived in the Wayside, Nathaniel Hawthorne's old home at Concord, the same woman applied there on a similar errand. Being told that it was futile, she asked: 'May I pick up something around the place to carry away as a memento?' Permission was granted, and she finally caught a cricket in the grass of the lawn and put it into a bottle. She said she also had a cricket from Emerson's front yard." None of these great men would have felt honored by this display of hero-worship. The tributes truly great men covet are evidences that their lives and teachings have influenced their disciples for good. The Saviour Himself had occasion to reprove this insincere personal reverence (Luke 6: 46-49).

A Repentant Thief was Sentenced to Imprisonment at Richmond, Va., on September 22d. He was formerly book-keeper to a stock-broker, but about two months ago he absconded with $28,000 worth of bonds belonging to a client of his employer. After an absence of two weeks he returned conscience-stricken and made restitution. He was put upon trial in the Hustings Court and pleaded guilty. After appeals by counsel the jury fixed his punishment at one year in the penitentiary, with a recommendation for Executive clemency. He looked wretched, and his condition evidenced the terrible mental suffering under which he has labored. Deeply as the court and jury evidently sympathized with the prisoner, and although he had repented and made restitution, the majesty of the law had to be vindicated. That fact was understood by the court and the public, yet when it is the divine law that is in question the same principle is not recognized. Thousands of men reject the Gospel, professing to believe that God will forgive them at the last if they truly repent. Thus Christ's atonement is counted an unnecessary thing (Rom. 3: 25, 26).

A Chicago Heiress who has Become a Factory-girl is the subject of a despatch from that city. It states that the beautiful and accomplished daughter of a millionaire merchant in Chicago has produced a sensation by going to work as a factory-girl in a spinning-mill at Rockford, for a salary of sixty cents a day. In a bantering way her father, who has made his own fortune and has a strong contempt for fine-lady ways, told her he would give her a dollar for every cent she would earn. Her salary of sixty cents will produce sixty dollars a day, and the young lady is determined to go on working as long as her father will keep up his end of the agreement. Her friends amuse themselves by joking her about her degradation, but she does not care about that while she is making $360 a week. A lady possessing so much courage and resolution may perhaps some day be found ready to sacrifice ease and luxury for a nobler motive than desire for money. If through God's blessing she becomes a Christian she will find many opportunities open to her for following the example of her Lord, "who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame" (Heb. 12: 2).

GOD OUR CONTINUAL RESORT.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Be thou my strong habitation, whereunto I may continually resort."—PSALM 71: 3.

The Young Mountaineer—David's Poetic Genius—God his Desired Home—I. Afforded Delightful Repose—Safe from Reporters—Implies Intimate Knowledge—Tender Care—II. Gives Peaceful Security—III. A Place of Continual Resort—The Law of the Persian Courts—What David Found—An Escape from Present Ills—For Strength—Ringing the Night Bell—A Parable—The Practical Conclusion.

DAVID in his younger days had been obliged to hide himself away with his followers in the great caverns and rocks of his native land. In the cave of Adullam, by the rocks of the wild goats, he had dwelt amid the sternest surroundings of nature. No doubt he had climbed aloft upon the mountain's side, and then had penetrated into one cave after another, and treated them as chambers of his house of rock. There he had spent both nights and days, looking from on high upon the plains beneath, often seeing his cruel pursuers passing by in eager hunt for him, while he himself was secure in his rocky fastness.

Nothing leaves a clearer impression upon the memory than a residence amidst such scenes. You might live for an age in such a town as this and forget it all. What is there to remember in this labyrinth of bricks and mortar? But when you get into the clear bracing atmosphere of the hills, when you tread their sublime heights, or descend into their mysterious hollows, you can not forget it. A day of leaping, like the wild goats, from crag to crag, ended by a night amid the dread seclusion of a mountain den, makes a clear mark on the surface of life which can never be erased; a man will carry such memories with him to his grave. This must have been especially the case with a genius so poetic as that of David.

With such a soul as his, and such an eye, and such a tongue, and such a harp, it was no wonder that, in his riper days, when he had known the soft luxury of palaces, he could not refrain from rehearsing the

of his earlier and more adventurous days, and drawing inspiration from the wild and sublime scenery among which he had been reared. The man, as full of grace as of genius, as saturated with the Spirit of God as with the spirit of poetry, could not but in his loftiest songs speak of his God in language culled from the cave: "Be thou to me a rock of habitation, whereunto I may continually resort;" or, as some read it, "Be thou to me a rock of repose."

What a gracious heart David must have had, to speak like this of his God! He desired to be upon the most intimate terms with the Lord his God. He wished to dwell not merely with God, but in God. He cries: "Bethou my strong habitation." Not merely did he long to dwell in the house of the Lord forever, but he would have the Lord to be his house. He would be and that not as with a dungeon, in which he was forced to be, but as the habitation of his choice, for his pleasure and rest. The wicked say, "No God;" but David sighed for none but God. The mere pretender would have God on Sabbaths and high days, and in times of trouble; but David would have God all the day, and every day. The formalist is satisfied with a word with God in the morning, and another at night; when he is either hurried or sleepy he forces from himself the tax of a minute or two in prayer; but he that loves the Lord delights to walk with Him evermore, yea, to make his home with God, and to abide in Him.

Some would like a Sabbath once in the month, but David would make all his days holiness unto the Lord. Many would like to speak with the Lord from a distance, but David would live and move and have his being in his God. By this the man after God's own heart proved that his own heart was after God. Judge yourselves, therefore, at the very outset, as to what your own condition of heart must be.

I. Let us dwell on this for a few minutes. David found in his God

DELIGHTFUL REPOSE.

Observe what wonderful condescension he had experienced from the Lord! What infinite grace that God should allow his servants to think of Him as their house! My God, thou art the glory of heaven, and yet angels veil their faces in thy presence, and yet I dare to say, "Be thou my habitation." Do we understand this? We have never reached the sum of our grace-given privileges till we are more at home with God than with any one else in the universe. What a wonder that the eternal God is our refuge! What condescension that the infinite Jehovah should be the abode of His saints!

David had realized in his God peculiar love. In a man's own home he expects to find love. Pity on the poor wretch who is disappointed therein. When we are abroad in the world, my brethren, we reckon to meet with rough handling, and to receive scant consideration; but within our own doors we enter the sanctuary of love. That is how David felt toward the Lord his God.

Moreover, home is the place of

SPECIAL REST.

At home we are unloaded of the world's huge load; the tradesman takes off his apron, the warrior his harness, the bearer his yoke, for he is at home; and if a man may rest anywhere on earth, it must surely be in his own habitation. Is not our God our rest? Oh, beloved, is there indeed beneath the sun any repose for a poor soul except in God? There remaineth a rest for the people of God, and that rest is God Himself.

We have not yet read all the meaning that coucheth beneath this sweet word "habitation," or home. Our habitation is the place of joyful freedom and hearty naturalness. One is not stiff and starched at home. You are not guarded there as to what you say or do, for you are not exposed to criticism and misrepresentation. Some of us cannot open our mouths without seeing a reporter's pencil twinkling across his prepared paper. Our steps are dogged by those who take notes and print them. We live under the microscope. We can hardly think without being published, with this addition, that what we do not think is often imputed to us. Do not wonder if we walk somewhat under constraint. But at home a man feels, "Well, these dear children, and the dear wife of my love, and these kind friends—I am not afraid of them; they will not misjudge me." Did you ever feel that with relation to God? God's children, dare to be familiar with Him. Oh, our God, we have not to study our language while with thee! Our soul speaks to thee without words; her thoughts and emotions rise to thee in their pure spirit, without the encumbering embodiment of speech.

A man's habitation is also the place of his intimate knowledge. David knew the Lord, even as he knew the caves in which he had sheltered. There is a weird charm, to my mind, about caves: I like to visit all that are in my way. One is pleased to pass from one subterranean room to another, and mark the secrets which are revealed by the glare of the torches. Here there is a spring of water, there a grand stalactite; here is an ascending staircase leading to another hollow, and there you must go down by a ladder to a greater depth. This is a fair allegory of the way in which the Spirit of God leads us into all truth. Oh, brethren, seek to have the same clear knowledge of the Lord as David had, till you can say that you are at home with God, who is your habitation.

Home also has about it the thought of tender care. Where are we so lovingly watched over as at home? Where else are there such soft pillows for our aching heads, such gentle words for our wounded spirits? "Take me home," saith the sick child. I had the great sorrow yesterday of speaking to a dear brother whom I had hoped would be spared for great usefulness in a distant land; but he had just received from the doctor's examination the solemn information that he was hopelessly diseased. We proposed that he should go to the seaside; but I saw which way his heart went. He thought of his wife and his habitation, and he said: "Let me go home. If I must die, let it be in my own house." He spoke as I should have done in like case. At home one might not have all the skill of the hospital at command; but one would be sure of a certain priceless tenderness which no nurse can rival. Lord, thou hast been my dwelling-place: I will die in thy arms. When I am sick and weary there is none like thee, my God!

There is much more in this first part of the verse than I can possibly set before you. I have only opened the windows, and I now invite you to look out upon the landscape so full of beauty.

II. Secondly, David had realized in God

PEACEFUL SECURITY.

"Be thou my strong habitation"—"my rock of habitation." When once we enter into God we do not shake or know a fear. Rise winds, roar waves, blow tempests, howl hurricanes, there is no shaking our sure abode in God. David in the rock had often defied the storm; for he felt that though the earth should be removed, and the mountains be cast into the midst of the sea, he would not fear. Such be the confidence of every child of God. God changeth not; God's arm is not shortened; God is not vanquished; no purpose of God shall be defeated; no decree of His shall fail. Rocks may dissolve, but the eternal God changeth not, and his people in Him shall have a sure abode.

But David felt also great safety from his enemies. When he climbed the rock, and crept into his cavern, he knew that his enemies could not follow him. Had Saul come with all Israel at his back, David's band could have kept armies at bay. He must often have felt like the eagle when it has flashed upward to its nest on the craggy rock, and from thence looks down upon the hunters. He is almost out of sight, but he can see all the movements of the foe. However long the range of the rifle, the noble bird knows no fear, for he is beyond range. I think I see him sitting there quietly eying the enemy, of whom he knows no dread. Thus may a child of God defy the great adversary. "Let us sing," said Luther, "the forty-sixth Psalm, and

DEFY THE DEVIL."

Oh, child of God, trust in God, for He is worthy of all confidence. In Him you are secure in every sense. He that keepeth thee doth neither slumber nor sleep; who, then, can do thee ill? Thou art secure from the penalty of sin, for Christ hath put it away from you, bearing the chastisement of your peace. Hidden beneath his atonement you are secure from the wrath of God; your transgression is forgiven, your sin is covered: thus the sting is taken from every evil. You are secure against final overthrow by your own natural and constitutional weaknesses; for the Lord will cleanse your blood which He has not cleansed. He will purge you thoroughly, and cleanse you from all your idols, and write his law upon your inward parts, so that you shall not depart from Him. You are secure against all the trials and troubles of providence, since these shall work together for your good. The griefs and pangs of death you need not fear, since God is with you, and will raise you from the grave. The terrors of eternity are not for you; joys immeasurable are your portion. Once safe in God, what is there to fear?

III. We have now reached our last point, upon which we may be somewhat more lengthy than upon the others. David's God was to him a place of CONTINUAL RESORT.

"Whereunto I may continually resort." There is joy in this thing in itself. Is it not a great bliss to have the entrée of Jehovah's palace day and night? The Persian kings forbade any one to come near them; and if any ventured into the king's court, and the monarch did not stretch out the silver sceptre, the guards cut them down at once. Yet there were certain favored courtiers who, by special privilege, had the right to approach the king at all times, guard or no guard. These were the noblest in the king's dominions. Such honor have all the saints. No cherub with flaming sword guards the way of approach to God against any child of the great Father. You have a privilege that is much greater than any dignity belonging to the mightiest monarchs of earth—the privilege of perpetual intercourse with God, at whatsoever hour you will.

There is a great comfort in it as an outlook. "Whereunto I may continually resort." Throughout all future time I may draw nigh unto God. The day may come when I shall be sore sick, and be compelled to keep my bed, and then I may resort unto God. I shall not be able to go up to the house of the Lord, but still I may resort to God, who is and home. No form of disease shall shut me out from my heavenly Father. I may lie on my bed and sleep, and when I awake I shall still be with Him. Old age steals on apace, and perhaps my feet will not be able to bear me to the place of the assembly; but even then I may resort to God. When my ears shall grow dull of hearing, and I shall not enjoy the preaching of the Word, even then I shall hear the still small voice of the Spirit in my heart. When I am so far gone with age that my lone bed will become the best place for me, I shall still enjoy his presence and sing his praise. Oh, brother, fear not the future, for the Lord said: "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee."

Now, this continual resorting to God is not only a joy in itself and in its outlook, but it is a joy which answers so many blessed purposes. I wish you would read this seventy-first Psalm quietly at home in the light of my text, and then you will see that David found in coming to God everything that he needed.

First, he found an escape from present ills—"Deliver me in thy righteousness, and cause me to escape." As the cony doth not fight its foe, but hides itself in the rock, so you in your time of trouble need not go forth to conflict, but may resort continually to your God. Stop up the rabbit's burrow, and you might soon take him; keep a believer from his God, and you would soon destroy him; but so long as he can reach his hiding-place no enemy can wreak vengeance on him.

David also resorted to God

FOR STRENGTH.

"Cast me not off in the time of old age; forsake me not when my strength faileth." He looked beyond himself to the unfailing power of the Almighty, and expected to be strengthened when infirmities crept over him. Do you want more power for service, more patience for suffering? resort to God. They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength. Go to the Strong for strength.

David also continually resorted to God for quickening. Notice how he puts it in the twentieth verse: "Thou, which hast shewed me great and sore troubles, shalt quicken me again, and shalt bring me up again from the depths of the earth." Have any of you got down there? Do you want to rise out of them? Those depths of the earth are not pretty places, but we stumble into them sometimes by careless walking; would you rise from them into newness of life? Then resort to God, and He will bring you up from the lowest depths. He will raise you from death to life, more fitted for holy service than ever.

The fact is, whatever you want you have only to go to God for it; and whenever you want it you may go. Whatever your condition, you may still resort to the Lord. If you cannot come as a saint you may come as a sinner; if you cannot come boldly you may come tremblingly. When you feel most unfit to resort to God you may still go to Him, for He is your fitness and your physician. When you feel that you dare not go, you may still go to Him: "Whereunto I may continually resort." Come, tried believer, and call up the great Physician. You have only to call upon Him, and He will be with you in an instant; yea, before you call He will answer you. Why, then, do you resort to man so often, and to God so seldom? Why drink so far down the stream, where it is muddy and polluted, when the pure fountain-head may be reached by you? Men will grow weary of you, but you cannot weary God. You may come to the Lord even though conscious of sin and backsliding. You may come to Him though your soul is sick and faint. He will restore you while you are yet coming. Listen to

RING THE NIGHT-BELL,

A PARABLE:

A certain young man traded, and in all things he prospered for a while. In all his dealings he was wise and prudent, and none were able to overreach him. The cause of his wisdom was that he had a father, a man of singular knowledge, of great experience, of large wealth, and great influence. His son never entered upon a transaction without consulting his father. Whenever he felt himself at all in difficulty, he hastened to ask counsel of his father. Whenever he needed money to meet a sudden demand, he drew upon his father. Their love to each other was more and more manifest as the one trusted and the other helped. Does anybody wonder that the young man grew rich?

But after a while the son grew cold toward his father, and seldom advised with him. There was no quarrel, but the young man was growing independent of his father, and preferred to act upon his own judgment. He failed to ask and to receive substantial help, which would have been freely given; and he fell into great losses, which might readily have been avoided. The young man became weak as others; he was the prey of deceivers; he spent labor and thought and substance upon matters which ended in failure; he grew poorer and poorer, till he trembled on the verge of bankruptcy. Do you wonder? Do you pity him? Do you see in him your own portrait? If so, change it all, and say of your heavenly Father: He is my friend and counselor, and to Him I do continually resort. This will be your wisdom, your strength, your happiness, and your spiritual wealth.

PERPETUAL WELCOME.

Multiply your approaches to God. Let them become incessant, constant, continual. No man ever resorted to God to excess. I had a dear friend whose company I esteemed, but on a sudden he did not come to see me. He stayed away; and as I knew he had not ceased to love me I wondered why. At last I found that the good brother had taken it into his head that he might outrun his welcome: he had read those words of Solomon, "Withdraw thy foot from thy neighbor's house; lest he be weary of thee, and so hate thee." I admired my friend's prudence, but I labored hard to make him see that Solomon knew nothing of me, and that I was more weary when he stopped away than when he came. I hope he made me an exception to a very sensible rule. But never get that thought into your head concerning your God.

Our immediate practical conclusion is this: If we may continually resort to God, let us go to Him at once. "Alas, I have been so worldly all the week!" This is to be confessed and repented of, but it must not keep you from God now. "But I feel dull and dead." I know it, and the Lord knows it too; but yet you may approach Him. Come, ye lukewarm ones, that have but little spiritual feeling; come just as you are, since Jesus from this platform says, Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest. "The Spirit and the bride say, Come." "Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely." That God who is the house of his people sets wide his doors, and writes over them in letters of light, "Whosoever will, let him come." Jesus comes to the door; He beckons to you, and persuades you to enter, saying: "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." The Lord enable you to come, for his dear mercy's sake. Amen.

MISSION WORK IN CHINA.

FIRST-FRUITS OF LABOR.

MR. HUDSON TAYLOR, in a letter dated Shanghai, June 12th, says: "We are greatly cheered in the work. For instance, Mr. George Clarke baptized the first-fruits in Tai-li Fu but a short time ago. Since then Mr. Eason has had the pleasure of baptizing five—the first in Yun-nan Fu. Mr. Andrews speaks of baptisms at Kwei-yang Fu. Mr. Meadows briefly mentions his return to Shao-hing from a visit to his out-stations, where he had examined nineteen candidates, and baptized eleven. He says: 'Among them was a dear little girl, the daughter of Christian parents, eleven years of age, who seemed such a bright, intelligent child; and another was a boy of fourteen, the son of a Christian man.' The tidings from our travellers are satisfactory. Journeying mercies are being vouchsafed to them all. The great cry everywhere is for more workers. How shall we meet it?"

A COVETED PRIZE.

Mr. G. Parker, of Kan-suh, says: "One morning I crossed the Si-ning River to attend a market on the opposite bank. A young mullah from Si-ning on business strongly coveted my last Arabic Bible, and tried everywhere to get the money to pay for it. He had only sufficient in silver to pay his expenses back to Si-ning. I promised to reserve the book until I reached Si-ning, but when I had left the street he changed his silver and ran himself out of breath to catch me before I could reach the ferry-boat with the desired treasure. It is a treat to sell the Scriptures to the Mohammedans. Some of them go off with the treasure more like school-boys who have received a prize than grave men. The copies of the Koran used in Kan-suh are mostly written; those printed come from India by sea, and are purchased in Shanghai for two dollars; from the size I think they must be incomplete, and they abound in dropped words, which the reader has to supply. I believe the Bible Society has an opportunity in Kan-suh of largely substituting the Bible for the Koran. They not only know that the Lord spake unto Moses, but as for Jesus, they say, 'There was something wonderful about Him.' He was the Lord's 'Ruakh.' By the word of the Lord were the heavens made, and all the hosts of them by the breath of His mouth."

A BRAVE HOSTESS.

Miss Lancaster writes from T'ai-yuen Fu, Shan-si Province: "Last week I was able to visit two villages. In one of these I was much encouraged; it being my third visit, a warm welcome awaited me on my arrival. During my stay, which was but short, I was asked into twelve homes, and was greatly pleased with our boys' school there. On the day of leaving I was invited by one of the baptized Christians to breakfast with his family. The invitation came at six A.M., and the meal was to be ready at seven. Having been up pretty early, we were quite ready for the food prepared, and I greatly enjoyed the Chinese fare. Breakfast being over, morning prayer followed, conducted by our Christian school-master; the boys were not present, as it is the custom to attend school early, and their worship had been conducted at an earlier hour. My hostess, a motherly woman of sixty years, announced to the neighbors present that we were about to have morning worship. A hymn, she said, would be sung, some portion of Scripture read, and then all would kneel and prayer be offered. Then, looking straight at the company present (about thirty), she said, in a commanding tone, 'Those who do not wish to kneel during prayer-time will retire at once.' None did so. I often wish friends in England could see some of these kind-hearted village people; their hearts, I am sure, would go out to them."

THE LATE REV. W. P. MACKAY, M.D. (See Portrait.)

THE death of Dr. Mackay is mourned not alone on his own side the Atlantic. In America he was well known and beloved. As he stood on the platform of Holy Trinity Church, New York, in October, 1878, and in ringing tones proclaimed the great truths of the Saviour's pre-millennial advent, it seemed as if he had strength for many years of service, and that a brilliant future might be safely predicted for him. But he is dead in the prime of his life, and if we were not assured that life and death are in the hands of One all-wise, as well as all-loving, we should speak of the Church's loss as untimely.

Dr. Mackay was forty-six years old when he died. He was born at Montrose, Scotland, and was educated for the medical profession, but his earnest piety and desire for active service for Christ led him rather in the direction of the ministry than the practice of medicine. When about thirty years of age he finally decided to devote his life to the preaching of the Gospel; but knowing well the value of medical knowledge to a pastor, he continued his studies even after he had accepted the call to the Church at Hull.

His aptitude for evangelical mission work was first noticed by Professor J. Y. Simpson, the discoverer of chloroform, who encouraged him to exercise his powers in that direction. He subsequently, while passing through college, became associated with the celebrated Scotch evangelist, Duncan Mathieson, in whose mission through Scotland and Ireland he took an active part, working with much earnestness and success. He afterward wrote his book, "Grace and Truth," which obtained a very wide circulation, and has been translated into many languages. It had a powerful effect upon the mind of Mr. D. L. Moody, who has frequently expressed his gratitude for the benefit he derived from it.

Dr. Mackay gathered around him a large congregation, among whom he labored with much success for many years. He was greatly beloved by his church, and his activity and restless energy brought him into contact with other churches in his own country and America, which also regarded him with respect and affection. He was often a prominent figure in the Perth, Dublin, and Mildmay Conferences. On three occasions he visited America for the purpose of attending similar conferences. On the occasion of Messrs. Moody and Sankey's first visit to Great Britain he took part in their mission, both in London and Edinburgh, this being work in which he delighted, and in which he excelled. His style of exposition and address was unique, and his matter bristled with illustration and anecdote drawn from his varied experience and retentive memory. He was often abrupt, sometimes startling his hearers by the oddity of his expressions, and frequently humorous.

His death was tragic. On August 19th he started on an excursion to the North of Scotland. The steamer by which he travelled arrived at Portree late at night. It was intensely dark, and Dr. Mackay, in stepping on the gang-plank to go ashore, missed his footing and fell between the steamer and the pier. He struck his head violently in his descent and became insensible. He was rescued from drowning with some difficulty and carried ashore. The shock he had received was aggravated by pneumonia, resulting from his immersion, and on August 22d he died. He knew before his death that his physicians had abandoned hope of his recovery, but he was not cast down. The prospect of meeting his Lord seemed to fill his soul to the exclusion of every other consideration.

"WHOSE picture is that, grandmamma?" asked a boy of some thirteen years, as he and a tall, queenly lady with white hair were walking down a long picture-gallery in an old mansion in Virginia. The boy, who was a little ahead of the stately old lady, stopped opposite the portrait of a young man, whose clear-cut features and intelligent brow gave him a distinguished appearance, as one of aristocratic birth.

"That is your great-grandfather, my boy," said the lady; "my father's father." "Was he not a great man? He looks like a statesman. I could imagine him the Governor of his State or a great Senator."

"He might have been that; he had intellect enough, as I have heard my father say many a time. But his life was wrecked at the outset. There was some terrible secret connected with him. I never heard what it was. My father would never speak of it, but he always mentioned him with respect, as of one who was a sufferer through the sins of others and his own weakness. His family was distinguished in English society, but when disgrace fell upon his name he retired from public life, went to his ancestral home in the country, and never again appeared in Court or Parliament."

"He did not live in America, then?"

"No; but it was by his wish that his son, who was my father, came here. The name was stained, he said, and there was no use in his trying to bear up against it. He would always be weighted in the race, and it would be better for my father to come to a new country and begin life afresh. That was before I was born. My father was only seventeen when he landed here, and the disgrace occurred some fifteen years before that, I should think about the year 1790."

"You never saw him, then, grandmamma?"

"Oh, yes, my boy; I was with him when he died. Papa took me over to Europe with him on a visit, and I stayed three months in the gloomy old abbey in which the old man lived. He died while I was there. That is more than fifty years ago."

"Is that portrait like him?"

"My father used to say so, but when I saw him he was very old, and it was difficult to see any resemblance to it."

"Did you see much of him, grandmamma?"

"Yes; he took a great fancy to me, and would have me in his room continually. He had never seen me before that visit, and he used to say that I brought into the old abbey some of the untainted American air, and it invigorated him. I was only twenty years old then, and my high spirits were not wholly subdued, even by the gloomy place, with its stained-glass windows and the woods all around it, through which the wind moaned and sighed like a creature in pain, and all the long dismal passages of the venerable place, with rooms that had not been opened for a lifetime. Everything seemed uncanny and mouldy, so unlike our bright, vigorous life here in Virginia; but it takes a good deal to depress a healthy girl of twenty on her first visit to Europe."

"And you were a very beautiful girl then?"

said the boy, adding, however, quickly, in thoughtful gallantry, the assurance which he could do conscientiously, "as you are a beautiful lady now."

"The old gentleman used to say so, but never without a warning that beauty was ever a source of danger, and urging me to be watchful against pride and temptation."

"Was he a good man, grand-mamma?"

"I do not know, my boy. His life was warped and overshadowed by sorrow and, I think, by remorse. He would sit for hours staring into vacancy, unconscious of everything around him, and would groan as he came out of his reverie. He liked to have me read to him, but often his thoughts were far away and he did not hear a word. But if I ceased reading at such times he would be aware of it and ask me to go on. Voltaire's works were much in vogue at that time, and I read one of them to him at his request. It seemed terrible to me to read such things to a man on the brink of the grave, for I had learned to love the Saviour, and the scoffing Frenchman's witticisms shocked me. When I had finished his book I begged that I might read a few chapters of the Bible, and the old man consented. I was reading it the very night before he died. I remember it well. I opened at the hundred and nineteenth Psalm. For a few minutes he listened attentively, and then his eyes took the vacant look and his jaw dropped, and he was lost to all that I read. He was sitting in his favorite easy-chair, with a large pillow at his back, and I was sitting opposite to him on a low ottoman. I glanced at him once or twice, and was struck by his utter unconsciousness. But I read on until his usual hour for retiring, when I rose to leave him. 'Stay a moment, dear,' he said. 'You read something just now that sent my thoughts on a long journey, and I thought I would speak to you about it; but I have quite forgotten. Will you read again, beginning where you began before?' I did so until I came to the ninth verse, 'Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way?' By taking heed thereto according to thy word.' That is it, the old man said. 'Don't forget that, my child. There is sound philosophy in it. Some day I will tell you a part of my history, and you will see why I was started on a train of reminiscences when you read that. But if I have no opportunity to tell you, don't forget that there is no other way of saving your life from wreck. You may have children, and perhaps grandchildren, and I charge you solemnly that you impress that on their minds. Tell them to take heed according to God's Word. If I had done that, what might my life have been!' The old man groaned heavily, and as he kissed me good-night he said again, 'Don't forget, my love; take heed according to thy word.' It is the injunction of an old man who did not take heed and fell into a pitfall. The next morning he was found dead in his bed, and I never heard his story."

"Now I know, grandmamma," said the boy, who had been listening intently, "why you made me learn those words the very first time I came to see you before I could read myself."

"Yes, my boy, and I am an old lady now, and I confirm my grandfather's words. God has mercifully preserved me, but I have seen many noble men and women fall through heedless-

THE SILVER LINING.

An Old Man's Remorse.

THE idea of a marriage between Jean and their brother in Australia delighted both Dr. Arnold's daughters; but how to introduce the idea to Jean and to win her consent to a union with a man she had never seen was a task requiring so much delicacy that there was need for careful thought before it was attempted. Nothing could be done on the next day, for their brother Frank was coming down on a visit from London, where he was studying medicine. He was Dr. Arnold's favorite son, if so wise a father could be said to have a favorite. He had never distinguished the boy or showed any partiality for him, but he thought very highly of his abilities, and loved him with an intense affection. He was looking forward to the time when, having finished his studies, Frank would come and reside at home and help him with his practice. That time was now near at hand, Frank having passed his last examination and being occupied with some special studies in the hospitals.

The next day the young man arrived, and was received by his parents and sisters with the loving welcome which is always reserved for the young man of promise after an absence. But Frank seemed changed. In spite of efforts to repress the feeling, the home circle was disappointed. He was nervous and pre-occupied. He appeared to have lost his interest in home affairs, and to be concerned about matters of his own. He stayed only a few days, and then hurried back to London, leaving behind him an uneasy sense that all was not well with him. Two weeks afterward the mail brought Dr. Arnold the following epistle from his son:

"DEAR FATHER: You will no doubt be surprised to hear that by the time you receive this letter I shall be married to a young lady by name Clare Newcombe. I do not like a fuss over these things, so I thought the less said about it the better. My future wife is an orphan, and has been under the care of a guardian for the last few years. He is a very old man, and has no relations, so he is leaving all his property to Clare, which will be an uncommonly good thing for both of us. I will write again after we return from Paris. Give my love to mother and the rest."

"Believe me, dear father,
"Your affectionate son,
"FRANK ARNOLD."

The letter filled both mother and father with amazement. No hint even of an attachment had fallen from the young man during his recent visit. He had seemed harder and colder than of yore. He had uttered words at times indicating that a worldly, selfish, almost a sordid spirit was ruling him. A contempt for disinterested generosity rare in the young, though often manifested by middle-aged men of the world, was more than once expressed by the young man, and had given pain to Dr. and Mrs. Arnold, with whom the teachings of the Master were the law of their lives. Frank seemed to be following quite a different example, and to have adopted as his rule of life the maxims of the world. Ambition and avarice seemed to be his ruling passions, and Dr. Arnold wished that it had been possible to give him at home the education necessary for his profession, rather than he should have gone to a great city to be indoctrinated with the evil passions of the world.

Only one thing relative to their new daughter-in-law was told them in the brief letter, and they could not avoid drawing the inference that it was the feature which was most prominent in their son's mind, and had probably influenced his choice. The lady was an heiress. If she had nothing else to recommend her they trembled for Frank's future, for none knew better than they that wealth alone never yet satisfied the heart of any human being. It was a saddening letter, not only because it showed that Frank had ceased to look to them for counsel, but because it indicated a spirit which in the end must lead to disappointment and unhappiness.

That result was nearer to the young man than they or he supposed. It was true, as he had stated, that Clare Newcombe had reason to look upon herself as the heiress of her guardian, but old James Crowther was an eccentric man, who might, as she knew, change the disposition of his property from mere caprice. She had frankly stated to her suitor how precarious her future was, but he had thought so well of her prospects that, as his father expected, he had thought only of her wealth in marrying her.

"She is quite poor, you know," Mr. Crowther had said when Frank asked his permission to marry Clare. "I might leave her a legacy in my will, but I am free to do that or not, as I choose. You must not reckon upon it. If you love her for herself you will not mind whether she is poor or rich." The old man's eyes stealthily watched Frank Arnold's face as he said this, but Frank had schooled himself before approaching the old man, and his features betrayed no emotion or anxiety.

"Money is always welcome," he said, "especially to a young doctor, who has sometimes a long time to wait for a lucrative practice; but of course we shall be able to live. I should not have proposed to your ward if I had not been able to maintain her."

"Ay, ay," said the old man, "that is well; I should not like Clare to marry a man who could not support her. You will manage, I dare say, and if a legacy should fall to her some day that will be so much the better; but don't reckon upon it. I may live a long time yet; I come of a long-lived family. Why, I might even marry yet; I shall be very lonely when Clare is gone," and the old man chuckled feebly, as if enjoying Frank's horror at the suggestion.

So Frank Arnold and Clare Newcombe were married. Mr. Crowther made them a handsome present, sufficient to defray their expenses on their marriage-tour and to furnish their new home. "A perfectly voluntary gift," he had said. Frank must understand that they had no claim upon him.

The day after Clare's marriage the old man had been sitting alone in his room, doing nothing in the twilight but stare into the little fire burning in his grate. He had been employing himself in his usual way till he could see no longer, looking at his banker's book and reading accounts of shares and companies, for he had thoughts now for little else.

Perhaps he missed Clare a little on that night; for though their lives had been singularly thrown together, yet there was no love between them.

Crowther had met Clare's father in Australia, where they were both seeking gold. Business had drawn them together, and Mr. Newcombe had been of great assistance to Crowther, furthering his mercenary objects by advice and co-operation.

His health failed after a time, and when he felt himself to be dying, Crowther, in return for past services, promised to be a guardian to the daughter of his friend. Mr. Newcombe did not prove at his death to be the rich man that had been expected. His health had long disabled him from seeing much to his affairs, which had gone awry. But still he left just sufficient to prevent his daughter from being a burden. She returned with Mr. Crowther to England shortly after her father's death, and, true to his promise, Crowther sent her to a boarding-school, where she was educated.

On the night after Clare's marriage, as we saw, old Mr. Crowther was sitting alone, and as he sat and stared into the fire unwelcome thoughts of the past started to his mind; thoughts even of his boyhood, of his mother, of his old home; then of his brothers and sisters. He felt sure they must be all dead, and yet he could not be easy about them. One sister had gone to America with her husband, and he had never heard of her death. He knew she was poor, for she had written some years before and told him of her husband's death, and how hard she found it to make a living for herself and child. But James Crowther had taken no notice of these letters—the last, in fact, he had burnt unopened—and now to-night the remembrance of them came reproachfully before him.

At length he rose, shook himself as if casting from him unpleasant thoughts, and rang the bell angrily. When his attendant, old Keziah, brought lights, he growled out a complaint of her negligence, which provoked no retort from the old woman, accustomed as she was to his caprices.

She had scarcely left the room when the door-bell rang feebly. "Who is that, I wonder?" thought old Crowther; "only a runaway ring, I dare say."

It seemed as if Keziah thought so too, if she heard it, for she did not go to the door.

Some minutes passed, and then whoever it might be ventured to ring again, and this time Keziah went to see what was wanted.

The evening had turned out rainy, and the street looked forlorn and dirty as she looked out and saw a woman's figure standing shyly in the doorway.

"Does Mr. Crowther live here, please?" "Well, yes; what do you want with him?" She hesitated and then said, "Would you ask him to speak to me for a minute?"

"I don't think he'll speak to you, especially at this time of night; but still I'll tell him."

"Please, sir," she said, when she had entered Mr. Crowther's room, "a young woman is come and wants to know if you will speak to her."

"Young woman! I don't know any young woman. What's her name?"

Keziah did not know, so she went down to the door again to ask.

"Sarah Jennings," was the answer.

Keziah was almost frightened when she saw the shudder her master gave as he heard the name, and she could not help saying, "Perhaps you would rather not see her, sir."

But no, he would see her, and in a minute more the strange young woman was coming up the stairs.

Keziah's curiosity was great, but she dare not stay to hear what passed.

The two looked at each other for quite a minute, and then the girl said:

"Please, sir, I believe you are my uncle. My mother wished me to come and see you."

Again a shudder shook old Crowther's frame. That mother of whom the girl spoke was his sister, of whom he had that night been thinking, and whom he had so shamefully neglected.

"How is your mother?" he said, in a low tone.

"She is dead," and at the thought of her fresh loss the girl's voice almost broke down.

"Dead! When did she die?" almost gasped old Crowther.

"Last Monday week."

"Where?" was his next question.

"At Liverpool. Poor mother had such a longing to see England again. She had been ailing for many months, but she thought if she could only get to England she would be quite well; alas! it was too late. She only lived one week after we came to land. She begged I would find you out without delay, and told me I was to give you this letter."

Crowther did not burn it, neither did he read it; there it lay unopened before him.

There is no mistaking you are my sister's child; you have her eyes over again. Have you had any tea?" he said, after a few minutes' silence.

"No."

"Well, you can have some. Keziah will get you some in another room, and you can stay here to-night."

Keziah stared when she found the strange visitor was to have some tea, and still more when she found she was to stay the night; but with all Keziah had a kind heart, and when she looked at the sad and weary girl, in her deep mourning, she felt sorry for her, and determined to make her comfortable, if she could. The woman's simple kindness put the poor girl at ease, and very soon physical weariness asserted its sway and she sank into peaceful, refreshing slumber in Keziah's own bed.

Keziah herself felt a strange disinclination to retire to rest. An uneasy apprehension of calamity possessed her which she could not shake off. She busied herself with household matters for some time, but her thoughts were busy with the lonely old man sitting solitary in his own room. It was hard to tell why she had any regard for him unless it was because they were growing old together, but certain it was that she was concerned about him, and once or twice she went and listened at his door. All was quiet there, but as she was just about to go to bed she heard a heavy fall. Then she entered the room without ceremony. She found him stretched upon the floor insensible. She waited only to raise his head on a hassock, and then ran across the road for a doctor.

In the course of an hour consciousness returned. It had been a fit, and comparatively a slight one; but others might follow.

The next day Crowther seemed much better than could have been expected, remembered all about Sarah, and asked to see her. They were unwilling at first that he should, thinking it would over-excite him; but his irritation at being thwarted was so great that she was allowed to go and sit by him. He lay and looked at her steadily, but made few remarks. Another restless night succeeded, and when the doctor came in the morning it was evident that some mental distress was weighing upon him. He questioned Keziah, who told him of the visitor's arrival and her master's agitation at seeing her. He therefore took the opportunity to speak about Sarah, and see if anything could be gathered from him about her.

"Mr. Reynolds," he cried, "I have something on my mind; I have wronged that poor girl's mother. She is dead, and I have killed her."

"Gently, gently, Mr. Crowther; it cannot be so bad as that. You are taking too gloomy a view of things."

"I am not, sir; I have killed her, and I—I am lost—lost—lost!"

Mr. Reynolds was a man of the world, and yet even he was awe-struck at his patient's words; he could give medicine for the body, but he knew not how to give healing to the soul. For a few minutes he was silent, now knowing what to say.

"Could you not, Mr. Crowther, provide for this young person, whoever she is—would not that in some measure atone for the past?"

"Her mother was my sister, Mr. Reynolds. I knew she was in want and I did not help her; now it is too late, too late." Then, as if a gleam of hope came across him, he added, "I could do as you say—I could leave my money to her daughter."

"Certainly, Mr. Crowther; I would see to it at once."

"Yes, at once. I had arranged differently, but I can alter."

A note was despatched to Mr. Crowther's lawyer, who promptly answered the summons of his client. A new will, leaving all to Sarah (for the old man would hear of nothing short of the whole), was rapidly drawn up, and by the evening it was properly signed and attested. This seemed to give him some little satisfaction, but his conscience could not rest; the past was ever present with him, and his own state rose vividly before him, till his voice could be heard beyond his chamber crying, "Lost—lost—lost." The lawyer and doctor could not cheer him, they knew not how; they could not tell him of a Saviour's love and mercy, for they knew it not themselves.

Then the stranger girl crept in, and in a low-toned voice said:

"Uncle, may I read to you a little?"

He stared at her with wild eyes, as of a hunted animal. "Read, child; what would you read to me? I am a lost man."

"Don't say that, uncle. Jesus Christ came to seek and to save those that were lost. Mother bade me tell you how she loved her Saviour, and that she hoped you would learn to love Him, too, that she might meet you again."

"Ah, child, if I could have asked your mother to forgive me I might have felt better. Perhaps she would; she was a good soul."

"Oh, uncle, she forgave you, I am sure of that. She forgave you as she hoped to be forgiven."

The doctor's entrance interrupted the conversation, but in the early morning Crowther said to Keziah, "Call the girl." Sarah was soon again at his bedside.

"What were you telling me last night? Tell me again, child."

Again she told the story of the Saviour's love, of His death for poor lost sinners; then from her Bible she read of the dying thief. "Dear uncle, there are no sins too black for Him to wash away; only tell Him you are laden with sin, and you want Him to wash you whiter than snow, and He will, indeed He will."

"Thank you, child; I will think about it; I think I could sleep a little now." To Sarah's great joy toward evening he opened his eyes and looked at her. Presently he said, "Child, you said 'Jesus died for sinners, then—He—died—for me,'" and his eyes closed again. In the night another fit came on, and James Crowther was gone—gone into the presence of his God.

THE FAMINE IN SAMARIA.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 11, II Kings 7:1-17. Golden Text, Luke 18:27. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Jehoram's Perversity—God's Mercies to Him—Subsequent Severity—The King Holds Elisha Responsible—Sends an Executioner to Kill Him—A Message of Mercy—The Captain's Incredulity—Common in Our Day—The Reasoning of the Lepers—Their Expedition—The New Plenty—End of the Scoffing Captain.

JEHORAM was not converted. Oh, how the Shepherd sought this wandering one, yet always in vain. Delivered, with his whole army, from death by drought, by the direct intervention of God, saved from the army of Syria—the bands of Syria led into Samaria blind, and their sight given back before his very eyes—the power and mercy of God were forced upon his notice in an unusual manner, and yet this man remained without hope and without God in the world. When gentle measures do not succeed God makes use of severe ones. He permitted Ben-hadad to come up against and to besiege Samaria. Supplies were cut off, the provisions of the city were exhausted, and the inhabitants were in such awful straits that a woman came to the king for justice against her neighbor, who had joined her in eating her child, and whose natural affection recoiled from giving up her own son for food. The king rent his clothes, not his heart, and, instead of humbling himself before God, said: "God do so and more also to me, if the head of Elisha, the son of Shaphat, shall stand on him this day."

What had Elisha done? He had been God's willing instrument of preservation to this king again and again. Why, then, this enmity? Jehoram knew that Elisha was in God's secret, and that this state of things was permitted for the very purpose of pressing him into subjection to God; his will was not renounced; and so, in this perverse spirit, he attributed the sore distress of the city to malice on the part of Elisha, not choosing to recognize the hand of God in it. Can the heart of man be so base? Yes, when Satan has possession. But Elisha knew all that was going on; he and the elders of Israel sat with him." From this we may know that God had been at work—the elders were with the prophet, the man of God, not with the king; faith in God must have been gaining ground among them. The king sent a man from before him to do the deed of blood. But Elisha was aware of it, and said to the elders: "See ye how this son of a murderer hath sent to take away mine head? look, when the messenger cometh, shut the door, and thrust him back with the door: is not the sound of his master's feet behind him? (Rev. Ver.) Elisha was not afraid to die, but he knew that he had work yet to do and a message now to deliver to the king.

Hardly had Elisha done speaking when the messenger came, bringing the king's message, and the king behind him: "Behold, this evil is of the Lord; why should I wait for the Lord any longer?" Jehoram always imputed evil to God. When in his own perverse self-will he had gathered Jehoshaphat and the King of Edom with their armies to fight with him against Moab, and there was no water for the host, he recognized God at once—"The Lord hath called these three kings together, to deliver them into the hand of Moab" (II Kings 3:13). When the deliverance came he heard nothing of the Lord from his lips. In his deliverance from the King of Syria, again, there was no mention of God; but when the famine in Samaria was at its height, then the king could see God in it. Would that this were an uncommon thing! But it is not! When any great trouble comes—a grievous epidemic, a famine, a frightful war, sickness or death in the family—men begin to talk about God. But when things go well in a country men attribute it to the industry of the inhabitants, the wisdom of the rulers, the sobriety of the people, and God is not seen at all.

Before the executioner whom the king had sent found time to do his work the prophet declared from the Lord

A MESSAGE OF MERCY.

Jehoram should have one more chance, one more appeal of love from the heart of God: "Thus saith the Lord, To-morrow about this time shall a measure of fine flour be sold for a shekel, and two measures of barley for a shekel, in the gate of Samaria." The king's chosen companions were not of a kind to influence him for good; perhaps if he could have broken with them his life would have been another one, and this lost soul might have been saved. "The captain, on whose hand the king leaned, answered the man of God, and said: Behold, if the Lord made windows in heaven, might this thing be?" (Rev. Ver.). The scoffer could see the closed gates, the famine-stricken soldiery, utterly incapable of making any sally from the city, and as he never took God into his reckoning he had the ear of all who resembled him; and the wretched men, instead of believing in the Lord, who alone could bring them out of their extremity, indulged in a joke at the expense of His prophet.

God is doing things in our day which may well seem incredible to those who put God out of their reckoning. The largest part of the soul-winning is done outside the churches by instruments (men and women) specially raised up by God, many of them illiterate. It is not the organized churches, as a rule, which save the drunkards and harlots; the most of these classes who are saved are so by the instrumentality of one or more of themselves whom God has rescued. The most successful missionaries among the heathen are often not those who have been for years prepared by learning for this work, but such as have gone without scrip, or staff, or purse, in dependence on the Lord alone, such as believe God can open windows in heaven if He will; and some of these were helpless invalids for years, who, since they have learned that "the body is . . . for the Lord, and the Lord for the body," have gone out in His strength, to do more than those of a naturally strong constitution. It is not for us to doubt that God will do what He says He will, because we do not see how He is going to work. Elisha said: "Behold, thou shalt see it with thine eyes, but shalt not eat thereof." Oh, how many a poor invalid sees God's healing with his eyes, but he does not experience it, because instead of taking God at His own simple written Word he reasons about it, and says, "How can this be?"

God had His own way of bringing about His purposes. Four leprous men were huddled together at the gate of the city, miserable objects, their very life a burden, and yet the instinct of self-preservation as strong in them as in the healthiest of the citizens. They held a council: "Why sit we here until we die?" If we enter into the city, the famine is in the city, and we shall die there (who would give anything to a leper in a time of famine?); and if we sit still here, we die also." There was but one other alternative—only desperate men would adopt it: "Now therefore come, and let us fall unto the host of the Syrians: if they save us alive, we shall live; and if they kill us, we shall but die." They could not be worse off, they might be better. If every lost soul, if every oppressed and tempted believer, if every weary sufferer would act likewise, take a fair survey of their present hopes, and say: "If we remain as we are, we can but perish, we can but be overcome, we can but continue in our suffering; we will claim the promises of God." Oh, what deliverances would be wrought! The lepers acted on the conclusion to which they came; they arose in the twilight and made the venture; step by step, with the utmost caution, they approached the camp of the Syrians. There was no need for all this caution—not one of their dreaded enemies remained.

GOD HAD BEEN AT WORK;

He had made the Syrians to hear a noise of horses, and chariots, and a great host—a panic had seized them, and they fled for their lives. All that the lepers found was the abundant, lavish supply of all their need.

If any unsaved soul reads this, go straight to Jesus, whom you have feared and avoided. He is not an enemy, He has no grudge against you: He loves you even now. Take Him, claim Him fearlessly as your own, and tell Him you do it on the ground of his own Word—"God so loved the world." In Him you have redemption through His blood, even the forgiveness of sins (Eph. 1:7). Tried believer, are you pressed down with the consciousness of how little you love God, how constantly you fail, how inconsistent you are? Go straight to Jesus, and tell Him all, claim Him boldly to be to you what you can never be in yourself, "Wisdom, Righteousness, Sanctification, and Redemption," and rest in Him to live out his own life in you. Dear sick one, make the venture, strike out upon the sure Word of God, and take Jesus as "the Lord that maketh thee." The lepers revelled in their new-found treasure, luxuriating in food, drink, clothing which the Syrians had left behind. And then they began to hide their treasure. But after the first intoxication of their joy conscience began to work; in the city, a few miles distant, thousands were still in the same distress from which they themselves were only just saved. "We do not well," they said; "this is a day of good tidings, and we hold our peace: if we tarry till the morning light, punishment will overtake us. Now, therefore, let us go and tell the king's household" (Rev. Ver.). Oh, how many there are who dishonor God, and bring loss on their own souls, and the return of sickness in their bodies, by not testifying to what the Lord has done for them! "Ye also shall bear witness" (John 15:27) is a direction for every child of God. The lepers returned to the city, and told the porters, and they wakened up the king. Full of unbelief, he, without the smallest reference to God's Word by Elisha, looked upon this as a ruse of the enemy. But over-persuaded by his hungry servants, who felt the pressure of need more than he did, he sent them with two chariot horses of the few that yet remained in the city, and they went on the track of the Syrians as far as the Jordan, and returned to say that the story of the lepers was true.

It was not long before the city turned out. Men who had a little energy left went into the camp and brought provisions into the city, and before the day was well on a thriving trade was doing in the gate. The Word of the Lord was fulfilled in judgment as well as in mercy. The scoffing captain was appointed to have charge of the gate, but the throng of starving people could not be kept back; he lost his footing in the crowd, there was no possibility of regaining it; "the people trod upon him in the gate, and he died." He saw the plenty, he saw God justified, he saw the blasphemy of his jest, but he did not eat of what he saw. The sin of unbelief and of leading others into unbelief is perhaps that of all others which God counts the most heinous. God keep us from this grievous sin of unbelief.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

THY WAY—NOT MINE.

BORRATON BONAR.

Thy way—not mine, O Lord,
However dark the land;
Lead me by Thine own hand;
Choose out the path for me.

Smooth let it be, or rough,
It will be still the best;
Winding or straight, it matters not,
It leads me to Thy rest.

I dare not choose my lot;
I would not if I might;
Choose Thou for me, my God,
So shall I walk aright.

The kingdom that I seek
Is Thine; so let the way
That leads to it be Thine,
Else surely I might stray.

Take Thou my cup, and it
With joy or sorrow fill;
As best to Thee may seem,
Choose Thou my good and ill.

Choose Thou for me my friends,
My sickness or my health;
Choose Thou my cares for me,
My poverty or wealth.

Not mine—not mine the choice,
In things of great or small;
Be Thou my guide, my Strength,
My Wisdom, and my All.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN—SIR LYON PLAYFAIR, M.P.—CASTLE STREET, ABERDEEN.

A GREAT ASSOCIATION.

WHEN the Apostle Paul admonished Timothy on the duty of avoiding "profane and vain babblings and the oppositions of science," he added, with the discretion which was so prominent a feature of his character, the words "falsely so-called" (1 Tim. 6: 20). The inference is—and it is strictly consistent with the teaching of the great apostle—that the science which he wished Timothy to avoid was the spurious science which had no right at all to the name of science. That was the science which antagonized the Gospel in Paul's day as it does in ours, and which our young ministers will do well to avoid, as Paul advised Timothy to do. True science "ever has been," said Sir David Brewster, "and ever must be, the safeguard of religion." This fact is now recognized. Were it not so we might now be laboring, like our Southern friend, the Rev. John Jasper, to prove from the Bible that the sun goes round the earth and persecuting men, as the priests did Galileo for teaching the true principles of astronomical science. Christian men in these days, though still retaining a prejudice against advanced scientific teaching, are looking upon it with more favor than their fathers did, and take delight in studying the handiwork of their Heavenly Father in creation, and admiring the perfect order which He established and maintains in the material universe.

One of the most famous institutions in this field is for the Advancement of Science, which last year met in Montreal, and this year has just been holding its sittings in Aberdeen, Scotland—the city in which it held its first meeting twenty-six years ago. The object for which it was founded and which its leaders still hold before its members may be understood from the remarks with which its President, Sir Lyon Playfair, opened its sessions on September 9th. He said: "The meetings of the association throw open the arena to the cultivators of all the sciences, and to their mutual advantage. The geologist learns from the chemist that there are problems for which he had no clue, but which that science can solve for him; the geographer receives light from the naturalist, the astronomer from the physicist and engineer, and so on. And all find a field upon which to meet the public at large—invite them to listen to their reports, and even to take part in their discussions—and show to them that philosophers are no vain theorists, but essentially men of practice, not conceited pedants, wrapt up in their own mysterious importance, but humble inquirers after truth, proud only of what they may have achieved or won for the general use of man. Neither are they daring and presumptuous unbelievers—a character which ignorance has sometimes affixed to them—who would, like the Titans, storm heaven by placing mountain upon mountain until hurled down by the terrible thunders of Jove; but rather the pious pilgrims to the Holy Land, who toil on in search of the Sacred Shrine, in search of Truth—God's Truth—God's laws as manifested in His works, in His Creation."

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN.

Born in 1847—His Ancient Family—Romantic Career of His Brother—University Successes and Public Appointments—Marriage in 1877—His Support of Temperance Work—Sympathy with Messrs. Moody and Sankey and Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Orphanage Work—Interest in Railway Employés.

ONE of the most prominent members of the association in the Aberdeen meetings was the distinguished Christian nobleman who takes his title from the city in which the meetings were held. His name has been long favorably known in the religious, philanthropic and political world. His portrait appears on the left of our first page. Though still a young man, his life has borne fruit of his great activity and usefulness, and while he represents one of the oldest families of the British aristocracy, he has thrown himself into the front of numerous movements for the welfare of the people, the amelioration of social wrongs, and the redress of social grievances. He has not concealed his sympathy and respect for religion, as aristocrats are tempted to do, but has openly espoused the cause of Christianity by presiding at the annual meetings of various religious institutions. Benevolent institutions also receive his valuable support. The countess and himself, for instance, have given generous assistance to the Homes for Working Girls in London, and regularly attend the meetings of the Homes to encourage the managers by their presence and advocacy.

John Campbell Hamilton-Gordon, seventh Earl of Aberdeen, was born August 3d, 1847. He is now thirty-eight years old. The name belongs to which has played an important part in the history of the north of the island. He is grandson of the well-known statesman and Prime Minister of the same name who tried to perform the difficult task of leading a non-partisan government. He entered office in 1852, with a cabinet which was called "the Ministry of all the Talents," each department having at its head a statesman with a special knowledge of its business, but not necessarily in harmony with his colleagues. The Administration closed its brief life in 1855, having held office two years and forty-four days. That was the Cabinet which quarrelled with Russia and engaged in the Crimean war.

The statesman was succeeded by his grandson, George, who was drowned, after a career of romantic adventure, on January 27th, 1870, during a voyage from Boston to Melbourne. The present Earl thereupon took the title. His early education was principally private, until he entered University College, Oxford, where he took his Bachelor's degree in 1871, and his M.A. in 1877. His undergraduate course was a brilliant success. The estates of the Aberdeen family are widely scattered over Scotland, and the Earl derives various other titles from them. In the peerage of Scotland he is enrolled as Lord Haddo, Methlic, Tarvis, and Kellie. He is, besides, a baronet of Nova Scotia, and has the title of Viscount Formartine.

In May, 1883, Lord Aberdeen had the honor of being selected as Lord High Commissioner of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. Besides performing the customary responsible duty of formally opening the General Assembly, he re-opened St. Giles's Cathedral, which had just been restored through the munificence of the late Dr. William Chambers, the well-known author and publisher. Dr. Chambers died a short time before the ceremony, but an address which he had prepared was read by his nephew on the occasion, to which Lord Aberdeen appropriately replied.

His lordship is well known in Scotland as a warm advocate of temperance principles. He is also movement. In a recent expression of his views on various public questions, his lordship expressed himself as hopeful that it would be possible in a short time to carry the bill closing the liquor-saloons on Sundays. At present they have to close only during stated hours—about six in all. Speaking on the outburst of infidelity which characterized the present day, he said that although it was a most serious and depressing sign of the times, yet it was not surprising that the vast amount of aggressive Christianity should have awakened some corresponding active hostility. Believing that the work in London and elsewhere of Messrs. Moody and Sankey was a valuable power for good among the people, he supported it, both by his gifts and by his presence. Only recently, also, he presided at the annual meeting of the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Orphanages, on which occasion he delivered a speech full of sympathy and kindly Christian love.

Lord Aberdeen is Chairman of the Royal Commission on Railways, the outcome of which has been an amelioration in various directions of the condition of railway employés in whom he takes a deep interest. He is also well known as an ardent advocate and supporter of working-men's clubs. If the other members of the House of Lords took as much interest in the welfare of the poor and the workmen as does Lord Aberdeen the agitation for the abolition of the House would not find the response it now does in the hearts of the people. It is with that House, as it is with the world—a few men are the salt that preserves it.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR, M.P.,

President of the British Association.

Born in 1819—His Studies at St. Andrews—Visit India—Becomes a Student in Germany—Public Appointments—Royal Pupils—Advocacy of the Enfranchisement of Women—Election by the Scottish Students—His Religious Writings—Appreciation of American Spirituality.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR, whose portrait appear on the right side of our first page, is this year the President of the British Association. He is a man well known in this country. Ever year since 1876 he has come to America, and spent some months in travel, in visiting our seat of learning, and in studying our social, political and economical development. European statesmen have usually exhibited an indifference, no to say a supercilious contempt for America, this mark of appreciation by a man who is a once a statesman and a philosopher is therefore a significant fact.

Sir Lyon Playfair was born in India, on March 21st, 1819, at Meerut—a place famous for being the town in which occurred the first outbreak of the terrible mutiny of 1857. His father was chief Inspector of Hospitals in Bengal. The boy was sent to Scotland to St. Andrews University for his education. He devoted himself chiefly to the study of chemistry, and throughout his subsequent life that has been the pursuit to which he has ever turned with delight. He subsequently went to Giessen, in Germany, to study organic chemistry under the world-renowned Dr. Liebig. On his return home he was soon engaged in practically applying the knowledge he had acquired, and undertook the management of the large calico print works of Messrs. Thompson, of Clitheroe. In 1843 he went to Manchester, and was appointed Professor of Chemistry in the Royal Institution. He was subsequently appointed to the same chair at Edinburgh University.

At the recommendation of the late Sir F. Peel, in 1844, he was placed on the commission constituted to examine into the sanitary state of the large towns of the empire, and his report displayed consummate ability. He has since held many special commissions, notably in respect of the great exhibition in 1851, at the close of which, in recognition of his valuable scientific services, he was made a Companion of the Bath and received an appointment in Prince Albert household.

IN PARLIAMENT.

When in 1868 a bill passed Parliament allowing the Universities of Edinburgh and St. Andrews to unite in electing a member to represent them in the House of Commons, the fellows and students elected Dr. Playfair, and have since that re-elected him at every election. He is best known in the Legislature by his persistent and irrepressible advocacy of female suffrage. In advocating a bill introduced to give women the right to vote at Parliamentary elections, he forcibly said that it was time to take women out of the category of incapable citizen in which their only companions were idiot lunatics, criminals, and minors. He maintained the world had benefited very much by the sympathies of women, and the bill appealed to the sense of national justice. In spite of his advocacy, however, it was defeated. After re-election in 1880, in the new Parliament, he was appointed Chairman of Committee of Ways and Means and Deputy Speaker; from the offices he retired in the Session of 1883, and was sed to the rank of K.C.B. (Knight Commander of the Bath.) He is a Liberal in politics, enthusiastic believer in Mr. Gladstone. He held office in the Ministry of 1873-'74 as Postmaster-General, and at the same period was made Privy Councillor, which gives him the right to prefix the words Right Honorable to his name. The honorary degree of LL.D. was conferred on him by the University of Edinburgh in 1890.

LITERARY WORK.

Sir Lyon Playfair has translated and edited Lord Liebig's treatise on chemistry applied to agriculture and physiology, and is the author of many scientific reports and memoirs, lectures and published addresses on economic, sanitary and educational subjects, including the address delivered in 1874 to the Social Science Association at Glasgow. He has also written able articles on the connection between religion and science. His papers, profoundly religious, are thoroughly philosophic as they are eloquent, and they demolish the very foundations of those philosophers who "do not like to retain God in their knowledge." For the most part the youth of Scotland are not afflicted with such teachers, and we may hope that in England, too, the progress of the fashionable materialism may be checked. At any rate, among the foremost teachers of science stands Dr. Playfair, who has attained an exalted rank, yet delights to honor the Word of the Bible, and grounds his hope for the future on the finished mediatorial work of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Sir Lyon Playfair has been thrice married. His present wife is a native of Boston, Mass.

THE SUPERIORITY OF AMERICA

A prominent subject in Sir Lyon's inaugural address at Aberdeen, on September 9th, which proved that during his visits to our shores he has been a close observer of our institutions. He said, after dwelling on British indifference to science: "Very remarkable is it to see a nation like the United States reserving a hundred and fifty million acres of national land for the promotion of scientific education. In some respects this young country is in advance of all European nations in joining science to administrative offices. Its scientific publications, like the great palaeontological work embodying the researches of Professor Marshall, his associates in the Geological Survey, are example to other governments. The Ministry of Agriculture is surrounded with a staff of botanists and chemists. The Home Secretary is aided by a special Scientific Commission to investigate the habits, migrations and food of fishes, and the latter has at its disposal two specially-constructed steamers of large tonnage. The United States and Great Britain promote fisheries on distinct systems. In this country we are perpetually issuing expensive commissions to visit the coasts in order to ascertain the experiences of fishermen. I have acted as chairman of one of these Royal Commissions, and find that the fishermen, having only a knowledge of a small area, gave the most contradictory and unsatisfactory evidence. In America questions are put to nature, and not to fishermen. Exact and searching investigations are made into the life-history of the fishes, into the temperature of the sea in which they live and grow, into the nature of their food, and into the habits of their natural enemies. For this purpose the Government give the co-operation of the navy, and provide the Commission with special corps of skilled naturalists, some of whom go out with the steamships, and others work in the biological laboratories at Wood's Hole, Mass., or at Washington.

The different Universities send their best naturalists to aid in these investigations, which are under the direction of Mr. Baird, of the Smithsonian Institution. The annual cost of the Federal Commission is about £10,000, while the separate States spend about £20,000 in local efforts. The practical results flowing from these scientific investigations have been important. The inland waters and rivers have been stocked with fish of the best and most suitable kinds. Even the great ocean which washes the coasts of the United States is beginning to be affected by the knowledge thus acquired, and a sensible result is already produced upon the most important of its fisheries. The United Kingdom largely depends upon its fisheries, but as yet our Government have scarcely realized the value of such scientific investigations as those pursued with success by the United States.

"Less systematically, but with great benefit to science, our own Government has used the surveying expeditions, and sometimes has equipped special expeditions to promote natural history and solar physics. Some of the latter, like the voyage of the Challenger, have added largely to the store of knowledge; while the former, though not primarily intended for scientific research, have had an indirect result of infinite value by becoming training-schools for such investigators as Edward Forbes, Darwin, Hooker, Huxley, Wyville Thomson, and others. In the United Kingdom we are just beginning to understand the wisdom of Washington's farewell address to his countrymen, when he said: 'Promote as an object of primary importance institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened.'"

Had such remarks been made by a citizen of the United States the British scientists would have doubtless commented on American vanity and self-conceit; as they were made by one of his own folks, John Bull had to swallow them with what grace he could.

THE CITY OF ABERDEEN.

THE picture on the first page represents one of the principal thoroughfares of the city in which the British Association has been holding its meetings. It is called Castle Street, and contains the Municipal Buildings, the Cross, and a granite statue to the memory of the highly-respected fifth Duke of Gordon.

Aberdeen is situated at the mouth of the Don or the Dee. Until nearly the end of last century the city could lay no claim to either beauty of street architecture or to orderly municipal and sanitary arrangements. In even the best quarters of the town there were wooden houses and swamps and waste ground, and dirt reigned supreme. Then a change came over the Aberdeensian civic mind; it effected improvements, and carried them out at such an impetuous rate that the town drifted into bankruptcy. The principal streets in Aberdeen are now very good indeed, broad, well planned, well cleaned, and well lighted, and although there are lanes and back slums that need attention, they are not so bad as they are in other large cities. Gray granite is almost universally used in the construction of both houses and large buildings, and the effect, although a little cold, is very striking. The chief street is Union Street, seventy feet broad, and nearly a mile in length. It is the site of many fine shops and stately edifices, and has a handsome appearance.

Although inferior in population to Dundee, Aberdeen is considered to be a more important and distinguished city. At the last census of 1881 the population was 105,054, and according to the Registrar-General's returns the estimated population at the middle of 1884 was 111,242. During the ten years which elapsed between the census of 1871 and that of 1881 Aberdeen showed an increase in population of 16,873, being with one exception the largest increase of any town in Scotland. It is a more ancient city than Edinburgh or Glasgow. Its present charter dates from 1179, more than seven hundred years ago, and that was a renewal of an older charter.

THE UNIVERSITY OF ABERDEEN.

THE sessions of the British Association were held in the University, which is the chief glory of Aberdeen, of which the citizens are rightly proud. (A picture of it appears on page 652.) It is composed of two colleges, King's and Marischal, which were united in 1860. King's, the older of the two, is situated in Old Aberdeen, and was "founded by Bishop Elphinstoun, in 1494, by a Bull of Pope Alexander VI., at the request of James IV., who confirmed this Bull on May 22d, 1497. The actual foundation, however, did not take place till 1505. It was first known as St. Mary's, but afterward as the "Royal College, or King's College of Aberdeen." The first principal of the college was the renowned Hector Boece, and under him the University soon grew famous. Its reputation extended to the Continent of Europe, attracting studious foreigners to it. Marischal College, which was united with it twenty-five years ago, stands in Broad Street, on the site of a Franciscan Convent. It was founded by George Keith, fifth Earl Marischal, in 1593. The old buildings remained until 1684; a new edifice was then erected, which in 1837 was replaced by the present pile—finished in 1841 at a cost of about £30,000, £15,000 of which was paid by Government. The style is Collegiate Gothic, and the designer was Archibald Simpson. A tower of one hundred feet high springs from the quadrangle, and the vestibule and stair in this tower leading to the hall, library and museum are very fine. In the wall within the principal doorway is a stone taken from the old building, on which is the defiant Keith motto, "They hail said: Quhat say thay: Lat them say." Since the union of the two Universities in 1860 the classes for art and divinity are taught in King's College, and those for law and medicine in Marischal. The number of students is from seven hundred to eight hundred.

A Call to All Christians has been Issued by a committee of the convention which recently assembled at Mr. Moody's invitation at Northfield, Mass. The committee calls attention to missionary progress of late years, to the large numbers of heathen who nevertheless have not yet heard the Gospel, and to the many doors recently opened for Christian missionaries. It suggests that, if in some great centre, such as London or New York, a great council of evangelistic believers could meet to consider the wonderful working of God's providence and grace in mission fields, and how fields that are unoccupied may be insured from any further neglect, and to arrange and adjust the work so as to prevent needless waste and friction among workers, it might greatly further the glorious object of the world's evangelization, and add: "We earnestly commend the suggestion to the prayerful consideration of the several bodies of Christian believers and the various missionary organizations." The suggestions of the committee were submitted to the convention and approved. The committee consisted of the Rev. A. T. Pierson, of Philadelphia, chairman; Rev. Dr. A. A. Gordon, of Boston; L. W. Munhall, of Indianapolis; Rev. Dr. G. F. Pentecost, of Brooklyn; J. E. K. Studd, of London, England; Rev. William Ashmore, of Swatow, China; and Miss E. Dryer, of Chicago.

An Appeal is Made by the Trustees of the People's Church at Humboldt, Neb., for assistance in peculiarly trying circumstances. Several godly men and women in that city were anxious that the Gospel should be preached there with purity and power. They held services for a time in rooms which became too small for the purpose. Then they were encouraged by a wealthy lady to build a church, she promising to defray all expenses. Circumstances occurred during the progress of the building which prevented her completely fulfilling her promise. The church is consequently burdened with a debt of a few hundred dollars, which the members are unable to raise. They ask the assistance of any Christian people who, knowing the condition of Humboldt, sympathize with their effort to establish an evangelical church. The names of the trustees are William C. Bissell, E. Whitney, and W. P. Ferris.

WINDOWS TOWARD JERUSALEM.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon. Preached Last Sunday Morning, Oct. 4, 1885.

"His windows being open and his chamber toward Jerusalem."—DAN. 6:10.

The Leonine Threat—The First Lion Tamer—The Royal Visit—Why his Windows were Toward Jerusalem—His Native Land—A Nation of Foreigners—The Post-Office Windows—A Letter from Home—An Avenue for Sacred Influences—A Sad Mistake—The Strasbourg Virgin—Windows Open Toward the Exchange—Daniel's Attitude—Livingstone's Portrait—The Attitude to See Farthest—The New Jerusalem—The Heavens of the Poets—The Rooms of Heaven—A Crusader Repulsed by his Mother.

THE SCOUNDRELLY princes of Persia, urged on by political jealousy against Daniel, have succeeded in getting a law passed that whosoever prays to God shall be put under the paw and teeth of the lions, who are lashing themselves in rage and hunger up and down the stone cage, or putting their lower jaw on the ground, bellowing till the earth trembles. But did not hinder the devotions of Daniel, the Cœur-de-Lion of the ages. His enemies might as well have a law that the sun should not draw water or that the south wind should not sweep across a garden of magnolias or that God should be abolished. They could not scare him with the red-hot furnaces, and they cannot now scare him with the lions. As soon as Daniel hears of this enactment he leaves his office of Secretary of State, with its upholstery of crimson and gold, and comes down the white marble steps and goes to his own house. He opens his window and puts the shutters back and pulls the curtain aside so that he can look toward the sacred city of Jerusalem, and then prays.

I suppose the people in the street gathered under and before his window, and said: "Just see that man defying the law; he ought to be arrested." And the constabulary of the city rush to the police headquarters and report that Daniel is on his knees at the wide-open window. "You are my prisoner," says the officer of the law, dropping a heavy hand on the shoulder of the kneeling Daniel. As the constables open the door of the cavern to thrust in their prisoner, they see the glaring eyes of the monsters. But Daniel becomes the first lion-tamer, and they lick his hand and fawn at his feet, and that night he sleeps with the shaggy mane of a wild beast for his pillow, while the king that night, sleepless in the palace, has on him the paw and teeth of a lion he cannot tame—the lion of a remorseful conscience.

THE ROYAL VISIT.

What a picture it would be for some artist, Darius, in the early dusk of morning, not waiting for footmen or chariot, hastening to the den, all flushed and nervous and in dishabille, and looking through the crevices of the cage to see what had become of his prime-minister! "What, no sound!" he says; "Daniel is surely devoured, and the lions are sleeping after their horrid meal, the bones of the poor man scattered across the floor of the cavern." With trembling voice Darius calls out, "Daniel!" No answer, for the prophet is yet in profound slumber. But a lion, more easily awakened, advances, and with hot breath blown through the crevice, seems angrily to demand the cause of this interruption, and then another wild beast lifts his mane from under Daniel's head, and the prophet, waking up, comes forth to report himself all unhurt and well.

DANIEL'S PATRIOTISM.

But our text stands us at Daniel's window open toward Jerusalem. Why in that direction open? Jerusalem was his native land, and all the pomp of his Babylonish successes could not make him forget it. He came there from Jerusalem at eighteen years of age, and he never visited it, though he lived to be eighty-five years. Yet when he wanted to arouse the deepest emotions and grandest aspirations of his heart he had his window open toward his native Jerusalem. There are many of you to-day who understand that without any exposition.

TOWARD HOME.

This is getting to be a nation of foreigners. They have come into all occupations and professions. They sit in all churches. It may be twenty years ago since you got your naturalization papers, and you may be thoroughly Americanized, but you can't forget the land of your birth, and your warmest sympathies go out toward it. Your windows are open toward Jerusalem. Your father and mother are buried there. It may have been a very humble home in which you were born, but your memory often plays around it, and you hope some day to go and see it—the hill, the tree, the brook, the house, the place so sacred, the door from which you started off with parental blessing to make your own way in the world; and God only knows how sometimes you have longed to see the familiar places of your childhood, and how in awful crises of life you would like to have caught a glimpse of the old wrinkled face that bent over you as you lay on the gentle lap twenty or forty or fifty years ago. You may have on this side the sea risen in fortune, and, like Daniel, have become great and may have come into prosperities which you never could have reached if you had stayed there, and you may have many windows to your house—bay windows and sky-light windows and windows of conservatory and windows on all sides—but you have at least one window open toward Jerusalem.

POST-OFFICE WINDOWS.

When the foreign steamer comes to the wharf you see the long line of sailors, with shouldered mail bags, coming down the planks, carrying as many letters as you might suppose would be enough for a year's correspondence, and this repeated again and again during the week. Multitudes of them are letters from home, and at all the post-offices of the land people will go to the window and anxiously ask for them, hundreds of thousands of persons finding that window of foreign mails the open window toward Jerusalem. Messages that say: "When are you coming home to see us? Brother has gone into the army. Sister is dead. Father and mother are getting very feeble. We are having a great struggle to get on here. Would you advise us to come to you, or will you come to us? All join in love, and hope to meet you, if not in this world, then in a better. Good by!"

THE EXILES.

Yes, yes; in all these cities, and amid the flowering western prairies, and on the slopes of the Pacific, and amid the Sierras, and on the banks of the lagoon, and on the ranches of Texas there is an uncounted multitude who, this hour, stand and sit and kneel with their windows open toward Jerusalem. Some of them played on the heather of the Scottish hills. Some of them were driven out by Irish famine. Some of them in early life drilled in the German army. Some of them were accustomed at Lyons or Marseilles or Paris to see on the street Victor Hugo and Gambetta. Some chased the chamois among the Alpine precipices. Some plucked the ripe clusters from Italian vineyard. Some lifted their faces under the midnight sun of Norway. It is no dishonor to our land that they remember the place of their nativity. Miscreants would they be if, while they have some of their windows open to take in the free air of America and the sunlight of an atmosphere which no kingly despot has ever breathed, they forgot sometime to open the windows toward Jerusalem.

No wonder that the son of the Swiss when far away from home, at hearing the national air of his own country sung, the malady of homesickness comes on him so powerfully as to cause his death. You have the example of the heroic Daniel of my text for keeping early memories fresh. Forget not the old folks at home. Write often, and if you have surplus of means and they a deficit, make practical contribution, and rejoice that America is bound to all the world by ties of sanguinity as is no other nation. We can doubt but it is appointed for the evangelization of all lands? What a stirring, melting, gelling theory that all the doors of all nations are open toward us, while our windows are open toward them!

AVENUE FOR SACRED INFLUENCE.

But Daniel in the text kept this port-hole his domestic fortress unclosed because Jerusalem was the capital of sacred influences. There had smoked the sacrifice. There was the Holy of Holies. There was the Ark of the Covenant. There stood the temple. We are all tempted to keep our windows open on the opposite side toward the world, that we may see and hear appropriate its advantages. What does it world say? What does the world think? What does the world do? Worshippers of the world instead of worshippers of God. Windows open toward Babylon. Windows open toward Constantinople. Windows open toward Athens. Windows open toward Sodom. Windows open toward the flats instead of windows open toward the hills. Sad mistake, for this world as a god like something I saw the other day

IN THE MUSEUM OF STRASBURG.

Germany—the figure of a virgin in wood and iron. The victim in olden time was brought there, and this figure would open its arms receive him, and once enfolded, the figure clothed with a hundred knives and lances upon him and then afterward let him drop one hundred and eighty feet sheer down. So the world embraces its idolaters, then closes upon them with many tortures, and then lets them drop forever down. The highest honor the world could confer was to make a man Roman emperor; but out of sixty-three emperors, it allowed only six to die peacefully in their beds.

The dominion of this world over multitudes illustrated by the names of coins of many countries. They have their pieces of money, which they call sovereigns and half sovereigns, crowns and half crowns, Napoleons and half Napoleons, Fredericks and double Fredericks, and ducats and Isabellinos, all of which names mean not much usefulness as dominion. The most of windows open toward the exchange, toward the salon of fashion, toward the god of this world. In olden times the length of the English yard was fixed by the length of the arm of King Henry I, and we are apt to measure things a variable standard and by the human arm in the great crises of life can give us no help. We need, like Daniel, to open our windows toward God and religion.

DANIEL'S ATTITUDE.

But, mark you, that good lion-tamer is standing at the window, but kneeling, while he looks out. Most photographs are taken of him in standing or sitting posture. I now remember but one picture of a man kneeling, and that was David Livingstone, who in the cause of God's civilization sacrificed himself; and in the heart of Africa his servant, Majwara, found him intent by the light of a candle, stuck on the top of a box, his head in hands upon the pillow, dead on his knees. But here is a great lion-tamer, living under the dash of the light, with his hair dishevelled of the breeze, praying. The fact is, that a man can see further on his knees than standing on tiptoe. Jerusalem is about five hundred and fifty statute miles from Babylon, and the vast Arabian Desert shifts its sands between them. Yet through it open window Daniel saw Jerusalem, saw all between it, saw beyond, saw time, saw eternity, saw earth, and saw heaven. Would you like to see the way through your sins to pardon, through your troubles to comfort, through temptation to rescue, through dire sickness to immortal health through night to day, through things terrestrial to things celestial, you will not see them till you take Daniel's posture. No cap of bone to the joints of the fingers, no cap of bone to the joint of the elbow, but cap of bone to the knees, because the God of the body was the God of the soul, an especial provision for those who want to pray, and physiological structure for h spiritual necessity in bidding us pray, and y, and pray.

n olden time the Earl of Westmoreland said had no need to pray, because he had enough us tenants on his estate to pray for him; but the prayers of the church universal amount to hing unless, like Daniel, we pray for our- ves. Oh, men and women, bounded on one e by Shadrach's red-hot furnace, and the e side by devouring lions, learn the secret courage and deliverance by looking at that ylonish window open toward the south-west! Oh," you say, "that is the direction of the abian Desert!" Yes; but on the other side the desert is God, is Christ, is Jerusalem, is ven.

HOW LACE IS MADE.

he Brussels lace is superior to all other lace, beautiful, so multiform, so expensive—four dred francs a pound. All the world seeks

Do you know how it is made? The sping is done in a dark room, the only light aded through a small aperture, and that light ing directly on the pattern. And the finest cimens of Christian character I have ever n or ever expect to see are those to be found ives all of whose windows have been dark- ed by bereavement and misfortune save one, under that one window prayer the inter- ing of divine workmanship went on until it fit to deck a throne, a celestial embroidery ich angels admired and God approved.

NEW JERUSALEM.

ut it is another Jerusalem toward which ve need to open our windows. The exiled ngelist of Ephesus saw it one day as the surf he Icarian sea foamed and splashed over the ilders at his feet, and his vision reminded me a wedding-day when the bride by sister and id was having garlands twisted for her hair e jewels strung for her neck just before she s her betrothed hand into the hand of her anced: "I, John, saw the Holy City, New usalem, coming down from God out of heaven arded as a bride adorned for her husband." ward that bridal Jerusalem are our windows ned?

Ve would do well to think more of heaven. is not a mere annex of earth. It is not a late outpost. As Jerusalem was the capital udah, and Babylon the capital of the Baby- nian monarchy, and London is the capital of at Britain, and Washington is the capital of own republic, the new Jerusalem is the cap- of the universe. The king lives there, and e royal family of the redeemed have their aces there, and there is a Congress of many ions and the Parliament of all the worlds. a, as Daniel had kindred in Jerusalem of m he often thought, though he had left ne when a very young man, perhaps father l mother and brothers and sisters still living, I was homesick to see them, and they be- ged to the high circles of royalty, Daniel self having royal blood in his veins, so we e in the new Jerusalem a great many kin- d, and we are sometimes homesick to see m, and they are all princes and princesses, hem the blood imperial, and we do well to p our windows open toward their eternal idence.

t is a joy for us to believe that while we are rested in them they are interested in us. ch thought of heaven makes one heavenly. e airs that blow through that open window charged with life, and sweep up to us arosas m gardens that never wither, under skies that er cloud, in a spring-tide that never termi- es. Compared with it all other heavens are d failures.

omer's heaven was an elysium which he de- bes as a plain at the end of the earth or be- th, with no snow nor rainfall, and the sun er goes down, and Rhadamanthus, the justest nen, rules. Hesiod's heaven is what he calls islands of the blest, in the midst of the ocean, ee times a year blooming with most exquisite vers, and the air is tinted with purple, while games and music and horse-races occupy the time. The Scandinavian's heaven was the hall of Walhalla, where the god Odin gave unending wine suppers to earthly heroes and heroines. The Mohammedan's heaven passes its disciples in over the bridge Al-Sirat, which is finer than a hair and sharper than a sword, and then they are let loose into a rôt of everlasting sensuality.

IDEAS OF HEAVEN.

The American aborigines look forward to a heaven of illimitable hunting-ground, partridge and deer and wild duck more than plentiful, and the hounds never off the scent, and the guns never missing fire. But the geographer has followed the earth round, and found no Homer's elysium. Voyagers have traversed the deep in all directions, and found no Hesiod's islands of the blest. The Mohammedan's celestial debauchery and the Indian's eternal hunting-ground for vast multitudes have no charm. But here rolls in

THE BIBLE HEAVEN.

No more night—that is, no wide separation. No more night—that is, no insomnia. No more tears—that is, no heart-break. No more pain—that is, dismissal of lancet and bitter draught and miasma and banishment of neuralgias and catalepsies and consumptions. All colors in the wall except gloomy black; all the music in the major-key, because celebrative and jubilant. River, crystalline, gate crystalline, and skies crystalline, because everything is clear and without doubt. White robes, and that means sinlessness. Vials full of odors, and that means pure regale- ment of the senses. Rainbow, and that means the storm is over. Marriage supper, and that means gladdest festivity. Twelve manner of fruits, and that means luscious and unending variety. Harp, trumpet, grand march, anthem, amen, and hallelujah in the same orchestra. Choral meeting solo, and overture meeting anti- phon, and strophe joining dithyramb, as they roll into the ocean of doxologies. And you and I may have all that, and have it forever through Christ, if we will let Him with the blood of one wounded hand rub out our sin and with the other wounded hand swing open the shining portals.

Day and night keep your window open toward that Jerusalem. Sing about it. Pray about it. Think about it. Talk about it. Dream about it. Do not be inconsolable about your friends who have gone into it. Do not worry if something in your heart indicates that you are not far off from its ecstasies. Do not think that when a Christian dies he stops, for he goes on.

An ingenious man has taken the heavenly furlongs as mentioned in Revelation, and has calculated that there will be in heaven one hundred rooms sixteen feet square for each ascending soul, though this world should lose a hundred millions yearly. But all will be ours, for they are family rooms; and as no room in your house is too good for your children, so all the rooms of all the palaces of the heavenly Jerusalem will be free to God's children, and even the throne room will not be denied, and you may run up the steps of the throne, and put your hand on the side of the throne, and sit down beside the king according to the promise, "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne."

But you cannot go in except as conquerors. Many years ago the Turks and Christians were in battle, and the Christians were defeated, and with their commander Stephen fled toward a fortress where the mother of this commander was staying. When she saw her son and his army in disgraceful retreat, she had the gates of the fortress rolled shut, and then from the top of the battlement cried out to her son, "You cannot enter here except as conqueror!" Then Stephen rallied his forces and resumed the battle and gained the day, twenty thousand driving back two hundred thousand. For those who are defeated in the battle with sin and death and hell nothing but shame and contempt; but for those who gain the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ the gates of the New Jerusalem will hoist, and there shall be an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord, toward which you do well to keep your windows open.

ANECDOTES RELATED BY MR. NOBLE, The Gospel Temperance Evangelist.

A Man Came into Hoxton Hall, London, one night some three years ago, under the influence of drink. He was in the hilarious, boisterous stage of intoxication, and made a disturbance. The cry was raised: "Turn him out; turn him out!" I never allow that at any of my meetings, so I kept the man. "Wot's a-going on here?" he asked. "A Gospel temperance meeting," was the reply. "I'm your man, then," he said; "give us a blue ribbon." The man seemed to understand what he was doing, and as, after some talk with him, to impress him with the importance of the step he was taking, he still insisted on signing the pledge and wearing the ribbon, he was duly received. One Sabbath evening, six months afterward, the same man came around after the meeting to the side wings, and asked to speak to me. He assured me he had kept his pledge, but he was under deep religious conviction and in much distress of mind. He wanted to tell me a secret. I said, "I'm not a priest; but if you tell me perhaps I can help you." It seemed that the man had stolen a wheelbarrow nine years before, and that wheelbarrow lay like a heavy load on his conscience. I was much perplexed for a time. I said, "If you can find the man who owned the wheelbarrow, would you pay him its money-value?" He said: "That I would; but I do not know where he is." I said, "Will you put the money away ready for him and never touch it?" He said, "I will. Do you think that will settle it?" I said, "Yes, if you sincerely repent." The man burst into tears, and falling upon his knees on the stage gave thanks to God. I have often met him since then, and I ask him if he has found the owner of the wheelbarrow. He has searched for him everywhere with the money ready, but has not seen him. I believe if that man meets him in heaven he will want to make restitution for that wheelbarrow in some way.

A Backslider's Restoration.—When I was a lad I was acquainted with Mary B., a Sunday-school teacher, an active Christian worker and the daughter of pious and very respectable parents. She was one of those young ladies who are always ready for work in a church society, and had no idea of fatigue. Somehow she became acquainted with a gay young man, and was fascinated by him and married him. I lost sight of her, and I think her family did too, for they never spoke of her. A few months ago we had a great Blue Ribbon demonstration at Hoxton Hall, and four thousand members walked in procession. A miserable-looking woman was in the crowd of lookers-on, who was gazing intently at me. I could feel the influence of her penetrating look even when I did not look at her, and whenever I did turn in her direction she was still regarding me earnestly. At last her face seemed to revive some memory in my mind, and I went and spoke to her. It was Mary B. She had seen my name on the posters, and being curious to know if I was the same William Noble she used to know, she had come to satisfy herself. She told me a sad story. Her husband was dead. He had drunk himself to death, and had left her in abject poverty; and, worse than that, she too had contracted the drinking habit, and had become an habitual drunkard. I persuaded her to sign the pledge, and prayed with her to God to heal her backsliding. She knew she would have a hard struggle, but she went away looking to the Lord for strength. I saw her several times afterward, and she was still holding fast. Just before I came to America I met a business man of my acquaintance, who asked me if I had heard of Mary B. He told me she had gone back to her family, and had resumed her Christian work with redoubled activity. She has been to visit my wife, and is thoroughly changed in heart and life.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Lover of the Whiskey Bottle.—Mr. Ferrie said at a recent meeting: "I remember when a friend and I were in the Highlands we were sitting enjoying a glass of whiskey, when I said: 'I am afraid you are going to let this drink master you,' fearing all the time lest it would master myself. 'Oh,' he rejoined, 'there is no fear of that; whenever I feel it is going to master me, I will give it up.' But it is five years since that, and the devil and the drink are fast taking my friend to ruin. Thank God, that Jesus Christ, by manifesting his love toward us, has come to destroy the works of the devil."

A Dying Scottish Chief.—The Rev. Mr. Thornton said: "At the battle of Prestonpans the clan M'Gregor was engaged in a deadly conflict, when their chief fell. When his men saw their leader fall, they halted in the fight, but the chief, raising himself on his elbow, exclaimed: 'Fight on, my children; I am not dead, I am looking to see you do your duty.' And, dear friends, if we, as soldiers of the cross, under Christ, our Divine Chief, are engaged in the conflict of a Christian life, let us go forth fighting bravely the good fight of faith, ever knowing that our Leader is not dead, but is watching us to see if we are faithful in His cause."

A Star in a Dark Sky.—A Minister said: "There is a young man in Dundee who is now preaching the Gospel there. When a lad he was a very sinful, wicked boy. He was brought into a meeting, and was led to see Jesus as his Saviour. His mother was a very drunken, careless woman, who put him out to work in a mill when other boys were at school. After he was converted this little fellow used to gather his companions around him and tell them of Jesus. His mother was very cruel to him, and did not give him enough food or clothing, that she might spend the money on drink. He was just telling us a fortnight ago that it was six years since he was brought to a saving knowledge of the truth in the midst of all his poverty and wretchedness."

A Lamb Added to the Fold.—Mr. J. G. Forbes remarked: "I spoke to a little boy in Mr. Hammond's meeting one Saturday, who was weeping very bitterly on account of his sins. I asked him what was the matter, and he said he wanted to love Jesus and be saved. I asked him what he wanted to be saved from. 'From my sins,' he said, and then he told me how wicked he felt in not loving Jesus. I tried to tell him how much Jesus had suffered for him, and how willing He was to save him. We then prayed together, and before leaving the meeting I believe that boy had truly accepted Christ. I may say I never got more satisfactory answers from any one, and let no one dishonor God by saying children cannot be converted."

A Scotch Atheist's Eyes Opened.—The Rev. Mr. Daly remarked: "I recently heard of a man, an atheist, who used to indulge in drinking bouts, as he called them, which lasted six weeks, about three times a year. One night a friend who had promised to join him in one of those bouts, kept his appointment, when the toper said: 'I think we have had enough of that. Let us go down to James Morrison Street Hall and sign the pledge.' He went down, and told a worker for what purpose he had come, when the worker said: 'Signing the pledge will do you no good unless you give yourself to the Lord Jesus first.' The man went away very much startled, he had never thought of that; but he came back in three days, and gave himself to Christ. He now wishes to join my church, and he is pleading with others to come to Jesus."

Afraid of Going Mad.—The Rev. Mr. Edgar said: "There was an awakened man in our meeting last night, and I think I never saw one so truly in earnest to be saved. I was down among the people in the after meeting when the man said: 'Will you speak with me for a moment?' By all means," I said, and led him into another room. Putting his hands over his breast as if in terrible pain, and staring at me with large, wild-looking eyes, he exclaimed: 'I think I shall go mad!' I saw he was very much excited, and putting my hand on his shoulder, I answered: 'Be seated, my friend. Do you want to be saved?' 'Yes,' he said. I opened my Bible and read John 3:16. After I had spoken to him for a little, he drew nearer, and still staring at me with those wild eyes, he inquired: 'Is it only trusting?' That man's fearful apprehension ceased as soon as he found peace through simple faith in the Lord Jesus Christ."

Made Poorer Through a Fortune.—Dr. Buswell remarked: "I remember a dear friend of mine telling the following incident at a meeting: He said: 'In the church to which I belong there was a member who used to give more money than any one else in the church. She was not wealthy, by any means, but she gave what she could. By-and-by she inherited some money, and from that time she did not give even as much as she formerly did. One of the deacons had the courage to go to her house and ask the reason of this; to which she replied: 'Well, you see, sir, it was not worth keeping then, it was so very little.' Dear friends, let us remember when we consecrate ourselves to the Lord that not only ourselves, but our money, much or little, and all we have, belong entirely to Him; that we are simply stewards in the hand of the Lord."

What Made Johnnie Impatient.—Mr. Dunn said at one of Mr. Hammond's recent meetings in Glasgow: "Fourteen years ago I was conducting meetings for the young. One night a little boy seated close to the end of the platform while I was speaking pulled my coat, and said, 'When are you going to be done preaching?' I took no notice of him at first, but after I closed this boy, who had been so impatient for the close of my address, rose, and coming round to the front of the platform, knelt down, and in earnest tones prayed, 'O God, save my poor drunken mother.' He could get no further, for the words seemed to choke him; but after a moment's silence he continued, 'O God, save my poor drunken father, for Jesus' sake, Amen.' Every one in the hall was weeping. I saw a woman rise and give a baby to a friend. She came slowly up the hall, and, standing before the platform, she said: 'Did you hear that boy pray, sir? He is my son Johnnie. Can Jesus save me? For I am a poor drunken woman.' I led her to the inquiry-meeting, where I found her husband weeping as if he would break his heart. I took their son Johnnie, and seating him beside them I told him to speak to them."

A MARTYR FIRE IN AFRICA. First Martyrs at Uganda.

THE Church Missionary Society reports the receipt of a long and important letter from Mr. Mackay, of the Nyanza mission, giving the history of the mission up to May 20th. It was brought across the Lake by himself in the Eleanor, and forwarded from Msalala in the middle of June. It tells a remarkable story of chequered fortune, of imminent peril, and merciful deliverance, of expected expulsion and restored favor. Almost the last scene is the young king, Mwanga, receiving instructions privately from Mr. Mackay; but we deeply regret to say that at the height of the hostile influence of certain chiefs three of the baptized Waganda youths were cruelly put to death.

The suspicions of the king were in the first instance aroused by rumors of white men with a large force being in Busoga, and that was only the beginning of a series of absurd accusations; until, at the end of January, Mr. Mackay, having obtained permission to cross the Lake again, was met on his way to the port by an armed force and compelled to return to the capital, while some of the Christian lads who were accompanying him to the boat were arrested on the charge of attempting to leave Uganda. Being unable to get at the king, Mr. Mackay and Mr. Ashe appealed to the Katikiro (chief judge and virtual prime minister), but were ejected from his presence with violence and insult. A judicious present of cloth appeased both Mwanga and the Katikiro, and earnest efforts were made to obtain the release of the arrested boys. Th of them were liberated; but two of these were reported as follows:

"That they had been taken with Kakumba a Ashe's boy, as also Serwanga, a tall, fine fellow baptized lad whom Mujasi (the leader of a hostile party) had caught, and Duta's wife Sasi and her child, to a place outside the capital. That Serwanga, Kakumba, and Ashe's boy were then bound alive to a scaffolding, under which a fire was made, and they were slowly

BURNED TO DEATH.
Mujasi and his men mocked them, and then they pray now if Isa Masiya (Jesus Christ) would rescue them from his hands. The boys sang Killa siku tunsifu (the hymn 'Daily, do sing the praises')."

This distressing information was afterwards confirmed by other testimony. Mr. Mackay anxious not to overstate the facts. He observed that it was not a case of "religious persecution" pure and simple. It was a burst of fire against the white men and any who consorted with them. Still the fact that the lads were taunted with their faith in the Lord Jesus Christ and died singing his praises, may justly claim for them the right to a place in the noble array of martyrs. Let us thank God for the witness He enabled them to bear, and pray that their faithfulness may be given to the rest of the converts.

DR. TALMAGE ON THE ABDUCTION CASE.

AT his Friday evening lecture on September 25th Dr. Talmage referred to the disclosures of moral rottenness in England recently made by the Pall Mall Gazette, and to the prosecutor which the editor of that journal is now ungoing. In the course of his remarks he said: "Mr. Stead, editor of the Pall Mall Gazette London, is now on trial for the part he took in starting Europe, America, and the world in a crusade against crime. He is being made a martyr by affluent vice and the stupidity of so good people who would rather have an unkill the patient than have the bandage removed before treatment. I arrived at Charing Cross Station, London, the afternoon

THE EARTHQUAKE OF EXCITEMENT started. The newspapers had not been more than half an hour. The need of such movement there will be doubted by no one v at any hour of the evening walks London Street or Piccadilly. The need of a correspond movement in America no one will doubt v walks upper Broadway at night, or any other the great thoroughfares. The attempt of Pall Mall Gazette made every man and woman in England a detective, and gave the might set-back to abomination it has received in a quarter of a century. Highest compliment to newspaper press that it should have inaugurated the movement! If ministers of religion speak men say that it is profession. If reformat organizations protest, men say that it is pharisaical. But when a greater secular newspaper comes out with facts that make the blood of respectable classes curdle with horror, the movement cannot be coughed down or silenced.

"There is a wide habit among many people denouncing the daily newspaper press as a purveyor of evil. I declare that it is the mightiest threat against wrong in high places and the greatest preventive of crime among the people to-day is not their conscience, not the Church, not the law of the land, through which crevices they may squirm, but newspaper disclosure of dishonesty and fraud and hypocrisy. The newspapers alone have the credit of bringing to light and condemnation Credit Mobilier and Tweed villainy, and fifty other evil schemes on this side the Atlantic, and now the Armageddon against the social evil on the other side the Atlantic. Against the social evil some paper do the work in America that the Pall Mall Gazette is doing in Europe. Scarification will come upon it and multitudes will write: 'Stop my paper!' and men without any Christian qualification except caution will deplore the undertaking; but God will be on its side, and that means final triumph.

"A hundred thousand people with banners and music assembled in Hyde Park to express their sympathy with the reformatory movement started by Mr. Stead, and there are a million people in America who would back up such moral heroism. When invited to speak for America at that meeting in Hyde Park, in my utter of regret that I could not come I said what I say now—the curse of modern society is the millionaire libertines. Society takes the small offenders over its knee and gives them old-fashioned chastisement; but after a man reaches a certain height in wealth and political honor he is allowed a special system of morals, and the Ten Commandments are abrogated. All honor to those who rub off the disguise! God is no respecter of persons, and what is right for one is right for all, and what is wrong for one is wrong for all. Depend upon it, the lower classes will not be purified till the upper classes are purified. Sin in high and honorable place is a compliment to iniquity, and people are imitative, and they copy, and if they cannot have as fine horses and is brilliant turn-outs, they will at any rate have the license and the dissipation of those more favored of fortune. I was told in London that nearly all the previous had been hushed up because if a case were taken into the courts it would bring lords, and dukes, and marquises, and members of Parliament or some of the royal family into troublesome conspicuity. But until Grosvenor Place and West End are reformed the common quarters of London cannot be fumigated. Wrong permitted in a palace is license to wrong at Shoreditch or St. Giles.

"I know that there is an attempt in some quarters to relax the moralities and suit the heory of what is right or wrong to popular habits. But the world has never seen any system of morals worth the paper it was written upon except the Bible. Conform society to that standard and all prosperities will attend. Conform society to another standard and blasting disintegration will be the consequence. As exposure of vices must precede their cure, I say turn on all the lights. Don't let us try with pieces of court-plaster to heal wounds that need to be probed. Let there be a glare of conspicuity to all wrong-doing. Let all the morning, and all the evening, and all the weekly newspapers publish it. Let it be pilloried in the face of the noonday. Let neither threat nor bribe hinder. If Mr. Stead goes to penitentiary—and he probably will—he goes there as certainly in the service of God as any martyr ever went to the stake. Such a man cannot be put down, for he stands for decency and home and right. His position will be sublime for all time and all eternity. It is too late to shackle the printing-press either in England or America, and most certainly so when it fights in defence of the purity of the domestic circle. An elegant mode of handling sin will never overcome it. You cannot drive back this host of sin with toy pistols. The evil must with iron hand be clutched and strangled—stout and long-continued blows, not with wooden mallets, but with thunderbolts for sledge-hammers.

"We must arouse public opinion until State, city and national officials shall no longer dare to neglect the execution of the laws. We have enough enactments now to revolutionize our cities and strike terror through the places of abandonment. Tracts distributed will not do it. Bibles printed will not accomplish it. City missionaries have not power for the work. But that all these evils will be quelled is as certain as that God is stronger than the devil. And let me say, by way of encouragement, that the right side will be the winning side. It does sometimes seem as if our cities were to be overrun with crime, and that all the sanctities are to be abolished. But while the agencies of evil are busier than ever, the agencies of good were never so potent. If the coral insects can lift an island, our feeble efforts under God may raise a breakwater that will dash back the surges of abomination."

PROPHETIC LECTURES IN HAMILTON, CANADA.

(From the Hamilton Spectator, Monday, September 28.)

Signs and Omens Which are Held to be Fulfillments of Scripture Prophecy, and to Point to Christ's Second Coming.

REV. MR. BAXTER, of London, Eng., electrified large audiences in the opera house yesterday morning, afternoon, and evening by startling predictions of stupendous events that are soon to happen. He is a large, muscular man, with a full, close-cropped beard, a low forehead, and a leonine head of hair. He speaks in a crisp, cool way, and with little vehemence. The great fact that he comes to announce is the second coming of Christ, which he declares is close at hand. But it is to be heralded by ever so many signs and wonders, as revealed in the Bible, and Mr. Baxter is one of those who are sure that they read in the great events that have recently been and are happening the signs that are described in divine revelation.

His remarks in the evening were based on Rev. 16: 12-16, the passage in which the woes of the sixth vial are described. Mr. Baxter confidently predicted that Christ will come to judge the nations in 1896, and that the millennium will then begin. Before this, however, a great many great and terrible events will happen, as revealed in Scripture. There will be an almost universal falling away from Christianity, a general lapsing into infidelity and sin (II Thess. 2).

THE MAN OF SIN

will then arise in the East, probably in Syria. He will become later on practically the monarch of the world, and kings will be his tributaries. All other despots who have caused humanity trouble are mere children in power and models of virtue and holiness as compared to him. In him all the vices of humanity will meet and be personified. He is "the little horn" mentioned in Daniel. He will enter into a compact with the Jews to promote the settlement of Palestine and defend them from their enemies. This will occur probably in 1899, seven years before Christ's coming. The Man of Sin will seat himself in the temple of God at Jerusalem as God, and all who refuse to worship him as such will be decapitated. This man, the Antichrist of revelation, will certainly be a Napoleon, and will probably be Prince Jerome Napoleon, the present head of the Bonapartist party. (The principal reason for this belief is a similarity between the names Napoleon and Apollyon.) He will become master of the world principally through the instrumentality and aid of the ultramontane Papists, the Socialists, Nihilists, and Red Republicans of Europe.

All leading commentators agree that we are now living

UNDER THE SIXTH VIAL.

The river Euphrates mentioned in the text means the Turkish Empire, and the "drying up" of the Euphrates means the dismemberment of that empire. The "ten horns" mentioned in the seventeenth chapter of Revelation mean the ten kingdoms which are to come under the dominance of the Beast, or the Antichrist. These ten kingdoms are also predicted in the ten-toed iron legs of the human image seen by Daniel in a vision. The two iron legs correspond with the Roman Empire's eastern and western divisions, each being subdivided into five kingdoms, in accordance with the five toes on each leg. The five western divisions will be Britain, France, Spain, Italy, and Austria, and the five eastern kingdoms Greece (enlarged), Turkey (reduced), Syria (separated from Turkey), Egypt, Bulgaria, and other Danubian provinces. Britain will be separated from Ireland, which never formed part of the Roman Empire. These ten kingdoms will be organically united—ten horns on one head—into a fedracy against Germany and Russia.

One way in which the date of the end of the world is verified is by discovering the exact time of the treading down of the holy city of Jerusalem, for we have it in Revelation 11: 2 that the end would be 1260 years after this event. The capture of Jerusalem by the Mohammedans happened in A.D. 636, and 1260 years added to that makes 1896. Also the 6000 years are computed to end in 1896, because Christ's birth was in 4104. The millennium will then begin. In the millennium a supplement to the Bible will become necessary, in which all the great events of the present dispensation will be accurately described.

The three unclean spirits mentioned in Rev. 16 were described as spiritualism, revolutionary democracy, and popish ultramontanism and Mahomedan fanaticism. He pictured to his hearers the horrors of the seventh vial, the contents of which are very soon to be poured out on the earth, and described four angels as standing on the four corners of the earth holding back the tornadoes of terrors which will soon swoop upon poor humanity. Another angel, according to Revelation 7, he said, is now busily engaged in imprinting on the foreheads of such as will be saved, in order to distinguish them from those who will not enjoy that privilege.

The first phase of Christ's second coming will be purely peaceful and joyous. He will come as a bridegroom, and the elect among the saints—144,000 in number—will be suddenly caught up into the air to meet Him. After that there will be a great revival of religion throughout the world. Christ will remain with His purified saints in the aerial heavens for three and a half years, during which time there will be great tribulations on the earth. Then He will descend to the earth, and on the plains of Armageddon His armies will do battle with the hosts of Antichrist, and Antichrist will be overthrown and Satan bound. Then Christ will reign with His saints over the earth for

ONE THOUSAND YEARS.

Though only a few will remain on the earth after the wicked are destroyed, the population will multiply rapidly, and may become two hundred times larger than at present. Wars will cease, and there will be no pestilence or famine, and human life will be greatly lengthened, and people will die of old age, tranquilly and painlessly. During the millennium universal unrestrained exchange of products will prevail among the nations. There will be the same divisions in society as now, for social equality is impossible; but there will be a more equitable distribution of wealth, and no poverty will pinch the people. Christ will rule in person, and will be sole ruler. He will rule with a rod of iron—that is, His sway will be firm and not like the vacillating, unstable governments of to-day.

The lecturer closed his remarks by an earnest exhortation in the usual fervent evangelistic vein. He drew a most graphic picture of the day of judgment, and dwelt principally on the punishment of the wicked. He is none of your modern preachers with new-fangled ideas about the great problem of existence, and who are almost willing to meet science half way. He is one of the good old sort who know not "sheol" and "hades," but believe in a concrete hell of fire and brimstone. Here are his words on this important subject: "There stretches the lake of fire which will burn forever. The crackling and roaring of its flames can be heard for many miles. And all the liars, and thieves, and swearers, and impure persons, and murderers, and others who have violated God's law and have refused to accept Christ, will be bound together in bundles and thrown into that lake of fire, there to writhe and wail and gnash their teeth forever and ever."

The thanks of the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are tendered to the subscribers who have expressed a wish to introduce the paper to their friends. As in former years, a concession in terms will be made in order to render this kindly project as light a burden as circumstances will permit. Any subscriber may have THE CHRISTIAN HERALD mailed every week to any address in the United States or Canada, from Oct. 1st to the end of the year, by sending twenty-five cents to this office. The large quantity of direct Christian teaching contained in fourteen numbers of the paper has only to be realized in order to recommend this low offer to the acceptance of all Christians desiring the increased circulation of religious literature. The publishers are encouraged to make the concession by the large response a similar offer brought last year, and by the letters of hearty thanks which were afterward received from persons too poor to subscribe for themselves, and from unconverted persons to whom God had blessed his personal.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Treasury Statement Issued Last Week shows that there was a reduction in the public debt during the month of September of twelve and three quarter millions of dollars. Of this seven and a half millions would be needed to pay the interest due October 1st, leaving an actual net reduction of five millions and a quarter. The net gold balance has increased during the month from $126,371,927 to $133,113,927, or six and three-quarter millions, and the net balance of United States notes from $24,793,656 to $27,944,332, or something more than $3,000,000. The net silver balance, meanwhile, has increased but $1,200,000. That the increase was comparatively small was probably due to the Secretary's action in withdrawing the one and two dollar bills from circulation.

The Massachusetts Republican Convention assembled at Springfield on September 30th. It re-nominated the old ticket with the exception of one official, who was legally disqualified. Senator Hoar, who was permanent chairman, followed Senator Sherman's example in making the charge of Southern intimidation of the Republican negro vote the prominent campaign issue. Senator Hoar then proceeded to denounce the national administration and any attempt to reduce the tariff. He claimed credit for the Republican party in having "settled peacefully a disputed succession to the Presidency," so it may be supposed he still adheres to the opinions he held when he was a member of the Electoral Commission. Mr. Hoar expressed the belief that the remedy for the suppression of the negro vote lay with the colored race themselves. Apparently that idea is held by colored men, too, though not precisely as Senator Hoar thinks. A few days ago the Rev. G. W. F. Bryant, the most prominent colored man in Nashville, Tenn., addressing a mixed assembly, said: "We are no longer the wards of any political party; we have paid the last debt of gratitude; we stand as untrammelled free men, and I tell you that the party which recognizes our rights, our manhood, our privileges as citizens, will get our votes. We will cling to those who treat us best." The platform adopted by the Convention demanded a national bankruptcy law, the "suspension of the over-valued silver dollar," and the extension of the principle of the Civil Service act.

The Prohibitionists of New York are Resolved to have no dealings with either the Republican or Democratic parties. A prominent member of the party writes us that they "are determined to labor, pray, and educate until the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages is entirely prohibited, and the Government is in the hands of a party that will enforce the prohibition." They are, of course, aware that their proceeding will imperil the success of the Republican ticket, which probably all of them would prefer to see elected rather than the Democratic ticket; but they believe that only by holding together and casting a solid vote, determined by the liquor question only, is there any prospect of success. The Republicans have, however, succeeded in capturing the Mugwump vote, which will bring a large accession to their ranks. It is significant that this achievement has been effected by the nominations alone. The platform was offensive to the Independents, especially on the questions of the civil service and revenue reform. The noticeable increase of the Independent vote is an encouraging sign of the times; it may lead both parties to exercise greater vigilance in the selection of candidates of good moral character.

Ten Mormon Polygamists were Tried Last week and convicted. The most important of these was John Nicholson, editor of the Deseret News and one of the prominent fanatics in the Mormon Church. Nicholson has been particularly bitter in his paper against persons pleading guilty and promising to live within the law. He pleaded not guilty to the indictment, but at the trial went upon the stand and testified that he was married to two women. The jury found him guilty. Alfred Best, charged with having three wives, testified to that fact, and was convicted. Emil Olsen followed the same course, and met with a like fate. In each case sentence was deferred. Of the ten men on trial four pleaded guilty and promised to live within the law, paying their fines. A great many polygamists in southern Utah have taken their families and moved into north-western Mexico.

A Riotous Demonstration in Montreal was evoked on September 28th by the order for compulsory vaccination. The French citizens are violently opposed to the practice, and having heard that they would be forced to submit to it, a crowd, numbering about five hundred men and boys, assembled to protest. There was a delay in summoning the police, and the mob, being without control, spread itself over the city, breaking windows and demolishing the stores where vaccine was kept. The following day order was restored, and the militia were called out to repress future outbreaks. Fears were entertained that there would be trouble on Saturday, and the military were kept in readiness; but the day passed peaceably. Race prejudice and religious differences are believed to be the chief causes of the tumult. Last week was the worst yet in the death-rate, being three hundred and twenty-one in the city and eighty in the suburbs. The epidemic is now spreading rapidly in the villages on the south side of the river.

The Situation in South-eastern Europe is Described by the London Times as "electric." It says that a very small spark will precipitate an explosion. A diplomatic conference will be held this week in Constantinople, to endeavor to arrange a pacific solution of the difficulty. In Russia, Austria, and Turkey extensive preparations are being made for war. Predictions of all kinds are being made by European diplomats and journalists, but they are for the most part intensely sombre. The only point on which they are agreed is that there are strong probabilities of Turkey losing a large part of her European territory. Russia, Austria, Greece, and Servia are all clamoring for shares, and the prospect of a peaceful settlement is meagre. The correspondent of the New York Times, describing the origin of the difficulty, tells a curious story. He declares that the late Secretary of State in Russia, Count Ignatieff, and the Pan-Slavs prepared the whole mine. They got everything ready for a revolution next spring, which was to be started by the simultaneous seizure and dethronement of Prince Alexander at Sophia, and Prince Milan at Belgrade, and the union of both the Bulgarians, Servia, and Macedonia, under the Serbian pretender, Peter Karagiorgevs. But the Russian intriguers were unable to control the conspiracy they had started. It was revealed by Karaveloff to Prince Alexander, who put himself at the head of the movement, sprung the mine prematurely, and tricked Russia. He concludes by saying that he finds everywhere prevalent "the belief that the time is at hand for a general break-up of the Ottoman Empire, involving a bloody scramble for loot, so that Europe seems to-day to stand on the very threshold of a vast convulsion." Present indications are that interference on the part of Russia will unite against her Germany, Austria, Turkey, and Italy.

A Renewal of Irish Outrages is Setting in. In spite of Mr. Parnell's earnest appeal, boycotting has attained a pitch never before witnessed. One league journal publishes exultingly every day a column or more of notices of men and women to be thus cut off from social intercourse. Nearly all of them are accompanied with violence; but the culminating point is reached when the maids and women of boycotted men's families are beaten and insulted, their hair cut off, and the like; and most especially so when the widow of Morgan O'Connell, the nephew of the famous liberator, is boycotted on her farm near Kildystar, and she and her household really almost starved. On Friday they were not allowed to get the absolute necessities of life. They have to send more than twenty miles to purchase the commonest articles for their daily use. This oppression of women as well as men is going on at a time when Mr. Parnell is trying to convince Parliament and the English nation that the Irish are fitted to govern themselves, and when the government is trying to manage Ireland without the Crimes Act.

The Official Report on the Fall of Khartoum was published last week by the British Government. It was written by Colonel Kitchener. He attributes the disaster to the starved condition of the troops and the desertion of their posts by the native contingent. The Arabs, the Colonel says, entered the city by the Boori gate, which was not defended. He acquits Farag of the charge of treachery which has heretofore been made against him. It will be remembered that Farag was accused of having allowed the Mahdi's troops to enter the city and of having withdrawn the force under his control from the point of attack.

The Earl of Shaftesbury Died on Thursday evening, October 1st. A cable message to the New York Herald says: "His last moments were of a most peaceful character, and up to the end he retained consciousness, and conversed with the utmost sensibility. He expected his death, and his gentleness to his children in the last hour was most touching. On the morning of his death Lord Shaftesbury dictated two letters to his daughters. The successor to the good earl's title has inherited his father's benevolence." English newspapers of every shade of politics published appreciative articles deploring the death of the venerable earl. He was never a politician in the party sense of the word. His efforts in the Legislature were directed to the attainment of philanthropic objects, chiefly designed to protect the working-classes and the poor from the oppression and rapacity of the rich. He was also actively engaged in promoting private enterprises in the interest of the poor. Not long ago the street-venders of London presented him with the most handsome donkey in the city as a mark of their gratitude and esteem.

Mrs. Baxter Preached at the Brooklyn Tabernacle on Sunday evening last to an immense congregation, which filled the vast edifice almost to suffocation. All the aisles and corridors were crowded, and hundreds went away before the service commenced, unable to obtain admission. Mrs. Baxter's discourse was in her usual simple, unpretending style, and was listened to with rapt attention. Her text was "The Lord is my Shepherd" (Ps. 23: 1). With marvellous pathos and eloquence she urged her hearers to trust in Christ for salvation for the soul and healing for the body. The Rev. M. Baxter was preaching at Hamilton, Ontario, Canada, last week to large audiences. A report of one of his lectures on prophecy, copied from a local journal, appears on page 647 of this number.

The New Building of the Young Men's Christian Association in Brooklyn, N. Y., was formally dedicated last week. The edifice has been erected by the trustees of the will of the late Frederick Marquand, Esq., and cost $150,000. That sum was given on condition that the same amount should be raised for an endowment fund, and the stipulation has been fulfilled. On Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday of last week public services were held, in which Dr. Talmage, Dr. Cuyler, Dr. Behrends, Dr. Bancroft, and several other clergymen of the various denominations in the city took part. The building fronts on three streets: Fulton Street, Bond Street, and Hanover Place. Besides the large hall, which has a seating capacity of thirteen hundred and eighteen, it contains a library of upward of six thousand volumes, a reading-room supplied with newspapers and magazines, hot-water, shower, sponge, and swimming baths, one of the finest gymnasiums in the country, and a handsomely furnished parlor and reception-room. The Brooklyn young men are to be congratulated on their magnificent home, which it is hoped will be a source of attraction to young men who have not hitherto been brought under Christian influences.

Dr. George F. Pentecost, of the Tompkins Avenue Church, Brooklyn, commenced last Sunday another series of afternoon services in the Academy of Music in that city. The services he held there last year were a source of much blessing, and many souls were converted. It is estimated that there are fifty thousand young men in Brooklyn who do not attend any church. Last year many of these were induced to go to Dr. Pentecost's services, and not a few of them were brought to Christ. Dr. Pentecost and his friends have been at great pains to render the services attractive by providing excellent music, and in other ways. The expenses, which are considerable, are defrayed by generous friends in the Tompkins Avenue Church, and there are no collections taken up at the Academy.

Bishop William Taylor Writes that he is establishing his first station in Africa. He and his party left St. Paul de Loanda late in May, and took up their journey inland. The bishop wrote from Nhangapepe, which is about three hundred miles from Loanda, under date of June 19th, saying that he and half a dozen of the party had arrived at that point, and were preparing a settlement. It would, he thought, become an important station. He has obtained a tract of land for a farm. It is good, rich soil, and the two thousand acres will easily furnish food for the missionary families. The country, however, is almost destitute of wood, and he will find it necessary to build or buy a stone house at a cost of about $900. There is a large population about the station, and "we can preach," says the bishop, "to one hundred to one thousand people daily." He adds: "We must advance without further delay. This is our first inland station, and must be occupied first." The bishop hopes to settle all his present force within four months.

An Unsettled Boundary Line, which is the subject of dispute between our Government and that of Great Britain, will have to be defined at an early date to avert unpleasantness. A telegram sent from Ottawa on September 28th says that the recent discovery of gold in the vicinity of the imaginary boundary line dividing British Columbia from Alaska has led the people of that province once more to press their claims on the Dominion Government to have the boundary definitely determined. It is represented that unless this is done serious complications may arise, as it is impossible at present for those locating mining claims to ascertain whether they are in British or United States territory. The same difficulty is often experienced as to the boundary line between the church and the world, and often by a similar cause. Young men professing Christianity, yet eager in their pursuit of wealth, often find themselves in positions in which neither they nor their friends are able easily to decide whether their allegiance is given to God or the world. Christ Himself, however, furnished a test which sharply defines the boundary line (Luke 14: 26, 27).

A Wife's Devotion to a Criminal Husband was pathetically manifested in Virginia recently. On September 24th a young lady, evidently refined and well-educated, was arraigned for burglary, and, pleading guilty, was sentenced to five years in the penitentiary. She was clad in male attire, and her sex was unsuspected. It was, however, discovered in the prison, and then she explained her conduct. She had been married in Philadelphia, but her husband, being in embarrassed circumstances, deserted her. She sought him everywhere, and "at last," she said, "I heard that he was in Richmond and in prison. I came on to Richmond, passing through Washington, where I put on male attire. When I found that my husband was in jail I set to work to know how I could get to him. I concluded to commit a theft, that I might be sent to jail, where I could be with him." Such devotion extorts our admiration and our regret that it was not lavished on a more deserving object. If this woman was ready to sacrifice her character and endure the hardships of a jail for the sake of her love for her unworthy husband, what ought to be the devotion of Christians to the Saviour who died for them! (Rom. 12: 1.)

A Fortune was Found in a Coffin Last Week in North Carolina. Two months ago a well-to-do citizen of Perquimans County died and was speedily buried in the clothes that he had worn before he became sick, because the fever of which he died was judged to be contagious. He was supposed by his relatives to have amassed considerable money. It was known that he kept no bank account, and as there were debts against the estate, diligent search was made throughout his house and premises, but no money or valuable papers could be found. It was then suggested by some member of the family that perhaps the deceased might have been in the habit of carrying his fortune around with him, and if so the most likely place to find it would be in the pockets of the clothes in which he was buried. The body was then taken up after being underground for two months, and in his coat-pocket were bonds and papers of great value and $2500 in greenbacks. Doubtless the dead man would in his lifetime have been as much vexed as his heirs by the thought of the money being so lost. He, in common with other men, would know well that money would be of no use to him in the grave. Nevertheless, an observer watching the general eagerness to obtain wealth and the care with which it is husbanded might reasonably doubt whether men do actually realize that they have only a life-interest in their possessions (1 Tim. 6: 7-10).

Much Amusement was Caused on Board a large steam-tug recently by the blunder of a nautical guest. He is a well-known sea-captain, and prides himself on his knowledge of the way to manage a ship. One night he went on deck to smoke his cigar and watch the beautiful effect of the moonlight on the waves. To his horror he saw a huge vessel coming up close astern, with a long line of smoke in her wake. He immediately hailed the pilot house, and called to his host, the captain of the tug: "Luff there, captain, or we'll get run down. Here's a fellow coming up like a ram, and ready to burst into us." The captain took the matter coolly, and told his guest not to get excited, as there was really no danger. But he looked again and kept looking, and at length said: "That's a pretty slow old tub, captain; she doesn't seem to gain an inch on us." The captain guessed not, but said no more. The guest, however, still felt too uneasy to turn in, and remained on deck dozing all night. When day dawned there dawned upon him a revelation that kept his mouth shut for the rest of the voyage. The steamer that scared him so badly was a barge in tow of the very tug on which he was, and the column of smoke which convinced him that she was a big steamer came from her donkey engine pumping out the bilge water. When the eternal day dawns upon the eyes of timorous Christians they will find, too, that many evils which in this world seemed to be advancing to crush them and the Church were really harmless, being under the control of their God. Here their eyes are held, and they suffer needless apprehension (II Kings 6: 17).

The Descent of a Gigantic Aerolite from the sky caused some alarm in Pennsylvania on September 26th. The concussion produced by its striking the earth was felt around Pittsburgh over an area having a radius of thirty miles. People rushed out of their houses in consternation, supposing there had been an earthquake. It was accompanied by a sound like the rumbling of distant artillery. One of the eye-witnesses of the fiery visitor's flight through the heavens says he never saw a more impressive scene. His horse suddenly stopped, and he heard a noise as if the wind was blowing with great violence. Looking up, he saw moving across the sky with incredible velocity what he describes as resembling a great coal of fire "as large as the largest barn I ever saw." There appeared to be surrounding it an immense flame of a deeper color than the central mass, which tapered off into a dark sinuous tail. A moment later the noise ceased; the fire-like appearance disappeared, and in their stead the stone assumed a whitish blue hue, which it retained until it passed out of sight. It fell near Mansfield, Pa. On striking the earth, it broke into three pieces, and when found was still hot. It is grayish in color, with a tendency to red in streaks, and is more than thirty feet square. There are many similar occurrences on record, and they are now, to the intelligent, subjects of curiosity rather than of terror; but the day is not far distant when an overwhelming visitation of such celestial bodies may be expected (Rev. 6: 13, 14).

The Wanderer of the Seas is a Source of Danger to mariners which the Hydrographic Bureau has asked the Treasury for permission to destroy. It appears that a schooner named the "Twenty-one Friends," laden with lumber, sprang a leak last spring, and was abandoned off Fortress Monroe. The cargo, however, kept her afloat. From time to time the derelict vessel has been reported, so that the Bureau has been able to keep track of her wanderings. She drifted into the Gulf Stream, and, once there, slowly followed that current to the north and east. She now lies directly in the route of steamers, about six hundred miles from the Irish coast. The Hydrographic Office want to send a boat out to find the wreck and blow her up, but the Treasury Department does not think it has the authority to undertake the work. There are quite a number of these derelict wrecks floating around in the Atlantic, and they are more dangerous than icebergs, for they give no intimation of their approach, and cannot be seen or heard at night. Of these this schooner is the worst, because it is right in the track of the great Atlantic steamers. Unhappily, there are also a large number of social derelicts in the world which have caused many moral wrecks. We speak of them as abandoned men and women, and the word is appropriate; but there is this difference between them and the abandoned vessel, that we pray that their mischievous career may be stopped by restoration, not by destruction (II Tim. 2: 25, 26).

THE CROSS OUR GLORY.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"But God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world."—GALATIANS 6:14.

Every Man has his Glory—Paul's Range of Choice—Jewish and Christian—His Remarkable Selection—I. What Paul Meant by the Cross—A Fact—A Doctrine—A Reproach—II. Why he Gloried In It—He Saw its Import—A Vindication—A Proof of Divine Love—The Removal of Guilt—A Marvel of Wisdom—The Door of Hope—An Inspiration—III. Its Effect Upon Him—Led Him to See the Vanity of the World—Its Wisdom Religion and Power.

ALMOST all men have something wherein to glory. Every bird has its own note of song. It is a poor heart that never rejoices; it is a dull packhorse that is altogether without bells. Men usually rejoice in something or other, and many men so rejoice in that which they choose that they become boastful and full of vainglory. It is very sad that men should be ruined by their glory; and yet many are so. Many glory in their shame, and more glory in that which is mere emptiness. Many a man has thrown his soul away for a little honor, or for the transient satisfaction of success in trifles. Oh, men, your tendency is to glory in somewhat; your wisdom will be to find a glory worthy of an immortal mind. The Apostle Paul had of things in which he could have gloried. If it had been his mind to have remained among his own people, he might have been one of their most honored rabbis. He stood high in the esteem of his fellow-professors. But when he was converted to the faith of the Lord Jesus he said: "What things were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ. . . . God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ."

Paul might also, if he had so chosen, have gloried in his sufferings for the cross of Christ; for he had been a living martyr, a perpetual self-sacrifice to the cause of the Crucified. He was once driven to give a summary of these sufferings to establish his apostleship; but before he did so he wrote, "Would to God ye could bear with me a little in my folly." In his heart he was saying all the while, "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." The apostle had yet another reason for glorying, if he had chosen to do so; for he could speak of visions and revelations of the Lord. He was in danger of being exalted above measure by reason of the abundance of these revelations, and hence he was humbled by a painful thorn in the flesh. Paul, when hard driven by the necessity to maintain his position in the Corinthian Church, was forced to mention these things; but he liked not such glorying; he was most at ease when he said, "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ."

Brethren, notice that Paul does not here say that he gloried in Christ, though he did so with all his heart; but he declares that he gloried most in "the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ," which in the eyes of men was the very lowest and most inglorious part of the history of the Lord Jesus. He could have gloried in the incarnation; angels sang of it, wise men came from the far East to behold it. He might have gloried in the life of Christ: was there ever such another, so benevolent and blameless? He might have gloried in the resurrection of Christ: it is the world's great hope concerning those that are asleep. He might have gloried in our Lord's ascension; for he "led captivity captive," and all his followers glory in his victory. He might have gloried in and I doubt not that he did; for the Lord shall soon descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God, to be admired in all them that believe. Yet the apostle selected beyond all these that centre of the Christian system, that point which is most assailed by its foes, that focus of the world's derision—the cross; and, putting all else somewhat into the shade, he exclaims: "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." Learn, then, that the highest glory of our holy religion is the cross. The history of grace begins earlier and goes on later, but in its middle point stands the cross. Of two eternities this is the hinge: of past decrees and future glories this is the pivot.

I. First, as the Lord shall help me (for who shall describe the cross without the help of Him that did hang upon it?)

by the cross? I think he meant, first of all, the fact of the cross. Our Lord Jesus Christ did really die upon a gibbet, the death of a felon. He was literally put to death upon a tree, accursed in the esteem of men. I beg you to notice how the apostle puts it—"the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." In his epistles he sometimes saith "Christ," at another time "Jesus," frequently "Lord," oftentimes "our Lord," but here he saith "our Lord Jesus Christ." There is a sort of pomp of words in this full description, as if in contrast to the shame of the cross. The terms are intended in some small measure to express the dignity of Him who was put to so ignominious a death. He is Christ the anointed, and Jesus the Saviour; He is the Lord, the Lord of all, and He is "our Lord Jesus Christ." When they bury a great nobleman a herald stands at the head of the grave and proclaims his titles. "Here lieth the body of William Duke of this, and Earl of that, and Count of the other; Knight of this order, and commander of the other." Even thus, in deep solemnity, with brevity and fulness, Paul proclaimeth beneath the bitter tree the names and titles of the Saviour of men, and styles him "our Lord Jesus Christ."

But, next, Paul gloried in the doctrine of the cross. What is that doctrine of the cross of which it is written that it is "to them that perish foolishness, but unto us who are saved it is the power of God and the wisdom of God?" In one word, it is the doctrine of the doctrine that the Lord Jesus Christ was made sin for us, that Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many, and that God hath set him forth to be the propitiation for our sins. In Christ upon the cross we see the Just dying for the unjust, that he might bring us to God; the innocent bearing the crimes of the guilty, that they might be forgiven and accepted. That is the doctrine of the cross, of which Paul was never ashamed.

But the apostle also gloried in the cross of the doctrine, for the death of the Son of God upon the cross is the crux of Christianity. Here is the difficulty, the stumbling block, and rock of offence. The Jew could not endure a crucified Messiah; he looked for pomp and power. Multitudinous ceremonies and divers washings and sacrifices—were these all to be put away and nothing left but a bleeding Saviour? At the mention of the cross the philosophic Greek thought himself insulted, and vilified the preacher as a fool. In effect he said, "You are not a man of thought and intellect; you are not abreast of the times, but are sticking in the mire of antiquated prophecies. As for the Roman, he would give no heed to any glorying in a dead Jew, a crucified Jew! Crushing the world beneath his iron heel, he declared that such romancing should never win him from the gods of his fathers. Paul did not blench before the sharp and practical reply of the conquerors of the world. He trembled not before Nero in his palace. Whether to Greek or Jew, Roman or barbarian, bond or free, he was not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ, but gloried in the cross.

II. But, secondly,

WHY DID PAUL GLORY

in the cross? He did not do so because he was in want of a theme; for, as I have shown you, he had a wide field for boasting if he had chosen to occupy it. He gloried in the cross from solemn and deliberate choice. He had counted the cost, he had surveyed the whole range of subjects with eagle eye, and he knew what he did and why he did it. He was master of the art of thinking. As a metaphysician, none could excel him; as a logical thinker, none could have gone beyond him. He stands almost alone in the early Christian Church, as a master mind. Others may have been more poetic, or more simple, but none were more thoughtful or argumentative than he. With decision and firmness Paul sets aside everything else, and definitely declares throughout his whole life, "I glory in the cross."

Why did Paul thus glory in the cross? You may well desire to know, for there are many nowadays who do not glory in it, but forsake it. Alas that it should be so! but there are ministers who ignore the atonement; they conceal the cross, or say but little about it. Paul was very bold; although he knew that this would make him many enemies, you never find him refining and spiritualizing; the cross and the atonement for sin is a plain matter of fact to him. Neither does he attempt to decorate it by adding philosophical theories. No, to him it is the bare, naked cross, all blood-stained and despised. In this he glories, and in none of the wisdom of words with which others vexed him.

AN AMERICAN JUDGE.

I take it that this was so first, because Paul saw in the cross a vindication of divine justice. Where else can the justice of God be seen so clearly as in the death of God Himself, in the person of His dear Son? If the Lord Himself suffers on account of broken law, then is the majesty of the law honored to the full. Some time ago a judge in America was called upon to try a prisoner who had been his companion in his early youth. It was a crime for which the penalty was a fine, more or less heavy. The judge did not diminish the fine; the case was clearly a bad one, and he fined the prisoner to the full. Some who knew his former relation to the offender thought him somewhat unkind thus to carry out the law, while others admired his impartiality. All were surprised when the judge quitted the bench and himself paid every farthing of the penalty. He had both shown his respect for the law and his goodwill to the man who had broken it; he exacted the penalty, but he paid it himself. So God hath done in the Person of His dear Son. He has not remitted the punishment, but He has Himself endured it. His own Son, who is none other than God Himself—for there is an essential union between them—has paid the debt which was incurred by human sin.

THE TEACHING OF THE CROSS.

But we glory because on the cross we have an unexampled display of God's love. "God commended His love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." The mythology of the gods of high Olympus contains nothing worthy to be mentioned in the same day with this wondrous deed of supreme condescension and infinite love. The ancient Shasters and Vedas have nothing of the kind. The death of Jesus Christ upon the cross cannot be an invention of men; none of the ages have produced aught like it in the poetic dreams of any nation. If we did not hear of it so often, and think of it so little, we should be charmed with it beyond expression.

I believe, again, thirdly, that Paul delighted to preach the cross of Christ as the removal of all guilt. Since sin was laid on Jesus, God's justice cannot lay it upon the believing sinner. The Lord will never punish twice the same offence. If He accepts a substitute for me, how can He call me to His bar and punish me for that transgression for which my substitute endured the chastisement? Many a troubled conscience has caught at this and found deliverance from despair.

He glories in it, again, as a marvel of wisdom. It seemed to him the sum of perfect wisdom and skill. He cried, "Oh, the depths of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God!" The plan of salvation by vicarious suffering is simple but sublime. It would have been impossible for human or angelic wisdom to have invented it. Men already so hate it and fight against it that they never would have devised it. God alone out of the treasury of His infinite wisdom brought forth this matchless project of salvation for the guilty through the substitution of the innocent. The more we study it the more we shall perceive that it is full of teaching.

I believe that Paul gloried in the cross, again, because it is

THE DOOR OF HOPE, even to the vilest of the vile. The world was very filthy in Paul's time. Roman civilization was of the most brutal and debased kind, and the masses of the people were sunk in vices that are altogether unmentionable. Paul felt that he could go into the darkest places with light in his hand when he spoke of the cross. To tell of pardon bought with the blood of the Son of God is to carry an omnipotent message. The cross uplifts the fallen and delivers the despairing. To-day, my brethren, the world's one and only remedy is the cross. Go, ye thinkers, and get up a mission to the fallen in London, leaving out the cross! Go, now, ye wise men, reclaim the harlots, and win to virtue the degraded by your perfumed philosophies! See what you can do in the slums and alleys without the cross of Christ! Go talk to your titled reprobates, and win them from their abominations by displays of art! You will fail, the most cultivated of you, even to win the rich and educated to anything like purity, unless your themes be drawn from Calvary, and the love which there poured out its heart's blood.

Again, Paul, I believe, gloried in the cross, as I often do, because it was the source of rest to him and to his brethren. When I see my Lord bearing away my sins as my scapegoat, or dying for them as my sin-offering, I feel a profound peace of heart and satisfaction of spirit. The cross is all I want for security and joy. To try to entice me away from the truth of substitution is labor in vain. Seduce me to preach the pretty nothings of modern thought! This child knows much better than to leave the substance for the shadow, the truth for the fancy.

THE ROCK.

I dare not renounce the truth in order to be thought cultured. I am no more a fool than the most of my contemporaries, and if I could see anything better than the cross I would as willingly grasp it as they; for it is a flattering thing to be thought a man of light and leading; but whither shall I go if I quit the rock of the atoning sacrifice? I cannot go beyond my simple faith that Jesus stood in my stead, and bore my sin, and put my sin away. This I must preach; I know nothing else. God helping me I will never go an inch beyond the cross, for to me all else is vanity and vexation of spirit. Return unto thy rest, oh, my soul! Where else is there a glimpse of hope for thee but in Him who loved thee and gave Himself for thee?

I am sure Paul gloried in the cross, yet again, because he saw it to be the creator of enthusiasm. In the old times vast crowds came together in desert places, among the hills, or on the moors, at peril of their lives, to hear preaching. Did they come together to hear philosophy? Did they meet at dead of night when the harriers of persecution were hunting them, to listen to pretty moral essays? I throw not. They came to hear of the grace of God manifest in the sacrifice of Jesus to believing hearts. Would your modern Gospel create the spirit of the martyrs? Is there anything in it for which a man might go to prison and to death? The modern speculations are not worth a cat's dying for them, much less a man. Atonement by blood, full deliverance from sin, perfect safety in Christ given to the believer, call a man to joy, to gratitude, to consecration, to decision, to patience, to holy living, to all-consuming zeal. Therefore in the doctrine of the cross we glory, neither will we be slow to speak it out with all our might.

III. My time has gone, or else I had intended to have enlarged upon the third head, of which I must now give you the mere outline. One of Paul's great reasons for glorying in the cross was its action upon himself. What was

ITS EFFECT UPON HIM?

The cross is never without influence. Come where it may, it worketh for life or for death. Wherever there is Christ's cross there are also two other crosses. On either side there is one, and Jesus is in the midst. Two thieves are crucified with Christ; and Paul tells us their names in his case: "The world is crucified to me, and I unto the world." Self and the world are both crucified when Christ's cross appears and is believed in. Beloved, what does Paul mean? Does he not mean just this—that ever since he had seen Christ he looked upon the world as a crucified, hanged up, gibbeted thing, which had no charms for him, whose frown he did not fear, whose love he did not court? He was dead to it, and it was dead to him; thus there was a double separation.

Paul would not ask the world to be pleased with him, since it knew not his Lord, or only knew Him to crucify Him. Can a Christian be ambitious to be written down as one of the world's foremost men when that world cast out his Lord? They crucified our Master; shall His servants court their love? Such approval would be all distained with blood. They crucified my Master, the Lord of glory; do I want them to smile on me, and say to me, "Reverend Sir" and "Learned Doctor"? No, the friendship of the world is enmity with God, and therefore to be dreaded. Mouths that spit on Jesus shall give me no kisses. Those who hate the doctrine of the atonement hate my life and soul, and I desire not their esteem.

THE BLIND CENTURY.

Paul also saw that the world's wisdom was absurd. That age talked of being wise and philosophical! Yes, and its philosophy brought it to crucify the Lord of glory. It did not know perfection, nor perceive the beauty of pure unselfishness. To slay the Messiah was the outcome of the culture of the Pharisee, to put to death the greatest teacher of all time was the ripe fruit of Sadducean thought. The cogitations of the present age have performed no greater feat than to deny the doctrine of satisfaction for sin. This century's philosophy will one day be spoken of as an evidence that softening of the brain was very usual among its scientific men. We count the thought of the present moment to be methodical madness. Bedlam out of doors; and those who are furthest gone in it are credulous beyond imagination.

So, too, the apostle saw the world's religion to be nought. It was the world's religion that crucified Christ, the priests were at the bottom of it, the Pharisees urged it on. The church of the nation, the church of many ceremonies, the church which loved the traditions of the elders, the church of phylacteries and broad-bordering garments—it was this church, which, acting by its officers, crucified the Lord. Paul therefore looked with pity upon priests and altars, and upon all the attempts of

to make up by finery of worship for the absence of the Spirit of God.

And so it was with the world's pursuits. Some ran after honor, some toiled after learning, others labored for riches; but to Paul these were all trifles since he had seen Christ on the cross. And so it was with the world's pleasures and with the world's power. The Christ that died upon the cross now lives in our hearts. The Christ that took human guilt has taken possession of our souls, and henceforth we live only in Him, for Him, by Him. He has engrossed our affections. All our ardors burn for Him. God make it to be so with us, that we may glorify God and bless our age.

Paul concludes this epistle by saying, "From henceforth let no man trouble me: for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus." He was a slave, branded with his Master's name. That stamp could never be got out, for it was burned into his heart. Even thus, I trust, the doctrine of the atonement is our settled belief, and faith in it is part of our life. Brethren, sisters, will you enlist under the conquering banner of the cross? Once rolled in the dust and stained in blood, it now leads on the armies of the Lord to victory! Oh, that all ministers would preach the true doctrine of the cross! Oh that all Christian people would live under the influence of it, and we should then see brighter days than these! Unto the Crucified be glory forever and ever. Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

A WHEEL OF FIRE.

by Arlo Bates, is decidedly above the average of the novels produced of late, and it is certainly the best novel Mr. Bates has written. The characters are original, and the conversation is piquant and witty. A double thread of love-making runs through the story, the light-heartedness, almost frivolity, of the one contrasting with and relieving the earnestness and sadness of the other. It is the puzzling question of heredity which forms the basis of the plot. Damaris Wainright, the heroine, is distressed by the fear that insanity, which afflicted her mother and brother, will one day be her own doom. The foreboding causes her to resolve that she will never marry, and it is this decision and the arguments with which it is assailed by a noble young man, who loves her and whom she loves, that constitute the basis of the story. Very pathetic is the situation of the girl, whose inclinations are at war with her judgment, and very beautiful is her craving for the love of the man whose strong will and vigorous mind promise a support and a comfort for her in her desolate life. Her cousin and companion, a capricious society lady, is cast in a very different mould, and her flirtation, which, almost unawares to herself, become serious, is a gleam of sunlight in a novel which, without her, would have been somewhat sombre. Readers who have not the felicity of living in Boston and belonging to the exclusive circle of its best society will notice with amusement the mistake Mr. Bates falls into, in common with Mr. Howells and other Boston writers, of regarding their city as the hub of the intellectual universe, and that all who are outside of it are uncultured barbarians. We have been treated to so much of this nonsense that we can afford to smile at it and quietly wait for the time—which surely now cannot be far distant—when Boston society will realize that it is only making itself ridiculous by despising every one who does not bear its imprimatur. However, as Mr. Bates has written a good story, it is not difficult to forgive a fault probably due rather to his surroundings than to his own narrowness of mind. Pp. 383; price, $1. Published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons.

by J. B. Mattison, M.D., is a work which ought to bring new life into many an aching heart by the assurance it gives to the opium user that there is hope of rescue. Who that has talked with a confirmed opium habitué has not sympathized with the despair with which the victim has declared that there is no hope of emancipation when once the insidious drug has fastened its chains upon its prey? Thousands of men and women, some of whom are blessed with brilliant talents and vigorous intellect, are going about our streets to-day absolute slaves to opium, and with no expectation of deliverance. A city missionary recently said to the editor of this journal: "No one knows what opium is doing in this city of New York. I meet with its ravages everywhere. It is a fastidious demon; it takes none but the brightest and the best. It is destroying the most brilliant of our citizens. They fall under its power, shine for a year or two with increased lustre, and then they drop—drop steadily down like a stone, until I meet them in the lowest slums of the city, living for nothing but opium, caring for no pleasure, no occupation, with no ambition, having but one craving—the all-absorbing desire for opium."

The University of Aberdeen, the Meeting-Place of the British Association for the Advancement of Science.

Unless some powerful pen arouses this people to the danger in their midst this nation is ruined, sure." The writer has been at some pains to verify this statement, and he finds it entirely and absolutely true.

The eminence Dr. Mattison has attained in the treatment of this terrible curse gives him authority to speak on the subject, and in the little manual he has now issued he gives hope to the enslaved. He has treated many whose addiction was in the hypodermic form, which is the most difficult of all forms to overcome. Two cures were effected in which the addiction covered a period of more than ten years, and in both cases the cure was complete. The doctor enters at large into his mode of treatment in this work, and explains its principles. Suffering the victim must expect—there is no royal road to emancipation, but Dr. Mattison appears to have reduced it to a minimum by study and long experience. We sincerely hope that the publication of his book may lead some hopeless ones to take heart and seek emancipation from their degrading slavery. Pp. 49; price, 50 cents. Published by Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

It was Saturday night, and the streets were crowded with busy people buying provisions for Sunday's dinner, and bonnets and hats and bits of finery, which would duly appear in church next day. The men had received their week's wages, and promises made earlier in the week of what should be done "when father gets his money" were being fulfilled—that is, some of the promises were; others were not; but then they had been made conditionally, for there were some homes in which all promises having a money basis were necessarily of an uncertain character. Father would get his money—all that he had earned; but if he happened to have been off drinking for one day there would be only five days' wages for him to draw, instead of six, and perhaps, too, that would not arrive at home intact.

In a cross street, not so brilliantly lighted as the one in which the stores were, several covered passage-ways gave admission to a row of rear tenements. Quiet Paradise Place certainly was, but unspeakably dull. The houses were let as a whole, or by the single room, to suit the convenience of tenants, who, as a rule, not exactly from desire for convenience, adopted the single-room arrangement.

James Bunce lived in one of those houses, and hired three rooms, of which one was kitchen and sitting-room by day and his son's bedroom at night. A second was Bunce's bedroom, and the third, originally intended to be a wardrobe, and having no window in it, was a bedroom for Bunce's daughter Jennie, twelve years old.

"Hallo, Jennie; ain't father home yet?" said a boy, who had just come in.

"No, Tom; I guess he's at the grocery. He'll be pretty bad when he does come, I'm afraid. You'd better undress and get to bed before he comes. If he cuts up rough you'll have it, if you're around."

"Not I, Jennie; it's no worse for me than you, and I guess I can stand it if you can." The boy flung himself, dressed as he was, on the heap of rice-bags which served him as a bed, and clapping his hands behind his head, lay watching his sister at her task.

"Say, Jennie," he said at last, "ain't there any way of keeping father home to-morrow? Couldn't you get all his money off him to-night? Seems to me he's been getting worse ever since mother died."

"That's so," Jennie assented. "I don't know what's to be done. What are the bar-rooms like, Tom? I suppose they're better than our places, ain't they? Father seems to hate the sight of home now."

"Oh, yes, they're fine enough—looking-glass all around and shiny shelves and glasses and little images and a good stove and lots of lights. They're splendid!"

"You won't ever go there, Tom, when you're a man?"

"Not I. I've seen enough of it with father. Why, if he didn't go there, Jennie, you'd have a good frock, and I'd have good shoes, and perhaps we'd go to school. No; I'm a temperance man, I am."

"That's right, Tom. You hold on to that, and some day you'll earn as much as father, and have a house of your own to live in."

"Then I'll take care of you, Jennie; but you haven't said whether there's any way of keeping him at home to-morrow."

"I don't know as there is, Tom. Maybe if we got him a good breakfast and made the place tidy a bit he wouldn't go. How much money have you got?"

"It's thirty cents now. I got five cents to-night for holding a horse;" and the boy rose to show his hoard.

"I've got a quarter, Tom. What do you say to buying a breakfast with it? We could do it for that. But it's a shame to have your money off you when you're saving for your shoes."

"I don't mind, Jennie; you can have it if you think it'll keep father out of the saloon." It was a risk, for it was all they had, and the investment was doubtful. There was no certainty that Bunce would be bribed to stay in his home, after all. They decided to try it, however, and Jennie slipped out to make the purchases. As she passed the grocery, she heard her father invited "to oblige the company with a song," and Bunce responded with "Home, sweet home."

She hurried on with a sad heart, for there was a huskiness in her father's voice which foreboded that in an unpleasant sense there would be "no place like home" that night for her. The little parcel which the half dollar bought was carried home and hidden away, and presently Bunce's stumbling feet were heard on the stairs. The next hour was a bad time for the two children, Bunce having apparently left his good-humor behind at the saloon. At last, grumbling and swearing, he shuffled off to bed, and was soon snoring loudly.

Early the next morning Jennie spread an old apron of her mother's on the rough table to do duty as a table-cloth, and laid out the breakfast in the most attractive form she could think of. She stepped back to take a final view of it, and being satisfied, roused Tom to get his judgment.

"That ought to do the business, Jennie. It looks good; you got a lot for the money." Then they sat down and ate a crust of bread and drank some water.

Bunce waked up with what is technically known as a head on him." To Bunce himself it seemed less like a head than a palpitating, throbbing bundle of nerves. The first thing must be a drink, and, half dressed, he shuffled into the kitchen and seized his hat and coat to go to the saloon for a whiskey-sour. He was in a limp, flaccid condition, a pitiable object. His glance fell on the table and the unusual preparations. That was the moment the children had waited for.

"Father," said Jennie, timidly advancing to do the honors as hostess, "here's a nice breakfast—hot coffee and a mutton chop. It's all ready; come and sit down. Tom and I have had our breakfast."

Bunce looked bewildered. First he gazed at the breakfast, and then at Jennie's upturned face, and then at Tom, whose eyes were pleading eloquently. Bunce wanted to go, but he had not arrived at the stage of utter indifference to his children. He could forget them in the saloon, but he had been a good father once, and had not lost all his paternal feelings. He could not resist Tom's earnest seconding of his sister's invitation: "Have some before you go, father; it'll spoil if you don't, and Jennie got it all herself to surprise you." So he sat down with a perplexed face. He had no appetite, but the hot coffee suited him, and after a deep drink of it his wits seemed sharpened. He began to realize the situation.

"How did you get this, children?" he asked. "You seem to be fond of your poor father, after all."

"Of course we are," said Jennie, kissing him; "and you're fond of us, ain't you, father? We've nobody but you to love us now."

Tears came into Bunce's eyes as he looked at the two children dependent on him for love and guidance. It was true they had no one but him, and he knew he had been like a broken reed and no support at all for them. He kissed them, and told them he did love them, and then went on with his breakfast.

Jennie had her mother's Bible ready on the mantel-shelf, and when Bunce was through, she pleaded with him to stay and hear her read a chapter. Now she did not go to school, there was no one to hear her read, and she might be forgetting. Bunce sat and listened while Jennie read about the prodigal son, and another chapter. It seemed comfortable there, and the reading carried his mind back to old times, when he was not "drunken Bunce," but a smart, bright lad at home, with a good father and mother, and later to the time when he and his young wife used to go to church regularly, and were so proud of their two children. Conscience was beginning to work, and Bunce, though he sat silent, was mentally busy. He thought he had some backbone left yet, and surely his children were more back to him than the men at the saloon. But it would be a hard fight, and maybe it was not worth making if he was sure to be beaten in the end.

"I must go now," Bunce said at last. "I'll soon be back, though." The children's hearts sank. They had heard that promise many times. Jennie put her arms around his neck, and begged him to stay. Tom held his hand and said, "Don't go to the saloon this morning, father; we'll do anything for you if you won't go out." "I must go," said the man. "Let me get up, Jennie, I can't stand it any longer. I ain't going to the saloon. I'm going to sign the pledge!"

"Bunce, bewildered, looked at the Table."

THE SILVER LINING.

A SERIAL STORY.

Disappointment.

THE fact of old Crowther's illness was duly communicated to Frank Arnold and his bride, who were spending their honeymoon in Italy. They, supposing that the old will, under which Clare was to inherit the property of the old man, was still in force, hurried homeward to protect their interests in the event of "anything happening" to Mr. Crowther. The "anything" meant the most solemn of all things that could happen to him, and it came to him before they set out for home. The letter announcing his death, therefore, arrived after they left, and when Frank and his wife entered the desolate home the man who had ruled it for so many years lay still and cold in his chamber.

The pair saw at once from the closed house that all was over. It is to be feared a gleam of satisfaction passed through Frank's mind, as he reflected that his hopes of easy independence were so soon to be realized. No thought of the old man's soul entered the minds of either of them.

They were astonished at seeing a stranger in the house, but in the bustle and confusion they gave little thought as to who the stranger might be. But the lawyer who had drawn the new will had come to see them, believing he would be the best person to explain how matters stood. He drew Frank into a room, and said: "Mr. Arnold, I have something to communicate to you that will greatly surprise you, and will, I fear, be a great disappointment to your wife."

Frank's eyes opened wider: "What is it you mean?"

"I mean this: the day after your marriage the young person you just now saw arrived. She proved to be Mr. Crowther's niece, the daughter of a sister he once loved well—it was agitation at seeing her that brought on his illness. His distress was so great at having wronged his sister in years that had passed that he determined to make what amends were at his command by providing for her daughter. I suggested that a portion should still be left to Mrs. Arnold, but nothing but giving the whole to his newly-found niece would satisfy the old man, and he accordingly made a fresh will in favor of that lady, leaving her all he had."

Frank's anger had been rising.

"How do you know she is his niece at all? How dare she come and impose on an old man? I will dispute the will."

"That, of course, is within your power, Mr. Arnold," said the man of law, courteously. "You will naturally protect your interests, and they have certainly suffered seriously in this case. I drew up the former will, which was in force until this young woman's arrival, and I violate no professional confidence in informing you that if that will had not been superseded by this new will your wife would have been a very wealthy lady. As it is I see no valid ground for contesting the will. Mr. Crowther was perfectly sane when he gave his directions, and when he executed the instrument. His reasons for making the change are such as the Court would respect. The arrival of a blood relative of whose existence he was not previously aware is sufficient to account for his disinheriting a lady who was not related to him, and you would have considerable difficulty in persuading a judge that the deceased was not acting justly in so doing."

"It is a conspiracy," said Frank Arnold, irritated by the cold, logical manner of the lawyer, and still more by the conclusion forced upon him that in spite of his assertion the old lawyer was right. "It is a shameful conspiracy," he reiterated: "I will contest the will to the last. It is a gross fraud, whatever your opinion may be."

"Well, consult your lawyer, by all means, Mr. Arnold. I have got been advising you professionally. I have been speaking as a friend who sympathizes sincerely with you in your natural disappointment. Think it over quietly, Mr. Arnold, and let your reason guide you; it is less likely to mislead you than your prejudices are." The lawyer bowed in his stately fashion, and took his leave.

Frank seemed stunned for a time after the lawyer left. He sat gloomily meditating, unable to realize fully that the fortune upon which he had counted was gone from him. He had talked glibly of a lawsuit to the lawyer, but even at this early time he recognized that a lawsuit was a luxury beyond his reach. The small sum left from old Mr. Crowther's wedding-gift was but a small capital, and if that lawyer proved right it would be a folly to spend it in law. But, then, the outrageous wrong. As he thought of it his exasperation rose again. Yes, he would fight the will if it cost him all he had. So he vacillated, as his reason and his passions swayed him, by turns. He was still sitting, hot and angry, in the same position he had occupied during his interview with the lawyer, when his wife, in that irritating state of cheerfulness which contrasted so glaringly with his own despair, entered the room.

"Why, Frank, what a time you have been talking. I am tired of waiting." Then seeing his scared face she stopped. "Is anything the matter?"

"The matter," he said bitterly; "I should think something was the matter. Old Crowther has altered his will, and left everything to that girl downstairs;" and again his anger rose.

Clare probably knew little the real value of money, but she was frightened at the change in her husband, and knew not how to soothe him.

Nothing in her associations or education had helped to develop her character, and she had no great force of intellect to bring to bear upon any subject. She loved Frank with all the love of which she was capable, but hers was not the noble woman's love that helps a man to bear fierce trouble. Frank had thought he loved her, but he woke up that night to find he had loved her gold, not herself. It was a terrible waking up for these two young people; they had not the refuge of a Saviour's love to flee to, and to wander in the world without Him is weary work indeed. They had begun their married life without Him, they thought they did not need Him, but He would teach them even yet that nothing short of His love can satisfy the cravings of the human heart.

They went home that night to the little house they had taken in one of the northern suburbs. It was a depressing home-coming. Everything in the house was new and strange, and the young couple were unhinged and out of tune. Frank had become wet in crossing the Channel, and, as he was aware, was in danger of illness from that cause alone. The sudden mental shock had aggravated the physical derangement and increased the danger. Two days later the young man was stretched on a bed of sickness, raving in wild delirium, his body and mind racked with fever. Week after week he lay there resisting the remedies administered, relapsing into delirium as he awoke to his consciousness of his disappointment.

Dr. and Mrs. Arnold had heard nothing from him since they received the letter telling them of his marriage. Day after day passed and no tidings came. Mrs. Arnold longed to write, but her husband said, "No, Marion, the boy should write first. He gave us no address, and evidently did not wish for a letter; we wait."

But when the weeks went on and still no tidings came, Dr. Arnold saw his wife's cheeks growing paler and the streaks of gray becoming wider in her brown hair, and decided he would himself go to London to seek his son. Mrs. Arnold pleaded to go with him, but Dr. Arnold thought he would be best alone, as the visit must be a very hurried one.

On arriving in London he drove to his son's former lodgings, thinking it possible he might learn his new address there; but "Mr. Arnold had taken away all his things," the landlady said, "and she knew nothing of his whereabouts; he was a kind, free-hearted young gentleman, and she often wished she could hear something of him."

From thence Dr. Arnold drove to the hospital with which Frank was connected, as, though unwilling to show his ignorance of his son's home, he thought it his only chance of finding him.

"Yes, they knew his address," and gave it at once, but they had not seen Mr. Arnold since his return to London after his marriage. They believed he was ill.

The poor father once more set off, and the November afternoon was fast closing in when his carriage at last turned up the road he wanted. It was a forlorn looking place to Dr. Arnold's eyes, the little gardens looking dank and untidy with the fallen leaves, and a street organ pouring out its inharmonious strains. The bell was answered by an untidy-looking servant, who stared strangely at him when he asked if Mr. Arnold was at home.

"Yes, at home, but you can't see him; he is ill."

As Dr. Arnold pressed his way in, with a feeling of right to enter his son's house, the servant looked more astonished still.

"Is your mistress at home?"

"Yes."

"I should like to see her; tell her a gentleman wishes to speak to her."

By this time Dr. Arnold found himself in the front-room, which was furnished as a drawing-room, but had a cold, comfortless look about it. After a few minutes the door opened, and Clare entered. He felt she might be pretty under some circumstances, but now she looked weary, and her dress was put on with the air of one who cared little what became of her.

"I must introduce myself," Dr. Arnold began; "I am your husband's father."

Clare had been hastily examining her visitor, and had instinctively discovered who was before her.

"I am told my son is ill; is it really so?"

"Yes, quite true; he has been ill ever since we came home."

"How long is that?"

"Nearly seven weeks now; it is low fever he has had; he is getting better now."

Dr. Arnold's face grew graver. "I should like to see him. Will you tell him I am here, or shall I go in at once?"

Clare had been making up her mind to say Frank could not see him, but there was something in Dr. Arnold's quiet authoritative manner which made her feel she must obey.

"Will you wait a minute? he was asleep just now; I will see if he is awake."

She returned, saying he was still asleep.

"I will slip into his room quietly then. I promise not to disturb him. You know I am a doctor, and am used to these things."

Very quietly Dr. Arnold entered the room, and sitting down behind a curtain waited his son's waking.

The only light in the room was from the fire; outside the fog was thickening, and looked impressively dismal. Dr. Arnold glanced at the sleeper and could hardly realize that the wasted form lying before him was his son. A few months before he had been a stalwart young fellow, full of vigorous life and ruddy health; now his cheeks were hollow, his hands white and thin.

The furniture of the room was chosen in good taste, but there was an uncomfortable look about it all that told at once, to Dr. Arnold's practiced eye, that it was not the hand of a wise, thoughtful woman that had arranged it. In about a quarter of an hour Frank woke, and, in a weak, fretful voice, asked for something to drink.

Dr. Arnold made signs to Clare to let him give it. "Here, Frank, my boy, are you thirsty?"

"Father, is that you?" he said, languidly.

"Yes; let me place your pillows more comfortably."

Frank was too weak to be greatly astonished at his father's appearance. His illness still made the past seem like a dream, and he had not the strength to question about the things around him. He leant back on his pillows as his father arranged them for him, with a satisfied look which seemed to say he was more comfortable. Then Dr. Arnold sat still, waiting for his son to break the silence.

After five minutes or more Frank roused himself a little. "I suppose I have been ill a long time; but I am getting better now."

"You must come home for a while, Frank, when you can be moved; a little native air will do more for you than anything."

Then, as if the past came back to him, Frank said: "No, no, I can't go home. I am married now; I cannot go home."

"Yes, Frank, and you can bring your wife with you; your mother longs to see you."

"Dear mother, how is she?" and something like one of his old smiles passed over his face; "you must tell her I am getting better, but I cannot go home;" and he turned wearily, as if he could not bear to think of it.

Dr. Arnold wisely dropped the subject when he saw it was no use to press it further; for Frank was in such a state that he could not bear to be thwarted. He was weak and irritable, still on the verge of delirium. It was better on all accounts to leave him, and defer the question of the home visit which professionally as well as paternally Dr. Arnold was convinced would be the best medicine for his son. As he was reluctantly leaving the house the physician who was attending the sick man arrived, and Dr. Arnold seized the opportunity for a friendly consultation. The pathological question was easily explained, but there the London doctor confessed that he was puzzled. So young and strong a man should have recovered ere this, but he only reached a certain stage to relapse into delirium. There must be some mental trouble which medicine could not relieve, and he believed it was due to a shock arising out of a pecuniary disappointment. In fact, he had heard that Mrs. Arnold had lost a fortune.

This gave Dr. Arnold the clue to all he saw, and confirmed his fears that money had been the great attraction to his son, so he longed more than ever to see him again under the influence of home. But he was powerless. His son's strange aversion to return could not be overcome. Evidently he was conscious of his untidy conduct, and had no mind to appear at home with the disastrous consequences fresh upon him. If he could have gone with wealth at his command he would have gone, for it would have seemed that he had at least received some advantage from his ill-considered step; but now it would be evident that he had sold himself for naught, and he could not bear to appear in that humiliating role.

One more effort Dr. Arnold made for his son's benefit. He proposed that Frank's mother should come and assist Clare in nursing him. But even that Frank declined. They were better alone, he said sadly, almost morosely. He would like to see his mother, but not now. "We shall manage to get along," he said, "and there are reasons why my mother would be embarrassed and would embarrass us. It is kind of you, father, to propose it; you always were the kindest of fathers; but it must not be. Clare will write you, and in a few days I can write myself. You shall hear of us, and all will be well."

Dr. Arnold made the journey howsoever in deep dejection. Here was another rent in the family circle as grievous, though not so hopeless, perhaps, as that of Grace's death. Frank had clearly cut himself apart from his family, and at present there was no prospect of reunion. It was with a heavy heart that he entered his home, grieving most that the intelligence he bore would rest very heavily on a loving soul whose maternal affection no unkindness or ingratitude could quench. Happily for him, he had never carried sorrow home without finding comfort and consolation. Together he and his wife always laid their trials at the Saviour's feet, and the burden was lightened. It was so this time, and when Dr. and Mrs. Arnold emerged from the doctor's study they were able to meet their daughters with brighter faces, and hearts from which Jesus had lifted the weight of woe.

A month later, however, there was another sorrowful scene in that same room. A letter was spread upon the table, and Dr. and Mrs. Arnold were upon their knees. It was a hard struggle this time and light was long in coming. At the breakfast-table the young ladies, whose affection gave penetration to their gaze, were quick to detect the signs of distress, and Kate's eyes were fixed on her mother with a note of interrogation in their light.

"My dears," said Mrs. Arnold, "your father and I are distressed—too much so to explain details to you now. But you ought to know the fact lest you apprehend greater trouble. Your brother Frank is separating himself finally from us. It is such a sad disappointment to our hope of having him at home to live. He and his wife are leaving London. A letter came from him this morning, saying that as they are very poor and with no prospect of getting on in England, they have decided to try their fortune in America."

JEHU'S FALSE ZEAL.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 18, 11 Kings 10: 15-31. Golden Text, ver. 31. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Real Holder of Power—Guiding National Destinies—Joseph—Moses—Ahab's Perversity—Two Awful Examples—The Anointing—Jehu's Commission—An Avenger—Elijah's Prophecy Fulfilled—Jehu's Jeuitism—A Terrible Carnage—Lapse into Idolatry.

JEHU had been raised up of God to do a work of judgment. Even in the days of Elijah God had marked him out to be king over Israel, and Elijah was commissioned to anoint him. But he did not do it in person. He anointed Elisha to be prophet, and Elisha, through one of the sons of the prophets, anointed Jehu. It is most instructive to mark how in inspired history we see the hand of God in the politics of nations. The great ones of this world may think they have the reins of government in their hands, but again and again the hand of a Greater is seen, overturning, overruling, and bringing out His own purposes. In Joseph's time God took the reins out of Pharaoh's hands and gave them into the hands of a young man who was brought forth from prison to rule. Through inspiring Joseph with wisdom God brought about that "all countries came into Egypt to Joseph for to buy corn; because that the famine was so sore in all lands" (Gen. 41: 57), and thus "all countries" heard of the true God. Again, in the time of Moses, when it seemed to Pharaoh, king of Egypt, that he could dispose of the children of Israel as best suited his purpose, and oppress them to satisfy his own ambition, God again took the reins and raised up Moses, who by that time had become known in Egypt; and using him as His instrument, the Lord made Pharaoh and all Egypt tremble again and again, and learn, by the very confession of their own magicians, that "the finger of God" was upon them. Again and again in the history of nations God asserts Himself, so that every one must acknowledge that "the Lord, He is the God."

It was in keeping with God's ordinary method that Elijah the prophet should have known the doom of Ahab's house before God declared it through him to the king himself (1 Kings 19: 17; 21: 21-24). Most tenderly and touchingly had the Lord sought Ahab, sending one message after another, one deliverance upon another, one threatening after another; but the unhappy man was not won, and the Lord's testimony of him is, "There was none like unto Ahab, which did

SELL HIMSELF TO WORK WICKEDNESS, whom Jezebel his wife stirred up." Jehoram, his son, was somewhat better; "he wrought evil in the sight of the Lord; but not like his father and like his mother; for he put away the image of Baal that his father had made. Here are two types of unconverted men, one the slave and creature of his ungodly wife, yet not excused, but condemned on that very account; the other a reformer in his way, yet indulging in the fashionable sins of his day, and, instead of yielding his heart to God, manifesting as much enmity against Him in his spirit as his father had done before him. Both perished, and both are awful examples of the hardening of the heart against God.

When the young prophet, who had been sent to anoint Jehu, entered the house which served as headquarters of the army of Israel, he signified to Jehu that his message was to him, and, taking him into a private room, he "poured the oil on his head, and said unto him, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, I have anointed thee king over the people of the Lord, even over Israel. And thou shalt smite the house of Ahab thy master, that I may avenge the blood of my servants the prophets, and the blood of all the servants of the Lord, at the hand of Jezebel." And he repeated the prophecy of Elijah made to Ahab in the vineyard of Naboth.

Jehu took his mission to heart. Naturally of an energetic character, described as a man who "driveth furiously," he let no time elapse before he began to put his mission into execution. In a few moments the officers of the army knew that God had caused Jehu to be anointed king, and the martial trumpets were sounded throughout the city to proclaim it. His next step was to engage the captains, that they should keep the gates of Ramoth Gilead so that no one should carry the news to Jezebel where Jehoram was seeking to recover from the wounds received in his last battle with the Syrians. He then with all speed drove in his chariot toward Jezebel. A watchman spied him, and a messenger was sent to parley with him. Jehu was a man not of words, but of actions; he commanded the messenger to turn behind him, and there was no withstanding him, there was nothing else to be done. A second messenger was sent with the same result, and as things looked ominous, the king himself, accompanied by Ahaziah, king of Judah, came out also, and when he met Jehu he said, "Is it peace, Jehu?" It was an unexpected answer: "What peace, so long as the whoredoms of thy mother Jezebel and her witchcrafts are so many?" With one cry, "Treachery, O Ahaziah!" the miserable king sought to flee. From whom?

GOD PURSUED HIM.

One arrow from the bow of Jehu, the first he drew, was God's instrument of death, and the unrepentant king went to account before God for his ill-spent life. Jehu commanded Bidkar, his captain, to cast the body into the field of Naboth the Jezreelite, saying, "For remember how that, when I and thou rode together after Ahab his father, the Lord laid this burden upon him; Surely I have seen yesterday the blood of Naboth, and the blood of his sons, saith the Lord; and I will requite thee in this plat, saith the Lord." After commanding the death of Ahaziah, Jehoram's brother-in-law, Jehu went on into Jezreel, and there the infamous Jezebel was thrown from a window by some of her retainers, who, under a sudden impulse, took Jehu's side. The conqueror rode on, but after he had dined he gave orders for Jezebel's funeral. When it was discovered that the dogs had eaten her Jehu at once called to mind the word of the Lord, "In the portion of Jezreel shall dogs eat the flesh of Jezebel: and the carcass of Jezebel shall be as dung upon the face of the field in the portion of Jezreel; so that they shall not say, This is Jezebel."

With such a recognition of God and of His Word, with such prompt, relentless execution of His judgment upon the house of Ahab, the entire destruction of which he had accomplished with the single comment, "Know now that there shall fall unto the earth nothing of the word of the Lord, which the Lord spake concerning the house of Ahab: for the Lord hath done that which He spake by His servant Elijah"—one might have expected better things in the reign of Jehu. His destruction of prevailing evils was thorough and complete; he was a great reformer, but his heart was nevertheless not right. In the first few days of his reign his one word was that the word of the Lord might be fulfilled, and he saw himself a simple instrument in carrying out God's purposes. But it does not take much to make an energetic man self-sufficient. After commanding the slaughter of the kindred of Ahaziah, who, knowing nothing of what was going on in Israel, had come to pay a family visit at court, he met with Jehonadab, the son of Rechab, coming to meet him. After assuring himself that Jehonadab was not an enemy, he took him up into the chariot and said, for the Lord." Jehu was beginning to set a value on himself and to pride himself on his zeal. The Lord had been first with him before, now it was "my zeal." Oh, how few there are who can bear to be used by God without being hurt by it! Jehu came to Samaria and finished his work of destruction, and then he gathered all the people together and said unto them, "Ahab served Baal a little; but Jehu shall serve him much." "My zeal" soon degenerated into duplicity. True, Jehu had a good end in view, but God does not teach us to do evil that good may come. A lie is always a lie, and the devil is the father of every lie (John 8: 44). Jehu made an urgent proclamation that all the prophets of Baal, all his priests, and all his servants should come together to make a great sacrifice to Baal. He went so far as to say that whosoever of the worshippers of Baal who was meriting it be put to death. But Jehu was acting in subtlety, and taking an untrue, unfair advantage. He did it "that he might destroy the worshippers of Baal." Did he think that God was at such a loss that the prophets of Baal could be destroyed no other way? Had he never heard men still living tell how on Mount Carmel, where the fire fell from heaven in answer to Elijah's prayer, and where the assembled people with one united cry declared, "The Lord, He is the God," that Elijah commanded, and all that generation of false prophets were slain? A miserable, unworthy, mean, unrighteous trick was a poor substitute for that calm reliance upon God which made Elijah, in His name, master of the situation.

"COME AND SEE MY ZEAL

DUPPLICITY.

The king then proclaimed an assembly, a grand religious ceremony in honor of Baal. As though in mockery of those whom he was about to slay, the king, who was present, called for vestments, and every one was arrayed in the religious garb which belonged to the worship of the false god, not knowing it was to be his shroud. Before the offering of the sacrifices the king gave orders that none of the servants of the Lord should remain among them, and then, when all were occupied with the gorgeous ceremonial, Jehu commanded his guard and captains to go in and slay them, not letting one escape. It was an awful carnage; God's work, but not done in God's way. After every one of these unhappy creatures had been slain they destroyed the images of Baal and the statues, and broke down the whole house of Baal. The work of reform was accomplished, but alas! Jehu, while taking away evil, had no power to bring in the good. His own heart was not right; he still would not be out and out for God; he could extirpate Baal-worship, but he could not renounce the golden calves at Bethel and in Dan. He had no trust that God would care for his kingdom if his people went up to Jerusalem to worship. And what respect could his people have for him? A man who could in the very prosecution of the work of God be guilty of such untruth, and who, while destroying one idolatrous worship, patronized another! Have we to go back as far as Jehu's time to find such? Are there none who are strong temperance advocates, and who wage as deadly a war with the drink as Jehu did with Baal, and who yet are wanting in truth, in love, in faith? Are there none of God's own children who make use of the most human, carnal methods to obtain money for God's work? Are there not some whose zeal abroad and whose home life correspond but sadly? Jehu got a present reward; four generations of his family sat on the throne of Israel, but we have no certainty that his own soul was saved.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Command Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 328 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

The Late EARL OF SHAFTESBURY, K.G., the Philanthropic English Peer.

THE LATE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY.

His Philanthropic Character—Birth and Early Labors—Member of the House of Commons—White Slaves—A Hard Fight—Efforts for Destitute Children—Public Honors—A Scottish Tribute—His Reminiscences—At the Y. M. C. A.—Celebration of his Eightieth Birthday—Gift of a Donkey—A Bishop-maker.

ON October 1st, two weeks ago to-day, died the venerable Earl whose name is honored by evangelical people throughout the civilized world. His interest in religious societies was shown by active co-operation as well as by liberal gifts, and he delighted in giving practical advice to their managers and in many ways contributing to their advancement. But it was in the sphere of philanthropy that his best services were rendered. As one of the hereditary legislators of Great Britain, he used his position and power to effect legislation which would protect the working people from the oppression of unscrupulous employers, and he succeeded to a larger extent than might have been expected in a nation strongly opposed to any restrictions on the freedom of trade. He was emphatically a good man—one of the very few among the English peers who are entitled by their character to the name of "noblemen."

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

The Right Hon. Anthony Ashley Cooper, Earl of Shaftesbury, was born on the 28th of April, 1801. He was educated at Oxford University, where he obtained a first-class in classics in 1822, and graduated M.A. in 1832, and was elected D.C.L. in 1841. Before he succeeded to the peerage he was elected a member of the House of Commons by the voters of Woodstock, in the Conservative interest, and he held office in the administration as a Commissioner of the Board of Control under the Duke of Wellington. He was afterward elected several times by the people of Dorsetshire. But in 1846, having resigned his seat for the county, owing to a difference of opinion between himself and his constituents on the subject of the repeal of the corn-laws, he was elected by the city of Bath, which place he represented till the death of his father in 1851, when he took his seat in the House of Peers. He held office for a few months under Sir Robert Peel.

Apart from his Parliamentary duties, his name is a household word in connection with the best-known religious societies of Great Britain—such as the Bible Society, the Pastoral Aid Society, and the Society for the Conversion of the Jews, and especially the cause of Ragged Schools.

A PHILANTHROPIC LEGISLATOR.

Signal services were rendered by the Earl of Shaftesbury to the factory population of England. The condition of the factory child, as witnessed by men in the early part of the present century in the manufacturing districts of the country who had eyes to see and hearts to feel, was awful. Attempts had been made from the moment the evils of the factory system were seen to check its action. The first Sir Robert Peel was an honored worker in this philanthropic movement. It would require volumes to record the horrors of the factory apprenticeship system. A short extract from good John Fielden's little book, called "The Curse of the Factory System," will give some idea of its evils. John Fielden was the largest cotton manufacturer in Lancashire, which is the largest in England, and was member for Oldham in Parliament. He was a man of cool temper and of an accurate turn of mind, so that the frightful state of things he described cannot be questioned. He thus describes those

"In the early part of the present century children in sufficient numbers to work in the Lancashire factories were difficult to be got, and the custom sprang up of procuring apprentices from the different parish poorhouses of London, Birmingham, and elsewhere. Many, many thousands of these little helpless creatures were sent into the north, being from the age of seven to the age of thirteen or fourteen years old. The custom was for the master to clothe his apprentices, and to feed and lodge them in an 'apprentice house' near the factory.

"Overseers were appointed to see to the works, whose interest it was to work the children to the utmost, because their pay was in proportion to the quantity of work they could exact. Cruelty was, of course, the consequence, and there is abundant evidence on record, and preserved in the recollections of some who still live, to show that in many of the manufacturing districts cruelties the most heartrending were practised upon the unoffending and friendless creatures who were thus consigned to the charge of master manufacturers; that they were harassed to the brink of death by excessive labor; that they were flogged, fettered, and tortured with the most exquisite refinement of cruelty; that they were in many cases starved to the bone while flogged to their work, and that even in some instances they were driven to commit suicide."

A CHAMPION.

This is but a sample of the statements that might be varied and multiplied indefinitely; but this frightful condition of things had been altered for the better before the Earl of Shaftesbury (then Lord Ashley) had entered the field; but it is only an historical truth that the Earl of Shaftesbury, from the time he entered the field, fought the battle of the factory child in a spirit and with a success, in and out of Parliament, which entitles him to the lasting gratitude of working people the world over, to whom God sent this noble-hearted man as a champion. The manufacturers of that time fought against factory legislation with a determination and unscrupulousness which left nothing untried for the attainment of their purpose. Hence, when the Earl of Shaftesbury entered the field, the fight was in truth a hard one, and he was perfectly justified in looking back with pride on the old days when the conflict had fatigue and danger in it; and it was only after years of continuous struggle that the women and children of the manufacturing districts of England were rescued from as degrading and oppressive a slavery as human creatures were ever cursed with.

A HARD FIGHT.

Lord Shaftesbury obtained legislation in 1833, but he had to defend his measure in 1836 from an attack of Poulett Thomson, the member of Parliament for Manchester, who proposed to modify what had been done. After a long debate a division was taken, in which the Earl of Shaftesbury was defeated by a majority of two, one hundred and seventy-eight voting for Poulett Thomson, and one hundred and seventy-six on the side of the factory children. We have not space to record the fluctuations of the fight, but the statement of the noble lord on the 9th of July, 1874, in the House of Lords, must have been a source of great satisfaction to him, as well as of confidence to the country, that what has been done in this matter has been safely done.

"At last," said his lordship, "after forty-one years of exertion, we find ourselves in possession of what we desired at first—a Ten Hours' Bill. When I began, in 1833, the opposition was hot, I may say fierce. I numbered on my side but two mill-owners—John Wood and John Fielden, both inestimable men." Now multitudes are on the side of the factory workers, and though the opposition was stronger at that time than Lord Shaftesbury cared to state, still truth and humanity have prevailed against exaggerated statement and false prophecy, and the health and happiness of the people have been promoted without injury to an honest man, or any legitimate interest in the country.

His lordship's reply on the same occasion to those manufacturers and doctrinaires who say that women do not want protection was decided and effective. "I would," said he, "undertake to go from town to town in Lancashire and Yorkshire, and carry in every town the overwhelming majority of female suffrages in behalf of the bill."

We have dwelt on this great work of Earl Shaftesbury's life because it is a justification of his wise humanity displayed in favor of the masses of the working people, whose oppression was in former days declared to be necessary to the maintenance of the manufacturing and commercial superiority of Great Britain as a nation. In truth, the Earl has reaped an abundant harvest of respect and gratitude from the working people of England as a reward for his efforts on their behalf.

The foregoing was one great effort of Lord Shaftesbury for the public good; but those who followed his career from the days of his early manhood until his death will readily admit that it would be no light task to attempt a description of the services he rendered to numerous philanthropic institutions, at many of whose anniversaries at the London May meetings he presided. If we single out one institution to which especially he devoted much time, it is the national refuges for homeless and

DESTITUTE CHILDREN.

Lord Shaftesbury never appeared as truly at home as when among these poor children, either in the old house at Queen Street, London, or on board the training ship Arethusa. Not long ago, when addressing the lads and a numerous company of ladies and gentlemen on this vessel, he said: "Before going back to town, I must thank the boys very much for the suit of clothes which they have sent my grandson, with the word Chichester upon the cap. My grandson will wear the clothes until they are worn out, and all I hope is that he will inherit the love which his grandfather cherishes for the Chichester boys. My dear lads, I rejoice to think you have repaid the care bestowed upon you, and have shown that God's grace has not been given in vain. Eight years ago, my dear friend William Williams, who has so long done the Master's work among the destitute of this great city, sat with me in council, and we asked each other, 'What is to be done for these homeless and savage lads?' My friend, being of a convivial turn, suggested a great supper in Queen Street, and we accordingly issued invitations for a great entertainment. We entertained nearly three hundred boys. Some stayed away because they were afraid they would have 'nothing to eat and plenty of jaw'; but I told them they should have plenty to eat and no jaw. Some of them said they were afraid of the police. But to-day we have Colonel Henderson, Chief of the London Police, with us, and do any of the boys look as if they were afraid of him?"

It need hardly be said that there was a loud shout of "No" to this query, and the noble Earl went on to say that if some good-hearted Christian would give Mr. Williams and himself $500,000, they would lead London of the vagrant population.

PUBLIC HONORS.

A more striking proof, perhaps, of the high esteem in which the noble Earl was held could hardly have been given than when, in April, 1878, he was presented with the freedom of the city of Edinburgh in the Free Church Assembly Hall, in the presence of upward of two thousand persons. The Lord Provost, who presided, said that the document which he placed in Earl Shaftesbury's hands was intended to mark their appreciation of those successful efforts which, with untiring devotion, during a long life he had made to ameliorate the moral and physical condition of the laboring classes, and in recognition of the work he had done as a Christian philanthropist.

The Lord Provost, in giving a summary of the noble Earl's long career of labors and achievements, not only referred to the successful issue of the factory struggle, but to his efforts on behalf of agricultural laborers and the mining population. "Altogether," said the Lord Provost, "I do not over-estimate the fact when I say that the ragged schools of London since their establishment have rescued from neglect and vicious courses at least two hundred thousand children, and placed them in the way of earning an honest livelihood. Lord Shaftesbury has presided at every one of the anniversaries of the Union without a single exception, and during its whole existence he has labored in its interests with unflinching perseverance. And while in conducting this great movement there has been associated with him a large number of earnest and God-fearing men and women, to his orship's influence and zeal are mainly due its extension and success."

Among other topics referred to by the Lord Provost it was stated that no estimate of Lord Shaftesbury's philanthropic labors would be complete without special reference to what he had done to improve the condition of the inane, a work which was begun fifty years ago, and which must be regarded as one of the great efforts of his life. The records of the religious and benevolent societies showed that his charity extended to all lands, and that the aspiration of his soul was that the time might come when the race of God would regenerate all men.

REMINISCENCES.

The reply of Lord Shaftesbury was exceedingly touching and full of pregnant truth. His hints to those who may follow in his footsteps and attack gigantic evils defended by commercial magnates, who grow rich on the lives of their employes, are very suggestive: "I can only say that an additional honor confers and rings with it an additional responsibility, and I trust that, God helping me, I shall do nothing to tarnish the distinction that has been conferred upon me. My Lord Provost, you have been good enough to enumerate a number of movements in which I along with others have been instrumentally engaged for the general improvement of society. But I wish to observe that many of these movements were of a character which could take place only in a free country, where individuals may stir and urge forward real matters of legislation, where they are free to appeal to and excite public opinion, and to bring that public opinion to bear upon reluctant overnments, who at last, by the force of the appeal, and the truth of the facts, are compelled to undertake those measures that at first they rejected, or from which they shrank under the reassurance of existing responsibilities."

On the conclusion of the noble Earl's speech, the Lord Provost, in accordance with time-honored custom, called for three cheers for the youngest burgess, and Lord Shaftesbury, in responding, said: "I did not expect to hear the term 'juvenile' applied to me; for although I am the youngest of burgesses, I believe I am old enough to be father of you all."

Lord Shaftesbury cordially co-operated in the religious movements conducted by Messrs. Moody and Sankey in England, in 1875, and expressed the highest opinion of the value of their evangelistic labors throughout the United Kingdom.

Lord Shaftesbury also took a deep interest in young men.

When the London Young Men's Christian Association was organized he was elected its first President, and was re-elected every year afterward. He served in that capacity twenty-nine years, and, as he said at a recent gathering, he was the only President they had had. Referring to Exeter Hall, the historic building which the M. C. A. now owns, he said: "Exeter Hall stood on what had been the gardens of the Earl of Exeter. One of his ancestors had lived there, and had married a daughter of the house, from whom he (the Earl) was descended. The Archbishop of Canterbury had reminded him that he could not live very long. Well, he hoped to be able to meet them once again, but, should it be ordered otherwise, they might rest assured that he would not cease as long as he lived to pray for their welfare, temporal and eternal."

THE EIGHTIETH BIRTHDAY

This popular nobleman occurred on April 28th, 1881, and the various societies with which he was connected resolved to make the occasion an opportunity to express publicly their sense of his long and valuable services. The Lord Mayor of London offered the use of the Guildhall for a public meeting. The vast hall itself was thronged as it had seldom been before, the gathering including members of all the principal religious denominations and of various shades of politics. In the Guildhall yard there were donkeys attached to barrows and decorated with small flowers, in testimony of the manner in which his lordship has long befriended persons of the costermonger class, while inside, the scene on the platform was enlivened by flowers, brought to the hall in baskets by girls in neat-looking dresses, who represented the Watercress and Flower Girls' Mission. The spacious platform was crowded with friends of the noble Earl, and the chair was occupied by the Lord Mayor, who was attended by the sword and mace-bearer, and wore his civic robe as chief magistrate of the city. A congratulatory letter was read from Mr. Alfred Tennyson, the Poet Laureate, who said: "Allow me to assure you in plain prose how cordially I join with those who honor the Earl of Shaftesbury as the friend of the poor, and who wish him many years of health and strength in which to continue his good works, and to invite others to follow his example." At the meeting the Earl was presented with a full-length portrait of himself, and the street vendors gave him, as a token of their esteem and gratitude, the handsomest donkey in all London.

To the last, though eighty-four years old, the noble Earl was erect in his bearing, and walked long distances. He travelled to Paris in May, 1878, to open the Evangelistic Hall at the Paris Exhibition.

THE BISHOP-MAKER.

The influence of the Earl of Shaftesbury was productive of good in more ways than the public was aware of. One of them may be mentioned here. During Lord Palmerston's lease of power it so happened that death removed from the Episcopal bench an unusually large number of bishops. The appointment of their successors vested in the Premier, and Lord Palmerston, who was an authority on racing matters and many other departments of that nature, was utterly ignorant of theology. He had the good sense not to exercise his patronage either from motives of nepotism or casual acquaintance, but always applied for advice to his relative, the Earl of Shaftesbury, and always followed it. The result was that the episcopal appointments of a premier notoriously careless and indifferent on all religious questions were more judicious than those of men who had given the subject their personal attention. This fact occasioned much surprise at the time, but after Lord Palmerston's death the secret of the Earl of Shaftesbury's influence was disclosed, and the public understood how it came about that so wise a discrimination had been exercised in that important part of the Premier's patronage.

THE CONVERSION OF LYDIA MONTEFIORE.

A BOOK recently published by Messrs. Morgan & Scott describes the conversion of the aunt of the eminent Jewish philanthropist, Sir Moses Montefiore. The following extract from its pages shows how in her extreme old age, and when death was approaching, the Saviour, for whom she had left her people and suffered the loss of family affection, stood by her, comforting and supporting her to the last.

As her bodily infirmities increased, and the outward man gradually decayed, so her inward man was renewed day by day, and she was enabled to bear delightful testimony to the power and grace of God. She had before her the hope of immortality, and all those who saw her were astonished at the peaceful state of her mind. She "rejoiced with joy unspeakable and full of glory" at the prospect of shortly being with Him whom against she had not seen yet she loved, and how often her cry was: "Come quickly, Lord Jesus."

On hearing she was not well I called on her, and we spent a profitable hour together. On seeing me she said: "I am very pleased to see you, my dear friend, but I do not think you have much longer to come and see me. I feel daily that I shall soon be called home to be with those who came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and have made them white in the blood of the Lamb! All my pains and infirmities are like so many notices of the near approach of death. Yes, I daily look for it. Every morning when I rise I thank my Saviour, and say to myself, I may never lie down again, and every night when I lie down, I may never rise again. I am ready, 'for I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed unto Him against that day.' And should He call me, even the next hour, to pass through the dark 'valley' which is merely the 'shadow of death,' I shall 'fear no evil,' for He who has saved me has promised that He will never leave me, nor forsake me!" This was

and this is the hope of every Christian.

The aged saint had now entered her eighty-sixth year; her infirmities had much increased. Early in 1857, writing to a friend, she says: "I am still ill, and never expect to be well again in this world." It was during this illness that it pleased the Lord to put her faith to strong trial, and to exercise her oft-repeated assurance, "I know He will never forsake me." In March of the same year she received on his way to the East, but he only remained with her a few minutes. On entering her chamber he inquired how she was, and expressed his regret at finding her so poorly, in reply to which she said, "I am very ill, and I am waiting for the Lord Jesus to come and take me home." When Sir Moses heard that name, so sweet to a believer's ear, but to the Jews a stumbling-block, he snatched up his hat and rushed out of the room. From that hour till her death he never held further intercourse with her by word or deed. She felt this more than she could express, at the same time she thanked God for having enabled her to witness for the Lord Jesus before her unbelieving nephew. "My Saviour's command," she used to say, "is, 'Whosoever shall confess me before men, I will I confess also before my Father which is in Heaven.'" To hear the name of Jesus from his aged aunt was more than Sir Moses Montefiore expected.

After much prayer for guidance she sent him, in March, 1857, a letter, in which she said: "In consideration of all your kindness toward me, it is impossible for me to pass over in silence our last interview—afforded me doubtless by yourself from the same affectionate disposition which you have ever manifested—without expressing my hearty regret at the untoward circumstance of your sudden withdrawal from my apartment."

"Aware of the short opportunity there is left me by Divine Providence of thanking you for all the kind interest you have taken in my welfare, I desire to do it now most cordially, and to assure you that my heart's desire and prayer for you is that you may be saved by that only name of Jesus, the Messiah, by which alone man may be saved, even by Him whom you blindly reject. I am aware you would hardly thank me for praying for you in that name, because the veil of unbelief is still upon you, as it has been these eighteen centuries upon our poor, benighted people of the house of Israel, for having crucified their own Messiah, the Lord of glory. Nevertheless, I feel it my duty and privilege to bear testimony for the holy name of my Saviour, whom I expect soon to meet in the regions above, where He is gone to prepare a place for me, and for you also, if you do not persist in your unbelief, but search as I did, and that honestly and ardently, the Scriptures of Moses, the Psalms, and the prophets, which testify of His passion, death and resurrection."

THE LORD'S RAZOR.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Oct. 11, 1885.

"In the same day shall the Lord shave with a razor that is hired, namely, by them beyond the river, by the King of Assyria."—ISAIAH 7:20.

The Daring Imagery of the Bible—A Suggestive Symbol—To be Used Carefully—On the Unfortunate—Poverty not Always a Punishment—A Search for a Captive King—An Implement of Precision—Preservation from Cholera—Todd Lincoln at the Cabinet Council—The Shaving of the Nations—Ancient Rome—The Weapon Hired—A King's Self-humiliation—The Unfinished Monument.

THE Bible is the boldest book ever written. There are no similitudes in Ossian or the Iliad or the Odyssey so daring. Its imagery sometimes seems on the verge of the reckless, but only seems so. The fact is that God would startle and arouse and propel men and nations. A tame and limping similitude would fail to accomplish the object. While there are times when He employs in the Bible the gentle dew and the morning cloud and the dove and the daybreak in the presentation of truth, we often find the iron chariot, the lightning, the earthquake, the spray, the sword, and, in my text, the razor.

This keen-bladed instrument has advanced in usefulness with the ages. In Bible times and lands the beard remained uncut save in the seasons of mourning and humiliation, but the razor was always

A SUGGESTIVE SYMBOL.

David says of Doeg, his antagonist: "Thy tongue is a sharp razor working deceitfully"; that is, it pretends to clear the face, but is really used for deadly incision. In this morning's text this weapon of the toilet appears under the following circumstances: Judea needed to have some of its prosperities cut off, and God sends against it three Assyrian kings—first Sennacherib, then Esarhaddon, and afterward Nebuchadnezzar. These three sharp invasions, that cut down the glory of Judea, are compared to so many sweeps of the razor across the face of the land. And these circumstances were called a hired razor because God took the kings of Assyria, with whom He had no sympathy, to do the work, and paid them in palaces and spoils and annexations. These kings were hired to execute the divine behests. And now the text, which on its first reading may have seemed trivial or inapt, is charged with momentous import: "In the same day shall the Lord shave with a razor that is hired—namely, by them beyond the river, by the King of Assyria."

NOT A TOY.

Well, if God's judgments are razors, we had better be careful how we use them on other people. In careful sheath these domestic weapons are put away, where no one by accident may touch them, and where the hands of children may not reach them. Such instruments must be carefully handled or not handled at all. But how recklessly some people wield the judgments of God! If a man meet with business misfortune, how many there are ready to cry out: "That is a judgment of God upon him because he was unscrupulous, or arrogant, or over-reaching, or miserly. I thought he would get cut down! What a clean sweep of everything! His city house and country house gone. His stables emptied of all the fine bays and sorrels and grays that used to prance by his door. All his resources overthrown, and all that he prided himself on tumbled into demolition. Good for him!" Stop, my brother. Don't sling around too freely the judgments of God, for they are razors.

DISASTER NOT PUNISHMENT.

Some of the most wicked business men succeeded, and they live and die in prosperity, and some of the most honest and conscientious are driven into bankruptcy. Perhaps his manner was unfortunate, and he was not really as proud as he looked to be. Some of those who carry their head erect and look imperial are humble as a child, while many a man in seedy coat and slouch hat and unblackened shoes is as proud as Lucifer. You cannot tell by a man's look. Perhaps he was not unscrupulous in business, for there are two sides to every story, and everybody that accomplishes anything for himself or others gets industriously lied about. Perhaps his business misfortune was not a punishment, but the fatherly discipline to prepare him for heaven, and God may love him far more than He loves you, who can pay dollar for dollar, and are put down in the commercial catalogues as A1. Whom the Lord loveth He gives four hundred thousand dollars and lets die on embroidered pillows? No; whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth. Better keep your hand off the Lord's razors, lest they cut and wound people that do not deserve it. If you want to shave off some of the bristling pride of your own heart, do so; but be very careful how you put the sharp edge on others.

How I do dislike the behavior of those persons who, when people are unfortunate, say: "I told you so—getting punished—served him right." If those I-told-you-so's got their desert they would long ago have been pitched over the battlements. The mote in their neighbor's eyes, so small that it takes a microscope to find it, gives them more trouble than the beam which obscures their own optics. With air sometimes supercilious and sometimes Pharisaical, and always blasphemous, they take the razor of divine judgment and sharpen it on the hone of their own hard hearts, and then go to work on men sprawled out at full length under disaster, cutting mercilessly. They begin by soft expressions of sympathy and pity and half praise, and later the victim all over before they put on the sharp edge.

A CAPTIVE KING.

Let us be careful how we shoot at others lest we take down the wrong one, remembering the servant of King William Rufus who shot a deer, but the arrow glanced against a tree and killed the king. Instead of going out with shafts to pierce, and razors to cut, we had better imitate the friend of Richard Cœur de Lion, who, in the war of the Crusades, was captured and imprisoned, but none of his friends knew where. So his loyal friend went around the land from stronghold to stronghold, and sang at each window a snatch of song that Richard Cœur de Lion had taught him in other days. And one day coming before a jail where he suspected his king might be incarcerated, he sang two lines of song, and immediately King Richard responded from his cell with the other two lines, and so his whereabouts were discovered, and immediately a successful movement was made for his liberation. So let us go up and down the world with the music of kind words and sympathetic hearts, serenading the unfortunate, and trying to get out of trouble men who had noble natures, but by unforeseen circumstances have been incarcerated, thus liberating kings. More hymn-book and less razor.

TO THE FAULTY.

Especially ought we to be apologetic and merciful toward those who, while they have great faults, have also great virtues. Some people are barren of virtues. No weeds verily, but no flowers. I must not be too much enraged at a nettle along the fence if it be in a field containing forty acres of ripe Michigan wheat. At the present time naturalists tell us there is on the sun a spot twenty thousand miles long, but from the brightness and warmth I conclude it is a good deal of a sun yet.

A PRECISE IMPLEMENT.

Again, when I read in my text that the Lord shaves with the hired razor of Assyria the land of Judea, I bethink myself of the precision of God's providence. A razor swung the tenth part of an inch out of the right line means either failure or laceration, but God's dealings never slip, and they do not miss, by the thousandth part of an inch, the right direction. People talk as though things in this world were at loose ends. Cholera sweeps across Marseilles and Madrid and Palermo, and we watch anxiously. Will the epidemic sweep Europe and America? People say, "That will entirely depend on whether the inoculation is a successful experiment; that will depend entirely on quarantine regulations; that will depend on the early or late appearance of frost; that epidemic is pitched into the world, and it goes blundering across the continents, and it is all guess-work and an appalling perhaps."

My friends, I think, perhaps, that God had something to do with it, and that His mercy may have in some way protected us, that He may have done as much for us as the quarantine and the health officers. It was right and a necessity that all caution should be used, but there has come enough macaroni from Italy, and enough grapes from the South of France, and enough rags from tatterdemalions, and hidden in these articles of transportation enough choleraic germs to have left by this time all Brooklyn mourning at Greenwood, and all Philadelphia at Laurel Hill, and all Boston at Mount Auburn. I thank all the doctors and quarantines, but more than all, and first of all, and last of all, and all the time, I thank God. In all the six thousand years of the world's existence there has not one thing merely "happened so." God is not an anarchist, but a King, a Father.

TODD LINCOLN.

When little Todd, the son of President Lincoln, died, all the land sympathized with the sorrow in the White House. He used to rush into the room where the Cabinet was in session, and while the most eminent men of the land were discussing the questions of national existence. But the child had no care about those questions. Now God the Father, and God the son, and God the Holy Ghost are in perpetual session in regard to this world and kindred worlds. Shall you, His child, rush in to criticise or arraign or condemn the divine government? No; the Cabinet of the Eternal Three can govern and will govern in the wisest and best way, and there never will be a mistake, and like razor skillfully swung, shall cut that which ought to be cut, and avoid that which ought to be avoided. Precision to the very hairbreadth. Earthly time-pieces may get out of order and strike wrong, saying it is one o'clock when it is two, or two when it is three. God's clock is always right, and when it is one it strikes one, and when it is twelve it strikes twelve, and the second hand is as accurate as the minute hand.

THE RAZOR OF WAR.

Further, my text tells us that God sometimes shaves nations: "In the same day shall the Lord shave with the razor that is hired." With one sharp sweep He went across Judah and down went its pride and its power. In 1861 God shaved our nation. We had allowed to grow Sabbath desecration, and oppression, and blasphemy, and fraud, and impurity, and all sorts of turpitude. The South had its sins, and the North its sins, and the East its sins, and the West its sins. We had been warned again and again, and we did not heed. At length the sword of war cut from the St. Lawrence to the Gulf, and from Atlantic seaboard to Pacific seaboard. The pride of the land, not the cowards, but the heroes, on both sides went down. And that which we took for the sword of war was the Lord's razor.

In 1862, again, it went across the land. In 1863 again. In 1864 again. Then the sharp instrument was encased and put away. Never in the history of the ages was any land more thoroughly shaved than during those four years of civil combat, and, my brethren, if we do not quit some of our individual and national sins, the Lord will again take us in hand. He has other razors within reach besides war; epidemics, droughts, deluges, plagues—grasshopper and locust—or our overpowering success may so far excite the jealousy of other lands that, under some pretext, the great nations of Europe and Asia may combine to put us down. This nation, so easily approached on North and South and from both oceans, might have on hand at once more hostilities than were ever arrayed against any one Power.

We have recently been told by skilful engineers that all our fortresses around New York harbor could not keep the shells from being hurled from the sea into the heart of these great cities. Insulted China, the wealthiest of all nations, as will be realized when her resources are developed, will have adopted all the modes of modern warfare, and at the Golden Gate may be discussing whether Americans must go. If the combined jealousies of Europe and Asia should come upon us, we should have more work on hand than would be pleasant. I hope no such combination against us will ever be formed, but I want to show that, as Assyria was the hired razor against Judah, and Cyrus the hired razor against Babylon, and the Huns the hired razor against the Goths, there are now many razors that the Lord could hire if, because of our national sins, He should undertake to shave us. In 1870, Germany was the razor with which the Lord shaved France. England is the razor with which very shortly the Lord will shave Russia. But nations are to repent in a day. May a speedy and world-wide coming to God hinder on both sides the sea, all national calamity. But do not let us, as a nation, either by unrighteous law at Washington, or bad lives among ourselves, defy the Almighty.

THE RAZOR ON ANCIENT ROME.

One would think that our national symbol of the eagle might sometimes suggest another eagle, that which ancient Rome carried. In the talons of that eagle were clutched at one time Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Dalmatia, Rhætia, Noricum, Pannonia, Mœsia, Dacia, Thrace, Macedonia, Greece, Asia Minor, Syria, Phœnicia, Palestine, Egypt, and all Northern Africa, and all the islands of the Mediterranean, indeed, all the world that was worth having, an hundred and twenty millions of people under the wings of that one eagle. Where is she now? Ask Gibbon, the historian, in his prose poem, the "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." Ask her gigantic ruins straggling their sadness through the ages, the screech owl at windows out of which world-wide conquerors looked. Ask the day of judgment when her crowned debauchees, Commodus and Pertinax, and Caligula and Diocletian, shall answer for their infamy? As men and as nations let us repent, and have our trust in a pardoning God, rather than depend on former successes for immunity! Out of thirteen greatest battles of the world, Napoleon had lost but one before Waterloo. Pride and destruction often ride in the same saddle.

THE HIRED WEAPON.

But notice once more, and more than all in my text, that God is so kind and loving, that when it is necessary for Him to cut, He has to go to others for the sharp-edged weapon. "In the same day shall the Lord shave with a razor that is hired." God is love. God is pity. God is help. God is shelter. God is rescue. There are no sharp edges about Him, no thrusting points, no instruments of laceration. If you want balm for wounds, He has that. If you want salve for divine eyesight, He has that. But if there is sharp and cutting work to do which requires a razor, that He hires. God has nothing about Him that hurts, save when dire necessity demands, and then He has to go clear off to some one else to get the instrument.

This divine geniality will be no novelty to those who have pondered the Calvarean massacre, where God submerged Himself in human tears, and crimsoned Himself from punctured arteries, and let the terrestrial and infernal worlds maul Him until the chandeliers of the sky had to be turned out, because the universe could not endure the indecency. Illustrious for love He must have been to take all that as our substitute, paying out of His own heart the price of our admission at the gates of heaven.

King Henry II., of England, crowned his son as king, and on the day of coronation put on a servant's garb and waited, he, the king, at the son's table, to the astonishment of all the princes. But we know of a more wondrous scene, the King of heaven and earth offering to put on you, His child, the crown of life, and in the form of a servant waiting on you with blessing. Extol that love, all painting, all sculpture, all music, all architecture, all worship! In Dresdenian gallery let Raphael hold Him up as a child, and in Antwerp Cathedral let Rubens hand Him down from the cross as a martyr, and Handel make all his oratorio vibrate around that one chord—"He was wounded for our transgressions, bruised for our iniquity." But not until all the redeemed get home, and from the countenances of all the piled-up galleries of the ransomed shall be revealed the wonders of redemption, shall either man or seraph or archangel know the height, and depth, and length, and breadth of the love of God.

AN UNFINISHED MONUMENT.

At our national capital, a monument in honor of him who did more than any one to achieve our American Independence, was for scores of years in building, and most of us were discouraged and said it never would be completed. And how glad we all were when in the presence of the highest officials of the nation, the work was done! But will the monument to Him who died for the eternal liberation of the human race ever be completed? For ages the work has been going up; evangelists and apostles and martyrs have been adding to the heavenly pile, and every one of the millions of the redeemed going up from earth, has made to it contribution of gladness, and weight of glory is swung to the top of other weight of glory, higher and higher as the centuries go by, higher and higher as the whole millenniums roll, sapphire on the top of jasper, sardonyx on the top of chalcedony, and chrysoprasus above topaz, until, far beneath shall be the walls and towers and domes of the great capital, a monument forever and forever rising, and yet never done. "Unto Him who hath loved us and washed us from our sins in His own blood, and made us kings and priests forever." Allelujah, amen.

THE CHRISTIAN CONVENTION IN NEW YORK.

ON Monday evening, October 5th, the Twenty-third Street Tabernacle was crowded in every part by a congregation assembled to take part in the opening proceedings of the Convention on Holiness and Divine Healing. The building was originally intended for a theatre, and the seats are still lettered and numbered to correspond with the tickets. The front part of what was the stage is cut away to form steps so that persons may pass through an opening in the part formerly appropriated to the orchestra to the stage, but the choir and the speakers entered from the wings. The stage or platform was covered with crimson baize, and of course the footlights had been removed. At the back of the platform relieving the blank wall is a circular window of stained glass, the centre panel of which displayed the figure of a dove with outspread wings. The building itself is square, but the circular gallery or balcony, which covers nearly a third of the floor, gives it, looking from the stage, the apparent shape of a horseshoe.

The gathering was a notable one from many points of view. Looking over it from the platform, the stranger was impressed chiefly by the similarity of expression in all faces. Like that eventful meeting centuries ago in Jerusalem, it seemed as if "they were all with one accord in one place." It was difficult to analyze that expression of countenance, but looking from one to another—here a young man, and there one with white hair and furrowed brow; here a young, intelligent lady, there a swarthy negro; people of all ages, all conditions of life, and all degrees of culture; everywhere the same look was to be seen. It seemed compounded of joy and expectancy. Another glance around, with that clue, and the impression was confirmed. There was not a gloomy, sorrowful face to be seen. And yet the observer would have been surprised to see laughter at that time on any face there. Those people could laugh, but they were not in that mood then—it was not that kind of joy that the spectator noticed. It was rather an intent, glad, expectant look, which spoke of profound spiritual peace and unalloyed happiness, which might easily be stirred to ecstasy.

Whether the spectator was or was not in accord with the spirit of the congregation, whether he thought the people before him were believers in a great truth, or were self-deceived fanatics, he must be convinced that they were possessed by some faith which raised them into a sphere above that attained by the masses of the people; something which made them supremely happy. A notorious unbeliever, who, prompted by curiosity, had strolled into the building, referring to this fact, said he would not deceive such people if he could. It would be as heartless to do so as to awaken a slumbering child whose smile told that she was walking through fairyland in her dreams.

A solemn stillness pervaded the meeting as the chairman and the speakers took their places on the platform and engaged for a few minutes in silent prayer. The Rev. A. B. Simpson, the pastor of the Tabernacle, presided, and on the platform with him, among others, were Mrs. Baxter, Miss Carrie F. Judd, Mrs. Naylor, Dr. Wilson, of St. George's, and Dr. Clift, of Philadelphia. At subsequent sessions other well-known speakers participated in the proceedings. Among them Rev. W. R. Rainsford, Dr. John Cookman, Captain Pennington, and Rev. Stephen Merritt.

The addresses differed from those at other meetings as the audience differed from other audiences. The distinguishing feature common, in a greater or less degree, to every speech was that of personal testimony. Each speaker in declaring the faith that was in him spoke of his own personal experience, and not a few stated or implied that nothing less than personal experience, sometimes very marvellous, often very painful, and again very joyous—always an experience not heard of from others, but actually felt by themselves—could have wrought in them the convictions they uttered. As one minister said, at the last session on Friday night, when he recognized some members of his own congregation in the audience, "I know my belief in these matters is not accepted by my church, but here I stand. God help me, I can do no less. He has healed me."

At every session, whether the subject was personal cleansing from sin or divine healing—whether the speaker was on the platform making a long address, or a volunteer rising to speak for two minutes from among the audience, the basis of the words spoken was the same: "I know, for I have felt; I am a living witness." The effect produced was most impressive. The testimony was overwhelming. The most incredulous could not gainsay it. The only escape from agreeing with the witnesses was in the theory, which they emphatically repudiated, that the results produced were the effects of the faith exercised, and not due to the direct interposition of the Almighty. That some present adopted that view was evident from the signs of concurrence manifested when one of the speakers told of a boyish experience of a severe pain, which was invariably relieved on his practising a charm consisting in his taking up a stone and turning it. But that concurrence was exceptional. The bulk of the Convention clearly believed that the holiness and the healing were as much the direct work of God as were the cases mentioned in the Gospels. This was an incontrovertible fact, for when, at the closing session, Mr. Simpson invited all who had received the blessing during that week to rise, fully one hundred stood up, and when he afterward asked those who had experienced divine healing at any time to rise, more than half the house were promptly on their feet.

A report of some of the principal addresses and testimonies will appear in our next issue.

A SECOND ADVENT PREACHING TOUR.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

ON Tuesday, September 8th, I embarked at Liverpool on the City of Chester steamship for America. It is one of the least swift vessels of the Inman Line, only accomplishing about three hundred and twenty miles a day, and did not reach New York till Saturday, September 19th, whereas the City of Rome, of the same line, started on September 9th, and arrived at New York on September 18th. Some of the Cunard vessels accomplish the voyage in seven or eight days.

A STORMY VOYAGE.

The sea was very rough for the first eight days, and many of the passengers suffered greatly from sea-sickness, to which, however, I was a stranger. Mrs. Baxter suffered far less than from former experience might have been expected. She found great relief in staying on the deck as much as possible, even when every one else was driven below by the rain and wind. In rough weather the portholes, or windows, of the cabins are closed, and the atmosphere becomes very hot from the engines, which occupy all the centre part of the vessels, while the cabins constitute the circumference. The heat and constant thumping of the engines, together with the violent rocking of the vessel in a storm, are very trying for all but robust people.

GOSPEL SERVICE.

We heard of some of the passengers who, during the storm, cried to God for mercy, and vowed to live better lives in future if they were spared. On Sunday the church service was read by the captain, as usual, and the Rev. Frank White, of Notting Hill Tabernacle, preached in the morning and I and he in the evening. During the week we held several open-air meetings on the deck and in the steerage.

BIBULOUS PRIESTS.

There were some priests on board who were smoking and drinking whiskey and playing cards during most of the voyage. A steward told me that out of hundreds of priests who had sailed on that vessel, he noticed that most of them drank whiskey freely, so that he had come to the conclusion that they probably had some dispensation from Rome to drink as much as they liked on the high seas—possibly in order to ward off sea-sickness.

On the fifth or sixth day the sea-sick generally recover, notwithstanding the continued roughness of the sea. Iced water and also constant doses of arrow-root greatly alleviate the sickness. Cabin passengers are supplied with ice, arrow-root, tea, coffee, and other refreshments on deck or in their cabins all day long, as well as with the regular meals. The cabin passage varies from sixty to seventy-five dollars. The intermediate passage is very good at $35, and the steerage wonderfully commodious at $20. The steerage passengers really have the best part of the vessel in front, free from all the noise and heat of the engines.

A clergyman named Arnold was on board with his family and several young men going to settle in Florida, orange farming. There were two other parties on board going to settle in Florida on orange farms. Quite a mania has sprung up lately for orange farming; but my brother-in-law, who has settled in that State, and others with experience say there are many drawbacks. The heat is great in summer, the mosquitoes most harassing, and it is questionable whether there will not soon be more oranges grown than can be sold.

Colonel Beers, an officer of the British Army, was also on board, emigrating with his family to Corsicana, in Texas. Altogether there were nine hundred and fifty persons on board. Mrs. Baxter believes for and claims the ultimate salvation of all of them, on the authority of the text, "Believe on the Lord Jesus and thou shalt be saved, and thy house," and, "Lo, God hath given thee all them that sail with thee" (Acts 16: 31; 27: 24). She considers that the ship may be regarded for the time being as the house, Reaching New York at 9 A.M. Saturday, we did not get out of the Custom House until 3 P.M., for each passenger has to go in turn before the Custom House officials—a most tedious process. I had to pay $125 duty on $500 worth of books and pamphlets. An Englishman indoctrinated with free-trade ideas feels it a grievance that the United States should tax English goods when England admits American goods free of duty. It may conduce to the prosperity of the country, but the English arrival makes a wry face over his loss of money. Some of the eight-day passage Cunard steamers start always on Saturday from Liverpool, and arrive at the New York Custom House on Sunday morning, and the passengers do not all pass through the Custom House till three or four o'clock in the afternoon.

containing one and a half million people, looks to a stranger like a large island nearly two miles wide and twelve miles long, nearly all built over. The long suspension bridge which connects New York with Brooklyn is an engineering marvel. Some of the buildings in both cities are eleven stories high. The bright red brick of many of the edifices, and the quantity of large gilt letters on the buildings, is very noticeable, and the general aspect is much more like Continental than English cities.

On Sunday morning, September 20th, I heard Dr. Talmage preach a most eloquent and impressive sermon to an overflowing congregation in his Tabernacle, which is an immense amphitheatre. After the service many went up to shake hands with him. In the afternoon, after dining with Dr. Talmage, I went to the American in Washington Street, Brooklyn. There was a well-dressed audience there, but even working-men in America can afford to have a black cloth coat, and are better off than in England.* This is the headquarters of General Moore's incorporated American Salvation Army, numbering about one hundred stations in America. He was once a major in General Booth's American contingent of the Salvation Army, but he disconnected himself altogether from the Booths, and is now the head of this organization, which has its War Cry, and is called the Salvation Army. At the same time Commissioner Frank Smith has the headquarters of a branch of the English Salvation Army near the Battery, in New York, and is also said to have nearly one hundred stations. America is so big a country that there is room for both of these armies to live together in harmony, like the millennial lamb and lion. General Moore believes in and administers believers' baptism and the Lord's Supper, neither of which ordinances are observed in the other Army.

On the following Tuesday we travelled to a city of two hundred thousand inhabitants, four hundred and twenty-four miles from New York, at the other end of New York State. The railway accomplished the journey in eleven hours, with very few stoppages. A sumptuous dinner and supper is furnished in a dining-car during the journey. The houses outside the business part of Buffalo are generally detached from one another and scattered over a considerable space of ground, so the city is from two to three miles long. We stayed at Miss Carrie F. Judd's Faith Home. There is no hall holding more than three hundred persons to be rented in Buffalo, except the Y. M. C. A. hall, which seats five hundred; but this is used on Sunday afternoons, and was not allowed to be let for prophetic pre-millennial lectures.

I proceeded on Thursday to

HAMILTON, CANADA

West, a town of thirty-five thousand people, and engaged the Opera House for $25, for the following Sunday. The advertising in the news-

* Mr. Baxter will doubtless find some one in the course of his travels who will explain this fact, which seems to have impressed him, by tracing for him the connection between it and his experience in the Custom House.—ED.

papers and by posters and handbills cost another $25, and the Sunday collections came to $30. The building seats eleven hundred people, and large audiences were present. I observed the Salvation Army procession, with a drum and concertina, out of doors numbered twenty in the morning and forty in the evening. They have two halls in Hamilton. The city is very quiet on Sundays, and the people attend churches well.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

The Locality of Hell.—At a Recent Meeting Mr. Baxter narrated: "A woman in the east of Glasgow said to me, 'Mr. Baxter, I wish you could answer me one question which I have asked many times, but no one can answer me.' 'If you tell me what it is, perhaps I shall be able,' I replied. 'Well, it is this: Can you tell me where hell is?' 'I believe there is a hell in the sinner's own heart,' I rejoined, 'for sin and hell are so closely allied that you cannot separate them, for how shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?' 'Jesus only can save and great sinners.'

From a Garret to Glory.—Mr. J. G. Forbes remarked: "I used to visit a poor aged woman who lived in a garret, yet I need not say that she was rich in the Lord. Although there was not a whole pane in the window, and many other discomforts were around her, yet she was always happy. Many a blessed hour I spent, as I sat by her side and read to her God's Word, for she was bedridden and could not read it for herself. 'Oh, how blessed! how blessed!' she used to exclaim as I read some of the precious promises. And when at length she was called to be with God, as she was passing away her last words were, 'Happy, happy, happy.'

Striking the Lord Jesus.—Mr. Mabon observed: "I was speaking to a man the other day, and when trying to explain the way of life to him, I said: 'Supposing every time you went into the house you lifted your hand and struck your mother, could people say you loved that mother?' 'No, sir.' 'If every time you went among your companions you began to curse and swear, would any one say you loved God?' 'No, sir.' 'My friend,' I said, 'every time we sin against God we are lifting our hand to strike the Lord Jesus. You must get to your knees and cry, 'Against Thee, Thee only, have I sinned.' 'Thank God, the burden rolled away, light was thrown on his darkened soul, and he went away rejoicing in the Lord.'

A Lost Field of Gold.—Mr. Ferrie said: "Forty years ago there was a man in Southern Africa who bought a piece of land for farming purposes. But he was disappointed, for the soil was not good; nothing would grow upon it. He was told that there was gold ore in his land, and he made great excavations, but finding this also fruitless work, he sold the land for a trifling sum. The company who purchased it had more faith than he had, for they dug deeper, and were soon rewarded by finding it indeed a very wealthy piece of land. They brought up the rich ore by the ton. When this came to the previous owner's knowledge, he actually gnashed with his teeth, when he thought of what he had lost. Friend, take timely warning; you who have accepted and then thrown away God's offered gift, thinking it was of no value, are like the man who gave up his field of gold; you will gnash with your teeth when you think of what you have lost forever."

A Young Man's Darkness Dispelled.—The Rev. Mr. Ewing related: "I was speaking to a young man lately about eternal and spiritual concerns. He had got very easily into the light of the Gospel, but shortly afterward it was succeeded by cloud after cloud of darkness coming over him. When speaking to me of this trying experience, he said: 'I would rather be horse-whipped than again go through this terrible torture.' For a long time I could not get a passage of Scripture that would yield him any comfort. At length I spoke to him about Gethsemane, and told him that Christ had to go through the same temptations and the same terrible agony of soul, and what was necessary for Christ was surely necessary for him. It seemed never to have appeared to him in that light before, for he said: "I always knew that Christ wore the crown of thorns for me, and that He died for me, but I never thought of Him going through this terrible agony of soul for me." I told him that Christ's mental sufferings were far worse than His physical sufferings, great as they were. This brought peace and joy back to his soul, knowing that Christ had suffered in the same way for and before him. Dear friends, let us ever remember that temptation is a divine dispensation."

One of 374 Recruits for Jesus.—The Rev. Mr. Fullerton reported: "We have had many interesting cases in connection with Mr. Hammond's meetings, which were held in my church, of which I shall give one. A little girl of about twelve years of age came into the meeting. She went home, and instead of going into the apartment where her godly mother was, crept into a private sleeping apartment. By and by the mother missed her child, and going in search of her, she found Tibbie on her knees wrestling with her soul. When her mother entered she turned and said: 'Oh, mother, what shall I do? What shall I do? I can get no peace.' The mother did what she could to soothe the awakened and anxious girl, and Tibbie came to the meeting the next night and gave herself to Jesus, and she is now happy and rejoicing in the Lord. I may add that three hundred and seventy-four in all, in my church have professed to give themselves to Christ during the week of meeting."

Turning Point in a Jew's Life.—The Rev. Mr. Gault narrated: "I heard of a very interesting case in London of a man who was a bigoted Jew. He went to Ramsgate, where, on the beach one day, he met with a gentleman who spoke to him and told him that he himself was at one time a Jew, but that he was now a Christian. When the Jew heard this he became very angry, calling the 'gentleman a turncoat and many other disagreeable things; but from that time he was restless and unhappy. He went to the Continent, and when there he entered a Jewish synagogue. The officials, seeing that he was only a poor man, gave him a seat among the paupers. The man became indignant at such treatment, and went out. On his way from the synagogue he came to a German Protestant Church, which he entered. They spoke kindly to him, and provided him with a Bible and Psalm-book. 'Ah,' he thought, 'this is not unlike the things that I hear that Jesus did.' This was the turning point of that man's life; he acknowledged that Jesus was the promised Messiah, and accepted Him as his Saviour. He returned to England, and is now in a respectable position, and is a true worshipper of the Lord Jesus Christ."

A Converted Van-Driver's Conquest.—The Rev. Mr. McNeil related: "Not long ago a man told me the difficulties he had to step over before he became a Christian. He was a van-driver, and this is what he said: 'When I went my rounds in the morning the first place I called at was that of a man who used to say, "I will toss you." I had previously been as willing for it as he was, and whoever lost had to pay for a glass of whiskey for both. This practice was carried on for years, until one night I went into an evangelistic meeting, where I was deeply impressed, and stayed until the after-meeting. A gentleman came and spoke to me, but I did not hear a word he said, for my thoughts were running to the morning, when I should have to meet with the man with whom I was in the habit of drinking, and how could I tell him I had given it up? The devil was bringing up all manner of hindrances and obstacles, but the Lord gave me grace to overcome them all, and decide for Him that very night. On the following morning I made my first call with a trembling heart. The first words when I entered the first shop were,

"I'll toss you." "No," I said, "I decided for the Lord last night; I have done with all that," and I walked from the shop, thinking how easy it had been." The Lord was by His weak servant's side to give him grace in the hour of need and trial."

THE TWO RESURRECTIONS.

By Rev. Charles Graham.

Distinction between the Resurrection of the Just and the Unjust—What is Implied in It?—Christ's Own Resurrection as a Pledge—The Moral Fitness Requisite for the First Resurrection—The End for which Paul Lived—The Second Resurrection at the End of the Millennium.

The resurrection of the dead has ever been the hope of the people of God. While repeatedly mentioning both resurrections at the same time, Holy Scripture emphatically makes between the resurrection of the just and of the unjust. Thus our Lord declares to the Jews, "The hour is coming in which all that are in the graves shall hear His voice, and shall come forth, they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation" (judgment crisis*) (John 6: 28, 29).

WHAT IS IMPLIED.

The believer is "quickened together with Christ"—that is, he has received into his soul the resurrection life of the Lord Jesus. This secures the resurrection of his body. "If we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also that sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him" (1 Thess. 4: 14). "The Church is His body, the complement of Him that filleth all in all." Hence the declaration of the prophet, "They dead men shall live, my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust; for thy dew is as the dew of the herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead" (Isa. 26: 19). In quoting this passage we omit the italics, which brings us into harmony with Eph. 1: 23. It is clear that these words are addressed to those who shall form part of the first resurrection; for only such dwellers in the dust shall awake to sing. To deceased tyrants who shall have no part in that resurrection there is also in the context a distinct allusion.

THE RESURRECTION OF CHRIST

Himself as the first-fruit is a pledge of the harvest; and "the harvest is the end of the age." "Now is Christ risen from the dead and become the first-fruit of them that slept." The sleepers are the righteous (1 Thess. 4: 14). It is only of such Christ could be the first-fruit. The wicked shall be raised by His power, but it will be in the end of His millennial kingdom.

The selective character and distinctiveness of the resurrection of the righteous is evident from the fact of its

DEPENDENCE ON MORAL FITNESS.

Our blessed Lord declares, "They who shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage; neither can they die any more, for they are equal unto the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Their title to this resurrection "from the dead" is that they are children of God (Luke 20: 35, 36). This was the end for which Paul lived and labored, that he might attain to the resurrection from the dead (Phil. 3: 11).

In Holy Scriptures the coming of the Lord to set up His kingdom and the resurrection of His people are inseparably connected. To comfort the Thessalonian mourners, who thought the day of Christ had come, and that their relatives who slept in Him would not share with them in His kingdom, he says: "This we say unto you by the Word of the Lord, that we who are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord, shall not come before them who are asleep" (1 Thess. 4: 15-18).

* Into that crisis the believer shall not come.—JOHN 5: 24.

AN ERRONEOUS OPINION.

These Scriptures are clearly against the view of those who teach that there will be no resurrection of the dead until after the Millennium. As this view, though diminishing in the number of its adherents, is still prevalent, it may be well to adduce additional Scripture evidence on the subject. The hope of the Church for nearly the entire of the three first centuries was resurrection glory with Christ. But when the world took the Church under its patronage, the Church began to think the Millennium had already dawned, and began to spiritualize such Scriptures as Rev. 20: 4. Her spiritualizing—that is, her emulating interpretations of such Scriptures—set in with her own causality.

In the Millennial Kingdom, as we have seen, Christ will reign until He shall have put all enemies under His feet. Then as the man Christ Jesus, He will deliver up the kingdom to God the Father, and God will be all in all. Will it be when He has delivered up the kingdom He will come to raise His sleeping saints and change the living ones?

SHALL WE BEGIN TO REIGN

with Him when He has delivered up His kingdom? Or will He reign in a glorified body and His saints in a disembodied state, reign with Him?—that is, shall they reign while death reigns over them? Shall the apostles sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel while death will hold their bodies in the grave, and when there will be no twelve tribes to judge? Nay, nay; Dan. 7 shows us that when Christ takes the kingdom the saints will take it with Him, and they will not take it disembodied.

A marked distinction between the first and second resurrection is that those who arise in the first resurrection appear before the judgment-seat (Bema); but those who shall arise in the second resurrection, the resurrection of the unjust, appear before the great white throne. The believer is never said to stand before the throne for judgment; when Christ takes the throne he is enthroned with Him: "He that overcometh shall sit with me on my throne, as I also overcame and am set down with my Father on His throne."

In Rev. 20: 4 John sees the martyrs living and reigning with Christ. They are kings and priests unto God.

"THIS IS THE FIRST RESURRECTION."

Now, the rest of the dead live not again till the thousand years are finished. In this resurrection the sea, and the grave give up their dead. If we make the first resurrection figurative, we must make the second figurative also. Then as the result we have no resurrection either at the beginning or end of the Millennium.

I suppose there is no one who expects the Millennium to come before the seven angels (Rev. 8: 2) have sounded their trumpets. It is after their doing so that John sees the thrones occupied and the thousand years introduced. But it is when the seventh angel has sounded that the dead arise, and the time comes to give reward to prophets and saints, and to them that fear the Lord, both small and great (Rev. 11: 15-18).

It is not easy to see how any one, in the language of the Creed, can look for the resurrection of the dead and the life of the world to come, who does not believe that either he or any one else shall rise till a thousand years, which have not yet commenced, shall have passed away.

THE RESURRECTION OF THE UNJUST

will be to condemnation, to shame, and everlasting contempt. They shall go away to everlasting punishment; they shall be cast into the lake of fire, which is the second death. How ought these awful statements to wake up your utmost zeal and energy to rescue sinners from this eternal judgment and lead them to Christ for salvation! And in the prospect of the end of all things being at hand, how ought we ourselves to live that we may be found by the Lord without spot and blameless at His appearing?

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION, $1.50.

The thanks of the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are tendered to the subscribers who have expressed a wish to introduce the paper to their friends. As in former years, a concession in terms will be made in order to render this kindly project as light a burden as circumstances will permit. Any subscriber may have THE CHRISTIAN HERALD mailed every week to any address in the United States or Canada, from Oct. 1st to the end of the year, by sending twenty-five cents to this office. The large quantity of direct Christian teaching contained in fourteen numbers of the paper has only to be realized in order to recommend this low offer to the acceptance of all Christians desiring the increased circulation of religious literature. The publishers are encouraged to make the concession by the large response a similar offer brought last year, and by the letters of hearty thanks which were afterward received from persons too poor to subscribe for themselves, and from unconvinced persons to whom God had blessed its perusal.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Why We Have No Navy in Spite of the Large sums voted by every Congress for its construction will be understood by any one who studies the report issued by the Naval Board last week respecting the cost of one vessel. The lengthy document is thus summarized by the New York Times: "The old Mohican was repaired at the Mare Island Navy Yard by the novel process of constructing an entirely new vessel without authority of law on a totally different plan from that of the old one. There being no appropriation for the construction of a new vessel the process dragged along over a period of thirteen years, during which several changes were made in the plan of the vessel, and material already rotting from exposure was replaced with new. The ship was fitted with second-hand rigging designed for a larger vessel, and one set of boilers had to be taken out and replaced by another of a different type. When the botch work was completed it had cost some $200,000 more than such a vessel might have been built for." If the business of the Navy Department has been conducted on that principle throughout, there need be no surprise that the money has vanished with no visible results.

The Republican Candidate for the Governorship of New York issued his letter of acceptance last week. As it was generally assumed that the candidate was himself the platform of the party, his letter was the subject of considerable interest, especially to the Independents, who have now resumed their relations to the party. His statement of his political faith is unequivocal, and, if he should be elected, he will be sharply reminded of it if his conduct is not consistent with this document. On the subject of Civil Service Reform, which in this State is the prominent issue, he says: "I believe in Civil Service Reform, and welcome any action by any official, Federal or State, which shows a sincere purpose to promote and establish it. When it comes to be thoroughly understood and its methods perfected I am confident that it will commend itself to the people through the improvement of their official service and the purification of their political life." He advocates the suspension of the silver coinage, and on the vexed question of capital and labor urges such "legislation as may be required to give to active and intelligent labor, as well as capital, its just reward, and the laboring man his full share in the national prosperity." Precisely what legislation Mr. Davenport would advise he omits to state. Such legislation is urgently needed, but we are not likely to have it while the voters elect liquor-dealers and prize-fighters instead of statesmen to legislate for them.

A Committee of the Legislature of New York has been sitting in the city during the past week conducting an investigation respecting the licensing of disreputable resorts. It has for a long time been a puzzle to respectable people to understand how men who are known to be burglars, and other degraded men obtain licenses to sell liquor and keep places of entertainment to which criminals and abandoned women resort. Some light was shed on the question by one of the Licensing Commissioners, who said that in a city like this a great diversity of amusements is required. "The laborer, mechanic, and artisan had a right to seek inexpensive pleasure in places like the one under consideration. Foreigners came here with tastes and habits that could not be despised, and a concert garden, a dancing hall, or a sparring resort, if properly and orderly conducted, ought not to be denied a license. Persons who enjoy that kind of amusement should have an opportunity to get it in proper places." The place "under consideration" is a notorious resort of vile people of both sexes, decorated with lewd pictures, and the entertainment consists of obscene songs and conversation of the filthiest description. While a Commissioner who sees no harm in such places holds office, reformers despair of purifying the city.

Rioting Street-Car Drivers Caused a Disturbance in St. Louis, Mo., last week. A large number of men are on strike in that city, and on Thursday and Friday they made up organized bands of about forty men each, and stopped traffic. They opened the switches and turned the cars over, and in some cases completely demolished them. Already two lives have been lost in the riots. On Thursday rioters beat a driver to death, and on Friday one of the strikers was shot by a policeman, who saw him cutting the harness and molesting the officers on duty. The riots have caused a serious injury to business in the city, and the merchants have now made an attempt to arbitrate between the companies and the men on strike.

The Murderers of the Chinese Miners at Rock Springs, Wyoming, appear likely to escape punishment. The Grand Jury at that place has found "no bill" in their case. The matter is to be carried into the United States Courts, but the result will probably be the same if it is tried in that section. If they are allowed to escape, the whole nation will be disgraced in the eyes of the civilized world. The outrage was cowardly, brutal, and inexcusable, for the Chinese were engaged in lawful callings, and offered no provocation to their assailants.

The Small-Pox Scourge in Montreal Showed no abatement of its violence last week, and the infection is spreading in St. Clet and Waterloo. The deaths for the first nine days of this month were 374 in Montreal, 30 in St. Jean Baptiste, 21 in Cote St. Louis, 17 in Ste. Cunegonde, 14 in Ste. Henri—a total of 456 for the district. There were 51 deaths on Saturday for the whole district, or one more than the previous day. The health reports show upward of 15,000 persons vaccinated during September, and among the French there appears to be a slight increase in the desire to profit from the protection. Two hospitals, which cost $250,000, were opened last week, and formally dedicated. Ministers and Roman Catholic priests are urging the people to be vaccinated, and an American clergyman, the Rev. John Nichols, pastor of the American Presbyterian Church, announced from his pulpit lately that he would vaccinate all who applied. He met applicants at St. Mark's Hall, which he hired for that purpose, and reported that he had vaccinated three hundred persons. Having done all that is possible in that part of the city, he now offers his services as a public vaccinator.

The Funeral of the Earl of Shaftesbury took place on Thursday last. The religious services were held in Westminster Abbey. Hundreds of poor people stood outside the Abbey in a drechning rain during the entire time, being unable to get inside of the edifice, which was densely packed with mourners for the noble philanthropist. A large number of shoeblacks, with crap bands on their arms, and many other boys who had benefited by the charitable acts of the deceased, stood in the Abbey side by side with a distinguished gathering.

Mr. Parnell's Demands for Ireland Were plainly formulated on October 5th, in a remarkable speech delivered at a Parliamentary Convention held in Wicklow. He demands legislative independence for Ireland with the power of protecting Irish industries by a tariff, if an Irish Parliament deemed that course advantageous to the interests of the nation. Certain passages in his speech have led to the inference that he has come to an understanding with Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Chamberlain, and has received definite promises of concessions in the event of a Liberal victory at the polls.

The Roumelian Difficulty Has Not Been solved by the Conference of Diplomats at Constantinople. The two weeks' delay which has occurred, has, however, allowed national passions to cool, and rendered war less probable. The attitude of Serbia, which is threatening, is the most dangerous element in the problem. She demands an increase of territory to balance the accession to Bulgaria. Austria is avowedly the opponent of Russia in this matter, and as she has the support of Germany, it is expected that Russia will be reluctant to make any move in the direction of war. The situation still occasions apprehension to European statesmen.

The Trial of Mr. Stead, the Editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, on the charge of abduction, is set down for hearing on October 20th. It is estimated that the defence will entail an expenditure of $35,000. The Methodist churches of Great Britain have displayed their sympathy with the defendants by subscribing $12,500 toward a defence fund, and will probably contribute further. Now that the full report of the preliminary proceedings before the magistrate have been received, the suspicion is confirmed that Mr. Stead is being prosecuted not for the offence with which he is charged, but for offending persons in high official position. It is not pretended that the girl abducted suffered any harm at his hands. The Salisbury Cabinet have covered themselves with infamy in initiating the prosecution. It may be hoped now that a full disclosure will be made, no matter whom it may hurt.

The French Elections Have had a Result little short of revolution. The party of M. Gambetta which for more than eight years has ruled France, was hopelessly beaten. Instead of holding a strong and powerful majority in the Chambers, it is now a comparatively small and ineffective minority. Second elections have to take place in some two hundred districts where no choice was made, but the Opportunists cannot recover their ascendancy. Practically, there are but two parties now in the Legislature, the Monarchists and the Radicals. The Opportunists or moderate Republicans, may still obtain concessions if they hold together, but that is doubtful, and in any case, M. Clemenceau and his followers will dictate Republican policy in opposition to the Monarchists. The prevalent opinion is that the Opportunist failure was due to the disgust of the people at the ridiculous meddling of the Government in Madagascar and Tonquin. If the moderate Republicans combine with the Radicals, a restoration of the monarchy may still be prevented.

Subscriptions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers in the South with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have been received to the amount of $4. From "Subscriber," $2; Newark, N. J., $1; Davenport, Ia., $1.

The Letters for Mrs. Baxter Received at this office have been duly forwarded to her, but her engagements since her arrival have been so numerous that she has been unable to reply to all of them. She desires us to thank her correspondents for their communications, and to express her regret that she has not had time to acknowledge them personally. Some letters contained requests for prayer; those received her careful attention, and they were also remembered at the daily prayer-meetings at Barabach.

A Convention for Christian Life. Divine healing, and evangelistic work will be held next week in Philadelphia, from Tuesday, October 20th, to Friday, October 23d. Three sessions will be held each day. Those in the mornings will be held in the Kenuel Home, 127 South Twelfth Street, at 10 A.M. The afternoon and evening sessions will be at the Institute Hall, north-east corner of Eighteenth and Chestnut streets, at 3 P.M. and 7:30 P.M. Full particulars, with lists and terms of boarding places, may be obtained by addressing Mr. G. W. McCalla, 813 Arch Street, Philadelphia. Pa. Mrs. Baxter, Miss Carrie F. Judd, the Rev. A. B. Simpson, Dr. Clift, and others are expected to take part in the meetings. In another column will be found an invitation from Buffalo to a Christian Convention in that city during the following week. It is signed by Miss Carrie F. Judd, who personally and by her work has won the Christian affection of thousands of our readers.

Messrs. Mateer and Parker, Mr. Spurgeon's evangelists, have been holding revival services at Brookfield, Mass., on the conclusion of the Moody meetings at that place, at which Mr. Parker sang the solos. On October 4th a series of successful services at West Brookfield was brought to a close, during which many souls were brought to the Saviour each night. Last Sunday they commenced services at Ansonia, Conn., for the success of which they earnestly desire the prayers of all Christians.

A Temperance Mission in Hackensack, N. J., was conducted last week by Messrs. Mabey and English with great success. A dispatch from that city says: "The evangelists have in twelve days six hundred names signed to pledges. The success of the movement has been a great surprise to everybody in the town. Men, women, and children have become enthusiastic in the work, and flaunt the red ribbon conspicuously wherever they go. Judges, lawyers, physicians, business men, temperance men, moderate drinkers, and drunkards are all represented on the roll. A reform club has been organized, with a New York broker as President, and having on its roll many leading citizens of the town. This body is expected to continue the work upon the departure of Mabey and English."

The Explosion of Hell Gate on Saturday last was a notable engineering feat, and the most gigantic mining blast of modern times. Nine acres of solid rock were blown into the air in a moment by the single touch of an electric key from the hand of a child. The dangerous reef which blocked the East River until 1876, and was the dread of every mariner approaching New York Harbor from Long Island Sound, was partially destroyed nine years ago by the blowing up of Hallett's Point. Since then the work of dredging has gone forward, opening the channel for the passage of vessels. But Flood Rock remained a source of danger. Mining operations have been during these years steadily prosecuted, until four miles of galleries had been excavated and holes drilled in their roofs to receive the cartridges. On Friday last no less than two hundred and eighty-three thousand pounds of rackerock and dynamite had been distributed in these holes and connected with an electric battery. On Saturday morning thousands of people lined the banks of the river to witness the explosion for which so many years had been spent in preparation. On the Astoria bank, a thousand feet away from the perforated rock, stood General Newton with a few friends and his twelve-year-old daughter, who, when a mere baby, nine years ago, sent the spark that blew up the Hallett Rock. He deftly connected the wires communicating with the explosives to the keyboard, and pointing to a little button told the child to press it. She did so, and in an instant the ground under their feet shook, and looking out toward Flood Rock they saw a writhing wall of white and silver and gray. Fifty gigantic geyers, linked together by shivering, twisting masses of spray, soared upward, their shining pinnacles, with dome-like summits, looming like shattered floods of molten silver against the azure sky. Three magnificent monuments of solid water sprang far above the rest of the mass, the most westerly of them still rising after all else had begun to fall, till it towered nearly two hundred feet in air. The reef was broken into fragments, which will soon be removed, and vessels will pass, with twenty-six feet of water under them, over the dreaded spot where Hell Gate stood. We are now nearing a period in the world's history when there will be a convulsion of nature of which this colossal explosion is a feeble type (Rev. 16: 15-20).

An Attempt to Predict Tornadoes is Being made by the Signal Service. A Washington, D. C., journal says: "The phenomena of tornadoes, to the scientific study of which Lieutenant John P. Finley, of the Signal Corps, has devoted about eight years, are now so well understood as to warrant the belief that trustworthy warnings may soon be sent out to the inhabitants of localities which may be threatened with disastrous visitations. Daily predictions are, in fact, being made at present, having begun last year and continued during the tornado season, and resumed recently upon the return of Lieutenant Finley from an inspection tour in the West. The percentage of verifications is already gratifying, though the predictions are as yet largely experimental, and are embodied in the daily published bulletins of the Signal Office only when the conditions favorable to the creation of tornadoes are very pronounced. In such cases 'severe local storms' are noted as probable." The intelligence is very welcome, and every one will heartily wish the lieutenant success. Timely warnings, if they are recognized as trustworthy, will save many lives every year. Happily people do not treat warnings of physical danger as they do the warnings of spiritual peril. The latter are very clear and unmistakable, but comparatively few heed them and fly to the refuge provided (Heb. 6: 18).

The Sale of a Lady's Hair Led to Reunion with her husband recently. The head of a large firm of hair importers in Philadelphia informed a reporter of the Times of that city last week, that a romantic reunion had just been achieved through his business. The firm were in quest of a switch of hair of a peculiar shade required by a fashionable lady to conceal the ravages time had made in her appearance. The hair was difficult to obtain, and having tried ordinary methods the firm advertised for it. Soon afterward a lady, young and beautiful, but shabbily dressed, came to see if her hair would match. It did so exactly, and she agreed to sell it. She wept when it was cut off, saying that it used to be her husband's pride, but he was dead, having been drowned four years before in a shipwreck off the coast of Africa, and she and her child were starving. She had wandered from city to city seeking employment without success, and only as a last resource she had brought herself to sell her hair for bread. The hair importer was sorry for her, and thinking to bring her case before the charitable public, procured its publication in the newspapers. Shortly afterward a tall, bearded man came to the office and eagerly inquired for the lady who had sold her hair. She was his wife, he said. He had been shipwrecked, but had been saved. He was detained among the savages, and when he did succeed in getting home his wife had disappeared, and he had been seeking her vainly until he saw her story in the newspapers. He was sent to his wife, and their reunion was a pathetic scene. Thus the sacrifice which had cost the wife so bitter a pang proved the stepping-stone to unexpected happiness. This was a mere coincidence, but the experienced Christian knows that, in his case, self-sacrifice has often led to blessing. Indeed, it is only when all he holds dear is given up to his Lord's will that he learns the fulness of the Saviour's love (Phil. 3: 8).

A Kiss that Cost a Life was Given by a Young man at Bloomingdale, N. J., on October 4th. The young lady to whom he was engaged was going on a visit to some friends, and her lover went to the railroad depot to see her off. He remained on the car talking with her until the signal to start was given. He stayed to take her in his arms and imprint one long, loving kiss on her lips, and then ran to the car platform and jumped off. But he had waited too long. The train had attained considerable speed, and as he alighted he reeled and fell. He was dragged under the cars and mangled in a frightful manner. The young lady did not learn that her lover's long adieu had cost him his life until the next day, when she received a telegram at the house of her friends announcing his death. He is not the first man by thousands who has learned that there are times when a moment's delay may prove fatal. One of Satan's most successful temptations is to persuade men that another time will do as well as the present to separate from the world and decide for Christ. Probably few people in Gospel lands expect to be lost; they intend to repent and be converted after cleaving to the world a little longer. Very often procrastination involves the loss of eternal life (Luke 9: 61, 62).

A Driver's Embarrassing Experience Caused some amusement in a crowded street recently. A New Hampshire journal says that on market day a farmer was seen driving through Concord guiding his spirited horse with one hand, while he held a big sheep in his wagon with the other hand. As he reached the corner of Main Street the sheep kicked violently, and the horse turning suddenly at the same time the whole establishment was tipped over and piled up in a heap in the road. The driver observed, as he rubbed the dust out of his eyes, "I'd rather go to a wedding than take that sheep home." The bystanders helped him to right his wagon and reload his sheep, and he got out of town without further accident. The farmer's position is a type of the spiritual experience of some Christians who have not learned how to deal with their old nature. Many a deplorable spiritual fall has come to converted men, especially to men converted in middle life, when sinful habits have grown strong, which might have been averted if, instead of trying to control their passions themselves, they had gone to Jesus for strength (Rom. 8: 3).

A Couple were Married at a Fair, for a prize, recently, at Onondaga, N. Y. A local journal says: "In response to the offer of a prize, a couple mounted a high platform, and were married in presence of assembled and hurrahing thousands. Cheering and laughable exclamations broke out at the various points in the ceremony, embarrassing the minister very much. Finally it was over, and the fair bride was kissed by the groom and six groomsmen, fourteen reporters, and more than twenty-five men who had taken prizes." It was an incongruous beginning to the serious duties of married life—the climax, so far as we have reached yet, to the tendency to regard the entrance upon the solemn obligations of matrimony as a joke. The same journal suggests, with grim pleasantry, that next year the managers of the fair should vary the programme by offering a prize to any one who will die on the grounds. That would be a matter still further removed from the sphere of joking, but the carelessness commonly displayed in rightly preparing for that momentous event, which lies before every one, proves that the gravity of that also is not generally realized (Ps. 39: 4).

"BEHOLD, HE PRAYETH."

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Enquire in the house of Judas for one called Saul, of Tarsus: for, behold, he prayeth."—ACTS 9. 11.

Prayer the Hall-mark of Conversion—The Autograph of the Holy Ghost—Its Significance in Saul's Case—I. Implied that He had never Prayed Before—Real Prayer Spiritual—Consistent with Character—Must be Humble—The Good-enough Family—II. A Remarkable Thing for Him to Pray—Hard for Him—What was Needed to Make Him Pray—III. Yet He did Pray—IV. His Prayer Accepted—God Answers It—The First and Last Prayer.

THESE words are the hall-mark of genuine conversion. "Behold, he prayeth" is a sure witness of a man's conversion than, "Behold, he singeth," or, "Behold, he readeth the Scripture," or, "Behold, he preacheth." These things may be admirably done by men who are not regenerate; but if, in God's sense of the term, a man really prays, we may know of a surety that he has passed from death unto life. True prayer is a sure evidence of spiritual quickening; the Holy Ghost has put spiritual life into the heart of the man who prays; for prayer is the breath of heavenly life.

Prayer is the outcome of that sense of need which arises from the new life; a man would not pray to God if he did not feel that he had urgent need of blessings which only the Lord can bestow. While expressing his sense of need, and appealing to God for help, the praying man gives evidence of being at peace with his Lord, and cured of his natural alienation. He who prays trusts, and thus reveals the faith which saves. Prayer is

THE AUTOGRAPH OF THE HOLY GHOST upon the renewed heart. Prayer is also an admirable form of communion with God; and as the carnal mind can have no fellowship with God, it becomes the token of regeneration, the evidence of adoption. He that prays has some knowledge of God, some acquaintance with the great Invisible. The habit of private prayer, and the constant practice of heart-fellowship with the Most High, are the surest indicators of the work of the Holy Spirit upon the heart. When it can be said of a man, "Behold, he prayeth," the seal of the great King is upon him, he bears the indorsement of the Searcher of hearts. Hence the Lord gave to Ananias this sure indication that Saul of Tarsus was a converted man, by saying to him, "Behold, he prayeth."

I. We will begin our discourse with the following observation: this expression concerning Saul of Tarsus is remarkable, for it implies that he had NEVER PRAYED BEFORE.

"Behold, he prayeth" could hardly be spoken of one who had been accustomed to pray in former days. This is very striking, for Saul was a Pharisee, and therefore a man who habitually repeated prayers. Pharisees boasted of the regularity, number, and length of their prayers. Perhaps there had never been a day in Saul's life from the time in which he was conscious, in which he had not gone through his prayers. Many devout Jews spent nine hours a day in prayer; for they occupied an hour in actual supplication, and sat still for an hour before and an hour after prayer; and this was done three times a day. Pharisees offered prayer, not only in the temple and in the synagogue, but even at the corners of the streets where they could be seen of men. Whatever the quality of their praying might be, there was plenty of it in quantity. If any fact was in public evidence so that nobody could deny it, it was that Saul of Tarsus had been much in prayer; and therefore it is the more striking that the Lord Himself should say to Ananias, concerning this constantly devout Pharisee, "Behold, he prayeth."

I want to push this fact home upon some who are present with us this morning; I mean those who in a formal manner have always prayed and yet have never spiritually prayed. Your mother taught you a form of prayer; this form you repeated all through your childhood and your youth; at this moment you are most regular in bowing the knee, both morning and evening; and yet no single prayer may ever have risen from your heart to the heart of God. You go constantly to your place of worship, you are diligently observant of every Christian ordinance, you join in the responses, or you bow your head and listen in silence to the extemporary utterance of your minister, and therefore you suppose that you pray; and yet it may be a vain supposition. If any one were to say that you had not prayed, you would be very angry; and yet it is possible that such a statement would be strictly true. How much I long that to-day, for the first time, you may in real earnest cry unto the Lord God, and cause Him to bear witness that now indeed you pray! You will then think little of all your heartless and you will cry to God for the Holy Spirit who helpeth our infirmities, since we know not what we should pray for as we ought.

I have told you that the Pharisees were noted for their prayers, and therefore it seems the more singular that the Lord should announce that Saul of Tarsus had now begun to pray. Yet it was so; he was now offering his first real prayer. That prayer of the Pharisee which we read just now from the eighteenth chapter of Luke was meant for prayer, but there is not a particle of prayer in it. He did not ask for anything; he did not confess a necessity, nor plead a promise; he did not seek mercy, nor mention propitiation. His formal thanksgiving was stained with proud self-esteem, and it was more the boast of vanity than the request of humility. Much of what is called prayer is the husk, and not the kernel, of prayer. One sentence of true heart-pleading, such as, "God be merciful to me a sinner," is worth volumes of mere lip-service. Real prayer and Saul's prayers had not been such before. Words are but the body of devotion: the confession of sin, the longing for mercy, the groaning for grace—these are the soul and spirit of prayer. A man may have repeated the choicest words, and these may have been the outward embodiment of true prayer, because his heart went with them; but, on the other hand, he may have used equally select expressions, and may not have prayed at all; for there may have been in him no stirring of the heart toward God. I reckon that those prayers which cannot be expressed in language are often the most deep and fervent. When desires are so weighty that they burden our words and even crush them down, then are they most prevalent with God. There is power in that solemn silence which is "Frost of the mouth, but thaw of the mind," when the soul flows with strong current in a deep and hidden bed till it reaches the heart of God, and prevails with Him. You may, if you like, praise God with organs, as the English do, or you may pray to God with windmills, as the Tartars do—the things are very much alike, as I believe—but your praising and your praying will not be measured by the heaving of the bellows, nor by the revolution of the sails; they will be measured only by the heart-work which was in them.

Next to this, Saul had never prayed a single right prayer of the kind which the Lord can accept. Saul hitherto had not known the Lord Jesus, and therefore he did not know the way of access to the Father through His Son, whom He has appointed Mediator. Saul knew the letter of the truth according to the ceremonial law; but he did not know the spirit of it as it is embodied in Jesus. When a man does not pray in the Lord's appointed way, nor through Jesus Christ, nor in dependence upon the Holy Spirit, he does not pray at all. However fine his prayer, it is only a splendid sin. If you employ a servant to do a work, and he obstinately persists in doing another thing, he will not earn his wages. However industriously he works at what you have never set him to do, he will receive nothing at your hands. So if you pray to God in a way which God has never ordained, if you refuse to use the name which He has appointed, if you neglect the cultivation of that holy and humble spirit which the Lord will alone accept, you may pray till your tongue cleaves to the roof of your mouth; but in God's judgment you have not prayed at all, and you will not receive anything of the Lord.

LOVE NEEDED.

Furthermore, I should like you to notice that real prayer cannot come from men whose characters are contrary to the mind of God. He whose character contradicts his prayer has not prayed; his life has effectually pleaded against his lips. Saul of Tarsus was opposed to the Son of God; how could he be in favor with God Himself? He was evidently full of hate and cruelty; how could he pray? Love is the element of the children of God; "Every one that loveth is born of God;" but Saul had conceived such an intense disgust against the followers of the Crucified, that he haled them to prison and voted for their death. We must not fight God's battles with the weapons of ill-will. For us to hate those who are in error, and talk of them with contempt or wish them ill, or do them wrong, is not according to the Spirit of Christ. You cannot cast out Satan by Satan, nor correct error by violence, nor overcome hate by hate. The conquering weapon of the Christian is love; and if Paul had sought to overthrow what he thought to be an error by love, although he had been mistaken, he would not have been so guilty.

If I go through the world hating my fellow-men because they differ from me, and determining to force my own doctrines upon others with an iron hand, I cannot lift that hand in prayer. A malicious heart pollutes the sacrifice which it offers. When I come before God in prayer, I may be really offending Him when I dream that I am pleasing Him. God will hear us when we hear Him; He will do our will when we do His will; but persistence in known sin, and especially indulgence in enmity and hatred, are so destructive to prayer, that till we are free from them we do not pray.

HUMILITY LACKING.

Yet again: Saul with all his prayers had never truly prayed, because humility was absent from his devotions. What a test this is! Saul had gone about the world feeling that he was a righteous man. Did he not wear texts of Scripture between his eyes? What a pious man he was! Had he not broad borders to his garments—borders of blue? What a saint he was! Did he not fast thrice in the week, and pay tithes of mint and anise and cummin? There was not a better man in all the dominions of Caesar than this Saul in his own judgment. When he prayed, there was a high flavor of self-righteousness in his religious exercises, and this made them disgusting to the Most High. If you feel quite content with your own prayers, permit me to suggest that you do not pray, for few who pray aright are ever content with their own petitions. Those who dream themselves to belong to the Good-enough family will find themselves bad enough, and the Too-goods will find themselves shut out of heaven. If you have a righteousness made out of your prayers, throw it to the dogs.

I say again, this makes terrible work of a great many persons who have been brought up in outward religion. Dear friend, be not vexed or angry if this should seem to come home to you. Do let this thought come to every professor of religion this morning, that you may have been a praying man for years, you may have come like Saul of Tarsus to the fullness of your age, and have abounded in the appearance of devotion, and yet you may have to pray to God for the first time.

II. This brings me to my second reflection, and that is, it is implied in the text that it was for such a person now to pray. It is put with an ecce, a mark of admiration, "Behold, he prayeth!" It is a very difficult thing, a very marvellous thing, for a man truly to pray who has been all his lifetime praying in a false way.

It is a miracle of grace to bring a proud Pharisee to plead for mercy like a penitent publican. It is not half so wonderful that a vain-glorious professor should begin to pray. It is hard for him to pray, because he is a person who has been a formalist for a long time, is so rooted in the habit of formal devotion, and so contented with it, that it is extremely difficult to bring him to attend to spiritual things. It is hard to get the robe of Christ's righteousness upon that man's back who believes that his own coat is as good as it needs to be; he has worn his own rags so long that they cling to him. He is too proud to beg, for he has so long lived like a gentleman on his own income. He has been so long rich and increased in goods, and in need of nothing, and he has grown so used to his way of external and superficial religion, that you cannot get him, without a miracle of grace, to seek after that which is deep and true.

MEN BORN GOOD.

Besides, a self-righteous man knows that everybody thinks him to be right, and therefore he cannot demean himself by such prayers and confessions as might suit a common sinner. If you talk to him about being converted, why, dear sir, he needs no conversion. He was born good. He has always been a Christian; he needs no change; you don't know what a fine gentleman he is! He never cries, in the bitterness of his soul, "God be merciful to me a sinner." Why should he? His mother and father were extremely good people, and he was born again at the font, and has since been confirmed. What do you want more? Washed in the blood of Jesus! Well, perhaps he needs this as others do; but there is no special sin in him, nothing certainly for which he could be condemned. Persons who are of this order are seldom brought to pray. They may be called reprobate silver, for the Lord has rejected them. If ever such as these are saved, it will astonish men and angels, and the Lord Himself will cry, "Behold, he prayeth."

See what was needed in Saul's case to make him pray—the Lord Jesus must Himself appear and bring him to his knees. Nothing less than a light shining from heaven could show him his vileness. Oh, that such a light would break upon all self-righteous souls! The proud man must fall to the earth, cast down from his high places. He must be struck with blindness, that he may be ready to accept the sight of faith. Three days he must neither eat nor drink, to wean him from earth and make him feed on the bread of heaven. Great must be the agony of his spirit, for he that has been so intensely self-righteous cannot be brought to Christ without a wrench. He that has rested in himself so completely and so long needs to be torn up by the roots ere he will quit his carnal confidences. It takes, as it were, a special interposition of grace to bring a religious professor to pray in spirit and in truth.

III. And now I want you to notice, in the third place, that albeit it was a great wonder that Saul prayed,

YET HE DID PRAY.

One would have liked to have heard Saul of Tarsus pray. See him now! This fine, good man! How humble, how lowly he is! His prayer began with a full and grievous confession of sin. He offered neither excuse nor extenuation. He looked to Him whom he had pierced, and mourned for Him. He owned that he was the chief of sinners—"because I persecuted the Church of God." The other day as he rode along to Damascus everybody looked upon him as a saint, but now by his own confession he is a sinner of the blackest sort. Hear how he de-fames himself! He repents in dust and ashes. He prays for mercy; he begs to be forgiven his scarlet sins. He owns that if he were sent to hell it would be no more than just; but he begs that for the Saviour's sake he may be spared and permitted to see the light of God's countenance. I think I hear him making this sad confession. Behold, he prayeth now!

And, beloved, all this must have been steeped in a wonderful fervor. If we could have stood outside the door and listened, we should have understood why the Lord said, "Behold, he prayeth." Before, you might have heard him repeating words, but now he uttered groans, and cries, and sobs, and tears. Before, you might have said to yourself, "He is saying his prayers," but this time it was as when a man wrestleth for his life, and is in bitterness for his only son. All previous prayer was sham, but this was real; all the rest was but a performance, but now he did real business with the Most High. "Behold, he prayeth." Now he is a real Israel, and lo, he comes off more than conqueror through Him that has taught him to pray.

IV. Lastly, we see that as soon as he did pray, it was evident that

THE LORD ACCEPTED HIS PRAYER.

How do I know this from the text? "Behold, he prayeth?" Well, I know it from the text first, because here is God bearing witness that he did pray. Might not the Lord stand in a prayer-meeting and hear a dozen of us talk our piece, and never say, "Behold, he prayeth"? But if a voice from heaven were to say concerning some one, "Behold, he prayeth," we should know that the man was accepted of the Lord. So was it with Saul. The first time he prayed, God heard him. Try it, my friend, try it; if this is your first prayer this morning, breathe it to God with humble faith, and He will hear you.

We know that God had accepted this first prayer, for he was about to answer it. He had Ananias in readiness to go and comfort the poor blinded penitent. God is about to answer your prayer, my dear brother, this morning if you have cried to Him. Perhaps the man is present in the Tabernacle who will speak to you before you leave these walls, or somebody will soon call to tell you the way of peace more perfectly. If now you quit the way of self-righteousness and formal devotion, and begin to cry out for the living God, that God will meet you. I am afraid there are many of whom it would have to be said, "Behold, he never prays!" What a sight upon earth!—a man created by his Maker who never worships his Creator, a man who is daily fed by God's bounty, and never worships Him! Sir, you are a monster, you are a creature among men most loathsome. A man that lives without prayer ought not to live. It is a wonder that the earth does not open her mouth and swallow up such a wretch. And yet when he does pray, God makes a wonder of it.

THE FIRST PRAYER.

It is his first prayer this morning. I see him: the sermon is over, and he has reached home. He has gone up to his room; he is afraid somebody will come in and disturb him; he is turning the key. He is kneeling by the side of that bed on which he has slept so often without prayer, and he cries, "O God, I do not know what to say, but be merciful to me a sinner, and forgive my sins." I hear the rustling wings of angels as they gather around the sacred spot. Anon they fly upward, crying, "Behold, he prayeth."

Years shall pass on with you, young man, and you shall come to middle life and be exposed to sharp temptation; what will you do then? Good spirits watch you, fearing lest you should go astray, and devils watch for your halting. You will then remember that day when you first prayed; and you will say to yourself, "I will again cry unto God, as I have often done." You go up stairs, and say, "Lord, many days have passed since first I cried to Thee, and I have not ceased to cry; but now I am in special trouble. I beseech Thee, deliver me!" God will help you. The great wheel of providence will revolve for you. Meanwhile, both angels and devils have spied you out; the angels sing and the devils mutter, "Behold, he prayeth."

A few years have passed; the young man has grown old, and the time is come that he must die. He has gone up to the same room for the last time, and there are those about him who weep and watch. Mark the sweet serenity of the departing soul! He is looking into eternity without fear. He knows whom he has believed, and he is ready to depart. What is he doing in his expiring moments? "Behold, he prayeth." Prayer, which has long been his vital breath and native air, is now

"His watchword at the gates of death;
He enters heaven with prayer."

Demons that gather about our last hour shall flee away as bats fly out of a cavern scared by a torch; they shall flee when they hear the voice, "Behold, he prayeth." The shining ones shall gladly meet the soul that is on Jordan's bank when they hear the voice, "Behold, he prayeth." They shall meet the praying spirit on the hither side of the river, and shall smile while the prayer of earth melts into the praise of heaven. Soon shall we be forever with the Lord. God grant it may be so, for His name's sake. Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

SIMPLE LESSONS FOR HOME USE.

FOUR pamphlets, under the above title, contain more practical information about matters of vital interest to every one than any book of the size that we have seen. Each pamphlet contains three or four papers. They are evidently intended for the use of children, but in these matters many grown people are children in knowledge, and need to have their instruction presented in very simple words. That fact has been kept clearly in mind by the writers, each of whom takes pains to explain every scientific term which had to be used in dealing with the subject in hand. The following is a list of the subjects discussed: Pamphlet No. 1 contains: Our Bodily Life; How and Why we Breathe; Food; Drink. No. 2 contains: Cookery; Plain Needlework; Clothing. No. 3: Air and Ventilation; Sickliness that Spread; The Weather; Astronomy. No. 4: Birds; Flowers; Money. Each pamphlet contains about one hundred pages. Price, 15 cents each. Published by Mr. Thomas Whittaker, 2 and 3 Bible House, New York.

THE LIFE OF GENERAL GRANT.

by Hon. J. T. Headley, is an amplification of a sketch by the same author which appeared soon after the close of the war, in a volume of biographical sketches of distinguished generals. Mr. Headley has devoted himself chiefly to eulogy in his book, and to defence where circumstances which appeared to detract from the greatness of the hero were in his opinion misunderstood by the people. His admiration for the illustrious soldier is unstinted, and in reading his work the reader is impressed with the sense that it is written by one who can see no imperfections in his character. At this time the public is prepared to appreciate a work written in this spirit, though the future historian will probably be chary of accepting as authentic a portrait in which all is light and there are no shadows. "As a man," says Mr. Headley, "whether President or not, we assert that his course was right, his example noble, and one that ought to be followed." That sentence furnishes the key to his entire work. Few men have been more bitterly and more frequently traduced than General Grant; it may, therefore, have been well that one man at least should write a book of unalloyed eulogy. It must be admitted, however, that the present generation, with the memory of the events of the past quarter of a century fresh in their minds, would not unanimously indorse the author's assertions. Grant was a great man and a great general, worthy of all the honors with which the nation can crown his memory; he cannot be made greater by a eulogy that is unguied by discrimination. Naturally the bulk of Mr. Headley's book is occupied by the events of the war. These he describes with remarkable dramatic power. The record of the two Presidential terms is meagre, as is the account of the tour around the world. The book is profusely illustrated, and contains two excellent portraits of the late general. Pp. 656; price, $2.50. Published by E. B. Treat, 771 Broadway, New York.

HEAVEN, MY FATHER'S HOUSE, by J. W. Kimball, author of "How to See Jesus." Mr. Kimball is already well known to readers of this journal. The character of this new work from his pen will be best understood from Mr. Kimball's own words with which he introduces it to his readers: "It is often said, we know nothing of heaven. But Jesus says, 'All things that the Father hath are Mine; and the Comforter shall take of Mine and show it unto you.' True to His promise, from the day I knew the Lord, the Comforter began to show me heavenly things. What I freely received, He bade me freely give. I pray God each reader may find them his Lord's own revelations to himself." The subjects of the chapters are: Popular Notions of Heaven; Rational Inquiries About Heaven; The World Without Us; The World Within Us; The Bible; Heaven as a State; Christ Without Us; Christ Within Us; Heaven as a Place; The Society of Heaven; The Joy and Occupations of Heaven. Pp. 248; price, 75 cents. Published by J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible House, N. Y.

OLDHAM, by Lucy Ellen Guernsey, is a simple but deeply interesting story of the good effected by a kind, sympathetic Christian school teacher in a New England parish. There are many evidences in it that the book is by no means a fiction. The characters are too life-like, and the events described are much too graphically narrated to be altogether the work of the imagination. Every one who has taught children, either in the public schools or in a Sunday-school, will enjoy the perusal of Miss Armstrong's experiences. Her trials with the children who are as wilful and perverse as children are everywhere, and her efforts to overcome the prejudices of their parents, some of whom are Christians of a peculiar type, and others are not Christians at all, while one is an avowed infidel, are described by one who knows whereof she writes. Any one who wants to see what can be done by a lady who believes in the power of love and the efficacy of faith should read this book. It is excellent. Pp. 370; price, $1.50. Published by Thomas Whittaker, 2 Bible House.

THE BROOKLYN Y. M. C. A.

The illustrations on this page, for which we are indebted to the kindness of Mr. Wilkie, the excellent secretary of the Brooklyn Young Men's Christian Association, shows two of the fronts of the new building, the dedication of which was mentioned in these columns last week. That on the left is the main entrance on Fulton Street, which, through an archway of terra-cotta and brick, conducts the visitor to the main building, fronting on Bond Street and extending through the block to Hanover Place. The illustration on the right is a picture of the Bond Street front of the building. The entire area is 19,840 square feet, and the building erected on it is the largest and most handsome of any in the country entirely devoted to Y. M. C. A. work.

The Association is one of the best organized in the Union, and though it has been somewhat crippled in funds and accommodation by having to hire its domicile, it has done a work for Christ in Brooklyn of inestimable value. Its new and commodious building, the gift of the late Frederick Marquand's trustees and the endowment fund of $150,000 contributed by friends of the Association, are new facilities placed at the disposal of the managers which they are not the men to neglect. The city itself is to be congratulated on the acquisition. There is no work more salutary and beneficial for any city than that this Y. M. C. A. has long been doing for Brooklyn in Christianizing her young men. There is every reason to hope that it will now be prosecuted with redoubled energy.

AN INVITATION.

A CONVENTION for Christian Life, and Work, and Divine Healing, will be held in Association Hall, Young Men's Christian Association Building, Buffalo, N. Y., from Tuesday evening, October 27th to Saturday, October 31st, 1885. Daily sessions will be as follows: Morning, 10 to 12, Addresses and Bible Readings; afternoon, 3 to 5, Personal Testimonies, Reports of Christian Work, etc.; evening, 7.30 to 9, Addresses. We believe that many dear ones who are hungering for a fuller manifestation of Christ in their souls and bodies, will be glad to meet with us in this gathering, and wait with us upon God, for a special outpouring of His blessed Holy Spirit. We expect Mrs. M. Baxter from London, England, and the Rev. A. B. Simpson, of New York, and many other eminent workers, to assist in this Convention.

INTERVIEW IN A CEMETERY.

It has been my habit for many years to make a pilgrimage on a certain day of the year to a lonely little cemetery in a distant State. It is sometimes inconvenient for me to go, and more than once my absence has involved me in a business loss; but of that I take small account—it seems part of my self-imposed penance. Call it superstition, if you will; I care not. It is my whim, or caprice, or anything you like to call it. There I go, and as long as I am physically able to travel, there on August 26th, you will find me. I was a bad son; my wickedness shortened the lives of my father and mother, and when they were ill—they died within two weeks of each other—I did not know of it. They died, and I never asked their forgiveness. God in His mercy saved my soul, but from them I never asked nor received pardon. Oh for one moment of their lives, that I might throw myself on the earth before them and plead for their forgiveness! Oh that they knew how bitterly I have repented! But it cannot be. Every year, however, on the anniversary of my birth, I go to their grave, and there on the green sod I weep unavailing tears. They may not know, but that day, which was to them for a few years a day of rejoicing over the birth of their first-born son, and later was a day of heartbroken sorrow over that son's wickedness, is a consecrated day in my year.

Last year I was there as usual, and as I lay beside the grave, lost in thought, I heard the sound of sobbing. I gave no heed to it for some time, but the fellowship that there is in suffering presently exerted its power, and I rose to speak to the mourner. It was only a newsboy with his unsold papers under his arm, and he was leaning against a headstone weeping bitterly.

"Your father, my boy?" I inquired.

"Yes, sir," he said; "he's buried here. He died nearly a year ago. Mother and I are all alone now."

"You loved him very much, I judge."

"That I did, sir. He was a good father to me."

"You were a good son, I hope?"

"I did my best, sir. Father said, when he was dying, I'd been a comfort to him. I'll never forget that."

"You and your mother are poor, I suppose?"

"Very poor, sir. Father's boss put this stone up for him, and he gives mother a dollar a week. She goes out scrubbing when she's well enough, and I sell papers; but we don't get on very well. Mother's often sick, and then we haven't much to eat. When I'm a bit older I'll get a better job. I hope mother won't die first; but I'm afraid sometimes. She's awful weak."

"If you could earn more money what would you do with it?" "You want a new suit of clothes rather badly."

"Oh, these'll do for me a long while yet. I'd give it mother to buy better things to eat. We have only bread and water very often, and that ain't enough for her."

Poor lad! He was evidently in earnest. It was a strange dispensation of Providence that I, a scapegrace son, had prospered, while this dutiful boy was in abject poverty. Well, that might be remedied. My father had been a philanthropist as far as his means would permit. This was a case in which he would have rejoiced to exert himself. How if my remorse took a practical turn, and I helped this boy and his mother for my father's sake? I resolved I would. I asked him where he lived, and he told me. Going in to the town, I sought an old acquaintance, who is an employer of a large number of hands, and asked him to take the lad and teach him a trade.

The Bereaved Newsboy's Lament.

He consented, and, on my placing in his hands a sufficient amount of money, undertook to pay him a regular weekly sum which would keep the boy and his mother in comfort.

I called on the boy's mother and found her a worthy Christian woman, very fond of her son. I told her to send him with my card to my friend, who would find him a good place, and left her weeping tears of joy. This year on my annual visit I made inquiries and received a good account of the boy. He proved intelligent and capable, and is going to night-school to get an education. I have four other pensioners now, and my burdened heart finds relief in helping them. If my parents know, I am sure they rejoice. It is done for their sake, though it can never blot out my sin against them. Perhaps that was what the Saviour meant when He told His disciples that they might show their love for Him by doing good to others.

THE SILVER LINING.

Wooing by Proxy.

DURING this anxiety about Frank Arnold his sisters had been busy furthering the desires of their other brother. The more they saw of their guest, Jean Lindsay, the more they were convinced that any man might be proud to win her love, and that any Christian man to whom she might give her hand would have reason to bless God for sending him such a wife. Nor had they any compunction in promoting the marriage on Jean's account. Their brother Ralph was a man of sincere piety, vigorous and well-trained mind, and a genial disposition. His presence brought sunshine into a home, and the two girls, who had missed their merry, handsome brother sorely when he crossed the ocean to live, thought that any lady, however exalted her station, might accept the position of his wife without humiliation. The union, then, on both sides seemed desirable, promising happiness to both parties if it could be brought to pass,

The task, in spite of Helen Arnold's humorous way of looking at it, was one she felt to be momentous; for, as she well knew, a man and a woman may both be admirable people, with similar tastes, and both might be Christians, yet find each other's society an intolerable burden and a mutual irritation. She thought about it and prayed over it continually, but she could not bring herself to undertake the responsibility of deciding. The two persons chiefly concerned must decide for themselves.

"Jean," she said one day to her friend, "I wish you would give me your photograph."

"I would give you a dozen, my dear, if you wanted them; but I have never had my portrait taken. It seems funny, does it not, that I should have lived until now without having sat to a photographer; but so it is. My father and my sister Margaret would reprove me for my vanity, I expect, if I proposed having my portrait taken, and, indeed, I have never thought of it. Girls who have many friends scattered around at long distances are those who do most to support photographers, I think. That is very nice to be able to send one's picture to one's friends; but, you see, until I knew you, all my friends were close at home and saw me every day. I should like to leave my likeness with you, dear Helen, when I go away; so we had better see about it at once."

"Ah! but I must be frank with you, Jean," said Helen. "I want your portrait for myself, it is true, and so do Kate and mamma; but this portrait that I want so very particularly is not for either of us. It is for some one whom you have never seen."

"You speak in riddles, my oracle. How can any one who does not know me care about having my picture?"

"That is my secret, and I had better tell you at once," Helen said gravely. "You remember that letter from Ralph? I believe if he were here you would love him dearly. He is a good, noble fellow, and I am sure he would love you, as we all do, only in a man's way. He is bent on my finding a wife for him, as you know, and my heart is set upon your being that wife. You are more than a sister to us now, Jean; I should like you to be one in fact. You would be very happy with Ralph, my dear, and he would be a proud and delighted man with you for his own. I have thought about it a great deal, and I have come to the conclusion that if you and he are united through me you will both live to thank me for bringing you together. But I am not going to do his love-making for him. You two shall settle it for yourselves one way or the other. The responsibility is too great for me to bear. Now you know why I want your picture."

"So you are plotting to expatriate me, are you, Helen? Do you think that is kind? A young gentleman across the seas is discontented, and needs some one to be sacrificed to make him happy. You look around for a victim, and you seize your guest and friend, and are going to drag her to the altar and offer her up to his majesty. Upon my word, your sisterly love is very evident. This with simulated indignation."

"That is a very grim way of putting it, Jean. But it is just the reverse of the true way. If you had listened to me instead of trying to goad your maidenly feelings to anger, in which you have not been very successful, you would have learned that I am distinctly opposed to any dragging of victims to the altar. If a young lady voluntarily chooses to walk to the altar that is another matter; but she will not be dragged by me. There is no question of victims, but there is a very serious question of a life's happiness involved, and I am trying to promote the happiness of two lives. I don't believe you are in earnest, Jean, and I don't believe you would think yourself a victim; but you shall decide for yourself by and by. You are too sensible to reject a prospect of happiness from pique. I am going to send Ralph your picture and tell him how I love you and what sunshine you have brought into the house, and then if he invites you—as I predict he will—you can think of it, and I believe God will guide you rightly."

"But I know nothing of your brother, my dear. I would never marry if I did not love, and how can I love a man whom I have never seen? If the question came from you, and you were asking me to spend all my life with you, I love you so well that I would say yes at once; but this is quite another matter. Your brother may not have your perfections, and I might not like him at all, still less love him well enough to be his wife."

"What would you love, Jean, in a husband? Just try to sketch mentally your ideal of the man you would love, and then I will tell you all about Ralph in his boyhood, and you shall read his letters to me, written, you know, to his sister, and not in the constrained style of a man trying to make a favorable impression on a stranger. You will get a pretty clear estimate of his character, and will see whether it comes up to your ideal."

"Yes, I will do that, Helen, and I will try to think of him impartially, and not with a sister's leanings. You will forgive me if I cannot accept your estimate of him?"

"Of course. It is a serious matter; you do not feel that more than I do. But I know you both so well that I think you would be very happy together. You and I have been drawn into so close a bond of friendship during these few weeks that one who so closely resembles me, but is much better, nobler in every way, would find even greater pleasure in your companionship than I do, and you would love him better than you do me."

"That is a very plausible argument, Helen. You are a very good advocate; I must take care that you do not steal away my judgment with your honeyed words. This Mr. Ralph may be a veritable ogre when I come to know him."

"Then you would not marry him, you know. Even if you went to Australasia you would be free to return. You would go out unpledged, and you would have a pleasant voyage, and would, if you chose, return as you are now."

"Oh, I will hear no more!" said Jean, putting her little hands, with a pretty, playful motion, over her ears. "It is dangerous to listen to the charmer. I must think for myself. Oh, Helen, I wish it was you that I had to decide about!"

The subject, being thus opened, was the all-absorbing one in the minds of the three girls during the remainder of Jean's visit. Neither Dr. nor Mrs. Arnold were taken into their confidence, but Helen adroitly led the conversation to the subject of her absent brother on several occasions, and Jean heard from his father and mother a discriminating estimate of his character. It was less eulogistic than that of Helen and Kate, but Jean could easily see that it was very clear and truthful.

"I have never had any anxiety about Ralph," said Dr. Arnold on one occasion. "He possesses that rare faculty of knowing exactly what is the right thing to do in an emergency. I was particularly struck by that during the time when my arm was broken and I was unable to ride on horseback. I had Ralph to drive me in a little open carriage. He was only fifteen then, and his coolness and nerve astonished me. We were in great danger once when a runaway team came dashing headlong toward us. I confess I was frightened, but the little fellow never lost his presence of mind. The debt way in which he guided the horse and saved our lives produced a respect in my mind for him that I have never lost. It is no mean test of the calibre of man or boy to see what he will do in the presence of imminent danger, when there is no time to balance courses and deliberate. Ralph is a little too ready to act on his impulses without analyzing them, but his instincts are generally right, though he does not know how he arrives at them. I confess I should have been uneasy if Frank had resolved to go to Australia alone; but I have never been anxious about Ralph, especially as he has the strong, unwavering faith in Christ, which keeps a man safely in the midst of fierce moral temptations. Yes, Ralph is a good boy, whom any father might be proud of. Impulsive, violent when opposed, and one whom no one can drive, and not very amenable to reason—"obstinate as a mule," his teacher said, "but a boy who would get on;" and so he is. He was a man in self-reliance when he was seventeen; and though he was always respectful with me, he was always ready to do battle with me when he did not agree with my opinions."

Mrs. Arnold's sketch of her son's character was tempered with a mother's partiality, and as she loved to talk of him, Jean heard much of the husband proposed for her. Her picture was duly sent, and she went to her seaside home, with a strange fluttering feeling of impending change agitating her heart. The loneliness of her old life came back upon her with chilly coldness as she came from the warm, hearty companionship of Helen and Kate Arnold into the silence and prim order of the home over which Margaret Lindsay ruled. She had, however, gained a new view of the power of religion to brighten life, and she sought more diligently than before for a higher realization of its influence. At home and in the village Jean's presence was a beneficent power. She was trying to live as her Master would have her live, and none can do that sincerely and earnestly without being a blessing to all who come in contact with them.

With a strong effort Jean had banished from her mind the thought of Ralph Arnold and the possibility of the momentous question on which she would possibly have to decide. She was growing into the peaceful state in which she could leave all things in the hands of her wise, loving Saviour, and she rested calmly in the conviction that when the emergency came she would have wisdom given to her to meet it. But deep in the recesses of her heart lay the knowledge, not acknowledged even to herself, that if Ralph Arnold wrote to her in a way that she could imagine her ideal husband writing that she would accept him.

Jean's life was being spent in busy usefulness among the poor and in helping Margaret, and one day was so like another that they slipped by almost unheeded. So quickly did they go that before she realized the fact months had flown, and a letter was on the way to her from Ralph Arnold, begging her to come to Australia. It was a sensible, manly letter, describing his position and prospects, the impossibility of his leaving to woo her as other men do, but relying on her wisdom and power of understanding and appreciating his situation. Finally, he told her that he had laid the matter before God in prayer, and begging her to do so on her side and accept the leading of the divine will.

It was on a New Year's morning that the letter was put into Jean's hands, accompanied by one from Mrs. Arnold and another from Helen, praying that she would give Ralph's proposal a favorable consideration, and promising that if she would go to Australia Helen would accompany her, as Ralph had begged that she would.

Jean was always delighted to see Mrs. Arnold's handwriting, for her letters brought her help and comfort, and were really the greatest joy she had in her quiet, secluded home. As usual she ran off with it to her own room, little heeding the bitter cold, and wrapping herself up, sat down to enjoy her New Year's letter.

She read the letter twice before she could realize what it meant, and then, as if she could still hardly believe it was not a dream, opened Ralph's epistle.

For more than half an hour she sat thinking, every now and then reading the letters over again. Had not Hezekiah received a letter and laid it before the Lord? She would do so too. So, kneeling down by her little bed, Jean Lindsay committed the first great problem of her life to God. She had still much to learn that no books, no sermons, no friend, could teach her. Surely, the lessons we learn best we learn on the battle-field of our own rooms.

We may be sure her words were few, but her heart said: "I am a little child, the way is dark and difficult; be Thou my Light, teach me Thy way, O Lord!" The time had slipped on, and Margaret, as usual, busy with her household, was at last annoyed at Jean's long absence, and called up the stairs, "Jean, what are you doing all this time; are you gone to bed again?"

At this Jean prepared to go down-stairs, carefully putting her letters into her pocket, and making up her mind to seek the first opportunity of telling her father all about it.

She had not long to wait; some one from the village required Margaret's attention, and so Jean found her father alone.

When he had heard the letters, he said:

"What do you wish to do, Jean?"

"I should like to go, father."

"Do you mean to say you would like to go to the other side of the world, to marry a man you have never seen?"

"Yes, father, I think I could go."

"Well, Jean, you were always a strange girl; I cannot give my consent till I have seen Dr. and Mrs. Arnold, and heard more about it. They have been very kind to you, I grant; you had better think it over seriously to-day and to-morrow; then, if you still desire to go, we will ask Dr. and Mrs. Arnold to come here, that we may hear more of their son."

Jean was thankful to her father for receiving it so quietly; she had thought, he would not listen for a moment to such a proposition; but she had timed it well in the absence of Margaret, whose ideas of the matter were very different.

"It was a most unheard-of thing," she told her father, "for any girl to leave her home in that way. I wonder you did not at once say that it was not to be thought of."

"Well, Margaret, I quite think with you," he said, "that it is a strange thing for any one to do; but the letter is written, I am sure, by a good and a manly man; and you see we have already had very satisfactory proof that Dr. Arnold's family is a good one. They, at least, are no strangers to us."

Accordingly a letter was written, asking Dr. and Mrs. Arnold to come to Lingford at their earliest convenience to talk the matter over, for, said Mr. Lindsay, "it was a grave matter, and nothing must be done in a hurry."

It was about ten days after that Dr. and Mrs. Arnold once more found themselves nearing Lingford. The country round looked wild and wintry, and brought back many thoughts of the last time they were there and of the dear child whose name was so painfully associated with the vicarage. As they drove along they felt how wonderfully our lives are made up of small events, which, like links, knit our life's history together; each link adjusted by a Heavenly Father's hand—the hand of One who careth even for the sparrows.

Two days were spent in quiet consultation. Mr. Lindsay was much impressed at his former interview with the sterling worth of Dr. Arnold's Christian character, and the two men mutually esteemed each other. They knew how serious was the proposal under consideration, but both had learned, through painful experience, where alone wisdom and light could be gained. On the last morning of their stay the two gentlemen were in the library, engaged together in earnest prayer, while in Jean's little bedroom, from the window of which she had seen that fatal shipwreck, Mrs. Arnold was kneeling with Jean, begging for God's guidance.

The family met at the luncheon-table two hours later, and a glance from one to the other told all there that each had arrived at the same decision.

Three months afterward Helen Arnold and Jean Lindsay were standing on the deck of a steamer outward bound, waving adieus to Dr. and Mrs. Arnold and Mr. Lindsay, who stood on the pier watching them and silently praying for a blessing upon them.

THE TEMPLE REPAIRED.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 25, II Kings 12:1-15. Golden Text, Ps. 122:1. By Mrs. M. Baxter. The Revelations of Vice in England—Elijahs Praying—Ahaziah's Death—His Mother's Barbarity—Her Tragic Death—The Public Recognition of God—A Great National Movement—Parasitical Lives—Repairing the Temple—The Money Collected—Willing and Unwilling Giving—The Barachah Home—The Criterion of Giving.

BAAL-WORSHIP prevailed in Judah as well as in Israel; and no doubt God had laid Judah equally with Israel on the hearts of His prophets, Elijah and Elisha. Thus we understand that when He raised up Jehu to destroy Baal out of Israel, He also found means to clear Judah of his polluting worship. Within the last few months we in England have been startled by the awful revelations of sin which have been made; there have been Elijahs praying unto the Lord for years; but it seems as though the time was coming or come when the hand of the Lord Himself should be put to the work of clearing England from the abomination of the traffic in young girls, and the forcing of them into sin, unconsciously to themselves. The time is coming when the hand of the Lord shall be against the unjust and wicked difference which has been made between the sexes in the matter of morality.

It is easy to understand why Ahaziah, King of Judah, should have been slain at the same time as Jehoram, King of Israel. Ahaziah was the son of Jehoram, King of Judah, who had married Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel; and the daughter was

WORTHY OF THE MOTHER.

No sooner did she learn that her son, Ahaziah, was dead, than the wretched woman arose and "destroyed all the seed royal," her own relations! So much for the humanizing effect of Baal-worship! Ambition led her to this step, she had her reward for she reigned six years in Judah; she has her reward, for she is gone to have her part in the lake of fire where she shares her lot with others of her class, "the abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars" (Rev. 21:8).

There was, however, one of the royal family, Jehoshaphat, or Jehoshaphath (II Chron. 22:11), who was sister to Ahaziah, and therefore probably also Athaliah's daughter, now the wife of Jehoiada, the priest, who took Joash, son of Ahaziah, then an infant, and hid him "in the house of the Lord six years." It is more than probable that Jehoiada had been converted to God at the same time as the revival took place, when seven thousand souls in Israel were found true to God. It is more than possible that Elisha went often up to Jerusalem to worship, that he was well acquainted with Jehoiada, and that the two men of God had greatly strengthened one another's hands. The name of Jehoiada is not to be found in the genealogy of the high priests (I Chron. 6); but his history is given us as that of a man spiritually true to the Lord in an age of darkness, delusion, and danger. He and his wife were loyal to God and to the young king, and as soon as he was seven years old, directed doubtless by God, they, by a sudden unexpected movement, gathered the heads of the army, showed them the king's son, had him publicly crowned king, and when Athaliah, hearing the unusual sounds, came into the temple of the Lord, the priest commanded her destruction, and she was slain.

Then it was that the first public recognition of God was made, since the time of Jehoshaphat;

Jehoiada made a "covenant between the Lord and the king and the people, that they should be the Lord's people; between the king also and the people." Thus prepared, having first the Lord on their side, and knowing themselves in covenant with Him, the people acted accordingly, and of their own accord, without the intervention of any Jehu, without any subterfuge such as he made use of, destroyed Baal out of Judah; the house of Baal, altars, images were destroyed, and Mattan, the priest of Baal, killed. Thus, while in Israel God used as His instrument a man so full of sins as Jehu, in Judah where there was one fearless priest on His side, He made the destruction of Baal

which every man made his own affair.

But the destruction of Baal would not amount to much if the worship of the Lord were not established. If the crying shame of England were put a stop to, and yet the hearts of libertines unyielded to the Lord, the reformation could only be temporary, for the evil would break out in some other direction. A clean heart cannot remain clean unless Jesus comes in there to dwell; a reformed nation needs the direct rule of God. The young King Joash did "that which was right in the sight of the Lord all his days, wherein Jehoiada the priest instructed him." This is no unusual thing. There are numbers of God's children, who rarely have any direct communion with Him. Everything must come through other people; they attach themselves to some great preacher, or some well-known Christian worker, and lead

A PARASITICAL LIFE.

You never see them absent from the meetings or services; they do everything which their favorite preacher thinks right; they spend their money and their time as he advises, and, in fact, they make him the keeper of their consciences, but they have no independent life with God. They only pray second-hand, and only depend on others getting an answer for them; their thoughts of Scripture are second-hand; their whole religion is of the same order. They do that which is right as long as they are under the same influence. But, let that influence be removed, they have so long led a parasitical life that they cannot stand alone, and when their pastor is taken away, they either fasten on to another or their religion collapses. God often makes use of such to build churches, to found missions, to help His truest children in things temporal; sometimes it is all they are good for.

"It came to pass after this, that Joash was minded to REPAIR THE HOUSE OF THE LORD"

(II Chron. 24:4). The king's first thought was to put the matter into the hands of the priests that they should undertake the restoration of the temple, "but the Levites hastened it not." Then he called for Jehoiada, and asked him why the redemption money had not been brought into the house of the Lord. God had said to Moses when he was in Mount Sinai, "When thou takest the sum of the children of Israel, after their number, then shall they give every man a ransom for his soul [or life] unto the Lord, when thou numberest them." The offering was to be half a shekel, somewhat over a quarter, for every one who was over twenty years of age. This was the money which was the Lord's due; to claim it was a step in the right direction; the next thing was to counteract the cupidity of the priests; the king called upon Jehoiada and the priests to forego all which they had been used to receive from the people. Then Jehoiada made a chest with a hole in the lid, into which the offerings were to be cast. Much money was thus gathered; masons, carpenters, stonecutters, and builders were hired, and the work began in earnest; the givers could see that they had something to show for their money, and the work went on well.

There is a cry everywhere among workers for the Lord, "How are we to get money for the work?" Some attempt to extort it by the most desperate and exaggerated appeals, some by preaching eloquent sermons, some by pandering to the world and getting up concerts and bazaars, so the worldlings who attend them may not think their money lost because it is only given to God, but may also get out of it some of the kind of satisfaction for which they live. It is as much as to say, "No one would give to the cause of God who was not tricked into it; no one would give to God of his own voluntary will." And yet no other offering is acceptable to the Lord; "Of every man that with his heart, ye shall take My offering" (Ex. 25:2). "If there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not" (II Cor. 8:12). While Joash was sending round the country to make collections very little came of it. But when he began with the redemption money, the recognition that the people were not their own, and without any pressure, put the chest at the entrance of the temple and rested in the Lord, then abundance of supply came in.

When in a certain city, a series of meetings were to be held, the chief mover in getting up these meetings was so anxious about monetary and other arrangements, that he had passed a whole night without sleep. Telling this to a Christian worker, and at the same time how completely without funds he was, and yet so sure that God willed the meetings should be held, she led him to see how safe it was to trust this matter fully out of his hands into the Lord's, letting go all anxiety on the subject, and letting the Lord be responsible. During the meetings, which lasted a week, and entailed considerable expense, no mention was made of money, and no collections were made. But before they came to an end, this very man had to tell how wonderfully the Lord had undertaken, and how, without any solicitation of any kind, all the expenses had been provided.

When Rev. A. B. Simpson, of New York, had it laid upon him to open and God had made it clear to his own mind that it was to be done; before he had mentioned it at all among his people, a gentleman who had received physical healing at his meetings placed in his hands some thousands of dollars. When God is made, in practical reality, the Treasurer of His people, He often, very often, gives before we ask even, and He never lets those who really trust in Him need to ask anything of man, and He never suffers them to be in debt while they trust Him. The trouble with so many is that they do not believe in a God nigh at hand, one who cares for our every need, and who would move earth and heaven sooner than not answer the prayer of His children (Ps. 18:6-19; Rev. 8:1-5).

The people were very happy, "the princes and all the people rejoiced, and brought in, and cast into the chest, until they had made an end." There is nothing which people do more willingly than to give if their hearts are first won; the proportion is always according to the value we set on things. If we value ourselves most, then the chief part of our income will be spent on ourselves; if it is the world, and outward appearance which we most value, it will appear in our spending; if it is dress, it will be made manifest; if God is first with us, then the chief proportion of our spending will be for Him, and this not in money only but time, thought, influence—everything. If all we are is the Lord's, then all which is spent upon ourselves is like His loving gift to us. Joash finished the restoration of the temple, but, alas, there was grievous defection in his own life, and one of his last acts was to slay the only man who was faithful to him, Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada, the priest.

ARCHDEACON FARRAR, the Eulogist of General Grant—WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

ARCHDEACON FARRAR, The Eulogist of General Grant.

WHATEVER may be the estimate of Dr. Farrar held in the Christian community of his own country, here he will always be best known and loved as the eulogist of our great hero. We do not think any section of the Christian Church in Great Britain unanimously endorses Dr. Farrar. He has succeeded in alienating the sympathies of a large number of the members of the Protestant Episcopal Church, to which he belongs, and some of the articles of his creed, which are thoroughly unorthodox, have made him obnoxious to the members of other churches; but to Americans the prominent fact overshadowing everything else about him is that when it was resolved to hold a memorial service for General Grant in Westminster Abbey, Dr. Farrar begged to be allowed to participate in the service. His fame as a pulpit orator indicated the part that ought to be assigned to him, and right nobly and generously did he perform that part. Never did so eloquent a tribute to an American and American institutions issue from the lips of an Englishman. Dr. Farrar is now visiting America, and is speaking by invitation in our chief cities; his portrait, therefore, and a brief sketch of his life, will at this time be interesting to our readers. With these appears on the first page a picture of the venerable Abbey in which the memorial service was held, and at the request of members of the Grand Army of the Republic a verbatim report of the eloquent Archdeacon's eulogy.

Frederick William Farrar was born in the Fort, Bombay, India, August 7th, 1831, and is therefore now fifty-four years of age. He is the son of the late Rev. C. R. Farrar, rector of Sidcup, Kent. He received his education at King William's College, in the Isle of Man, and at King's College, London. In 1850 he became a classical exhibitor of the London University, graduated B.A., and was appointed a university scholar in 1852. From there he went to Trinity College, Cambridge, and in 1854 took his Bachelor's degree. There, too, he obtained the Chancellor's Prize for English verse by his poem on "The Arctic Regions," the Le Bas Classical Prize, and the Norrisian Prize. In 1854 he was ordained a deacon by the Bishop of Salisbury, and was admitted to priest's orders in 1857 by the Bishop of Ely. In that same year he took his M.A. degree; in 1872 he was made B.D., and in 1873 D.D. For some years he was one of the assistant masters at Harrow under Dr. Vaughan, and his successor, Dr. Butler. In 1871 he accepted the head-mastership of Marlborough College, which he held with great distinction until April, 1876, when he was appointed to a canonry in Westminster Abbey, and the rectory of St. Margaret's, Westminster. He was made archdeacon in 1883. He was chosen as Select Preacher before the University of Cambridge in 1868, and again in 1874-'75, and he delivered the Hulsean Lectures in 1870. For fourteen years he has held the office of Chaplain to the Queen; from 1869 to 1873 as Honorary Chaplain, when he was nominated Chaplain in Ordinary.

Dr. Farrar first became known to the literary world by his tales of school and college life—"Eric; or, Little by Little," "St. Winifred's; or, The World of School," and "Julian Home"—which were widely read. It was not, however, until 1874, when his "Life of Christ" appeared, that his literary powers were fully appreciated. It attained its twelfth edition in a single year, and is now in its twenty-fifth edition.

Dr. Farrar's respect for America is not a new development. As far back as 1879 he amazed an aristocratic British audience by declaring that the course which alienated the American colonies from the mother country was folly, and he at the same time recognized the blessings to civilization and progress, on both sides of the Atlantic, which had followed the Revolution.

Archdeacon Farrar's object in visiting America is to see the country and to visit some friends; but he will not altogether abstain from intellectual labor during his stay. He had promised to deliver the opening address before the Johns Hopkins University at Baltimore, and to be present at the Church Congress at New Haven. From New Haven he will come to New York, where he will deliver three lectures, and then go to Boston and other places. On October 29th a grand reception will be tendered him in Chickering Hall, New York, by the National Temperance Society and the Church Temperance Society, at which Bishop Henry C. Potter will preside, and Dr. Cuyler and Chief-Justice Noah Davis will speak.

In Boston and Philadelphia the lectures will be addressed to divinity students and ministers, on purely theological subjects. The subjects of the other lectures will be "Dante," "The Talmud and its Author," and "Browning the Poet."

DR. F. W. FARRAR ON GENERAL GRANT. An Address delivered in Westminster Abbey, Aug. 4, 1885.*

EIGHT years have not passed since the Dean of Westminster, whom Americans so much loved and honored, was walking round this Abbey with General Grant, and explaining to him its wealth of great memorials. Neither of them had attained the allotted span of human life, and for both we might have hoped that many years would elapse before they went down to the grave, full of years and honors. But this is already the fourth summer since the Dean fell asleep, and to-day we are assembled at the obsequies of the great soldier whose sun has gone down while it yet was day, and at whose funeral-service in America tens of thousands are assembled at this moment to mourn with his widow, family and friends. Yes; life at the best is but as a vapor that passeth away. The glories of our birth and state are shadows, not substantial things. But when death comes, what nobler epitaph can any man have than this, that, having served his generation, by the will of God he fell asleep?

Little can the living do for the dead. The pomps and ceremonies of earthly grandeur have lost their significance, but when our soul shall leave its dwelling the story of one fair and virtuous action is on our tombs or silken banners over us. I would desire to speak simply and directly, and, if with generous appreciation, yet with no idle flattery, of him whose death has made a nation mourn. His private life, the faults and failings of his character, whatever they may have been, belong in no sense to the world. They are for the judgment of God, whose merciful forgiveness is necessary for the best of what we do and are. We touch only on his public actions and services, the record of his strength, his magnanimity, his self-control, his generous deeds. His life falls into four marked divisions, of which each has its own lessons for us. He touched on them himself in part when he said:

"Bury me either at West Point, where I was trained as a youth; or in Illinois, which gave me my first commission; or at New York, which sympathized with me in my misfortunes."

His wish has been respected, and on the cliff overhanging the Hudson his monument will stand, to recall to the memory of future generations those dark days of a nation's history which he did so much to close. First came the early years of growth and training, of poverty and obscurity, of struggle and self-denial. Poor and humbly born, he had to make his own way in the world. God's unseen providence, which men nickname chance, directed his boyhood. A cadetship was given him at the Military Academy of West Point, and after a brief period of service in the Mexican war, in which he was three times mentioned in despatches, seeing no opening for a soldier in what seemed likely to be days of unbroken peace, he settled down to a humble trade in a provincial town. Citizens of

St. Louis still remember the rough backwoodsman who sold fire wood from door to door, and who afterward became a leather-seller in the obscure town of Galena.

Those who knew him in those days have said that if any one had predicted that the silent, unprosperous, unambitious man, whose chief aim was to get a plankroad from his shop to the railway depot, would become twice President of the United States, and one of the foremost men of his day, the prophecy would have seemed extravagantly ridiculous. But such careers are the glory of the American continent. They show that the people have a sovereign insight into intrinsic force. If Rome told with pride how her dictators came from the ploughland, America, too, may record the answer of the President who, on being asked what would be his coat of arms, answered, proudly mindful of his early struggles, "A pair of shirt-sleeves." The answer showed a noble sense of the dignity of labor, a noble superiority to a strong conviction that men are to be honored simply as men, and not for the prizes of birth and accident, which are without them. You have of late years had two martyr Presidents, both men sons of the people. One was the homely man, who at the age of seven was a farm lad, at seventeen a rail-splitter, at twenty a boatman on the Mississippi, and who in manhood proved to be one of the most honest and God-fearing of modern rulers. The other grew up from a shoeless child in a log-hut on the prairies, round which the wolves prowled in the winter snow, to be a humble teacher in Hiram Institute. With these Presidents America need not blush to name also the leather-seller of Galena. Every true man derived his patent of nobleness direct from God.

Did not God choose David from the sheepfold, from following the ewes great with young ones, to make him the ruler of his people, Israel? Was not the Lord of Life and all the worlds for thirty years a carpenter at Nazareth? Do not such things illustrate the prophecy of Solomon: "Seest thou a man diligent in his business? He shall stand before kings; he shall not stand before mean men."

When Abraham Lincoln sat, book in hand, day after day under the tree, moving round it as the shadow crossed, absorbed in mastering his task; when James Garfield rang the bell at Hiram Institute on the very stroke of the hour, and swept the school-room as faithfully as he mastered his Greek lesson; when Ulysses Grant, sent with his team to meet some men who came to load his cart with logs, and, finding no men, loaded the cart with his own boy's strength, they showed in conscientious duty qualities which were to raise them to become kings of men. When John Adams was told that his son, John Quincy Adams, had been elected President of the United States, he said: "He has always been laborious, child and man, from infancy."

But the youth was not destined to die in the deep valley of obscurity and toil, in which it is the lot—and perhaps the happy lot—of most of us to spend our little lives. The hour came; the man was needed. In 1861 there broke out that most terrible war of modern days. Grant received a commission as Colonel of Volunteers, and in four years the struggling toiler had been raised to the chief command of a vaster army than has ever been handled by any mortal man. Who could have imagined that four years would make that enormous difference? But it is often so. The great men needed for some tremendous crisis have stepped often, as it were, out of a door in the wall which no man has noticed; and, unannounced, unheralded, without prestige, have made their way silently and single-handed to the front. And

THERE WAS NO LUCK IN IT.
It was a work of inflexible faithfulness, of indomitable resolution, of sleepless energy, and iron purpose and tenacity. In the campaigns at Fort Donelson; in the desperate battle at Shiloh; in the siege of Corinth; in the success-

POSTHUMOUS OPPORTUNITY.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Oct. 18, 1885.

"If the tree fall toward the south, or toward the north, in the place where the tree falleth, there it shall be."—ECCLES. 11:3.

A Chimerical Expectation—The Theory of Post-Mortem Amendment Illogical—Penalty Fails to Reclaim in this Life—Drunkards not Reformed by Delirium Tremens—Jails do not Reform Habitual Criminals—Conditions of the Impenitent after Death—Not Favorable to Reform—An Unpropitious Start—The Infant has a Better Chance—Seraphs not Evolved—Not Demanded by Justice—Longevity not Conductive to Holiness—The Antediluvians—Unfavorable Surroundings—A Demoralizing Theory—Alexander's Sieges—An Incident in a Battle—A Dream of Judgment.

THERE is a hovering hope in the minds of a vast multitude that there will be an opportunity in the next world to correct the mistakes of this; that, if we do make complete shipwreck of our earthly life, it will be on a shore up which we may walk to a palace; that, as a defendant may lose his case in the Circuit Court, and carry it up to the Supreme Court or Court of Chancery, and get a reversal of judgment in his behalf, all the costs being thrown over on the other party, so if we fail in the earthly trial, we may in the higher jurisdiction of eternity have the judgment of the lower court set aside, all the costs remitted, and we be victorious defendants forever.

A CHIMERICAL HOPE.

My object in this sermon is to show that common-sense, as well as my text, declares that such an expectation is chimerical. You say that the impenitent man having got into the next world and seeing the disaster will, as a result of that disaster, turn, the pain the cause of his reformation. But you can find ten thousand instances in this world of men who have done wrong and distress overtook them suddenly. Did the distress heal them? No; they went right on.

PAIN DOES NOT CURE.

That man was flung of dissipations. "You must stop drinking," said the doctor, "and quit the fast life you are leading, or it will destroy you." The patient suffers paroxysm after paroxysm, but under skillful medical treatment he begins to sit up, begins to walk about the room, begins to go to business. And, lo! he goes back to the same grog-shops for his morning dram, and his evening dram, and the drams between. Flat down again. Same doctor. Same physical anguish. Same medical warning.

Now the illness is more protracted, the liver is more stubborn, the stomach more irritable, and the digestive organs are more rebellious. But after a while he is out again, goes back to the same dram shops, and goes the same round of sacrilege against his physical health.

He sees that his downward course is ruining his household, that his life is a perpetual perjury against his marriage vow, that that broken-hearted woman is so unlike the roseate young wife that he married, that her old schoolmates do not recognize her, that his sons are to be taunted for a lifetime by the father's drunkenness, that the daughters are to pass into life under the scarification of a disreputable ancestor. He is drinking up their happiness, their prospects for this life, and, perhaps, for the life to come. Sometimes an appreciation of what he is doing comes upon him. His nervous system is all a jangle. From crown of head to sole of foot he is one aching, rasping, crucifying, damning torture. Where is he? In hell on earth. Does it reform him?

After a while he has delirium tremens, with a whole jungle of hissing reptiles let out on his pillow, and his screams horrify the neighbors as he dashes out of his bed, crying: "Take these things off me!" As he sits, pale and convalescent, the doctor says: "Now I want to have a plain talk with you, my dear fellow. The next attack of this kind you will have you will be beyond all medical skill, and you will die. He gets better and goes forth into the same round again. This time medicine takes no effect. Consultation of physicians agree in saying there is no hope. Death ends the scene.

HABITUAL CRIMINALS.

That process of inebriation, warning, and dissolution is going on within stone's throw of this church, going on in all the neighborhoods of Christendom. Pain does not correct. Suffering does not reform. What is true in one sense is true in all senses, and will forever be so, and yet men are expecting in the next world purgatorial rejuvenation. Take up the printed reports of the prisons of the United States, and you will find that the vast majority of the incarcerated have been there before, some of them four, five, six times. With a million illustrations all working the other way in this world, people are expecting that distress in the next state will be salutary. You cannot imagine any worse torture in any other world than that which some men have suffered here, and without any salutary consequence.

AN UNPROFITABLE BEGINNING.

Furthermore, the prospect of a reformation in the next world is more improbable than a reformation here. In this world the life started with innocence of infancy. In the case supposed the other life will open with all the accumulated bad habits of many years upon him. Surely, it is easier to build a strong ship out of new timber than out of an old hull that has been ground up in the breakers. If with innocence to start with in this life a man does not become godly, what prospect is there that in the next world, starting with sin, there would be a seraph evolved? Surely the sculptor has more prospect of making a fine statue out of a block of pure white Parian marble than out of an old black rock seamed and cracked with the storms of a half century. Surely upon a clean, white sheet of paper it is easier to write a deed or a will than upon a sheet of paper all scribbled and blotted and torn from top to bottom. Yet men seem to think that, though the life that began here comparatively perfect turned out badly, the next life will succeed, though it starts with a dead failure.

TIME NO REFORMER.

"But," says some one, "I think we ought to have a chance in the next life, because this life is so short it allows only small opportunity." We hardly have time to turn around between cradle and tomb, the wood of the one almost touching the marble of the other. But do you know what made the ancient deluge a necessity? It was the longevity of the antediluvians. They were worse in the second century of their lifetime than in the first hundred years, and still worse in the third century, and still worse all the way on to seven, eight, and nine hundred years, and the earth had to be washed, and scrubbed, and soaked, and anchored, clear out of sight for more than a month before it could be made fit for decent people to live in. Longevity never cures impenitency. All the pictures of Time represent him with a scythe to cut, but I never saw any picture of Time with a case of medicines to heal. Seneca says that Nero for the first five years of his public life was set up for an example of clemency and kindness, but his path all the way descended until at sixty-eight he became a suicide. If eight hundred years did not make antediluvians any better, but only made them worse, the ages of eternity could have no effect except prolongation of depravity.

UNPROFITABLE SURROUNDINGS.

"But," says some one, "in the future state evil surroundings will be withdrawn and elevated influences substituted, and hence expurgation, and sublimation, and glorification." But the righteous, all their sins forgiven, have passed on into a beatific state, and consequently the unsaved will be left alone. It cannot be expected that Dr. Duff, who exhausted himself in teaching Hindoos the way to heaven, and Dr. Abel, who gave his life in the evangelization of China, and Adoniram Judson, who toiled for the redemption of Borneo, should be sent down by some celestial missionary society to educate those who wasted all their earthly existence Evangelistic and missionary efforts are ended. The entire kingdom of the morally bankrupt by themselves, where are the salvatory influences to come from? Can one speckled and bad apple in a barrel of diseased apples turn the other apples good? Can those who are themselves down help others up? Can those who have themselves failed in the business of the so pay the debts of their spiritual insolvents? Can a million wrongs make one right?

A LAZARETTO WORLD.

Poneropolis was a city where King Philip Thracia put all the bad people of his kingdom. If any man had opened a primary school, Poneropolis I do not think the parents from other cities would have sent their children there. Instead of amendment in the other world, all the associations, now that the good are evolve will be degenerating and down. You would not want to send a man to a cholera or yellow fever hospital for his health; and the great lazaretto of the next world, containing the diseased plague-struck, will be a poor place for moral recovery. If the surroundings in this world were crowded of temptation, the surroundings in the next world, after the righteous have passed, and on, will be a thousand per cent more crowded of temptation.

The Count of Chateaubriand made his lion sleep at night at the top of a castle tower where the winds howled and where specters were said to haunt the place; and while the mother and sisters almost died with fright, the son tells us that the process gave him nerve that could not tremble and a courage that never faltered. But I don't think that towers of darkness and the spectral world swept by Sirocco and Euroclydon will ever fit one for the land eternal sunshine. I wonder what is the curriculum of that college of Inferno, where, after proper preparation by the sins of this life, the candidate enters, passing on from Freshman class of depravity to Sophomore of abandonment, and from Sophomore to Junior, and from Junior to Senior, and day of graduation comes and with diploma signed by Satan, the president, and other professional demoniacs, attests that the candidate has been long enough under their drill, he passes up to enter heaven! Ponder a preparative course for heavenly mission! Ah, my friends, Satan and his cohorts have fitted uncounted multitudes for ruin, I never fitted one soul for happiness.

A DEMORALIZING THEORY.

Furthermore, it would not be safe for the world if men had another chance in the next. If it had been announced that, however wicked a man might act in this world he could fix it all right in the next, society would be terribly demoralized, and the human race demolished a few years. The fear that if we are bad and unforgiven here it will not be well for us in the next existence is the chief influence that keeps civilization from rushing back to semi-barbarism, and semi-barbarism from rushing into night savagery, and midnight savagery from extinction, for it is the astringent impression of nations, Christian and heathen, that there is future chance for those who have wasted this.

Multitudes of men who are kept within bounds would say, "Go to now! Let me get all of this life there is in it. Come, gluttony, inebriation, and uncleanness, and revenge, and all sensualities, and wait upon me! My life will be somewhat shortened in this world by idleness, but that will only make heavenly indulgence on a larger scale the sooner possible. I will overtake the saints at last, and will enter the Heavenly Temple only a little later than those who behaved themselves here. I will my way to heaven take a little wider excursion than those who were on earth pious, and I shall go to heaven via Gehenna and via Sheol." Is there any other chance in the next world means license and wild abandonment in this.

Suppose you were a party in an important case at law, and you knew from consultation with lges and attorneys that it would be tried ice, and the first trial would be of little importance, but that the second would decide everything, for which trial would you make the best preparation, for which retain the ablest attorneys, for which be most anxious about the evidence of witnesses? You would put all the ess upon the second trial, all the anxiety, all the expenditure, saying, "The first is nothing, the last is everything." Give the race assurance a second and more important trial in the subsequent life, and all the preparation for eternity uld be post-mortem, post-funeral, post-sepulchral, and the world with one jerk be pitched off

o impiety and godlessness.

SUFFICIENT CHANCES IN LIFE.
Furthermore, let me ask why a chance uld be given in the next world if we have used innumerable chances in this? Suppose you give a banquet, and you invite a vast number of friends, but one man declines to come, treats your invitation with indifference. You he course of twenty years give twenty banquets, and the same man is invited to them all, treats them all in the same obnoxious way.
er a while you remove to another house, er and better, and you again invite your nds, but send no invitation to the man who lined or neglected the other invitations.
you to blame? Has he a right to expect to invited after all the indignities he has done
? God in this world has invited us all to banquet of His grace. He invited us by His vidence and His Spirit three hundred and y-five days of every year since we knew our hand from our left. If we declined it every e, or treated the invitation with indifference, gave twenty or forty or fifty years of indig-on our part toward the Banqueter, and at
He spreads the banquet in a more luxuriant kingly place, amid the heavenly gardens, we a right to expect Him to invite us n, and have we a right to blame Him if He s not invite us?

THE GOSPEL SHIP.
twelve gates of salvation stood open twenty s or fifty years for our admission, and at the
of that time they are closed, can we comain of it and say, "These gates ought to be again. Give us another chance?" If the mer is to sail for Hamburg, and we want to to Germany by that line, and we read in y evening and every morning newspaper it will sail on a certain day, for two weeks ave that advertisement before our eyes, and we go down to the docks fifteen minutes it has shoved off into the stream and say:
ome back. Give me another chance. It is fair to treat me in this way. Swing up to dock again, and throw out the planks, and e come on board." Such behavior would e arrest as a madman.

nd if, after the Gospel ship has lain at anchor
re our eyes for years and years and years, all the benign voices of earth and heaven urged us to get on board, as she might sail any moment, and after a while she sails us, is it common-sense to expect her to e back? You might as well go out on the lands at Neversink and call to the Aurania she has been three days out, and expect o return, as to call back an opportunity for en when it once has sped away. All heaven ed us as a gratuity, and for a lifetime we re-to take it, and then rush on the bosses of vah's buckler demanding another chance.
e ought to be, there can be, there will be,
such thing as posthumous opportunity.
our common-sense agrees with my text—the tree fall toward the south, or toward orth, in the place where the tree falleth, it shall be."

us see that this idea lifts this world up from important way station to a platform of stuo-id issues, and makes all eternity whirl nd this hour. But one trial for which all reparation must be made in this world, or made at all. That piles up all the ems and all the climaxes and all the destinies into life here. No other chance! Oh, how that augments the value and the importance of this chance!

ALEXANDER'S LIGHT.

Alexander with his army used to surround a city, and then would lift a great light in token to the people that, if they surrendered before that light went out, all would be well; but if once the light went out, then the battering-rams would swing against the wall, and demolition and disaster would follow. Well, all we need to do for our present and everlasting safety is to make surrender to Christ, the King and Conqueror, surrender of our hearts, surrender of our lives, surrender of everything. And He keeps a great light burning, light of Gospel invitation, light kindled with the wood of the cross and flaming up against the dark night of our sin and sorrow.
Surrender while that great light continues to burn, for after it goes out there will be no other opportunity of making peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ. Talk of another chance!
Why, this is a supernal chance!

In the time of Edward the Sixth, at the battle of Musselburgh, a private soldier, seeing that the Earl of Huntley had lost his helmet, took off his own helmet and put it upon the head of the earl; and the head of the private soldier uncovered, he was soon slain, while his commander rode safely out of the battle. But in our case, instead of a private soldier offering helmet to an earl, it is a King putting His crown upon an unworthy subject, the King dying that we might live. Tell it to all points of the compass. Tell it to night and day. Tell it to all earth and heaven. Tell it to all centuries, all ages, all millenniums, that we have such a magnificent chance in this world that we need no other chance in the next.

A DREAM.

I am in the burnished Judgment Hall of the Last Day. A great white throne is lifted, but the Judge has not yet taken it. While we are waiting for His arrival I hear immortal spirits in conversation. "What are you waiting here for?" says a soul that went up from Madagascar to a soul that ascended from America. The latter says: "I came from America, where forty years I heard the Gospel preached, and Bible read, and from the prayer I learned in infancy at my mother's knee until my last hour I had Gospel advantage, but for some reason I did not make the Christian choice, and I am here waiting for the Judge to give me a new trial and another chance." "Strange," says the other: "I had but one Gospel call in Madagascar, and I accepted it, and I do not need another chance."
"Why are you here?" says one who on earth had feeblest intellect to one who had great brain, and silvery tongue, and sceptres of influence.
The latter responds: "Oh, I knew more than my fellows. I mastered libraries, and had learned titles from colleges, and my name was a synonym for eloquence and power. And yet I neglected my soul, and I am here waiting for a new trial." "Strange," says the one of the feeble earthly capacity: "I knew but little of worldly knowledge, but I knew Christ, and made Him my partner, and I have no need of another chance."

Now the ground trembles with the approaching chariot. The great folding doors of the Hall swing open. Stand back! cry the celestial ushers. Stand back, and let the Judge of quick and dead pass through! He takes the throne, and, looking over the throng of nations,
He says: "Come to Judgment, the last Judgment, the only Judgment!" By one flash from the throne all the history of each one flames forth to the vision of himself and all others.
"Divide!" says the Judge to the assembly.
"Divide!" echo the walls. "Divide!" cry the guards angelic.

And now the immortals separate, rushing this way and that, and after a while there is a great aisle between them, and a great vacuum widening and widening, and the Judge, turning to the throne on one side, says: "He that is righteous let him be righteous still, and he that is holy let him be holy still," and then turning toward the throne on the opposite side, He says: "He that is unjust let him be unjust still, and he that is filthy let him be filthy still," and then lifting one hand toward each group, He declares: "If the tree fall toward the south or toward the north, in the place where the tree falleth there it shall be." And then I hear something jar with a great sound. It is the closing of the Book of Judgment. The Judge ascends the stairs behind the throne. The Hall of the last Assize is cleared and shut. The High Court of Eternity adjourned forever.

THE WORLD-POWER.

By G. Warrand Houghton.

FEW Christians are aware of the vast consequences entailed upon the Church by ignorance of dispensational truth, as taught in God's Word. What is

THE ORIGIN OF THE WORLD-POWER?

God's earthly people, Israel, knew that His only kingdom on earth must be established in Jerusalem. Of the heavenly calling of the Church they knew nothing. In spite of continued acts of disobedience they refused to believe they could be cast out. They may well have argued that they would never be superseded by the Gentile. God, however, gave them over to the Gentile supremacy, promising, nevertheless (for He is long-suffering, slow to anger, and of great goodness), to destroy the Gentile power and remember His covenant with Abraham; and sooner should His celestial ordinances depart from before Him than that promise be forgotten! Yet, what God would not forget, the Church did not trouble to remember. It has clung for over fifteen centuries to

THE FOURTH OF THE WILD BEASTS

of Daniel's vision, one which was to combine the characteristics of the three preceding ones (compare Rev. 13: 1-2), and "be great and terrible exceedingly." The thought is simply frightful. The man of God who beheld this fearful thing even but in vision was "much troubled." What an awful thing it is to count God "slack concerning His promises," to say
"my Lord delayeth His coming!" The Church is ever prone to rest on sight and not on faith.
Like Peter, when the storm arose, she tried to walk on the waters by looking down instead of steadfastly keeping her eyes fixed on the Author and Finisher of her faith. There never has been till now a people prepared for His possession.
Yet Jesus waits. His patience is inexhaustible.

The present position of the Church with regard to this thing is very serious, much more so than Christians are wont to imagine. There is not panic; but scepticism and indifference as to "the hope" pervades even the true Church.
It is not contended that souls are not being saved, but that a full Gospel is not found acceptable by the majority of those who have been saved. The average evangelist is satisfied if he brings the proselyte into the outer court, instead of conducting him into the sanctuary. The Lord says, "Be ye ready!" and there must be a people to be ready for Him when He comes.
It is certain that they ought all to be preparing people for the Lord's return, and it is equally certain that but few are doing so.

The outcome of all this is given in Revelation
17, where "mystery Babylon" is found

SEATED ON THE BEAST

with the ten horns (i.e., uncrowned), and whence she is hurled to her ruin by those same "ten horns." It may be asserted that the Babylonian system is only found among Papists and Ritualists. That is, however, quite incorrect. Its symbols are found in nearly all ecclesiastical systems, and the services would seem to be leavened throughout, if people would only take the trouble to see where. It must be thoroughly shaken off if we are to be "without blemish" among the one hundred and forty-four thousand not contaminated with spiritual adultery.

Let us rest on Christ and keep clear of the World-Power, and let our hope in Christ be fixed by the Spirit working through the Word.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Determined Man.—At a recent meeting the Rev. Mr. McNeil said: "A man came into a meeting one night, and when asked if he were a Christian, he replied, 'No; I know nothing of it, but I am determined to know what this religion is,' and in ten minutes he rose with the light of heaven in his face, because he was in earnest. Like Zaccheus he was determined to overcome every obstacle and see his Lord, and he did."

The Devil Foiled Again.—The Rev. Mr. M'Lahlan remarked: "God has given us great blessing in our work for Him. One man to whom I spoke one night recently said, in a distressed tone, 'I cannot see it! I cannot see it! Everything about the Gospel is quite dark to me.' We knelt in prayer; I pleaded with the Lord that this man's eyes might be opened to see the truth! I then opened my Bible and read to him a few passages which told of our heavenly Father laying our sins on Jesus. After I had finished he exclaimed, in great astonishment, 'What! has the Father put my sins upon Jesus?' 'Yes,' I rejoined; 'your sins and mine were all laid on Jesus.' 'Well,' he said, 'Satan tried to keep me from this meeting all day, but I have come, and I go away with a great blessing.'"

Saved from a Living Death.—At a recent meeting a man testified thus: "For twelve years I was an earnest worker for the Lord in London. I came to this city, and a lady, in kindness, as she thought, offered me some whiskey, not suspecting the harm it would do me. I yielded to the temptation, and from that time I became careless of religion. Soon doubt took possession of my mind, and this was followed by sceptical views about all that Christians love and prize. I was going fast down to destruction, but the Lord looked upon me and was merciful. He led me into Mr. Hammond's meeting on a recent Thursday afternoon, and there He was graciously pleased to meet with me and heal my backslidings; and now when I look back on my former life, and think of what the Lord has snatched me from, I gratefully thank Him, for it was just a living death, and nothing beside."

Three Courageous Young Ladies.—Captain Hatfield said: "A few months ago a young lady went to a meeting, and was led to see that she was a lost sinner, but that Jesus could save her. She gave herself to Him, and went home rejoicing in the Lord. She asked her two sisters, who were not Christians, to come to the meeting, but they refused. She continued to plead with them just to come and see what it was like. At length her entreaties prevailed, and they accompanied her to the meeting, and they also were touched by the story of the Cross, and gave themselves to Jesus. When their parents heard of this they became very angry, and their father said if they did not discontinue attending those meetings they would have to seek a home elsewhere. But they still continued to go, and he told them they must leave his house. The three sisters sorrowfully gathered their things together, and, after engaging in prayer, they left the house, and were about to enter a cab when their parents' hearts melted, and they came out and begged of them to return to their house. They still continue to shine and live for Jesus."

A Highway Robber's Remorse.—The Rev. Mr. Muir said: "Many years ago there was a company of men on the borders of Scotland who used to live by plunder. There was one man in particular, known as John of the Score, who seemed to be the worst among the gang. One day while walking along a road he met a man with a very fine chestnut horse. When John saw it he wished to be the possessor of the horse. He told the man his intention of taking it, but the owner resisted. At length John drew from his pocket a pistol, threatening to put the man to instant death if he did not give up the horse. But the man still pleaded to keep his property, saying it was the only means by which he could support his wife and family. But John turned a deaf ear to all the man's entreaties, and walked off with the horse. From that moment he had no peace for thinking of the man he had so cruelly robbed of his living. At length he could bear it no longer, so calling his sons to him, who were also engaged in this unlawful traffic, he said: 'I cannot persist in this conduct any longer. I am going to give myself up, and you will have to take care of yourselves the best way you can.' He gave himself up to the authorities, who imprisoned him in the Edinburgh gaol. He was tried and found guilty, and was condemned. When the sentence was pronounced John felt he had no hope for this life or the next. When he was conducted back to gaol he asked if he might see a minister. Two ministers came to see him, and John asked in a trembling voice, 'Is there any hope for me?' 'Yes,' they said, 'there is hope for you. Although you have been guilty of so many atrocious crimes there is hope for you, for 'This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners.' John seized hold of this truth, and entered into the rest which God has prepared for His people."

INCIDENTS IN MR. NOBLE'S WORK.

True to His Colors.—A Little Boy in Our Band of Hope was run over in the street by a heavy team and truck, and was dreadfully mangled. He was taken to the hospital, and his legs were amputated. After the operation the surgeon offered him a stimulant, but the boy begged that he might not be forced to take it, and he was allowed to do without it. The poor lad sunk under his sufferings, but before he died he sent for his mother to the hospital. When she came he said: "Mother, I want you to do something for me after I am dead." "I will, my boy; what is it?" "You know the Hoxton Hall, where the Band of Hope is? Will you go there and tell the superintendent about me being run over? Tell him they brought me here, and that I was true to my colors." After the boy was dead the woman came to the hall and told me of the brave little fellow's fidelity.

"Until Seventy Times Seven."—A Woman who was the most inveterate drinker I ever knew used to come to our meetings night after night. I have known her come with a bottle under her shawl, and getting where it was in the shade and she could not be watched, drink herself into a state of insensibility and have to be carried home. Yet she was anxious to reform, and time and again she signed the pledge, only to sink back further into debauchery. One night she was there again, looking more miserable and degraded than ever. She was near the platform, and she listened intently as one after another testified of the Lord's power to save. She was much affected, and at length she said to my wife: "Mrs. Noble, won't you try me once more?" Poor creature! she had been often tried without success. My wife took her aside and prayed with her, and she went away rejoicing yet trembling. That is five years ago. She has never touched a drop since. She is living a reputable, useful life, and her husband has been converted through her instrumentality.

A Dying Saloon Keeper.—About Three Years ago I was requested to visit a dying man whose bar-room was a notorious resort. The man himself sent for me, and I was curious to know why. I went immediately to his place and entered the bar-room. That was a shocking sight. Miserable creatures were standing there clutching their glasses of liquor, looking as wretched as if they had come from their graves to get the stuff and had forgotten their way back. The proprietor's wife was behind the bar, and when she saw me she beckoned me to the private door. "My husband wants to see you. He is dying. Oh, this accursed business! I never wanted to begin it. We were doing well as we were, but he had the chance of getting this place, and said there was a fortune in it." I went into the chamber of death. There upon the bed lay an old business acquaintance of mine, but so changed that I could scarcely recognize him. The business had played fearful havoc with the seller. I talked with him for some time, and then asked him if I might read and pray with him. He raised his hand and wrung them in despair. "No," he said, "it's of no use now. I only wanted to see you once more and tell you to go on with your work. Save the people, Noble, if you can. I am a lost man." The agonized look on that man's face has haunted me ever since.

THE CHRISTIAN CONVENTION IN NEW YORK.

ON Monday evening, October 5th, the 1 session of the Convention was opened, after preliminary devotional exercises, by an address from the Rev. A. B. Simpson explaining the objects of the Convention. He urged every one to take part in the proceedings to hold up Jesus only and to exalt Him.

Dr. Wilson, of St. George's Church, spoke the motives of service. He said that he served the Lord from fear, some for pay, some for love. It was better to serve Him from an ignoble motive than not to serve Him at all, but it was the service of love that He desired. The Prodigal Son coming home from the country, with his little set speech all ready, not allowed to say it all when he met his father. He got no farther than "I am not worthy when his father stopped him. The best that father's home could give was brought out, because he was a son. God did not want children to take the position of hired servants. A friend had put into his hand the other tract entitled "The House-top Saint." When he had read it he thought how few ever reach the house-top in their Father's mansion. The house-top was there, and the Father, reaching down with His hand to draw up to the cellar and parlor and chamber Christians for there are Christians on every story. The house-top saint should never be harsh to them, for he has been there himself; but should come down now and again to help them up. Personally, he could testify that it was possible to reach the house-top. He had been in the lower regions in a state of servitude, but was a living witness of the power of the Holy Ghost, whose special mission it was to take the things of Jesus and show them to His lovers.

Mrs. Baxter said, in the course of her address: "A little word has been so pressed on my heart that I cannot help reading it to you. It is this: 'I sat down under His shadow to great delight, and His fruit was sweet to my taste.' [Canticles 2:3]. Christ's first invitation to His disciples when He was about to die was: 'Make the people sit down.' If the crowd had not believed that Jesus had come to feed them they would have rushed upon those five loaves and two fishes; but they knew they would be fed, and so they sat down in patience. Lord, help us to sit down in patience. We read of a woman who sat down. Mary was in a great bustle because the dinner was not ready, and she asked Jesus to scold Mary, not helping her. But Mary was sitting down. She was sitting at Jesus' feet, and I don't think He ever scolded any one away from there. We sit down at the feet of Jesus. He will not allow any one to take that place from us. Where is the place to sit down? Under His shadow. The restful shadow and the shadow under which we get satisfied is the shadow of Jesus. It is the shadow of a great rock in a weary land, and it is cool there. If we get out of that shadow and sit down there the rest of our experience will be true—His fruit will be sweet to our taste. It is fruit for our land, for our cities, which He will teach us to hand out to them. Anything that makes us too restless to sit down should be put away, that we may not be sitting down, but I am sitting down." Captain R. Kelso Carter closed the session with a lengthy address.

TUESDAY.

The subject suggested for the day was "The Grace and Power of Christ for our Full Salvation from Self and Sin." At the morning session for Bible readings Miss Carrie F. Judd, of Buffalo, N. Y., read Canticles 1: 7. "Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest, where thou makest thy flock to rest at noon," She said: "Jesus told His disciples that He had meat to eat that they knew not of. That was before they had received the Holy Spirit. We should not like to have Him say that to us now. It is very precious to be one of that flock which He makes to rest at noon; it is still sweeter to be one of the lambs that He carries in His arms."

TESTIMONY.

At the afternoon session many interesting testimonies were given from among the audience at the invitation of Mr. Simpson, who presided. A man said he gloried in the name of the tramp-preacher, for he had a great regard for tramps and outcasts of all kinds. For thirty years he had been addicted to strong drink, and he was sent to America as the place where the people were total abstainers in the hope of reforming him. But he found there was no lack of liquor in America, and he sank from bad to worse. He was converted under Mr. Moody's preaching. He gave up his position on a daily journal, and had devoted himself ever since to the Lord's service. Had never tasted liquor since, nor had any desire to do so. A lady said that when she received the gift of the Holy Spirit it seemed to her that the Lord asked her if she would dare to testify for Him before large congregations. It was a long time before she could say Amen to that, but now she delighted to speak for Him. She did not always wait until she had something to say; the Lord always gave her words and blessed them. The Christian life, which had once been hard to her, was now easy and sweet, and this year had been the best of her life. A man in the gallery said he had been in the habit of smoking

TWENTY CIGARS A DAY.

His smoke cost him $2710. When he received the Holy Ghost God took the appetite away, and he had never smoked since. He thought that was a fair test. A man said that he had been thinking for a long time that he ought to give up everything for Jesus, but his Christian friends had told him that there was no need to give up everything; but the Lord had led him to see his duty, and last Saturday he had resigned his commercial position, and was now ready to go anywhere to preach the Gospel—to Africa, if the Lord wanted him there.

Mrs. Whitney, a well-known worker, said: "About fourteen years ago I made a transfer of myself and all that I called mine to the Lord. He has enabled me to suffer as well as to do, and I praise God to-day for these fourteen years of experience. My life has gone out, but another life has come in. My life has been alone; yet not alone, for my Saviour has been with me. While I live, a busy life I am very happy. I count it a joy to work for Christ, to follow close to Him. I do nothing, but I am near to Him, and delight to see what He does." An elderly gentleman from Philadelphia said: "I never was at a Convention before. I had a great desire to attend Mr. Moody's Convention at Northfield, but the way was not opened. But I saw in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that this Convention was to be held, and that Mrs. Baxter would be here. I prayed to the Lord about it. I did not see my way, but I thought there would be an answer, and I prepared to come. One morning last week I got a letter from a friend in Brooklyn saying he had heard that I was looking like a wilted cabbage-leaf, and he wanted me to come and spend a few days with him, and he enclosed a return ticket. I said, 'Bless the Lord, I am going to the Convention; and here I am, and I am very happy to be with you.'"

At the evening session Dr. Wilson delivered an address. Having read John 12: 20-24—the passage referring to the Greeks who went to

Philip desiring to see Jesus—he said: "I cannot help thinking that we have come up to the house of God to keep the feast. But I think there are Greeks with us to-night who do not see with us, and they come to us with the request that the Greeks put to Philip, 'We would see Jesus.' God grant we may be true to the trust. Let us stand aside, that they may see the Master. The world is asking to see Jesus. I pray that it may see Him shining in our faces, living in our lives. You remember the story of that great artist who painted a picture of the Last Supper, and in that picture he painted a very beautiful cup standing before our Lord. He had taken pains with every detail of the picture, but the cup was exquisite. He noticed that every spectator noticed the cup. They said, 'Oh, what a beautiful cup!' With one stroke of his brush he obliterated all the beauty of the cup, saying, 'God forbid that anything in my picture should attract attention from the Lord.' No face should be visible to seeking souls but the face of Jesus. But there is one condition to seeing Jesus. Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone. It is a law of creation that there can be no life until there has been death. Seeds will remain seeds until the end of time, unless they die. May the Spirit of God deal death to us, and then give us the life of Jesus!"

Mrs. Baxter dwelt on the same words, reiterating that it was necessary to die to see Jesus. "Jesus said, 'He that loveth his life shall lose it' (John 12: 25). Naturally we look after our own interests and seek our own life; but God's way is so different from our way. God never would leave His children to do the best they could for themselves. The father can do so much better for his child than the child can do for itself. We have to give up our own plans and fall into the plans of our God, and the way of our God is death. We have to give up the ground and leave it all to God. Our place is to be crucified with Christ; we are not to be reckoned upon any more than a man who died yesterday. Then we see Jesus."

Dr. John Cookman related how he came to be an advocate of the doctrine of cleansing grace, and described the life of his mother, whom he had living in his house for many years, and living a life of beautiful sanctification, yet one with him and those around her in sweet naturalness. He also spoke of his glorified elder brother, the late Alfred Cookman, who also received this grace and thrilled the audience to tears as he told of the wonderful experience through which he came into its possession.

An address followed from Captain R. Kelso Carter, in which, as on the previous and subsequent nights, he propounded questions to the audience, requiring them to respond by rising.

WEDNESDAY.

The subject for this day was "Divine Healing," and the morning session, as usual, was devoted to Bible readings.

In the afternoon over fifty testimonies were given by persons who had themselves experienced divine healing. One man told how he had been delivered from the opium habit. Another was healed suddenly last Thanksgiving Day of a double affliction that his doctor told him would keep him on his back for more than three weeks. He had been previously assured that nothing but a surgical operation could save his life. He had also been all his life a bond-slave to spectacles, but on praying for relief he found that he could read small type without them. A lady said she had suffered for a long time with sore eyes. For more than three months it had been necessary to lead her about. She had undergone two serious operations—one in London, and one in New York—and for four years she had been a regular patient under treatment at an hospital. The eyelids were paralyzed, and the tear-gland had been probed. The best oculists here and in Europe told her that nothing could save her from ultimate total blindness, but the Lord had healed her. Another lady, who was also troubled by defective eyesight, said that she gained her living by needlework. Owing to the trouble with her eyes she had been obliged to decline fine work. She was warned that she would soon become totally blind, but having taken the Lord for her Healer, her eyesight had been restored so that she could do the finest needlework. Putting on her spectacles for a moment the other day, she found that she could not use them, they magnified too much. Looking through them her skin looked like leather, and the needle she was threading looked like a walking-stick. She has never used spectacles since. A portly, stalwart man, who said that he was a physician, testified that a few months ago he was an emaciated cripple, brought down by rheumatism and Bright's disease to the verge of the grave. He weighed only one hundred and eight pounds. He went to the Lord for healing, and was cured immediately.

CANCER CURED.

An old gentleman who spoke from the platform thanked God for the cure of his son of malignant cancer in the jaw. He had taken the boy to the Massachusetts Infirmary. Drs. Whittemore, Richardson, and Porter had all examined him, and agreed in the diagnosis. A most painful operation was decided upon as the only means of saving his life; but the night before it was to take place the father met a man who had received divine healing of a cancer, and he persuaded him to trust the boy in the hands of Christ. He did so, and the boy recovered. No operation was performed. A brother who said he was an officer in a church testified that he had been healed of heart disease, from which his family had suffered for three generations. Formerly he was confined to his house by illness for six weeks at a time. In the month of July he had been ill for several weeks, suffered excruciating pain, could not lie down day or night, but was propped up in a sitting position. He was brought to see the truth of divine healing, and three days after making a full consecration he was completely cured; could lie down and sleep peacefully, and walked up a high hill without difficulty.

MINISTERIAL TESTIMONY.

After twenty-one other testimonies were given by different persons who had been healed of various diseases, Dr. John Cookman said that twice he had been himself the subject of the healing power. On December 16th last he was lying at the gate of death, and hope had been abandoned by his physicians and his family and himself; but God had spoken to him and revealed Himself as the Healer, and he was restored. Again, one month ago, he was prostrated with congestion of the heart and lungs, and again he had gone to Christ for healing and was immediately recovered, though it had been supposed that he was dying. Dr. Wilson said that for seventeen years he was a walking drug-store, was continually ill, and had been several times near death; so near on one occasion that an undertaker was spoken to about his funeral. He had been to the most skillful physicians in America, and finally had gone to London and Edinburgh for treatment, but returned uncured, and none of them gave him hope of recovery. In a month after his return he was worse than ever. Since he had gone to the Lord for healing, two years ago, he had never tasted medicine or stimulants, had not had a day's illness, and was doing more work in connection with his church now than he had ever done in his life.

Many other persons were standing up at the conclusion of Dr. Wilson's address desiring to give testimony; but as the time for closing had arrived it was impossible to hear them. Mr. Simpson therefore asked all who had been healed by Christ without medical aid to stand up, and fully two hundred persons rose. Then, they having resumed their seats, he asked any who had been healed of either cancer, tumors, consumption, or any organic disease to rise, and forty-one persons responded.

A report of the two closing sessions of the Convention will appear in our next issue.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Republican Victory in Ohio is the Most notable political event of the week. Mr. Foraker has been elected by a plurality estimated at over 19,000, and the Legislature also has been carried by the Republicans. The latter fact is important, because a United States Senator to succeed John Sherman will be elected by this Legislature. Dr. Leonard, the Prohibition candidate for the Governorship, polled fully 25,000 votes. Last year the vote for St. John was 11,069. That the campaign was a vigorous one is proved by the fact that over 700,000 votes were cast, though the day was rainy. Many Democrats attribute the defeat to the decisive attitude taken by Governor Hoadly on the liquor question, which strongly offended temperance Democrats. National politics, however, exercised an important influence in two ways. Mr. Cleveland's Democratic friends and opponents are said to have both contributed to the defeat. His opponents, annoyed by his slowness in making removals, were indifferent about Democratic success; while his friends, irritated by the hostile attitude taken by the Ohio Democracy to the Administration, also refrained from voting. The one encouraging fact about the election is the large increase in the Prohibition vote. That the increase is all due to the growth of Prohibition sentiment is doubtful; but the fact remains that the balance of power in Ohio was this year in Prohibition hands. The Republicans had only a plurality, not a majority. There have been rumors of disturbances in Cincinnati, and a threat of mob violence. Mr. John McLean, of the Cincinnati Enquirer, has had to apply for an armed guard. The charge is that of ballot-box frauds.

The Democratic Candidates for the Governorship and Lieutenant-Governorship of New York issued their letters of acceptance last week. Governor Hill's letter is a long one, and is chiefly devoted to the denunciation of the Republican party. His attitude on the Civil Service Reform question and on the labor question he is, however, at some pains to define. On the former he says: "I believe that the Civil Service, of the country should be reformed. The continued ascendancy of one party in the national government for twenty-four years led to abuses, the creation of sinecures, and the prostitution of public positions to partisan purposes. Any laws not inconsistent with the true spirit of our institutions, having for their sole object and purpose the correction of such abuses, and capable of practical and impartial enforcement, must commend themselves to all thoughtful men." Respecting the subject of labor, Governor Hill says: "The interests of labor are worthy of serious consideration at the hands of the State. Such legislation should be enacted as is demanded by a just and proper appreciation of the wants and needs of workmen. Honest labor should be protected as far as possible from the unjust competition of prison labor, and laws should be framed providing for the amicable arbitration of differences between the employer and the employed." The campaign is being pushed vigorously, and present indications are that the result will not be "a tidal wave" for either party. Mr. Schurz has issued a manifesto defending the course of the Mugwumps in voting the Republican ticket this year after voting the Democratic ticket last year.

The Present Outbreak of Defamation of Character, which this year is worse than is usual in an off-year, was the subject of Dr. Talmage's Friday Evening Talk last week. He uttered a vigorous protest against it, which may be useful in other States besides New York. He said: "As soon as a man is nominated for any office he must be painted black. Qualification for office has nothing to do with the question. It is falsehood against falsehood, misrepresentation against misrepresentation, and scandal against scandal, until the whole scene is disgusting almost beyond endurance, and what is transpiring in our own State is at the present time taking place in most of the States. The wide indecency becomes more and more stenchful. When a man is put on the head of a city or a State ticket people begin to ransack pigeon-holes and portfolios and old trunks in the garret to see if they can find any letters that he has ever written that may be construed unto that which is compromising or denunciatory. A wrong twist is given to all his past behavior, and after the campaign has been going on for a month the candidate hardly knows himself, so confused has he become by the representations abroad concerning him. The damage is not done so much to those put up for office, because every man comes eventually to be taken for what he is worth, and you cannot put him permanently in a false position; but the damage is to those who manufacture the untruths and to the community in general, who get so in the habit of lying in the early autumn that they cannot stop it."

The Suspension of a Chief Justice Last Week is a gratifying sign of improvement in the standard of political morals. On October 14th President Cleveland suspended Judge Vincent, who in June last was appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of New Mexico. The cause of this startling proceeding was that the Chief Justice had appointed Stephen W. Dorsey one of three commissioners to draw grand and petit jurors for the Territory. The information upon which the President acted was furnished by a resident of the Territory in a communication to the Attorney-General. Mr. Garland promptly reported the fact to the President, and after a brief consultation upon the matter, in which the relations of Mr. Dorsey to jurymen and land claims are said to have received attention, it was decided that a justice who would intrust the selection of jurors to such a notorious character as Dorsey ought to be requested to explain his conduct, and until he had done so be prevented exercising his functions. Judge Vincent may be able to furnish a fair explanation of his curious appointment, and possibly may be free from blame. The fact with which we are concerned is that the report that he had made such an appointment was deemed a sufficient reason for his suspension. There are many judges in office who would do well to consider this fact, and learn the lesson it teaches.

The Arrest of W. S. Warner is a Natural Result of the disclosures made by Ferdinand Ward and the receiver of the Grant & Ward estate. It took place on Saturday morning last, and gives general satisfaction. Ward declares that Warner had $1,300,000 in "profits" out of the concern. It was the United States District Attorney who secured the warrant, so that his trial will take place in the United States Courts, where proceedings have also been commenced against Ward in the event of his escaping the penal code of New York State. Mr. Dorsheimer's information against Warner is that he abetted Ward, who was a director of the Marine National Bank, in misappropriating the funds of the bank, in fraud of the bank and of William H. Vanderbilt and General Grant, and to his own advantage. Specific counts follow, alleging detailed acts, and a final clause charges that Warner abetted, incited, counselled, and procured Ward to commit the offences, he, said Warner, intending to injure and defraud General Grant and William H. Vanderbilt for his own use, benefit, or advantage. The punishment provided under the Revised Statutes for the offence is imprisonment for not less than five nor more than ten years.

The Irish Political Conventions Held at Cork and Dublin last week were a striking manifestation of Mr. Parnell's power and popularity. He is really, as he was ironically described, the uncrowned king of Ireland. The conventions were assembled to select candidates for the approaching elections, and each candidate signed an undertaking to vote, if elected, solidly with the other Irish members of the Parnellite party, and to resign whenever called upon to do so by his colleagues. Mr. Parnell's leadership was everywhere recognized with enthusiasm, and in the two cities in which the conventions were held he received a magnificent ovation. A new addition to the party is Sir Thomas Henry Grattan Esmonde, Bart., a grandson of Henry Grattan, and a young man of great promise. He is himself a landlord, but casts in his lot with the Parnellites with enthusiasm. He was one of the candidates selected for Dublin county.

The Situation in the Balkan Peninsula Did not change materially last week. Rumors were rife of a Servian invasion of Bulgaria and of a treaty by which Servia was to be placated with the cession of the town of Widin. The great powers, however, are industriously suppressing news, and the arrangements which may be made by Servia or Bulgaria will have to be submitted to the decision of Austria and Russia, which still confront each other with menacing aspect. The whole eastern section of Europe is in a turmoil, and armies are being rapidly collected and equipped in Turkey and Greece, as well as in the disturbed provinces. The European correspondent of the New York Times cables a long description of the different movements, and compares the seething nations to a café of hyenas in a menagerie at feeding time, when the frantic brutes are indifferent whether they devour their meat, or their keeper, or one another, so long as they can set their teeth in flesh.

The Second Ballotings in France are Reported to be slightly in favor of the Republicans, but the returns so far received do not indicate that they have recovered their lost ground. There appears, however, to be little prospect of a restoration of the monarchy as the result of the downfall of the dominant party. The European correspondent of the New York Herald, who has canvassed men of all parties, states that only a very small portion of the voters meant to express any preference for a monarchical form of government. But they thought of the war against the clergy begun by M. Ferry and likely to be continued with renewed vigor; they shrank from the threatened income tax, from the separation talked of between Church and State, and from all violent and revolutionary measures likely to follow the advent to power of the radicals. Few of those who voted as conservatives had the slightest dream of any such possibility as a monarchical restoration, in either an immediate or a distant future.

The Approaching Political Struggle in Great Britain will have a strong religious element. The Premier, Lord Salisbury, speaking on October 15th, said that the agitation to separate the Church from the State was the most prominent question of the day. If the question was not settled in the next it would be settled in the following Parliament. It would be the greatest conflict in English history. A wave of infidelity was passing over the land. Mr. Gladstone bowed to it; he was unable to consider it the great issue of modern civilization, higher than any issue of national destiny. The Roman Catholics, who might have been expected to favor the cause of Church disestablishment, will probably oppose it by their votes at the polls.

The Rev. M. Baxter has Addressed Large audiences in Canada during the past two weeks on the subject of unfulfilled prophecy. In Hamilton, which has a population of thirty-five thousand, he lectured three times in the Grand Opera House. At Guelph he spoke twice; at London he delivered six lectures in the Opera House before a deeply-interested audience. He has also lectured in Stratford and Brentford. The lectures are arousing a deep interest in the prophetic Scriptures. It is a surprise to the majority even of Bible readers to learn how near we are to the time when the great events which will close this dispensation may be expected, and to see that the events now occurring of which they read in their newspapers were outlined more than twenty years ago by students of prophecy. It may be hoped that in these five cities, which have an aggregate population of a hundred thousand persons, many may be brought into the light by God's blessing on this proclamation of the truth, which they never heard before, that the end is at hand.

The Christian Convention at Buffalo, N. Y., already announced in these columns, will be held in the large hall of the Young Men's Christian Association in the ensuing week, commencing on Tuesday, October 27th, at 7:30 P.M. There will be three sessions on Wednesday and each of the following days, commencing respectively at 10 A.M., 3 P.M., and 7:30 P.M. The morning sessions will be devoted to Bible readings, the afternoons to personal testimonies, and the evenings to addresses from eminent Christian workers. Mrs. Baxter and the Rev. A. B. Simpson will take part in the meetings. It is believed that many Christians hungering for a fuller manifestation of Christ in their souls and bodies will be glad to avail themselves of this opportunity of meeting together to wait upon God for a special outpouring of the Holy Spirit. Persons desiring to attend may obtain full particulars by addressing Miss Carrie F. Judd, 260 Connecticut Street, Buffalo, N. Y.

Immense Audiences Assembled on Sunday at the Broome Street Tabernacle, New York, to hear Mr. D. L. Moody preach and Mr. Sankey sing. The large building was crowded almost to suffocation both morning and evening. Prior to the commencement of the services a company of Christian workers patrolled the unsavory neighborhood, collecting "the poor and those who are out of the way," and taking them into the Tabernacle, where they had seats in advance of the ordinary church-goers who were attracted by the visit of the evangelists. The services showed that both Mr. Moody and Mr. Sankey retained all their old power. The services were continued on Monday and Tuesday.

Mr. William Noble, the Gospel Temperance evangelist, addressed crowded audiences at Newton, Mass., on October 18th, in the Baptist church, at the invitation of the Young Men's Christian Association. On November 2d he commences a series of meetings at Chelsea, Mass., at the close of which he has promised to go to Louisville, Ky., for two weeks. Arrangements are being made to secure united meetings in Brooklyn, N. Y., which he is requested to conduct. Invitations to labor are pouring in upon him from all quarters, and it is probable that he will be induced to prolong his visit through the winter. Opportunities for efficient Gospel temperance work are being opened to him which it would be a serious responsibility to decline.

The New Building of the Bowery Branch of the Young Men's Christian Association in New York was opened on October 15th. The building is an attractive four-story structure, with a front of brick, stone, and iron. The first floor comprises a large reception room, containing an inviting fireplace, with chimney-corner seats, files of the daily and weekly papers, tables for writing, and comfortable chairs and divans. Stairs lead down from the reception-room to a spacious gymnasium, furnished with all the requirements of a good physical training place. Adjoining the gymnasium is a large dressing room containing lockers. Next to this is a room containing several tub baths and shower baths provided with hot and cold water. On the floor above the reception-room are a social-room and the library, both handsomely finished in red wood. Back of the library is an audience-room, with a seating capacity of five hundred. The floors above contain rooms for the classes which will be formed in penmanship, book-keeping, free-hand, architectural and mechanical drawing, and the trades.

An Unvoluntary Immigrant Arrived in New York on October 16th by the City of Rome of the Anchor Line. When the vessel touched at Queenstown, Ireland, on her voyage here, a peddler went on board to sell fruit, candies, etc. She did a good business, and was so busily engaged disposing of her stock that she did not notice the signal for all who were not passengers to leave the ship. Before she realized her situation the vessel was under way, and much against her inclination she was brought to New York. Her distress during the voyage was pitiable, and she is now trying to collect money from the charitable to pay her expenses back to Ireland. She is not the first, by many thousands, whom absorption in business has led to unpleasant results. There are many busy contestants in the race for wealth who call themselves Christians, yet are so eager for gain and so forgetful of all else that they are in danger of being carried away from their place in Christ's Church (1 Tim. 6:9).

A Dangerous Place of Residence Near Wilkesbarre was deserted on October 17th. A despatch from that city reports that a great cave-in of the earth's surface over the Baltimore mines occurred at an early hour that morning. The district is situated at the Five Points, a suburb of Wilkesbarre. Fifteen acres were affected by the cave-in, and on these fifteen acres are situated about one hundred and twenty houses, occupied by miners and laborers. The family of a miner named Evans sustained serious injuries. Mrs. Evans and her two children were sleeping in the north end of the house when the foundation walls under that part of the structure gave way, tipping over the part of the house they were in. The mother and the two children were thrown violently against the walls, and were severely hurt. The miners took in the situation at once, and removed their families to higher ground. It is sad that people are not similarly wise where their spiritual safety is concerned. There are abundant signs that the time of terrible trial predicted in the Bible is near at hand, yet few heed them and remove to the higher ground, where they would be safe from evil (Rev. 6:15-17).

A Disappointed Lover has been Consolated after many years at Laramie, Wyoming Territory. When quite a young man and a hard-working laborer he fell in love with the daughter of a settler. He was a rough fellow, though an honest and a brave man. The girl would not promise to marry him, though she evidently liked him and encouraged his devotion. In one of the outbreaks of the Indians on the frontier the settler's house was attacked and plundered, he was killed, and his daughter carried off. Her lover was desperate. At the risk of his life he followed the Indians, and, as he knew every inch of the country, he soon came up with them. He stole into their camp at night, killed the two Indians who were on guard, and carried the girl away to a place of safety. Then after the daring rescue he begged her to marry him; but she refused. She had seen a dashing city man, whose polished manners and glib tongue captivated her fancy; and though she was warned that he was an unprincipled man and a gambler, she married him. The man who had risked his life to rescue her was disconsolate. He went to Denver, and began prospecting. A despatch from Laramie says that he has returned with considerable property, and has found his old love a widow and very poor. Her husband had treated her cruelly, and finally deserted her. Again her faithful lover offered himself in marriage, and this time she accepted him, and they have been married. Those who condemn the ingratitude of the girl in rejecting the man whose heroism saved her life may well consider how much more shameful it is to reject the Saviour, who gave His life freely for the salvation of men (Heb. 10:29).

A Child was Carried Off by an Eagle Near Montreal on October 15th. A despatch from that city says that on that day the wife of Jean Baptiste Komilly, a farmer in St. Vincent de Paul, a village about ten miles from Montreal, was feeding her fowls, while her child, aged about two years, was playing around, when suddenly a large eagle swooped down and bore the little one off in its talons. The child screamed and extended its arms to its mother, who was beside herself with mental agony, but was powerless to render assistance. The screams of the child, however, attracted the neighbors, who with shotguns pursued the eagle. The bird was seen to alight with its prey upon the roof of a barn a long way off. They saw it lift its head and deal the child a powerful stroke. At the near approach of the neighbors, who were firing guns to frighten it, the eagle took flight, leaving the child behind. When the body was recovered life was extinct, its head being completely broken in. Every parent will sympathize with that bereaved mother's grief, but dreadful as was her child's fate, it was less awful than that of children around us who are falling into the clutches of a more relentless foe. Every child is in danger of becoming Satan's prey, but believing parents who commit their children's future to God and follow His injunctions are assured of their safety (Prov. 22:6).

A Simple-Minded Widow Appealed to the Circuit Court in Chicago last week for protection under peculiar circumstances. She stated that she keeps a boarding-house, and recently she heard that one of her boarders had taken upon himself to execute a chattel-mortgage on all her household goods. She went to a lawyer for advice, and he persuaded her that the best way of avoiding the loss of her property was to execute a mortgage herself, and obligingly suggested that she might make a friend of his own, whom he named, the mortgagee. The widow took his advice, and executed the mortgage. She paid for having it recorded, and begged the mortgagee, to whom she did not owe a cent, to strenuously defend her property against the fraudulent mortgagee. He did so, but shortly afterward sold the mortgage he held to another man, who promptly foreclosed and seized the widow's property. Now she asks the court to set aside her own act. The guileless woman's mistake was in not being more careful about the character of the man to whom she gave a valid claim on her property. If she had been dealing with spiritual affairs she could have adopted no better principle than that laid down by the lawyer. The soul of which Satan holds wrongful possession can be delivered only by giving it to the Saviour, to whom it really belongs by right of redemption (Heb. 7:25).

An Ingenious Device to Save Money has been adopted by an executor. Recently a will was admitted to probate, in which the testator directed that five thousand dollars should be placed upon his dead body in the coffin and buried with him. The executor was much concerned about the waste of so large a sum, and endeavored to avoid it. The law gave him no assistance, as the will was clearly drawn, and was valid. Except this one clause all other parts of it were reasonable and just. No clue to the testator's motive for his singular injunction was given, but the executor thought that if the testator had any way of using money he would be able to use an order for money. He therefore put his cheque for five thousand dollars in the coffin instead of the actual money, sarcastically remarking that it would be honored when he presented it. As the executor well knew, the money would never be called for. The only thing the dead man would desire in the land to which he went could not be purchased by a millionaire (Ezek. 7:19).

THE TRUE TABERNACLE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, (and we beheld His glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father,) full of grace and truth."—JOHN 1:14.

"For the law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ."—JOHN 1:17.

The Shekinah—God's Universal Presence—The True Temple—Christ as the Dwelling of God—I. The Tabernacle of God—The Union of Two Qualities—In the Concrete—Blended—Balanced—Grace First—Truth in Essence—Producing Grace and Truth—II. The Tabernacle to be Availed of—Resorted to for Help—Its Sanctifying Influence.

Do you see yonder tent with its curtains of goats' hair in the centre of the canvas city? You cannot see within it; but it was all glorious within with precious wood, and pure gold, and tapestry of many colors. Within its most sacred shrine shone forth a bright light between the wings of cherubim, which light was the symbol of the presence of the Lord. But if you cannot see within, yet you can see above the sacred tent a cloud, which arises from the top of the Holy of Holies, and then expands like a vast tree so as to cover all the host, and protect the chosen of God from the intense heat of the sun, so apt to make the traveller faint when passing over the burning sand. If you will wait till the sun is down, that same cloud will become luminous, and light up the whole camp. Thus it was both shade and light; and by its means was enjoyed that safety which was afterward set forth in the promise, "The sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon by night."

THE DAY OF THE TYPE

is over; we see no more a nation secluded from all others and made to be as "the church in the wilderness." God doth not now confine His abode to one people; for "The God of the whole earth shall be called." There is now no spot on earth where God dwells in preference to another. Yet there is a true house of God, a real temple of the Infinite, a living abode of the Godhead. The Epistle to the Hebrews speaks of "the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man." There is still a trysting-place where God doth still meet with man, and hold fellowship with Him. That place is the person of the Lord Jesus Christ, "in whom dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." The manhood of Christ is become to us the anti-type of that tent in the centre of the camp. That is to say, in Christ Jesus the Lord dwelt among men, as God of old dwelt in His sanctuary in the midst of the tribes of Israel. He was no phantom, or apparition, but He had a human body and a human soul. "The Word was made flesh." When the Lord became bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh, His incarnation in a human body brought Him far nearer to man than when He only abode within curtains, and occupied a tent in the midst of Israel.

THE SHEKINAH.

In and around the tent wherein the Lord dwelt in the centre of the camp there was a manifestation of the presence of God. This was the glory of that house: but how scanty was the revelation! A bright light which I have already mentioned, the Shekinah, is said to have shone over the mercy-seat; but the high priest only could see it, and he only saw it once in the year, when he entered with blood within the veil. Outside, above the holy place, there was the manifest glory of the pillar of cloud by day, and of fire by night. This sufficed to bear witness that God was there; but still, cloud and fire are but physical appearances, and cannot convey a true appearance of God, who is a spirit. God cannot be perceived by the senses; and yet the fiery, cloudy pillar could appeal to the eyes only. The excellence of the indwelling of God in Christ is this—that there is in Him a glory as of the only begotten of the Father, the moral and spiritual glory of Godhead. This is to be seen, but not with the eyes; this is to be perceived, but not by the carnal senses; this is seen, and heard, and known, by spiritual men, whose mental perceptions are keener than those of sight and hearing. In the person of the Lord there is a glory which is seen by our faith, which is discerned of our renewed spirits, and is made to operate upon our hearts.

WHERE GOD DWELLS.

I. First, then, let us behold this tabernacle of God with us. "We beheld His glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth." In Jesus Christ all the attributes of God are to be seen; veiled, but yet verily there. You have only to read the Gospels, and to look with willing eyes, and you shall behold in Christ all that can possibly be seen of God. It is veiled in human flesh, as it must be; for the glory of God is not to be seen by us absolutely; it is toned down to these dim eyes of ours; but the Godhead is there, the perfect Godhead in union with the perfect manhood of Christ Jesus our Lord, to whom be glory for ever and ever.

Observe the two glorious qualities, joined inseparably—grace and truth—and observe that they are spoken of in the concrete. Jesus is not merely a teacher, an exhorter, a worker of grace and truth, but these heavenly things are in Him: He is full of them. I want you to note this—it raised such a difference between Christ and others. You go to others to hear of grace and truth, but you must go to Christ to see them. There may be, there is, grace in other men; but not as it is in Christ: they have it as water flowing through a pipe, but He has it as water in its fountain and source. He has grace to communicate to the sons of men, grace without measure, grace essential and abiding. There is truth in others where God has wrought it by His spirit; but it is not in them as it is in Christ. In Him dwell the depth, the substance, the essence of the fact.

THE QUALITIES BLENDED.

This grace and truth are blended. The two rivers unite in one fullness—"Full of grace and truth;" that is to say, the grace is truthful grace, grace not in fiction nor in fancy, grace not to be hoped for and to be dreamed of, but grace every atom of which is fact; redemption which does redeem, pardon which does blot out sin, renewal which actually regenerates, salvation which completely saves. We have not here blessings which charm the ear and cheat the soul; but real, substantial favors from God that cannot lie. Then blend these things the other way. "Grace and truth:" the Lord has come to bring us truth, but it is not the kind of truth which censures, condemns, and punishes; it is gracious truth, truth steeped in love, truth saturated with mercy. The truth which Jesus brings to His people comes not from the judgment-seat, but from the mercy-seat; it hath a gracious drift and aim about it, and ever tends unto salvation. His light is the life of men. See how grace and truth thus blend, and qualify each other! The grace is all true, and the truth is all gracious.

Furthermore, it is grace and truth balanced. I wish I were able to communicate my thoughts this morning as they came to me when I was meditating upon this passage; but this thought almost speaks for itself. The Lord Jesus Christ is full of grace; but, then, He has not neglected the other quality, which is somewhat sterner, namely, that of truth. I have known many in this world very loving and affectionate, but they have not been faithful: on the other hand, I have known men to be sternly honest and truthful, but they have not been gentle and kind: but in the Lord Jesus Christ there is no defect either way. Our Lord's ministry is not truth alone, nor grace alone; but it is a balanced, well-ordered system of grace and truth. The Lord Himself is in His character "just and having salvation."

Grace is put first. "We beheld His glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace." Now, in the Old Testament, in that thirty-fourth chapter of Exodus, which we read in part this morning, you notice that the glory of God lay in His being "the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth." The glory of the only begotten of the Father must lie in the same things as the glory of the Father, namely, in long-suffering, goodness, and truth. In Christ there is a wonderful display of the gentleness, patience, pity, mercy, and love of God. Not merely did He teach the grace of God, and invite us to the grace of God, but in Himself He displayed the grace of God.

IN HIS INCARNATION.

This is to be seen, first, in His incarnation. It is a wonderful instance of divine grace that the Word should be made flesh and dwell among us, and reveal His glory to us. Apart from anything that springs out of the incarnation of Christ, that incarnation itself is a wondrous act of grace. There must be hope for men now that man is next akin to God through Jesus Christ. If the Lord had meant to destroy the race, He never would have espoused it and taken it into union with Himself. There is fulness of grace in the fact of the Word made flesh tabernacle among us.

Then think for a minute of what He did. He was so full of grace that the dew of His own love was upon all His discourses; and when He moved about and touched men here and there virtue went out of Him, because He was so full of it. At one time He spake and pardoned a sinner, saying: "Thy sins be forgiven thee;" at another moment He battled with the consequences of sin, raising men from sickness and from death; again, He turned Himself and fought with the prince of darkness himself, and cast him out from those whom he tormented. He went about like a cloud which is big with rain, and therefore plentifully waters waste places. His life was boundless compassion. There was a power of grace about His garments, His voice, His look; and in all He was so true that none ever thought Him capable of subterfuge. Everywhere He went He scattered grace among the children of men; and He is just the same now; fulness of grace abides in Him still.

IN HIS DEATH.

When it came to His death, which was the pouring out of His soul, then His fulness of grace was seen. He was full of grace, indeed, forasmuch as He emptied Himself to save men. He was Himself not only man's Saviour, but His salvation. He gave Himself for us. He was indeed full of grace when He bare our sins in His own body on the tree. His was love at its height, since He died on the cross, "the just for the unjust, to bring us to God." Pronounce the word "substitution," and you cannot help feeling that the Substitute for guilty man was full of grace; or use that other word "representative," and remember that whatever Jesus did, He did as the covenant head of His people. If He died, they died in Him; if He rose again, they rose in Him; if He ascended up on high, they ascended in Him; and if He sits at the right hand of God, they also sit in the heavenly places in Him. When He shall come a second time it shall be to claim the kingdom for His chosen as well as for Himself; and all the glory of the future ages is for them, and not for Himself alone. He saith, "Because I live, ye shall live also."

There is yet another word higher than "substitution," higher than "representation," and that is "union." We are one with Christ, joined to Him by a union that never can be broken. Not only does He do what He does, representing us, but we are joined unto Him in one spirit, members of His body, and partakers of His glory. Is not this grace, grace unspeakable? Is it not a miracle of love that worms of earth should ever be one with incarnate Deity, and so one that they never can be separated throughout the ages?

But then it is said there is in Him also a fulness of truth, by which I understand that in Christ Himself, not merely in what He said, and did, and promised, there is a fulness of truth. According to my second text, in verse seventeen, I understand our Lord Jesus to be "truth" in the sense of being the substance of all the types. He is really that blood of sprinkling which speaketh better things than that of Abel; He is in very deed the paschal lamb of God's Passover; He is the burnt-offering, the sin-offering, and the peace-offering—all in one! He is the true scapegoat, the true morning and evening lamb; in fact, He is in truth what all the types and figures were in pattern. The covenant in its fullness is in Christ; the prophecy is in Moses, the fulfilment is in Jesus: the foreshadowing is in the law, the truth is in the Word made flesh.

A FACT.

Further than that, our Lord Jesus Christ is said to be grace and truth in this sense, that He truthfully deals with matters of fact in the case of our salvation. I know the notion of the world is that the salvation of Christ is a pretty dream, a handsome piece of sentiment. But there is nothing dreamy about it: it is no fiction; it is fact upon fact. The Lord Jesus Christ does not gloss over or conceal the condition of man in His salvation; He finds man condemned, and takes him as condemned in the very worst sense, condemned of a capital offence; and as man's substitute He endures the capital penalty, and dies in the sinner's stead. The Lord Jesus views the sinner as depraved, yea, as dead in trespasses and sins, and He quickens him by His resurrection life. If God could be unjust to save us, He could also be changeable, and cast us away. If there was anything rotten in the state of our salvation, we should fear that it would fail us at last. But our foundation is sure, for the Lord has excavated down to the rock; He has taken away every bit of mere sentiment and sham, and His salvation is real throughout. It is a glorious salvation of grace and truth, in which God takes the sinner as he is, and deals with him as He is; yea, and deals with the sinner as God is on the principles of true righteousness; and yet saves him.

Sometimes it seems to me that my sins could have deserved that the Son of God should die. The atonement is greater than the sin. Speak of the vindication of the law!—is not the vindication even greater than the dishonor? Does not the law of God shine out more lustrous in its indescribable glory through the sacrifice of Christ as the penalty for sin, than it would have done had it never been broken, or had all the race of law-breakers been swept into endless destruction? Oh, brothers, in the salvation of Jesus there is a truth of grace unrivalled! There is a deep verity, a substantiality, an inward soul-satisfaction in the sacrifice of Christ, which makes us feel that it is a full atonement—a fountain of "grace and truth."

Nor have I yet quite brought out all the meaning, even if I have succeeded so far. Christ has brought to us "grace and truth;" that is to say, He works in believers both grace and truth. We want grace to rescue us from sin: He has brought it; we need truth in the inward parts: He has wrought it. The system of salvation by atonement is calculated to produce truthful men. I say it, and dare avow it, that the system of salvation by the indwelling of God in Christ and the atonement offered by Him for men has a tendency in it to infuse grace into the soul and to produce truth in the life. The Holy Ghost employs it to that end. I pray that you and I may prove it so by the grace which causes us to love both God and man, and the truthfulness with which we deal in all the affairs of life.

TO BE APPROACHED.

II. Now, I want a few minutes to say to you, Come, brothers and sisters, let us avail ourselves of this tabernacled of God among us. First, then, if God has come to dwell among men by the Word made flesh, let us pitch our tents around this central tabernacle; do not let us live as if God were a long way off. To the Israelites God was equally near from every quarter of the camp. The tabernacle was in the centre, and the centre is equally near to every point of the circumference. Our God is not far from any one of His people this day. We are made nigh by the blood of Christ. God is everywhere present, but there is a higher presence of effectual grace in the person of the only begotten. Do not let us live as if we worshiped a far-off God. God is never far away, since Christ has come to dwell among men.

Next, let us resort to this central tabernacle to obtain grace to help in time of need. Let us come to Christ without fear, for He hath grace to give, and He will give it to us abundantly, whenever we need it. I like to think of the wording of my text. Leave out the parenthesis, and it runs, "He dwelt among us full of grace." He could not have dwelt among such provoking ones if He had not been full of grace. But if He dwells among us full of grace, we need not fear that He will cast us away because of our sins and failings. I invite you, therefore, to come boldly to Him who is full of forgiving love. I beg you to come and receive of His fullness, for grace is truly grace when it is communicated: grace which is not distributed is grace in name only. "Alas!" you say, "I want so much grace." Brother, it is treasured up in Christ for you without measure. It is placed in Him that you may have it. Do we not try to persuade the sinner that there is life in a look? Shall I need to persuade saints that grace is equally free to them?

TO BE DECLARED.

Once more: if this be so, and God does really in Christ dwell in the midst of His people "full of grace and truth," let us tell everybody of it. I am sure if I had been an Israelite in the wilderness, and had met an Amalekite or an Edomite, I should have gloried in my God, and in the privileges which His presence secured me. We know that Amalekites and Edomites could not have come into the house of the Lord; but nowadays, if we meet with one who is a stranger, we can tell him of our privilege, with sweet persuasion, that the stranger can be brought nigh through the blood of the Lamb. Therefore let us abundantly speak of the dwelling of God with men. Let us tell to all that the Lord has come to man, not in wrath, not in judgment, but "full of grace and truth."

Oh, my unconverted hearer, come to Jesus! He is able to save to the uttermost those that come unto God by Him. Draw nigh to the meek and lowly Jesus, and you draw nigh to God. He saith, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." Publish the invitation of grace to the four winds. Ring out your silver trumpets, or, if you have them not, sound your rams' horns; but somehow let all people know that the tabernacle of God is with men, and He doth dwell among them. Tell out this news in the far country, that the wandering prodigal son may hear it, and cry: "I will arise, and go to my Father." God has come to men; will not men come to God? In Christ Jesus God invites men to come to Him; will you not come to receive grace and truth?

THE PURITY REQUIRED.

One more lesson remains, and that is, What manner of people ought we to be among whom Jehovah dwells? It must have been a very solemn thing to be a member of that great camp of two millions in the wilderness of Sinai. God's presence in the midst of the camp must have made every tent sacred. As we walked through the streets of that canvas city, if we had been Israelites, and in our right minds, we should have said: "These tents are none other than the house of God and the very gate of heaven; for see, Jehovah is in the midst of us. Mark you not the bright light that shines above His sanctuary?" We should have felt that in such a camp all should be holy. The pollution of sin should be unknown there. In such a camp constant prayer and praise should be presented to Him whose presence was its glory and defence. To-day let our congregation be a holy convocation; and as for ourselves, let us be holiness unto the Lord.

We are consecrated men and women, seeing the Lord has come so very near to us. I spoke of solemnity; I meant not dread and sorrow, but a solemnity full of joy. It is a solemn thing to have God so near, but the joy is equal to the solemnity. Glory be unto God most high, for He is here! Let us spend our days and nights in gladness and delight. God is reconciled to us in the person of His dear Son, and we have fellowship with God in Christ Jesus; wherefore let us rejoice evermore. Amen and amen.

THE REV. JOHN WORDSWORTH D.D., who has been appointed Bishop of Salisbury, England, in succession to the late Bishop Moberly, is the eldest son of the late Bishop of Lincoln, and grand-nephew of the poet Wordsworth. He was born in 1843, and being only forty-two years of age, is the youngest bishop on the bench. He was educated at Winchester and at New College, Oxford.

The University honors and distinctions which he has gained are many and of a high order. He was ordained deacon in 1867, and priest in 1869, by the then Bishop of Oxford, Dr. Wilberforce. In 1876 he was elected to the Grindfield Lectureship on the Septuagint, and this post he held for two years. In 1876 he was also appointed one of the Select Preachers to the University. In 1881 he was elected Bampton Lecturer. In 1882 he was appointed an Examiner in the Theological School. In 1883 he was elected Oriel Professor of the Interpretation of Holy Scripture, and was for years one of the College Tutors at Brasenose College, Oxford. He was for some time Deputy Professor of the Exegesis of Holy Scripture, during Canon Liddon's professoriate. His name appears in the list of Fellows in two colleges, in Brasenose and in Oriel. His connection with Oriel is through his professorship. His fellowship at Brasenose he vacated on his marriage, in 1870, to a daughter of the late Rev. Henry Cox, the Librarian of the Bodleian, but he was re-elected as a married Fellow under the new College Statutes.

Dr. Wordsworth is at present engaged in the collection of the various MSS. of the Vulgate, and is considered to be one of the finest Latin scholars in the University of Oxford. He is also one of the few scholars who have made a European reputation for his patience and skill in the difficult work of collating MSS. His published works are a course of "Lectures Introductory to a History of Latin;" "Fragments and Specimens of Early Latin;" "University Sermons on Gospel Subjects;" and "The One Religion—Truth, Holiness, and Peace, Denied by the Nations and Revealed by Jesus Christ," a course of sermons which he delivered as Bampton Lecturer in 1881.

The Times, in an editorial article, says: "In parochial experience he is not altogether wanting. He has never, as far as we are aware, held any parochial office, but he has done from time to time a good deal of unofficial parochial work. He has made his chief mark as a scholar and as a theological student. Though Mr. Wordsworth belongs to the moderate High Church school, he has gained so entirely the esteem and respect and regard of those who have known him at the University that the news of his appointment to the See of Salisbury will be received there with general satisfaction."

It may be hoped, for the sake of the Church of which Dr. Wordsworth has now become an overseer, that his influence will be exercised wisely. It is evident that the Church is passing through a crisis. A large number of Englishmen are disposed to strip it of some of its power and much of its wealth, and the agitation for this object is stimulated by the anomalies which exist within it. Many of the clergy are preaching disguised Romanism and others thinly-veiled infidelity; it rests with the bishops to see that every clergyman in their dioceses is preaching the truth as it is in Jesus. If they fail in their duty in this matter they will contribute to the downfall of their Church. Dr. Wordsworth needs to bring to his new office a wisdom more profound than that of earth.

AN OPIUM-EATING PHYSICIAN.

A COLPORTEUR, in the course of his travels in China, visited a Christian who was sick. Whilst he was with him the doctor came to see his patient. He got into conversation with him and asked him if he would not buy a Gospel. Having taken his books to look at them, he exclaimed: "Why, I have a book at home very much like this. It is called the Gospel of John. I bought it ten years ago, and have read it a great deal since then. Through reading that I have long ago given up the worship of idols. The more I studied it the more I saw they were useless, and when I have been at home I have never allowed my family to have anything to do with them." "Why, then, have you never come and joined the Christians, and become an open worshipper of God?" the colporteur asked him. "There have been various reasons," he replied. "In the first place, I am an opium-smoker. That I know to be very wrong, but I did not care to give up the habit. Another reason was that I am very often away from home for long periods. I travel about practising my profession, and consequently I am not very long in one place; my chief reason, however, has been that I did not care to face the trouble and annoyance that I knew I should have to bear from my neighbors if I became a Christian. To be a Christian involves such an amount of petty persecution and bother that I felt I could not stand it, and so I have been content to think and worship in my own quiet way."

They sat there for several hours, when at the close of their conversation the doctor said, "From this moment I become a Christian, and from this very instant I give up my opium-smoking." The subsequent history of this remarkable man is highly creditable to him. It appears to be established that he has conquered his habit of opium-eating, and makes no secret, either at home or on his journeys, that he has accepted the faith which once he had not the courage to profess.

A VISIT TO HOLLAND.

No American citizen can visit the Netherlands without emotion. There he sees the triumph of man over nature and the marvellous results of that steady, persistent energy which, when it was driven to his own country by religious persecution, contributed so much to its present prosperity. An American traveller, whose sketch of a view near Amsterdam we reproduce on this page, visited the country this summer, and spent a few delightful weeks in examining its places of interest. He says:

"While standing before one of the largest buildings in Rotterdam, our guide told us that we were eleven feet lower than the ocean. 'What will you do,' I asked, 'when the dykes give way some stormy night and the waters come rushing in upon you?' 'Ah,' said he, 'I don't want to be here then.'"

"As we sailed up the river Maas the other morning it seemed strange to find that the land just over the banks was below the level of the river. Sometimes the waters of the German Ocean rush with great power up this river, and then the alarm bell tells the story to all far and near that the waters of the ocean are rushing furiously against the high embankments. Then every person, old and young, that can help, hastens away to the scene of danger, taking with them old sails, or hurdles, or anything on which they can lay their hands to keep back the waters."

At Amsterdam we find the city cut with canals in various directions. In many parts, although it has a population of three hundred and twenty thousand, it is a city of silent highways, all business being done by water, while for the accommodation of pedestrians there are three hundred and thirty bridges, yet, as in Venice, it is comparatively quiet. The river Amstel, which flows through it, is nearly a foot below the mean level of the German Ocean, but by the help of many pumps, moved by great windmills and steam power, even when there are heavy rains they manage to keep the water in abeyance."

The country is absolutely flat, but the monotony is broken by the well-kept meadows, the fields of waving corn, and the beautiful trees. The cities are large and well kept and governed, furnishing a pattern to the whole world in this respect. Steady contentment and industry are seen everywhere, combined with intelligence and thrift. The country well repays a visit, if it is only to see how man has subdued nature and has turned his enemy into a useful servant. Surrounded by water which, unrestrained, would submerge the whole land, destroying houses and crops, he has barricaded himself against its incursion, letting in just so much in his canals as will suffice him for a highway for his commerce.

THE SAILOR'S PROTÉGÉ.

A MISERABLE specimen of humanity stood outside a saloon on the water front of a great city one fine spring morning, looking appealingly in the faces of passers-by. He was not ashamed to beg, but he was afraid to do so, for a policeman on the opposite side of the way was watching him. He was a man likely to attract the attention of the police, for he looked capable of any crime that might be achieved by meanness and did not require courage. He could not have been twenty years of age, but he had the sullen, miserable appearance of one whose life has been a failure, and whose ambition had all died out of him. He was getting what solace he could out of a pipe of tobacco, and heartily wishing some one would pity his misery sufficiently to give him the price of a meal. He watched the busy crowd pass him by, and was feeling utterly desolate when a sailor, whose smart rig indicated Jack with a day ashore before him, walked briskly toward him. The sailor did not see him at first, but a shuffling of the loafer's feet drew his attention. Stopping sharply he said:

"Well, you look pretty low down, mate; what's the matter with you?"

"I'm awful hungry," said the loafer. "Give us a nicker to buy some bread."

"Why, you're a strong, healthy chap to be begging. Why ain't you at work? There's no need for you to be hungry."

"I've got no chance," said the loafer. "I can't get work; nobody will take me on."

"Well, you don't look prepossessing, I must say. Guess folks are afraid you wouldn't do much good if they did take you. What do you say to going to sea?"

"I don't mind what I do," said the loafer. "I'm pretty near ready to go into the sea and make an end of it. I'm about sick of life."

"Early days to feel like that, my man. Why, you might be well off and the mate of a ship before long if you'd give your mind to it. Would you try, now, if you had a chance?"

"I would," said the loafer; "but the chance ain't here."

"Yes, it is; I'm pretty sure I can get you taken on if you'll give me your word to act square."

"I'll give you my word if you'll take it. Most folks don't take any stock in my promises."

"I'll take it," said the sailor, clapping him on the shoulder. "You've got the making of a man in you, if you don't let the devil keep you down. Here, come along with me. The first thing is to brace you up; you're as limp as a drowned rat." And the sailor twisted him round and turned him into a restaurant. He ordered a good square meal for him, and sat watching him eat it voraciously.

"Now tell me your story," he said, when the loafer's appetite was at last appeased. It was a story common enough in our great cities—a neglected childhood, a drunken father, a shiftless mother, an education in the gutter, a term in prison, a spell of work, then another term in prison, then an associate of habitual criminals, and an undercurrent of misery, hopelessness, and vice.

How many are there in every city to-day who might tell the same tale! Go down into the slums and talk to them, and you will be amazed at the number, and will wonder what Christ would say if He were here and saw the crowds of fashionable people, who call themselves by His name, living within a stone's throw of human beings who are in ignorance of His very name. Our costly church edifices and our large gifts to foreign missions would be but a poor set-off in His eyes for the neglected souls dying in our midst every day who have never heard the Gospel.

"Now then," said the sailor, briskly, "you go and say good-by to your pals, and get your things together and be here at sundown, and I'll meet you and take you on board."

True to his word, the sailor was at the rendezvous at the appointed time, and there, too, was the loafer, washed and smartened up, and the two went on board a ship lying in the dock. The captain had no high opinion of the new recruit, but accepted him on the sailor promising to "give an eye to him," and he was regularly installed.

"Now," said the sailor to his protégé, "remember I'm responsible for you. I've given my word to the captain, and if you get up to any devilry you'll disgrace me."

"Never fear," said the man. "You're the first man who ever said a kind word to me, and you've given me a chance. I'll never forget it."

"I think I've done a good day's work," said the sailor to himself as he turned in. "But it's just like me to go glegging myself for a man I've never seen before. I guess I'm pretty much of a fool, but anyhow it gives the fellow a show, and I fancy it's the first he's had. Poor old mother; you'll be glad when you know. That's your idea of religion, and it's a good one, too."

The sailor had to endure some little chaffing by his messmates over his protégé, who, they confidently predicted, would be in irons before the voyage was over; but he was a good-humored man, and as he was pretty much of their opinion that he had done a rash thing, did not resent their ridicule. But by and by the tide changed. The man was docile and tried to learn. He did not mind what he did or how he was humiliated so he could be useful, and gradually the hang-dog look on his face gave place to a cheerful expression, and his slouching gait to a brisk, active step, and the man himself could not have been recognized for the loafer who stood smoking outside the saloon that morning. The voyage over, he seemed a new man, and when he had spent some of his earnings in a suit of sailor's clothes he looked a man that almost any captain would have been glad to engage. His friend took him home to show him to his old mother, who, as he had predicted, approved his act. The old lady read the Bible to him and told him of One who came to seek and to save the lost, and when he went away on his next voyage with her son, to whom he clung with more than a brother's love, it was with a new life in his soul which the world cannot give, neither can it take away.

THE SILVER LINING.

The New Sister.

HELEN ARNOLD'S departure for Australia in company with Jean Lindsay left another vacant place in the good physician's family circle. Of his five children, Kate alone remained under his roof. It is true she was the merriest and brightest of the group, but under the spell of her loneliness her spirits sank. For a day or two she was sad and distraught, but the depressed faces of her father and mother recalled her to a sense of her duty. It is the essence of Christianity that the happiness and welfare of others should be the first thought in every breast. He who pleased not Himself is the pattern for all His followers, and Kate Arnold had learned the lesson. How sad and lonely she felt since Helen's departure none knew. The two girls had never been separated before. Grace had been very dear to both, but she had been so much younger than either of them that the two elder girls had been closer confidantes and companions. Helen's temporary absence, therefore, had struck a dulling sensation of solitude into her heart almost as painful as did the crushing blow of Grace's tragic death.

On the third morning of her desolation she felt it more bitterly than before. It was Sunday, and Helen's vacant seat in the family pew would speak to her, and she would walk alone to and from the Sunday-school instead of having Helen by her side. She commenced dressing before she fully realized her changed circumstances, but she missed the soft, low music of Helen's voice, which used to penetrate to her room as her sister sang her favorite hymns while she dressed, and then the consciousness of her loss came upon her. Laying down the brush with which she was smoothing her luxuriant tresses, she sat down by her toilet-table, buried her face in her hands, and had a good cry. It was a beautiful, if a sad picture that the mirror above her reflected. Kate was the beauty of the family, tall and graceful of form, and with that rare combination of dark eyes with golden hair which always compels the admiration of a lover of beauty. As she bent forward, her face almost touching her knees, and her hair falling in a golden rain about her, the rich ivory skin showing faintly through her delicate white robe, as her body was shaken by her sobs, she formed an image of female loveliness that would have charmed the artist or the sculptor.

The rain of tears was of brief duration. Perhaps its very violence involved that. She felt relieved by the outflow, and rising, she proceeded with her toilet without further interruption. She heard her mother's voice below, and that suggested the thought that there must be other suffering beside her own, and that it rested with her to alleviate that. Dressing finished, she turned over the leaves of her Bible, and selected the twenty-third Psalm for her morning meditation. It comforted and strengthened her, and after she had prayed earnestly that God would enable her to cheer her parents and lighten their lives, she descended to the library, singing in clear, untroubled voice, "Sometimes a light surprises," and with a bright, sunny face bent over her father as he sat in his great easy-chair, and saluted him with a kiss.

"You come like a gleam of sunlight, Kate," he said. "The thinning family circle leaves one a little chilly, but your brightness drives away depression. God bless you, my dear."

Mrs. Arnold, too, was cheered by Kate's sunny face and buoyant manner, and as the three sat around the breakfast-table they could talk of the dear ones at a distance without distress. Frank alone caused them anxiety. He was the only one in the family in whom no evidence of a changed heart had been seen. Now that he was evidently in trouble they could but pray that it might drive him to God, as the refuge from the disappointments and miseries of the world.

"I have written to Frank," said Dr. Arnold, "to beg him to come to us before finally deciding on his American emigration, and to bring his wife with him. Perhaps it is not yet too late to induce him to stay at home. I hope they will come. It is strange how he shrinks from us in his trouble."

"There was always a good deal of personal pride in Frank," said Mrs. Arnold; "as a boy he never could bear for any one to see him in suffering. If he hurt himself he would never tell of it if he could help it. Sympathy seemed to humiliate him. I expect he feels so now. His marriage was so very strange, and I am afraid that the prospect of a fortune was the chief inducement to him in deciding upon it. Now that has faded he feels that he has blundered, and that hurts his self-esteem. If he will come we must try to encourage him, so that he may not feel that he has thrown his life away."

"What kind of a lady is our new sister, papa?" Kate asked.

"I fear she is not one who will be a help to him, my dear. She struck me as being somewhat artificial. She is beautiful, and a wealthy man would like to see her at the head of his table doing the honors of his house. In a poor man's home she would appear out of her place, and would probably feel herself to be so. There was a lack of self-reliance about her, I thought, as of a child who had been accustomed to depend upon others all her life. But then I saw her at a disadvantage. She was bewildered by the responsibility suddenly laid upon her, and did not seem to know what to do. Now that Frank has recovered she may be more collected."

"I hope they will come," Kate said; "I shall like to see Mrs. Frank; I decline to accept your opinion of her, papa. I believe you would say the same things of me if you did not know me and made my acquaintance professionally. I think physicians do not give our sex all the credit that belongs to us. You are so accustomed to sickness that you do not realize how distressing it is to a lady whose life is bound up in that of the sufferer, and is so anxious about him. If she loves Frank so dearly as to marry him she would naturally be uneasy when he was ill, and would not be in the mood to entertain a gentleman whom she had never seen before."

"That was precisely the impression I conveyed, my daughter, if your small mind had been able to receive it," said Dr. Arnold, playfully. "You are so ready to do battle for your sex that you are ready to fight your friends as well as your enemies. Ladies have no more ardent admirers than physicians, but we should admire them more if they had a little more sense and were a little less impulsive. They do not always attend to what is said to them, and trust to their own intuition instead of relying on the superior knowledge and judgment of others. A case in point—"

"No illustrations, please, papa," said Kate, hastily, shrewdly divining the illustration Dr. Arnold was about to use. "My 'small mind' has taken in your meaning quite clearly. Mama's imperturbable disposition has spoiled you. You expect too much. You must love your daughter-in-law and your daughter, too; and if, sir, you can show a little respect for our understandings, it will render your conversation more agreeable."

Mrs. Arnold sat quietly amused during this playful fencing, which was common between Kate and her father. Seeing that hostilities were suspended for the time, she changed the subject of conversation by saying to her husband, "Your little patient, Dora Stevenson, is growing quite strong again. I saw her yesterday, and she told me that her brother Percy is come home from Australia. He has seen Ralph, and is coming to tell us about him and his home. It was a pity he was not here before Helen and Jean sailed; they would have liked to hear his account." A sudden flush tinted Kate's face to the roots of her hair, which did not escape the mother's alert gaze, and confirmed a suspicion she had already formed about the state of her daughter's affections. But she allowed it to pass without remark, being too wise to adopt a course far too common with mothers, of joking with their children about the grave matters of love and marriage. She noted it, however, and prepared herself for the confidence which she knew might soon be expected.

The day cost Kate an effort. The sense of loneliness oppressed her heavily, but the strength for which she had prayed in the morning was given to her, as it is given to all who seek it earnestly, and neither the girls who listened to her in the Sunday-school, nor her father and mother at home, knew that she was less cheerful than she appeared. As she sat in the dim twilight playing soft solemn music, Dr. and Mrs. Arnold sitting near the piano, a gentle, peaceful calm seemed to reign in every breast, and anxiety and worry were banished by the consciousness of the loving guardianship of the Heavenly Father. Presently the music died away, and Mrs. Arnold rose, and throwing her arms about her daughter's neck as she sat, her fingers still lightly touching the keys, said:

"Thank you, my love, for all you have done to-day. Your father and I were very sorrowful, but you have brightened our hearts."

Kate shed a tear or two in the gathering darkness, but they were grateful tears. She had her reward. The ministry that was nearest to her she had rendered, and after all there is heroism in any struggle that will render some one else happier. Would that sons and daughters who are aspiring to do some great thing in the world learned that in ministering to the comfort of the home circle they are having the best preparation for future usefulness! To forget self, to rise above the mood of the hour, and to think how another's lot may be rendered less sombre may cost an effort, but it never fails to bring a blessing equal to the one imparted, and it is the product of the Master's spirit which He would have every one of His followers to display. How much such an effort might do to brighten the home let those fathers and mothers say who are depressed by the sudden silence or moroseness of sons and daughters who were beaming, and genial, and sprightly but a short hour ago, when a few friends were included in the family circle. A little of the suavity and vivacity lavished on the outside world would render many a home less gloomy.

As Kate bent her knees in prayer that night she thanked her Lord for all He had done through her that day, and begged that she might enter more fully into His spirit and live as He had lived, going about doing good. As she prayed the thought of one in need of the knowledge that had come to her crossed her mind. Her brother's wife, though utterly unknown to her, had strangely won her unseen way into her affection. What better could she do than pray for one who, she felt sure, must be placed in an embarrassing situation, and who must sorely need a strength not her own. If Clare could have heard Kate's prayer for her, she must have loved the intercessor, so earnest was she in her petitions for a blessing on the unknown sister whose entrance into the family seemed sadly unpropitious.

"Frank and his wife are coming," said Dr. Arnold, two days later, as the family met at the breakfast-table. "I have a letter from him promising that they will be with us the day after to-morrow."

"Then," said Mrs. Arnold, "we may change his determination about America. He will listen to you, dear, and perhaps we may persuade him to settle here. He would be of so much assistance to you."

"I fear not; he is selling his furniture and bidding his friends good-by, and seems to be fully resolved on trying his fortune in the New World. If I read Frank's character correctly, he will not be moved by our persuasions. Ralph might be, but not Frank."

So it proved. Frank Arnold's first words, when, after his arrival, his mother laid her entreating hand on his arm, and said: "Frank, you will not go to America while we need you at home?" were, "Mother, we must go. I have fully decided; do not try to unsettle me. I am sorry to leave you all, but it is a necessity."

Mrs. Arnold said no more, feeling that if her son's resolution were to be shaken at all, his father's arguments would be the only means that could do it. She left the two together, and busied herself in hospitable cares.

Kate had carried Clare off to her own room, and on reaching it closed the door, and turning toward her, put her arms around her neck and kissed her affectionately. "How strange it seems," she said, "to think that you and I are sisters, and yet we have never seen each other until now. I hope you will come to love us very much when you know us. We all love Frank very dearly, and you are precious to us for his sake already, and we shall love you for your own, now we see you. I shall want you to love me as your own sister, dear, for I am all alone now."

"I am alone, too," Clare said. "I never had a sister or a brother, and my father and mother have been dead a long time. My guardian was not related to me, and he is dead now, so that I have not a relative in the world. My husband is the only one who claims any affection from me or shows me any."

"Then," said Kate, "you have a large store unexpended, and I may draw upon it. I give you notice that I am insatiable, and I shall not rest satisfied with a small share of your heart." She looked at Clare's sad face lovingly, and kissed her again.

The two girls, as they stood looking at each other, were strangely alike, and the fact seemed to dawn upon both at the same moment. Clare had the bright, silky golden hair which shone around Kate's lovely face. Her features were more regular, and there was a more dignified expression on her face, indicating reserve, than Kate's features habitually wore, and she was apparently several years older, though the actual difference in age was measured in months. But the last few weeks had initiated her into the gravity of life, and in spirit she was years older than when she was married. But otherwise they were so much alike that a stranger might have supposed them to be sisters. Clare had been prepared for a cold reception at the hands of her husband's family, feeling that they might regard her as one who had entered it under false pretences, and she was ready to repay coldness with coldness. Kate's loving greeting, therefore, surprised her, and it was some minutes before she could recover her ease of manner.

"Do you think you shall love me?" Clare asked. "It is so seldom that sisters love their brothers' wives."

"I am sure I shall," Kate answered, impulsively. "Now I look at you critically, it seems to me that Frank's intervention is not needed at all. You must be a sister I have never heard of. Look," and putting her arm around Clare's shoulders, she deftly turned her to the mirror. "Is it not strange how much we are alike? Allowing for the dignity you have as a married lady which I have not attained, there is really an extraordinary resemblance; so it will not be modest for me to tell you you are beautiful."

"It is so, indeed," Clare said. "How remarkable! Nature has prepared us for a relationship. How kind you are, too. I did not expect to find ready-made affection waiting for me. Do you know, I wanted Frank to leave me at home and pay this visit without me. But you make me very glad I came. And you will really feel to me as a sister?"

"That I will, and we will seal the compact now," Kate said, clasping Clare in a close embrace, and imprinting a long, loving kiss on her lips.

Mrs. Arnold found them standing so as she opened the door at that moment. "I claim a share of that," she said, playfully, as she gently detached Kate's arms, and substituted her own form in Clare's embrace. "Frank tells me you have no mother, my dear, so you will let me be a mother to you instead of a mother-in-law. I welcome you with all my heart, and I pray God that He will bless your connection with us, and make it a happy one."

Clare did not answer, but the tears rose glistening into her lustrous eyes, and when the three ladies joined Dr. Arnold and his son, Frank thought he had never seen his wife look so beautiful and happy.

DEATH OF ELISHA.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 11, II Kings 13: 14-25. Golden Text, Heb. 11: 4. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Early References to Sickness in the Bible—The First Mention of Physicians—A Significant Occupation—Patriarchal Obituaries—Elisha's Dying Thoughts—The King's Sorrow—Strong Hands of Faith—An Unhappy Suspension of Action—A Limited Trust—A Type of the Resurrection.

"PRECIOUS in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints." This was true even in Old Testament times. And how much more now, since death has lost its sting, and since Paul has taught us that "to die is gain" (Phil. 1: 21). Elisha was one of the few men of God on record in the Bible who died of sickness. Jacob was the first of all the patriarchs of whom we hear that he was sick, and this was in Egypt, the country where sickness and physicians are first heard of in Scripture. It is rather striking, too, that the first mention of physicians in the Bible is in embalming the dead, not in healing the living. We hear of no physicians attending the dying Jacob, but after his death they preserved his body from corruption (Gen. 48: 1; 50: 2). Egypt was the land of sickness; "the diseases of Egypt" are often mentioned (Ex. 15: 26; Deut. 7: 15; 28: 60). Very little light is given us about the

of old; often the only words which express it are these: "And he died." Of Abraham we read: "Then Abraham gave up the ghost, and died in a good old age, an old man, and full of years; and was gathered to his people" (Gen. 25: 8). Of Isaac the account is couched in almost the same words (Gen. 35: 29). Of Moses we read: "And Moses was a hundred and twenty years old when he died: his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated" (Deut. 34: 7). Thus we see that, although there may be instances in which our loving God calls home His own chosen people by sickness, as in the cases of Jacob and Elisha, yet there are others where the contrary is the case. There is every reason for a man of God, when he is attacked with sickness, to inquire of the Lord whether this may be his call home; but even if it be so, there is nothing in the Word of God to contradict God's promise that "the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up" during the days which yet remain to him. One who is wholly abandoned to the Lord cannot know much of choice in the matter of life or death; but the Lord would have us claim all the fruits of His redemption work for soul and body while we remain here.

ELISHA'S DYING THOUGHTS.

Elisha's sickness did not occupy him with himself. We hear nothing about any symptoms or any treatment, any doctor or any nurse; but we do hear of a heart full of interest concerning the kingdom and the people of the Lord. Elisha had no personal affairs to settle with God; they were all arranged beforehand, and he was as ready to die as Elijah had been to be translated. He was going to be with Him with whom he had long lived on the most intimate terms; there was the most perfect understanding between him and his Lord; nothing had to be hurried, nothing settled now. Elisha was perfectly at leisure from himself, soul and body. Oh, how different to many a death-bed, where things are first seen in their true light; where all the past life is seen to be one horrible mistake; where, indeed, grace may be claimed, but the senses, dulled by opiates given to soothe pain, can only feebly comprehend, and the heart only feebly respond to the loving heart of God; when regrets agonize the heart, and pain racks the nerves. Here is a man, sick truly, but raised above his sickness; dying, truly, but as much at home with God in dying as he has been in living—just perfectly at ease. Elisha's dying was only part of his life service, and, like Abel, he being dead yet speaketh.

Joash, the King of Israel, Jehu's grandson, was now on the throne of Israel. His father had known something of the Lord. He had clung to the fashionable sin of worshipping the golden calves, as every king of Israel had done since the time of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin, and the anger of God was kindled against Israel, and He allowed Hazael, King of Syria, and his son, Benhadad, to oppress them. So terrible was the destruction that only fifty horsemen, ten chariots, and ten thousand footmen remained. Then "Jehoahaz besought the Lord, and the Lord hearkened unto him," and the people were delivered (II Kings 13: 1-7). Alas! Jehoahaz did not turn from his sin.

Joash, although trained up to worship the golden calves, must have known at least how God had answered prayer in his father's time. But he was no better than his father; God used him to humble the pride of Amaziah, King of Judah, and there was perhaps some measure of drawing toward God; but he did not depart from the sin of Jeroboam. The world's religion is to do the best we can, not to be peculiar, and to count nothing wrong which our fathers did not count so. God's religion is quite of another order: "Ye were redeemed . . . from your vain manner of life handed down from your fathers . . . with precious blood" (I Pet. 1: 18, 19, R. V.). It is no excuse for a sin that our fathers and our forefathers did the same; it is no excuse for ignorance that our fathers knew no better.

ROYAL SORROW.

Jehu, bad man that he was, felt compunction when he heard of Elisha's approaching end. Like many other worldly men, he felt, no doubt, safer in having such a man as Elisha at hand. It was a real sorrow to him that the man of God was about to leave him; his own defection made him cling all the more to Elisha; so he "came down to him and wept over his face, and said, O my father, my father! the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof." Joash saw the treasure he was losing; Elisha, by his faith in God, was a greater strength to Israel than the whole army; in his one person he, with the living God on his side, was "the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof." Men of the world sometimes judge aright; they reckon, not according to words, but deeds. Joash knew that when no power on earth could have given water to the combined armies of Jehoram, Jehoshaphat, and the King of Edom, God had done it in answer to Elisha's prayer; when, again, no power could have detected the strategy of the King of Syria, God had warned Jehoram through Elisha, and that not once nor twice. When Elisha himself was besieged at Dothan God had, in answer to his prayer, struck the host of Syria with blindness; God through him had sweetened the waters, healed the poisoned potage, fed the hungry, even raised the dead; and now the man who had been the instrument of blessing was being taken away. In that moment Elisha was in his eyes the true strength of his country, "the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof."

STRONG HANDS.

Elisha said to him, "Take bow and arrows. And he took unto him bow and arrows. And he said to the King of Israel, Put thine hand upon the bow. And he put his hand upon it. And Elisha put his hands upon the king's hands." There is a wonderful teaching in this. Elisha's dying hands, tremulous and faint, were yet the hands of faith which laid hold on God; and the king's muscular hands of fleshly power could work no deliverance alone. With God's people it is not so much a question of what they can do, but what they believe God can do. Behind many a wondrous work of revival, beyond many an awakening among the heathen, there are some Elisha-hands held up to God. "Open the window eastward," said the believing prophet; and the obedient king opened it. "Then Elisha said, Shoot. And he shot. And he said, The arrow of the Lord's deliverance, and the arrow of deliverance from Syria: for thou shalt smite the Syrians in Aphek, till thou have consumed them." Oh, what opportunities lay before the king! God was on his side; where should be the limit of his conquests? Elisha told him to take the arrows and smite upon the ground. The king seemed to have no apprehension of how much hung upon this act; "he smote thrice, and stayed." The limit of blessing is never on God's side; it is man's unbelief which limits the Holy One of Israel. God reveals to us the mighty power which wrought in Christ when He raised Him from the dead, and tells us that this power worketh to usward who believe; and then say, God declares, "What things soever ye desire, when ye pray believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them." We ask and receive some things, but mighty crying needs for our nation, our churches, and for the heathen world overwhelm us; we smite thrice, look at the difficulties, and stay. "The man of God was wroth with him, and said, Thou shouldst have smitten five or six times; then hadst thou smitten Syria till thou hadst consumed it; whereas now thou shalt smite Syria but thrice." So long as we have warrant in the Word of God, so long as our prayer is the prayer of faith, which always lands us in thanksgiving and rest of soul about that for which we pray, God assigns no other limit. The Lord teach us to pray with divine boldness, dealing closely, trustfully with God about all which He lays upon our hearts, however impossible it may seem to us.

Elisha died, and they buried him. But Elisha had a life beyond the grave. Like Abel, "he being dead yet speaketh" (Heb. 11: 4). He was possessed of a life which death cannot destroy, and which the clods of earth cannot cover. That which is of God in us passes through death and lives on; Christ could not be holden of death, and all that is of Christ in us bridges death. Elijah is a wonderful type of the church which shall, at the coming of Christ, be taken away to meet Him in the air without dying (I Thess. 4: 17); Elisha is a type of the resurrection. The bands of the Moabites invaded the land at the coming in of the year. When burying a man, they cast him into the sepulchre of Elisha. No sooner did the corpse touch the bones of the prophet than the man revived and stood upon his feet. There was life to others in the very death of the prophet, just as all our life comes through the death of Jesus.

The King of Syria still continued to attack Israel. But God remembered both His prophet and His servants of old. "The Lord was gracious unto them, and had compassion on them, and had respect unto them, because of His covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and would not destroy them, neither cast He them from His presence as yet." As Elisha had foretold, so it came to pass; three times Joash conquered Benhadad, King of Syria, the son of Hazael—only three times; had faith prevailed it might have been until he had consumed them.

DR. WILLIAM ELSLIE, whose portrait appears this week on the first page of the CHRISTIAN HERALD, was born in Aberdeen, on June 29th, 1832, and died near Goojerat, in India, from exhaustion, brought on by over-work, on November 18th, 1872, at the age of forty years. He was the son of a prosperous shoemaker. His mother was wont to call him "the son of consolation," for he was born only a few days after the death of his little sister, whose loss almost broke the mother's heart. His

were of a home in which his mother's presence was always felt as the unfailing source of comfort and love. Mrs. Elmslie was no ordinary woman. She was blessed with a vigorous intellect, a large measure of common sense, and earnest piety. She gave her boy from his earliest years sound religious training, and taught him to look to God for help and guidance in every difficulty. The family reaped the fruit of this training quite early in life. The father, hoping to improve his circumstances, removed from Scotland to London, and there sought employment. Before he succeeded he was prostrated with typhus fever, and his wife, while attending upon him, caught the disease. Their hired help fled in terror, leaving Mr. Elmslie in the feebleness which follows the crisis of that disease, and Mrs. Elmslie raving in delirium. There was no one in the house beside but William, then a boy of eight years old. He was a complete stranger in the modern Babylon, and did not know a soul there. The boy knelt down to pray, and then sallied forth into the crowded streets in search of a physician. He was standing bewildered at a street corner, not knowing which way to turn, when a Christian man saw him, and went to his relief, sending his own physician, and tending and helping the family until the dread disease was banished from the home. William never forgot his kindness, and when, years afterward he was toiling as a missionary in the far East he never ceased to pray for God's blessing on that good Samaritan.

A YOUNG WORKMAN.

At the age of nine years his father initiated him into his own business, and the lad became so expert that, by the time he was twelve years old he was earning a man's wages, and was able to buy a few books and commence the labor of self-education. Mrs. Elmslie assisted him, and so the days of childhood passed in busy labor. From eight to ten hours he toiled at the shoemaker's bench, and four hours were given to his books. In 1848 he had succeeded in accumulating a considerable sum of money, and his father having by that time returned to Aberdeen and again become prosperous in business, William applied for admission to the Grammar School of that city. He was successful, and he worked with so much ardor that in a short time his standing in the school was equal to that of boys of his own age who had enjoyed the advantages of a regular education.

COLLEGE LIFE.

At the age of twenty-one, William Elmslie was one of the most expert shoemakers in Aberdeen, and held first-class certificates of his proficiency in the classics and science. Life was before him, and he had to decide how it should be spent. Happily for him, by this time his mother's teaching and example had led him to Christ, and he resolved to devote himself to a life of Christian service. He calculated that by working at the shoemaker's bench for a part of the day he could maintain himself, while giving the remainder of the day to study in the university. He entered himself as a student, and the next five years were years of arduous toil of hand and brain. It was an interesting sight, that of the young Bachelor of Arts working for his Master's degree, stitching away at the shoes every night for his daily bread.

His first ministerial experience was gained in Italy. A wealthy Aberdeen family was making the tour of Europe, and needed a tutor for the eldest son. It was the long vacation at the university, and William Elmslie being at liberty, applied for and gained the position. The family spent several months at Florence, and while there the clergyman who resided there as the chaplain of the English and American church fell ill, and services were suspended. At the earnest request of his employer and other visitors in Florence, the young tutor undertook to conduct religious services which he did with much pleasure to himself and benefit to his hearers.

Returning to Scotland he spent much time in thought about the best way of carrying out of service, and was attracted by the conception of the usefulness which might be achieved by a man who united in himself the skill of a physician with the consecration of a preacher to the heathen. He at once entered himself in the Divinity College, and commenced the work of preparation. During his course there and his subsequent course in the medical college, he supported himself by giving private tuition, and by his shoemaking, which he never regarded as beneath the dignity of a Master of Arts. In August, 1864, Mr. Elmslie being then thirty-two years old, his studies were finished, his examinations passed with honor, he was a skilful physician and surgeon, a profound theologian, and a clever shoemaker. So equipped he entered the great mission field to labor for his Master as a medical

MISSIONARY IN INDIA.

On September 20th, 1864, Dr. Elmslie sailed for his appointed sphere of labor in Cashmere on board the Poonah, and on October 28th he landed in Calcutta, where he spent a fortnight with Mr. Vaughan, of the Church Missionary Society, at the expiration of which he started for his designated sphere of labor by way of Amritsar.

His first resting-place was at the city of Benares, the Rome or Mecca of India. "I must tell you an incident," he writes, "which happened when I was visiting one of the great temples there. As the crowds of worshippers entered the temple, I saw that every one was furnished with flowers, some in garlands, others in bouquets, which were meant as offerings to the god, or to make them fit to appear before it. The room into which we were conducted was dimly lighted. I could only just perceive a block of wood or stone, shaped in the form of the head of a fish. It stood on the ground, inclosed by a little fence of stone work, and near it stood a priest, who, on seeing me, stepped forward and threw a garland of flowers round my neck before I was aware. Fancy me decked as if ready to worship this contemptible deity! He—this sensual-looking priest, implored me for money, which, however, I did not give."

At length, after making a brief stay at several places of interest, he arrived at Cashmere at the beginning of May, 1865.

THE VALLEY OF CASHMERE

is situated on the north of the Punjab, India, from which it is separated by a range of mountains called Pir Panjal. Through the middle of the valley flows the broad-bosomed river, Jhelum. The climate is exceedingly salubrious. The total population of the valley is between four and five hundred thousand, most of whom are Mussulmans, and a proportion Hindoos. Though they are most industrious and very abstemious, and the produce of the country marvellously abundant, the people are very poor.

It was in the capital city of Srinagar, that on May 9th, Dr. Elmslie opened

HIS FIRST DISPENSARY.

Associated with him were two native assistants and a catechist. A Christian service was conducted at 7 A.M., after which ten persons sought advice and help as patients; and four days later Dr. Elmslie began short itinerations on Saturday afternoons in the neighboring villages, "that the people may hear the Gospel in their own tongue, and know of the Medical Missionary Dispensary in Srinagar." On the 17th as bazaar preaching was forbidden, Dr. Elmslie began tract distribution, his medical skill being in increasingly frequent requisition. On the 31st, he opened a small hospital for the accommodation of four or five patients. In September he began to see some spiritual fruits of his efforts. In a letter home, he wrote: "A native fearlessly declared his faith in Christ in an open bazaar yesterday, and endured a terrible beating from his fellow-countrymen, but he still seems to stand fast." And, again, under date of the 25th, he observes: "Heard glad news to-day from the catechist, to the effect that my Kashmiri pundit had declared to him that he firmly believed the Gospel was true, but that he was afraid to make a public profession of his faith in Jesus for fear of the consequences. He is but a Nicodemus in faith. Lord, strengthen him."

Dr. Elmslie's plan of operations was not executed in the opening of this one dispensary. He was anxious to extend the field, and accordingly opened another in Amritsar, and eventually others in distant cities, travelling from one to the other at stated times, and preaching the Gospel on his way as he had opportunity.

RETURN HOME.

Five years of prodigious exertion and unwearied labor had their effect on his constitution, and rest and recuperation became an absolute necessity. Dr. Elmslie accordingly turned his face toward his beloved Scotland. His mother had entered into her rest a few months before he sailed, and it was with sad consciousness that the chief attraction his native land held for him had vanished, that he once more set foot in his native land. Hearty welcomes, however, awaited him from people who had friends and relatives in India, to whom he had been useful. One deserves especial notice. "I can never forget," writes a friend, "how on Dr. Elmslie's arrival in England, a father shook his hands, as the tears rolled down his cheeks, and how between his sobs he could say no more than

'YOU HAVE SAVED MY BOY.'

"It was not his body only that Dr. Elmslie was the means of saving. During a dangerous illness in India, he had nursed him into health, and had been the means also of leading him to Christ, for the salvation of his soul."

During his stay in Edinburgh, Dr. Elmslie's principal work was the preparation of a vocabulary of the language of Cashmere, and so strenuously did he labor at this task that at its conclusion he fell into a condition of physical collapse from which he did not fully recover until he was on shipboard on the way to his sphere of labor in India. In October, 1871, he had the satisfaction of seeing the first part of his book in print; the entire volume was not finished for some time afterward, and a completed copy was sent out to him in India, which reached its destination only the day after his death.

On February 28th, 1872, Dr. Elmslie was united in marriage to Margaret, daughter of the late Rev. W. Wallace Duncan, of Peebles, and on March 5th they left Edinburgh for India, arriving at Cashmere in April. With his health considerably improved, Dr. Elmslie at once plunged into the midst of the exhausting work which he found awaiting him. His mental powers were at their brightest, and his energy was apparently inexhaustible. The work was thoroughly organized, native catechists and evangelists were carrying it forward with vigor, and Dr. Elmslie was here, there, and everywhere guiding, inspiring, and directing the work.

GOVERNMENT INTERFERENCE.

In all directions the sphere was widening, and Elmslie was full of hope and joy when an officer arrived from the English Viceroy of India, demanding him to quit the country. Native priests had waited upon the Viceroy, and lodged complaints against the missionary, who, they said, was undermining the religion of the people.

They held the English Government responsible for Dr. Elmslie's presence in Cashmere, and their resentment at the loss of presence endured, was turned against the nation which the missionary belonged. The principle of the British Government of India are purely secular. It was intolerable that the rule of England should be rendered unpopular in Cashmere by the operations of a Christian missionary. The people of Cashmere might be suffering their physical sufferings relieved, and be getting divine light in their souls, though his self-denying exertions; but, if he was exciting the jealousy of the governing princes, and the priests, against himself and his country, he must be stopped. Accordingly, the Viceroy's order was issued, and Dr. Elmslie and wife had no alternative but to obey. In deep sorrow and mortification they set out for Goorjoo, followed by the tears and lamentations of native Christians to whom the missionary had been a very bearer of light from heaven.

DEATH.

Dr. Elmslie was heartbroken. The mental shock brought on a return of the malady which prostrated him the previous year in Edinburgh, and before he reached Goorjat he was in crisis of a fatal disease. The party had headed Bhimbar, thirty miles from their destination, when a halt was unavoidable. A European physician was hastily summoned, and sought to bear on his noble patient all the skill in command. But Dr. Elmslie's condition was the result of mental emotion as much as of physical disease, and his constitution was enervated by his arduous labors. The physician baffled, and the patient steadily sank. On November 18th, 1872, Dr. Elmslie's life of contested service ended, and he entered into rest. His beloved wife is still laboring at Amritsar, as Superintendent of a Girls' Orphanage.

SCENES IN CASHMERE.

The illustrations which accompany Dr. Elmslie's portrait on the first page, convey some idea of the scenes among which he labored, and of the manners and customs and dress of the people.

THE DANCING BEAR.

An invariable sight at the native fairs, and attracts a large crowd of spectators who watch his performance with delighted interest. The common reddish bear of Cashmere. Its skin is decorated with a chaplet of cowrie shells.

THE EXHIBITION OF THE SNAKE-CHARMER.

Very peculiar to Indian cities, where men go to the country offering to find, attract, and tame serpents of any kind—even the venomous cobra—and exhibit them in a state of marvellous docility, accompanied with the sound of a gong. One of the most ancient practices in the East, and is referred to in the Old Testament books and poetry. The professional snake-charmer usually carries a number of snakes around his limbs and body, and concealed in his clothes.

THERE IS A LARGE PEEPUL-TREE

In the city of Cashmere, at the foot of which a bench or low wall has been put up to serve as the counter of a store; and the sale of shawls or sheepskin coats, Astrakhan and furs, is here carried on by merchants from Afghanistan. Types of the Afreedi hillmen with their marked Arab physiognomy, and the orn of head-dress and veil, the "boorka," worn by the Mussulman women, differing from those of India generally, are also shown in the illustrations.

THE BACTRIAN CAMEL

comes laden with merchandise from Cabul through the Khyber Pass to Cashmere and Peshawar, is another foreign importation, differing in shape, especially in the hump, from the well-known camel of Western Asia and of Egypt.

A SERIES OF EARTHQUAKES

which resulted in tremendous disaster recently occurred in Cashmere and the adjacent region. The first warning was felt on the evening of May 29th. At 3:15, on the morning of the 30th, a most violent shock occurred, which caused immense damage. "From that day," writes, on July 13th, Mr. Edwin G. Johnson, who was present, "no day has passed without repeated shocks, so frequent as to number one hundred and fifty. These, fortunately, have not been very serious, though from the accompanying sounds like thunder, and the uncertainty of the danger, they are sufficiently alarming. Owing also to the extraordinary angles into which the old shaky houses had been thrown, many of these buildings toppled over whenever a severer shock than usual occurred." As the people were camped out, however, comparatively few persons were killed by the later shocks, though the damage to property was incalculable.

THE TOTAL LOSS OF HUMAN LIFE

Mr. Johnson estimates at thirty-two hundred, while thirty thousand cattle perished, the great cattle mortality being owing to the fact that at night the animals were housed under the lower stories of the houses, or in roughly built sheds in the fields. "I have been twice over the districts affected, and even now the stench from the decaying bodies is overpowering. The human bodies have been dragged or thrown into the chasms formed on the hill-side, but the cattle were left behind in the ruins." The towns of Sopoor and Baramoola were completely wrecked, and the inhabitants were living under any kind of shelter which they could put up—mats, boards, old clothes, or boughs of trees. Every European has done his best to afford assistance, especially the missionaries, who have expended all their funds. The Governor of Cashmere also, Diwan Luchman Doss, a native gentleman of high family and good education, was most active in arranging for the supply of doctors, tents, money, and food for the sufferers.

INCIDENTS AT REV. E. PAYSON HAMMOND'S MEETINGS.

Converting the Cattle.—Rev. E. Payson Hammond said: "A man in Mashua, who was a notorious sinner, and was very cruel to his cattle, was led to see himself as a guilty sinner before God, and getting on his knees he cried, 'God be merciful to me a sinner.' In one of our meetings that man got up and told his experience, concluding with: 'I believe my cattle are converted, too; there is such a great change in them.' I think he meant that the change in himself had wrought a like transformation in his cattle; when he had treated them cruelly they had been unmanageable, but now that he was kind and gentle toward them they had also become gentle and tractable. And so, my dear friends, if you have been truly converted by the Holy Spirit of God you will be kinder and gentler to everybody with whom you come in contact, and even the dumb animals around your home will find it much to their advantage."

A True Friend to a Motherless Girl.—"I knew a woman in greatly reduced circumstances, but amidst all her poverty she heard of a friendless and homeless girl, and for the sake of Him who had done so much for her, she resolved to share her little room, and the little food she had, with this girl. Her work of love was not lost even in this world. She was a true friend to this motherless girl. Years elapsed, and she was laid on a bed of sickness through over-work, but now she had a true friend in this girl whom she had befriended. She came every day with delicacies and comforts to this old woman, until she died. A cup of cold water given to a disciple in the name of a disciple, shall in no case lose its reward."

A Bareheaded Woman's Confession.—Mr. J. G. Forbes related the following: "We recently had a praise and testimony meeting in the open air, at which some twenty persons professed to decide for Christ. I called upon any one in the crowd to give a short testimony as to what the Lord had done for them. A poor, bare-headed, shoeless woman stepped forward, saying: 'With your permission, sir, I would like to say a word. Friends, I am a poor, wretched, fallen woman, an outcast from society. I was once a respectable woman. My husband, who is now in glory, died, saying: "Eliza, my feet are on the sure Rock of Ages. Will you come after me?"' I faithfully promised that I would, but I have broken that promise, and walked in the paths of sin. After my husband's death wicked men and women got hold of me and led me to be what I now am. Glory be to God, while you were singing that beautiful hymn, "Washed in the Blood of the Lamb," I cried to God to have mercy on my soul and forgive me, and now I know that I am washed in the blood of the Lamb."

A Man Prays a Child's Prayer.—Mr. A. Orr Ewing said: "We had a crowded meeting in Alexandria to hear Mr. Hammond's farewell address. All seemed to be deeply impressed with the service. One young man to whom I spoke came in with five or six companions. They were seated in the gallery, and, in the after-meeting, after some little conversation with him, I said: 'Are you converted?' 'No, I am not,' was the reply. 'Well, here you are to-night with the wrath of God abiding upon you, despising the blood of Jesus and ignoring His agony in the garden.' I saw that the man was moved, for his eyes glistened with tears. I repeated a little prayer that Mr. Hammond taught the children:

'Jesus, take this heart of mine,
Make it pure and wholly Thine;
Thou hast bled and died for me;
I will henceforth live for Thee.'

I asked him if he could repeat that prayer from his heart. He did so, and I believe nothing but the Holy Spirit could have wrought so deep a conviction within that man, and before he left the meeting he had accepted Christ, and passed from death unto life."

A Shocking Admission.—"A Young Man who had been trained up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, but had gone astray, and was living far from good or holy influences, felt his great difficulty to be that he knew the Bible almost all by heart, and that he believed every word of it to be true, but how to apply it to himself he did not know." After a long and solemn conversation he deliberately said: 'I cannot feel anything but that I am on my way to hell; I do not feel the way to be saved, but I will do what you say.' "Take God at His Word." Since that night he has found Jesus Christ to be a glorious Saviour, and he has brought one of his companions to the meeting who also found Christ, and has given striking testimony in the open air to the power of God to save unto the uttermost."

A Shipwrecked Crew Saved.—Mr. Ferrie related: "A ship was on its way from a foreign port to Liverpool one calm, quiet evening, when all at once, in the midst of the peacefulness that reigned, a burst of smoke and fire arose toward heaven. Some of the terrified crew clung to the mast and to the hull of the ship; others were thrown into the water and were instantly drowned; a few men got on to rafts. For days they were perishing for want of food, and almost ready to drink one another's blood, when, at last one day they saw a white speck on the blue horizon. These perishing men watched it eagerly as it came nearer, for it was a vessel; but, alas! it turned another way, and the informant tells us such an awful shriek of despair as arose from them, he would never forget. On the following day another ship came in sight, and with the little strength they had they called for help. The captain heard the cry, feeble as it was, and responded to them, by saying: 'I will come to your help; I will save you.' And these perishing men were soon on board the vessel, because they were willing and eager to be saved. Dear friends, is not Christ, our great Captain, far more willing to save perishing men if they only will cry to Him?"

VICARIOUS SUFFERING.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon. Preached Last Sunday Morning, Oct. 25, 1885.

"Without shedding of blood is no remission."—HER. 9: 22.

The Poet's Question—Not Literal Blood—The Thing Signified—Vicarious Suffering—Common in Life—Champions of the Homestead—The Midnight Watcher—Patriotic Self-Sacrifice—Yellow Fever Martyrs—The Dominant Principle—The Great Unlike—The Meaning of Blood—At Waterloo.

JOHN G. WHITTIER, the last of the great school of American poets that made the last quarter of a century brilliant, asked me in the White Mountains, one morning after prayers, in which I had given out Cowper's famous hymn about "The Fountain Filled with Blood," "Do you really believe there is a literal application of the blood of Christ to the soul?" My negative reply then is my negative reply now. The Bible statement agrees with all physicians, and all physiologists, and all scientists, in saying that the blood is the life, and in the Christian religion it means simply that Christ's life was given for our life. Hence all this talk of men who say the Bible story of blood is disgusting, and that they don't want what they call a "slaughter-house religion," only shows their incapacity or unwillingness to look through the figure of speech toward

THE THING SIGNIFIED.

The blood that, on the darkest Friday the world ever saw, oozed, or trickled, or poured from the brow, and the side, and the hands, and the feet of the illustrious sufferer, back of Jerusalem, in a few hours coagulated and dried up, and forever disappeared; and if man had depended on the application of the literal blood of Christ, there would not have been a soul saved for the last eighteen centuries.

In order to understand this red word of my text, we only have to exercise as much common-sense in religion as we do in everything else. Pang for pang, hunger for hunger, fatigue for fatigue, tear for tear, blood for blood, life for life, we see every day illustrated. The act of substitution is no novelty, although I hear men talk as though the idea of Christ's suffering substituted for our suffering were something abnormal, something distressingly odd, something wildly eccentric, a solitary episode in the world's history; when I could take you out into this city, and before sundown point you to five hundred cases of substitution and voluntary suffering of one in behalf of another.

VICARIOUS SUFFERERS.

At two o'clock to-morrow afternoon go among the places of business or toil. It will be no difficult thing for you to find men who, by their looks show you that they are overworked. They are prematurely old. They are hastening rapidly toward their decease. They have gone through crises in business that shattered their nervous system, and pulled on the brain. They have a shortness of breath, and a pain in the back of the head, and at night an insomnia that alarms them. Why are they drugging at business early and late? For fun? No; it would be difficult to extract any amusement out of that exhaustion. Because they are avaricious? In many cases no. Because their own personal expenses are lavish? No; a few hundred dollars would meet all their wants. The simple fact is, the man is enduring all that fatigue, and exasperation, and wear and tear, to keep his home prosperous. There is an invisible line reaching from that store, from that bank, from that shop, from that scaffolding, to a quiet scene a few blocks, a few miles away, and there is the secret of that business endurance. He is simply the champion of a homestead, for which he wins bread, and wardrobe, and education, and prosperity, and in such battle ten thousand men fall. Of ten business men whom I bury, nine die of overwork for others. Some sudden disease finds them with no power of resistance, and they are gone. Life for life. Blood for blood. Substitution!

At one o'clock to-morrow morning, the hour when slumber is most uninterrupted and most profound, walk amid the dwelling-houses of the city. Here and there you will find a dim light, because it is the household custom to keep a subdued light burning; but most of the houses from base to top are as dark as though uninhabited. A merciful God has sent forth the archangel of sleep, and he puts his wings over the city. But yonder is a clear light burning, and outside on the window casement a glass or pitcher containing food for a sick child, the food set in the fresh air. This is the sixth night that mother has sat up with that sufferer. She has to the last point obeyed the physician's prescription, not giving a drop too much or too little, or a moment too soon or too late. She is very anxious, for she has buried three children with the same disease, and she prays and weeps, each prayer and sob ending with a kiss of the pale cheek. By dint of kindness she gets the little one through the ordeal. After it is all over, the mother is taken down. Brain or nervous fever sets in, and one day she leaves the convalescent child with a mother's blessing, and goes up to join the three in the kingdom of heaven. Life for life. Substitution! The fact is that there are an uncounted number of mothers who, after they have navigated a large family of children through all the diseases of infancy, and got them fairly started up the flowering slope of boyhood and girlhood, have only strength enough left to die. They fade away. Some call it consumption; some call it nervous prostration; some call it intermittent or malarial disposition; but I call it martyrdom of the domestic circle. Life for life. Blood for blood. Substitution!

SLAIN FOR A SON.

Or perhaps the mother lingers long enough to see a son get on the wrong road, and his former kindness becomes rough reply when she expresses anxiety about him. But she goes right on, looking carefully after his apparel, remembering his every birthday with some memento, and when he is brought home worn out with dissipation, nurses him till he gets well and starts him again, and hopes, and expects, and prays, and counsels, and suffers, until her strength gives out and she fails. She is going, and attendants bending over her pillow, ask her if she has any message to leave, and she makes great effort to say something, but out of three or four minutes of indistinct utterance they can catch but three words: "My poor boy!" The simple fact is she died for him. Life for life. Substitution!

PATRIOTIC SELF-SACRIFICE.

About twenty-four years ago there went forth from our homes hundreds of thousands of men to do battle for their country. All the poetry of war soon vanished and left them nothing but the terrible prose. They waded knee-deep in mud. They slept in snow-banks. They marched till their cut feet tracked the earth. They were swindled out of their honest rations, and lived on meat not fit for a dog. They had jaw all fractured, and eyes extinguished, and limbs shot away. Thousands of them cried for water as they lay dying on the field the night after the battle, and got it not. They were homesick, and received no message from their loved ones. They died in barns, in bushes, in ditches, the buzzards of the summer heat the only attendants on their obsequies. No one but the infinite God who knows everything, knows the ten thousandth part of the length, and breadth, and depth, and height of anguish of Northern and Southern battle-fields. Why did these fathers leave their children and go to the front, and why did these young men, postponing the marriage-day, start out into the probabilities of never coming back? For the country they died. Life for life. Blood for blood. Substitution!

YELLOW FEVER MARTYRS.

But we need not go so far. What is that monument in Greenwood? It is to the doctors who fell in the Southern epidemics. Why go?

Were there not enough sick to be attended these Northern latitudes? Oh, yes; but a doctor puts a few medical books in his valise, and some vials of medicine, and leaves his patients here in the hands of other physicians, a takes the rail-train. Before he gets to the fabled regions he passes crowded rail-trains, regular and extra, taking the flying and afrighted populations. He arrives in a city over which great horror is brooding. He goes from couch to couch, feeling of pulse and studying symptoms, and prescribing day after day, night after night, until a fellow-physician says: "Doct you had better go home and rest, you look miserable." But he cannot rest while so many are suffering. On and on, until some morning find him in a delirium, in which he talks of home and then rises and says he must go and look after those patients. He is told to lie down, he fights his attendants until he falls back, a weaker and weaker, and dies for people whom he had no kinship, and far away from family, and is hastily put away in a strange tomb, and only the fifth part of a newspaper tells us of his sacrifice, his name just mentioned among five. Yet he has touched the furthest height of sublimity in that three weeks humanitarian service. He goes straight as an arrow to the bosom of Him who said: "I visit the sick and ye visited Me." Life for life. Blood for blood. Substitution!

A LEGAL CHAMPION.

In the legal profession I see the same principle of self-sacrifice. In 1846, William Freeman, a pauperized and idiotic negro, was at Auburn, N. Y., on trial for murder. He had slain the entire Van Nest family. The foaming wrath of the community could be kept off him only by armed constables. Who would volunteer to his counsel? No attorney wanted to sacrifice his popularity by such an ungrateful task. They were silent save one, a young lawyer with feeble voice, that could hardly be heard outside the bar, pale and thin and awkward. It was William H. Seward, who saw that the prisoner was idiotic and irresponsible and ought to be put in an asylum rather than put to death, the hence counsel uttering these beautiful words:

"I speak now in the hearing of a people who have prejudged the prisoner and condemned him for pleading in his behalf. He is a convict, a pauper, a negro, without intellect, sense, or emotion. My child with an affectionate smile dismisses my care-worn face of its frown whenever I cross my threshold. The beggar in the street obliges me to give because he says, 'God bless you!' as I pass. My dog caresses me with fondness if I will but smile on him. My horse recognizes me when I fill his manger. What reward, what gratitude, what sympathy or affection can I expect here? There the prisoner sits. Look at him. Look at the assembly around you. Listen to their ill-suppressed curses and their excited fears, and tell me who among my neighbors or my fellow-men, who even in his heart, I can expect to find a sentiment, a thought, not to say of reward or of knowledge, or even of recognition? Gentlemen, you may think of this evidence when you please, bring in what verdict you can, but I asseverate before heaven and you, that to the best of my knowledge and belief, the prisoner the bar does not at this moment know why it that my shadow falls on you instead of his own."

The gallows got its victim, but the post-mortem examination of the poor creature showed to all the surgeons and to all the world, that the public were wrong, and William H. Seward was right, and that hard, stony step of obloquy the Auburn court-room was the first step of the stairs of fame up which he went to the top, to within one step of the top, that last denied him through the treachery of American politics. Nothing sublimer was ever seen in an American court-room than William H. Seward, without reward, standing between the fury of the populace and the loathsome imbecile. Substitution!

In the realm of the fine arts there was as remarkable an instance. A brilliant but hyposed painter, Joseph William Turner, was y a valley of abuse from all the art galleries rope. His paintings, which have since he applause of all civilized nations, "The Plague of Egypt," "Fishermen on a Lee in Squally Weather," "Calais Pier," "Sun Rising Through Mist," and "Dido near Carthage," were then targets for critics not at. In defence of this outrageously man, a young author of twenty-four years, ne year out of college, came forth with his nd wrote the ablest and most famous essays at that the world ever saw, or ever will see n Ruskin's "Modern Painters." For teen years this author fought the battles of al-treated artist, and after, in poverty and n-heartedness, the painter had died, and ublic tried to undo their cruelties toward y giving him a big funeral and burial at al's Cathedral, his old-time friend took f a tin box nineteen thousand pieces of containing drawings by the old painter, hrough many weary and uncompensated s assorted and arranged them for public vation. People say John Ruskin in his ays is cross, misanthropic, and morbid, ver he may do that he ought not to do, hatever he may say that he ought not to etween now and his death, he will leave rld insolvent as far as it has any capacity y this author's pen for its chivalric and ian defence of a poor painter's pencil. Ruskin for William Turner. Blood for . Substitution!

THE DOMINANT PRINCIPLE.

at an exalting principle this which leads o suffer for another! Nothing so kindles siasm or awakens eloquence, or chimes canto, or moves nations. That principle dominant one in our religion—Christ the r, Christ the celestial Hero, Christ the der, Christ the Substitute. No new prin- for it was as old as human nature; but on a grander, wider, higher, deeper, and rld-resounding scale. The shepherd s champion for Israel with a sling toppled ant of Philistine braggadocio in the dust; e is another David who, for all the armies urches militant and triumphant, hurls the h of perdition into defeat, the crash of his n armor like an explosion at Hell Gate. am had at God's command agreed to sac- his son Isaac, and the same God just in ad provided a ram of the thicket as a sub- e; but here is another Isaac bound to the e and no hand arrests the sharp edges of tion and death, and the universe shivers uakes and recoils and groans at the horror, ood men have for centuries been trying t who this Substitute was like, and every arison, inspired and uninspired, evangelis- rophetic, apostolic, and human, falls short, rist was the Great Unlike. forsook a throne and sat down on His own toil. He came from the top of glory to bottom of humiliation, and changed a cir- cference seraphic, for a circumference dia- e. Once waited on by angels, now hissed at gands. From afar and high up He came down; a-past meteors, swifter than they; by stary thrones, Himself more lustrous; past larger worlds to smaller worlds; down-stairs of firmaments, and from cloud to cloud, and through the tree-tops and into the camel's stall, to thrust His shoulder under our burdens and take the lances of pain through His vitals, and wrapped Himself in all the agonies which we de- serve for our misdoings, and stood on the split- ting decks of a foundering vessel, amid the drenching surf of the sea, and passed midnights on the mountains amid wild beasts of prey, and stood at the point where all earthly and infernal hostilities charged on Him at once with their keen sabres—our Substitute!

DIED FOR A WORLD.

When did attorney ever endure so much for a pauper client, or physician for the patient in the lazaretto, or mother for the child in membranous croup, as Christ for us, and Christ for you, and Christ for me? Shall any man or woman or child in this audience who has ever suffered for another find it hard to understand this Christly suffering for us? Shall those whose sympathies have been wrung in behalf of the unfortunate have no appreciation of that one moment which was lifted out of all the ages of eternity as most conspicuous, when Christ gathered up all the sins of those to be redeemed under His one arm, and all their sorrows under His other arm, and said: "I will atone for these under my right arm, and will heal all those under my left arm? Strike me with all thy glittering shafts, O Eternal Justice! Roll over me with all thy surges, ye oceans of sorrow!" And the thunderbolts struck Him from above, and the seas of trouble rolled up from beneath, hurricane after hurri- cane, and cyclone after cyclone, and then and there in presence of heaven and earth and hell, yea, all worlds witnessing, the price, the bitter price, the transcendent price, the awful price, the glorious price, the infinite price, the eternal price, was paid that sets us free.

THE MEANING OF BLOOD.

That is what Paul means, that is what I mean, that is what all those who have ever had their heart changed mean by "blood." I glory in this religion of blood! I am thrilled as I see the suggestive color in sacramental cup, whether it be of burnished silver set on cloth immacu- lately white, or rough-hewn from wood set on table in log-but meeting-house of the wilderness. Now I am thrilled as I see the altars of ancient sacrifice crimson with the blood of the slain lamb, and Leviticus is to me not so much the Old Testament as the New. Now I see why the destroying angel passing over Egypt in the night spared all those houses that had blood sprinkled on their door-posts. Now I know what Isaiah means when he speaks of "one in red apparel coming with dyed garments from Bozrah," and whom the Apocalypse means when it de- scribes a heavenly chieftain whose "vesture was dipped in blood;" and what Peter, the apostle, means when he speaks of the "precious blood;" and what John means when he refers to the blood that cleanseth from all sin; and what the old, worn-out, decrepit missionary Paul means when, in my text, he cries, "With- out shedding of blood is no remission." By that blood you and I will be saved—or never saved at all. In all the ages of the world God has not once pardoned a single sin except through the Saviour's expiation, and He never will. Glory be to God that the hill back of Jerusalem was the battle-field on which Christ achieved our liberty!

AT WATERLOO.

The most exciting and overpowering day of last summer was the day I spent on the battle- field of Waterloo. Starting out with the morn- ing train from Brussels, Belgium, we arrived in about an hour on that famous spot. A son of one who was in the battle, and who had heard from his father a thousand times the whole scene recited, accompanied us over the field. There stood the old Hougomont Château, the walls dented and scratched and broken and shattered of grape-shot and cannon-ball. There is the well in which three hundred dying and dead were pitched. There is the chapel with the head of the infant Christ shot off. There are gates at which, for many hours, English and French armies wrestled. Yonder were the one hundred and sixty guns of the English and the two hundred and fifty guns of the French. Yonder the Hanoverian Hussars fled for the woods. Yonder was the ravine of Ohain, where the French cavalry, not knowing there was a hollow in the ground, rolled over and down, troop after troop, tumbling into one aw- ful mass of suffering, hoof of kicking horses against brow and breast of captains and colonels and private soldiers, the human and the beastly groan kept up until, the day after, all was shov- eled under because of the malodor arising in that hot month of June.

"There," said our guide, "the Highland regi- ments lay down on their faces waiting for the moment to spring upon the foe. In that orchard twenty-five hundred men were cut to pieces. Here stood Wellington with white lips, and up that knoll rode Marshal Ney on his sixth horse, five having been shot under him. Here the ranks of the French broke, and Marsal Ney, with his boot slashed of a sword, and his hat off, and his face covered with powder and blood, tried to rally his troops as he cried: "Come and see how a marshal of France dies on the battle-field." From yonder direction Grouchy was expected for the French re-enforcement, but he came not. Around those woods Blucher was looked for to re-enforce the English, and just in time he came up. Yonder is the field where Napoleon stood, his arm through the reins of the horse's bridle, dazed and insane, trying to go back. Scene of a battle that went on from twenty-five minutes to twelve o'clock, on the 18th of June, until four o'clock, when the Eng- lish seemed defeated and their commander cried out: "Boys, can you think of giving way? Remember old England!" and the tides turned, and at eight o'clock in the evening the man of destiny, who was called by his troops Old Two Hundred Thousand, turned away with broken heart, and the fate of centuries was decided. No wonder a great mound has been reared there, hundreds of feet high, a mound at the expense of millions of dollars and many years in rising, and on the top is the great Belgian lion of bronze, and a grand old lion it is. But was in Palestine. There came a day when all hell rode up, led by Apollyon, and the Captain of our salvation confronted them alone. The Rider on the white horse of the Apocalypse go- ing out against the black horse cavalry of death, and the battalions of the demonic, and the myr- mids of darkness. From twelve o'clock at noon to three o'clock in the afternoon the greatest battle of the universe went on. Eternal destinies were being decided. All the arrows of hell pierced our Chieftain, and the battle-axe struck Him, until brow and cheek and shoulder and hand and foot were incarnadined with oo- zing life; but He fought on until He gave a final stroke with sword from Jehovah's buckler, and the commander-in-chief of hell and all his forces fell back in everlasting ruin, and the victory is ours. And on the mound that celebrates the triumph we plant this day two figures, not in bronze or iron or sculptured marble, but two figures of living light, the Lion of Judah's tribe and the Lamb that was slain.

The Evangelical Alliance Held the First meeting of the Annual Conference in the Queen's Assembly Rooms, Glasgow, on Tuesday, Octo- ber 6th. The attendance was so large that an overflow meeting was held in Claremont Church, which was also filled. In the absence of Lord Provost McOuie, Baillie Dickson presided. Among those on the platform were Principal Cairns, Dr. Houghton, Prebendary Anderson, Dr. Munro Gibson, Lord Polworth, Sir William Muir, and Admiral Sir W. King Hall. The speakers were the Chairman, the Marquis of Ailsa, Dr. Draper, and Principal Douglas.

THE OPTIMISTIC CREED.

THE tendency of our times is toward optimism. In the past, it was common to find men dwelling on the degeneracy of the times in which they lived. They spoke of past ages as being better than their own. Men were more public-spirited, purer of life, keener of thought, diviner in spirit than they and their contemporaries. If they did not inquire why "the former days were better" than theirs, they thought they were better. We have changed all that. We think there has never been an age like this. We boast of our culture, our benevolence, our "higher life," and our advances in science, the arts, and religion. We have gone further still. We expect that our descendants will make greater advances. It is not uncommon to hear preachers speak of the time coming as a golden age. They assure their hearers that the Church will triumph. They promise certain victory to the soldiers of the cross. "I am an optimist by constitution," said a great preacher, recently, "I expect the triumphant victory of the Church." People who do not believe all this, and who maintain that the world is getting worse, and will continue getting worse, are stigmatized as alarmists and croakers. Do not heed them, say the optimists; they are bilious; their digestion is out of order. We are not told about Noah, but there is reason to believe that his warnings did not receive much attention. Even if he had a respectful hearing, nobody seemed to turn his words to practical account. When the flood came no one was in the ark but his own family. Apparently there were optimists in those days. The fact is worthy of consideration because our Saviour explicitly pointed out that the days preceding His Second Coming, would resemble the days of Noah in that characteristic (Matt. 24: 37-39).

Naturally, alarmists are not popular. It is much more pleasant to listen to the optimists. We like to be told we are making progress, and that there is a still better time ahead. But the pessimists may be right. Their medicine, bitter as it is, may be beneficial. It might be an unwelcome sound to people around Wilkesbarre to hear some cold night that there were signs of a cave-in. They would be sorry to be disturbed from their beds by a man proclaiming that the pillars of the mines under them were giving way. But they would not rate at him as an alarmist. They would want to know who he was and how he knew, and if they were satisfied they would lose no time in getting to a place of safety. They would be sensible. They would know that it was suicidal folly to disregard a warning like that. That is the way Christian men should act, and the half-and-half people who call themselves Christians, but who are living lives of worldly pleasure.

The message is now being proclaimed through our land that a time of trouble is at hand. Solemn assurance is given that society, instead of being better than of yore, is worse. We are cautioned against trusting to appearances and deceiving ourselves into the belief that the fair churchoing outside is a proof of spirituality. We are warned that victory is not ahead, but the temporary triumph of Godlessness. The future is no golden age, but an age of trial, persecution, and misery. Safety is not to be gained by heedlessness, but by watchfulness and consecration. The Lord is gathering out a people for Himself who will be removed out of the evil, and will return with Him to witness and share in His triumph. The preachers of this message are "the pessimists, the alarmists, the croakers."

When we ask them for their authority they are reasonable. They invite us to look around. To look below the surface. They appeal to the Bible. They point to the prophecies. Some of them have been literally fulfilled. When they were uttered they were utterly improbable; but not a letter failed. Nineveh is a quarry. On Tyre the fishermen dry their nets. Babylon is the home of the bitter. Israel is a nation scattered and peeled. The line of the prophetic does not end there. It goes forward, and it is not difficult to find

OUR PLACE ON THE CHART.

Behind us stretches the line, perfect and accurate. Not one thing has failed of all the things that God spoke. Before us, too, is the line. What does it tell us?

There are two courts of appeal. There is the present state of the world, and there is the inspired Word of God. Both courts pronounce the same verdict. It would be impossible to survey the entire field here. A few facts and quotations may, however, lead readers to examine more extensively for themselves. In an article recently published in The Truth, the writer condenses them with much force. He cites the fact that the murders in the country at large, during the last year, exceeded those of the preceding year by as many as five for every day of the twelve months. "All right," say the optimists. In St. Louis, which is not by any means the worst city in the United States, but may serve as an average specimen, there were last year 27 murders, 83 suicides, and more than 1000 divorces, 3 for every day of the twelve months. On a pleasant May Sunday there were less than 20,000 of all sorts and sizes in all of the Protestant churches put together, while on the same day there were far more than 20,000 on the base-ball parks, and 87,000, it is said, passed through the gates of the Fair Grounds to witness an exhibition given by "cowboys." The same evening more than 2000 whiskey-shops were in full blast, and the theatres were crowded to see low and licentious plays. "All is well," shout the inexplicable optimists of the Christian Church. Surely "they have healed the hurt of the daughter of my people slightly, saying: Peace, peace; when there is no peace" (Jer. 8: 11).

THE WARNING.

But what saith the Scripture? "Behold, the day of the Lord cometh, cruel both with wrath and fierce anger, to lay the land desolate: and He shall destroy the sinners thereof out of it. For the stars of heaven and the constellations thereof shall not give their light: the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine. And I will punish the world for their evil, and the wicked for their iniquity; . . . Fear, and the pit, and the snare, are upon thee, O inhabitant of the earth. And it shall come to pass, that he who fleeth from the noise of the fear shall fall into the pit; and he that cometh up out of the midst of the pit shall be taken in the snare: for the windows from on high are open, and the foundations of the earth do shake" (Isa. 13: 9-11; 24: 17, 18).

Figurative language, is it? Well, here is some more of it. After announcing the certain doom of Jerusalem, upon which His name was called, God says: "A noise shall come even to the ends of the earth; for the Lord hath a controversy with the nations: He will plead with all flesh; He will give them that are wicked to the sword, saith the Lord. Thus saith the Lord of hosts, Behold, evil shall go forth from nation to nation, and a great whirlwind shall be raised up from the coasts of the earth. And the slain of the Lord shall be at that day from one end of the earth even unto the other end of the earth: they shall not be lamented, neither gathered, nor buried; they shall be dung upon the ground" (Jer. 25: 31-33). There are many such figures of speech running all through the Old Testament prophecies, pointing to the last days. The New Testament is equally explicit, and with more fullness of detail. (See Luke 17: 18-21; 11 Thess. 2; 11 Tim. 3).

One of the profoundest thinkers and ablest historians of our day,* speaking of the world's vaunted progress after comparing our age with other ages in the history of the human race, expresses his deliberate opinion that the accumulation of wealth, with its daily services at the Stock Exchange, and the Bourse, with international exhibitions for its religious festivals, political economy for its Gospel, is progress; it be progress at all, toward the wrong place. Baal, the god of the merchants of Tyre, counted four hundred and fifty prophets when there but one Elijah. . . . Yet in the end Baal could not save Samaria from the Assyrians any more than progress, and "unexampled prosper could rescue Paris from Von Moltke. Thus age is an age of material progress, but of material retrogression. A few are being preoccupied gathered out of the putrefying mass; they be taken to meet their Lord at His descent into the air. For the remainder, the nominal Christians, the careless and the avowed unbelievers there will be a fierce ordeal. Some will be driven for refuge to Christ, purified by the flames; others will graduate in blasphemy and rebel until the day comes when Christ shall appear visibly with His saints to consume that wicked one with the fierceness of His wrath.

It is of no use deceiving ourselves, or allowing those who prophecy smooth things to deceive. The Word of the Lord is sure, and those who sit at ease in Zion, those who utter no warning, those who sleep in slothful indolence will have a terrible awakening.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND

A Memento of Brownlow North's Work. At a recent meeting, Mr. Frazer related: "the time of a revival in Inverness-shire, in 1840, of Brownlow North's revival meetings, a young woman became deeply anxious about her soul, and when giving her experience afterward, said: 'The question was asked, "Who will baptize this Saviour?"' And then she said, 'tears running down her face, "I could not, I did not stay away from Him. I came to Him; I was poor, lost, guilty sinner, and He took me, and have found rest and peace in Him."

The Best Argument.—A Friend remarked:

"I know a young man in Wishaw who came to a meeting which I was conducting, and gave himself to Jesus. The next morning when he went into his workshop, the first thing he did was to honestly to confess Christ. His fellow workmen began to reason the matter with him, and he, being quite an unlearned man, could not answer many of the questions which were put to him, and therefore contented himself by repeating thus: 'I know not how to answer all that you say, but one thing I do know—"the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin."'" They were silenced and solemnized, and he is cherished that some of them are seeking the Saviour."

A Christless Christian Worker Saved.—

"One of our open-air meetings I saw a man was in a respectable position in the city, engaged in active work for Christ, a teacher in a Sabbath school, but yet without God or hope in Christ. I noticed him hanging about, but his dress and general appearance were so different from the others among whom we work that I thought it was mere curiosity which kept him standing till most of the others were gone, but I decided that was my duty to speak personally to him, and did so, when he told me that he was anxious about his soul since he heard the personal testimony of others in the open air. He wished to become a follower of Christ without confessing that hitherto he had not been a Christian. I directed him to what the Scripture says on that point, and I am glad to say that he got grace from the Lord to conquer his pride, and that he has confessed Christ openly."

An Incident of the Indian Mutiny.—

Mr. Stewart observed: "I had a friend who was in the battle of Lucknow, and he told me that the order was given that every man was to lie down for four hours, for the enemy had taken possession of a hospital, and from it they were firing down shot and shell upon the British forces, but by lying down the deadly missiles passed harmlessly over their heads. My friend told me that those four hours were the most miserable he could recall in his life, for even erve in his body was twitching to get at the eels, but the command was given, and it had to be obeyed. But when the order came to rise and go forward, the British rushed at them and cleared every man from the place. To stand still is one of the hardest, but the first thing, that a Christian must learn if he would be of use in his Master's service."

The Last Half-Hour of His Life.—"When Dr. Barkis was near his end the surgeon came, and a servant asked him how his master was. He cannot live more than half an hour," replied the surgeon. The good doctor asked the servant what the surgeon had said, and when he was told, he exclaimed: 'Lift me out of bed; let me get on my knees, and spend the last half-hour of my life in prayer for the Church of God.' Friends, if you are to have power with God, you must be much on your knees alone. Much real prayer is the precursor and accompaniment of much real power."

A Pauper Boy's Gratitude.—Dr. Cameron said: "I knew an aged woman who lived a few miles out of Glasgow. She earned her living by boarding children from the poor-house. Among the children whom she kept was a little lame boy of whom she became very fond. As time wore on the authorities of the poor-house said that the boy must now be sent to learn a trade. When the old woman heard this she became greatly distressed, and pleaded with them to leave the boy under her care a little longer, but to this they would not consent. To the gentleman who came to take the lad away, she said: 'Oh, sir, do not take Johnnie away, but let him remain a little longer.' When she found that no words would prevail, she finally resolved, although she was very poor, to keep him free of charge. They let her have her own way, and she kept the boy. He received a free education, and, when old enough, he got into a good situation in Glasgow, and was soon able to take his benefactress to a comfortable home, where she spent the remainder of her life in comfort."

How a Minister was Killed.—The Rev. Mr. Pugh remarked: "Some years ago there was a pastor in one of the American churches, who was an admirable preacher and a straightforward minister of Christ. A wealthy gentleman habitually sat in his church as a member of his congregation, who conceived a dislike to the pastor, and went about trying to undermine his character, and diminish his influence. When the charge was made public it cost the minister his life, for he died of a broken heart. His widow was left with very little means in the world. This rich man who had been the cause of her husband's death, went and offered her a large sum of money, but she said: 'No, I never can accept a gift from a man whose hands are red with the blood of my husband.' God afterward generously provided for her, but the wealth of the rich man appeared to do him no good; it eat like a cankerworm into his soul; and unless he has obtained forgiveness from God for his cruel slander against the minister of the Gospel, God will hold him guilty of murder."

Found in the Dead Man's Hand.—The Rev. Mr. Fullerton said: "A party were at one time travelling through a part of India, when one of their number, a native, dropped suddenly to the ground. The others were passing on taking no further notice of him, when one of our countrymen left the party, and bending over him saw that the poor fellow was dying. When his friend saw that his end was near, he asked: 'Have you any hope for the next world?' 'Ah, yes,' said the native, 'the blood of His Son cleanseth us from all sin.' Somewhat surprised to hear these words fall from the lips of a poor ignorant Hindoo, the other questioned, 'Where did you get that?' But he could not answer, for his eyes were already closed in death. They found, firmly grasped in the dead man's hand, a leaflet containing the text which he had just quoted. I do not know how he had come into possession of it; the winds of the forest might have blown it to him for all I know. But he seemed to have prized it above all things.

Friends, can you with the same faith as the poor Hindoo, say: 'The blood of His Son cleanseth us from all sin?'"

THE CHRISTIAN CONVENTION IN NEW YORK.

THE subject suggested for the sessions of Thursday, October 8th, of the Christian Convention in the Twenty-third Street Tabernacle, was Evangelistic and Missionary Work, or HOW TO REACH THE MASSES.

Dr. John Cookman introduced the subject by exhorting all who might speak to adhere to the keynote of Jesus only, which had given the tone to all the previous sessions.

Dr. Easton, of New Brunswick, N. J., discussed the methods adopted by the churches in our day to reach the masses, and expressed his conviction that the only method that contained the promise of success, was not in splendid edifices, beautiful music, church regimental drill, nor free pews; the best way of reaching the masses was to go to the masses. He urged Christians to go into the alleys and rear tenements, and to work there in faith. A good motto for every worker, he said, was that which appeared on the bas-relief which adorned a home for the fallen in London, representing a child blowing a dying ember—"Perhaps there remains a spark." It would be well never to despair of any one however degraded. A spark might remain which the breath of life and love might revive.

The Rev. W. S. Rainsford, Rector of St. George's Church, read Isaiah 61:1, and reminded Christian workers that in that passage they would find their commission for this age as for the age twenty centuries ago. He said:

"Our business is not with the question, What is to become of the world? but, What is to become of the Church of God if she refuses to hear the voice of her Lord to declare good tidings to the poor? I believe that the proportion of the people in these United States, who do not care a fig for religion is increasing relatively. Not numerically, perhaps, but relatively. I judge by the fact that the proportion of church-goers in our cities is decreasing. If a man loves God, he will go to God's house. The decrease in the number of church-goers is therefore a startling and suggestive fact. It is not that they do not believe in God and in the Lord Jesus Christ. It is mainly because the world regards the Church as a gathering of people trying to live by two laws: The law of selfishness for six days of the week, and the law of self-sacrifice for the seventh. They regard the Church simply as an insurance company against the risks of the next world. The workingman will not accept such a religion. He says if the Gospel is not to be of service to him to-day, he does not want it at all. His needs for this life are too absorbing to allow him to give much thought to the next life. He has to battle for bread, and in that struggle all his energies and thoughts are exhausted. The Church must do as its Master did. It must follow in His steps who went about to make men good; who, when surrounded by people who were not seeking conversion, gave them bread. It must say to rich Christians, you cannot live for yourselves; you cannot live by two laws; you cannot live to make great fortunes, or, if you do, you must not name the name of Christ. God has but one law for every follower of the Saviour, and that is the law of self-sacrifice. Our mission is to make the world see that Jesus lives, and lives in our hearts and lives. The world does not want to hear your doctrines or your experience. It does not understand either of them. But it understands the actions of a self-sacrificing life—a life governed by the one principle of self-denial and self-sacrifice, that others may become happier and better. The world wants to believe, but the inconsistencies of Christians have caused it to doubt."

Mrs. Baxter said: "The commission given to the disciples was, All power is given unto me in heaven and on earth. Go ye therefore and teach" (Matt. 28:18). "In trying to reach the masses we should soon grow discouraged and despair, if we thought that all power was given to us. It is because we know that all power is given unto Him that we have confidence. We have not to consider what we can do, or what we want to have done, but what God can do. There is something better even than going down to the masses and making them feel that we love them; we should get them to feel how God loves them."

FRIDAY.

An anointing and consecration service was held in the afternoon. In the evening the Rev. A. B. Simpson, in opening the session, remarked that there was a deep significance in the narrative of the multiplying of the widow's oil (II Kings 4). God asks every consecrated Christian the question Elshila put to the widow, "What hast thou in thy house?" You have oil. Oil is always the emblem of the Holy Ghost. That must be poured out. It must be poured in borrowed vessels. No man has room in himself for all there is. He must go to his neighbors, and let them share with him. God has more to give than any man can receive, and all the vessels you can find can be filled.

Captain Pennington, whose portrait appeared in this journal on October 1st, at the request of Mr. Simpson, told how God had blessed him in healing through him, and in sending him answers to his prayers. He related several instances which were mentioned in these columns in the sketch of his life. Mr. Young, of Brooklyn, described the work of Divine Healing as carried on in the institution God had enabled him to organize in Brooklyn. Volunteer testimonies of Divine Healing were then invited, and some thirty-two persons gave accounts of their recovery from disease through the power of Christ, in answer to prayer, without the use of means.

Dr. Wilson then rose to say "a parting word" to the Convention. He said: "You remember the leper who came to Jesus (Matt. 8:1-4) saying, 'Lord, if thou wilt thou canst make me clean.' You know the rest. Jesus said I will, be thou clean, and immediately his leprosy was cleansed. In this case Jesus enjoined silence. He did not despise testimony. In some cases He commanded it, but in this case He directed the man to go straight to the priest and show himself. That is a duty for some of you who have testified here to do. God has many conscientious ministers who do not believe in these cures. Go, show yourselves to the priest. There will be no need of doctor's certificates. There will be the living proof: 'Here am I healed.' Another matter: Let us live the life that faith-healing suggests. You will do more to convert the world to belief in Divine Healing by being straight in your dealings, pure in your lives than by all the testimonies you have given to-night."

Dr. John Cookman being requested to say a farewell word, briefly described again the two occasions within the past year in which he had experienced Divine Healing. He said: "My last word to you at this Convention is the word addressed by God to Moses (Ex. 25:40): 'See that thou make all things after the pattern which was shewed thee in the mount.' We have been on the mount all the week with Him. Oh, how we have been thrilled with His blessedness and His beauty! Now we are coming down from the mount. See that you make all things according to the pattern shewed you in the mount. See to it dear Christian workers. The Apostle John saw a lamb in the midst of the throne. That means tenderness in the midst of Almightiness. He shall lead you. How tenderly He broods over you! How tenderly He loves you, every one!"

Mrs. Baxter said: "If I ask myself how is it my soul is so blessed, I see it is all Jesus. He has been the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. He was the same before I found all this out. He is the same to-day as when Peter and Paul and John knew Him. He is, blessed be God, the same to-morrow. Therefore, I think we can say with David, His praise shall be continually in my mouth."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Usefulness of the Navy-Yards as a Political influence in the elections will be curtailed by a letter issued on October 23d by the Secretary of the Navy to the commandants at New York, Portsmouth, Norfolk, and Mare Island. In this letter he asks the commandants to report in detail upon the efficiency of the foremen recently appointed, and particularly as to whether any one of these has selected men not good workmen or has appeared to be governed by political considerations rather than the interest of the yard. Mr. Whitney had the reputation before he entered the Naval Department of being an astute politician, but he seems now to have forgotten how many votes may be gained by making sinecures in the navy-yards for political heeled. He is treating the navy-yards as if they existed merely for building and repairing ships. That may be a good business principle, but it is not politics. It will make him popular with men of sense and integrity, but not with the party bosses.

The Changes in the Civil Service Law which have been suggested for the consideration of Congress, have hitherto been in the direction of relaxing its stringency. The three, however, recommended by Mr. F. O. Prince, who is one of the candidates for the Governorship of Massachusetts, are of the opposite character. They deserve the attention of Congress. One is to make "every corrupt exercise of the power of nomination, promotion, transfer, or confirmation, even though the corrupt consideration may not be a 'thing of value,' an offence under our bribery laws." This would render liable to indictment and punishment an officer who should appoint a subordinate because he wished him to help the party by his influence on his workmen. The second change Mr. Prince desires, is an absolute prohibition of all solicitation of office-holders for political contributions. A third change is a moderate increase in the number, now four, presented from the eligible list for selection by the appointing officer, and this in order to make political appointments more difficult.

Sound Political Counsel as Useful to Democrats who may read it, as to the Republicans who heard it, was given on Friday last to a large meeting in New York by Senator Edmunds, of Vermont. He said: "I maintain the right of a man to be a Democrat or Republican as he pleases, but he must feel his responsibility for good government. He cannot shift that responsibility to the leaders of his party. So we have no occasion to complain when there are sometimes differences within the party in regard to measures or candidates. I am therefore glad to hear that in this great State the name of party is this year losing largely its significance. It is the mission of every man now in selecting the Chief Magistrate of this State to look at what the two men can do when they come to the position, and not stumble over platforms. It is your duty to vote the ticket which you think will bring the best and honestest government to this State. It is the duty of the citizens to say, as President Cleveland is reported to have said, and as I believe he said, that public office is a public trust. The duty and the right of suffrage is a still more sacred public trust." As the Senator intimated, it is a healthy sign in any State when voters look to the moral character of the candidates rather than to the platform of their party. That appears to be the tendency in New York this year. Senators Sherman and Logan, who are announced to speak in this State, will do well to remember this fact. If they harangue the people here on the subject of the war, and try to arouse sectional animosity as they have been doing elsewhere, they will do their party harm rather than good. If it is right to do so it is not expedient, because here the people have been informed that the war is over.

The Disposal of the Grant Fund was Settled at a meeting of the subscribers on October 22d. It was originally intended to make the quarter of a million dollars, which was raised four years ago, a permanent fund, the proceeds of which should be devoted to ex-Presidents of the United States. The subscribers, however, decided to give it to the Grant family absolutely. It is to be put in trust, and the income paid to Mrs. Grant for her life, and at her death the principal is to be divided among General Grant's descendants. The division is not to be equal among the grandchildren of General Grant, but each of his children will have an equal share, and if any of them are dead the share of the one deceased will be divided equally among his or her children. In legal phrase it is to be divided per stirpes and not per capita.

A Statue to the Late Hon. William E. Dodge was unveiled in New York on Thursday last. It has been placed on the triangular plot made by the junction of Broadway and Thirty-fifth Street. The statue is nine feet six inches in length, and stands upon a pedestal of polished granite, the front of which is a drinking fountain. Mr. Dodge is represented as standing erect, his right arm resting upon two books that lie upon a short column. The significance of the statue was pointed out by the Hon. Abram S. Hewitt, who said that New York had not been prodigal of public statues. Yet surely it was a good thing for the community to perpetuate the memory of such a man as Mr. Dodge. It had not been the custom in this or any other land. The warrior and the statesman had carried off the honors. Our civilization had entered upon a new era. Construction was esteemed more highly than destruction. It was an evidence of this that the community had chosen to honor a man whose chief claim to admiration was that he held his means as a trust fund for the good of his fellow-men. Dr. McCosh, of Princeton, Senator Colquitt, of Georgia, and Cyrus W. Field took part in the ceremonies.

The Canadian Arctic Observers Have Fared better than those sent out by the United States Government under Lieutenant Greely. After spending fifteen months among the Esquimaux fourteen of the eighteen men have been brought back to Halifax in safety. They arrived by the steamer Alert on October 18th. One man died of scurvy before the party was relieved, and three others who were stationed at Stupart's Bay, becoming hopeless of relief arriving, as the Alert was a month behind her time, set sail the very day before she sighted the station. They are believed to be safe. All the party agree that the country is enormously wealthy in fur-bearing animals and fisheries, and that furs, the profitable trade in which has hitherto been monopolized by the Hudson's Bay Company, can be obtained from the Esquimaux for a trifle. The sum total of the observations is that the average temperature is much lower than generally imagined, the average of the cold spells being 30° below zero. Regarding the ice conditions, they varied so every year that no one year was a criterion for another. The navigator simply had to take the ice as he found it, and sail wherever he saw open water or the ice was thinnest. That was the experience of two Hudson's Bay captains who had navigated that region for a quarter of a century. The prospect of reaching Europe by way of Hudson's Bay, which was one of the chief objects contemplated when the expedition was sent, is not favorable.

The Small-Pox Scurge in Montreal continues its fatal work. The authorities are actively engaged in isolating infected houses, and in cases where isolation is impossible taking the patients by force to the hospital. The ambulance corps is clearing out the cases from the extreme west end of the city, where small-pox is very prevalent. The isolation committee have sixty houses guarded by special constables. Large numbers of cases, however, are not reported, and from them contagion is spreading. On October 22d a regular pest house was discovered in Notre Dame Street by the health officers. In the second flat of the house, in a small room reeking with filth, eight children were discovered afflicted with the disease, while in an adjoining room, only separated by a thin wooden partition, there were three children lying on a mattress all stricken with the disease, with a dead child between them. None of the cases had been reported. The alarm seems now to be general, and extraordinary measures are being recommended by sanitary specialists to stamp out the disease.

The Marquis of Lorne was Mobbed and pelted with rotten eggs on Saturday in one of the suburbs of London. He is a candidate for a seat in the House of Commons as the representative of Hampstead. He went down to Brentford to make a campaign speech, when he was rudely assaulted. Missiles of a very unsavory character were flung at him, his hat was smashed over his eyes, and he was obliged to run through the streets to the railroad station in a drenching rain with the yelling mob at his heels. His supporters attempted to protect him, but were overpowered, and roughly handled. The Marquis, though the son-in-law of the Queen and the son of a duke, announces himself as an advanced Radical, and adopts Mr. Chamberlain's platform with modifications.

The Final Result of the Elections in France is that the Conservatives or Monarchists have 204 seats in the Legislature, while the Republicans of all shades have 382 seats. If the Republicans could act together they could still hold control of the Government, but the moderate Republicans appear more inclined to act with the Monarchists than with the Radicals. Grave fears for the existence of the Republic are now openly expressed, as the French people would prefer a Monarchy to a Radical Republic, which now appears to be the only kind of a Republic possible.

The Complication in South Eastern Europe was not solved last week. The attitude of England, France, and Italy is now reported favorable to the union of Roumelia and Bulgaria, while Russia would not oppose the union if Prince Alexander could be dethroned, and his place filled by Prince Waldemar, son of the King of Denmark, or some other nominee of her own. Austria, with the moral support of Germany, is opposed to the union of the two principalities, and insists on the right of the Powers who signed the treaty of Berlin to enforce its provisions. The result of the diplomatic negotiations is awaited with intense anxiety, not so much on account of the importance of the States directly involved, but because the great Powers occupy decided and antagonistic positions on the question, and in espousing the cause of either party may be dragged into war. On Saturday news was cabled that Serbia had sent an army into Bulgaria by way of Klissura, and that a collision with the Bulgarian troops was hourly expected. Should war actually break out, a further dismemberment of the Turkish Empire is considered inevitable. That result, as we know from prophecy, must eventually occur.

Wanted: An active Christian man, who is a rapid writer, to accompany the Rev. M. Baxter in his lecturing tour and occasionally to distribute handbills from house to house. A good singer and speaker preferred. Address to this office, 63 Bible House, N. Y.

Mrs. Baxter is this Week Taking Part in the Convention at Buffalo, N. Y., on Holiness and Divine Healing. On Sunday, October 18th, she spoke three times at Newark, N. J. During last week she was at Philadelphia assisting at the Christian Convention in the Institute Hall. Last Sunday she preached at Rochester, N. Y., and next Sunday, November 1st, she expects to preach at Ashtabula, Ohio. Letters for her, addressed to this office will be forwarded to her.

The Rev. W. Hay Aitken, the English Mission preacher, commenced a series of services at St. George's Church, Newburg, N. Y., on October 17th. They are being continued this week. He is assisted by the Rev. James Stephens, and services for ladies are conducted by Mrs. Couch, a lady of much earnestness and oratorical power. Mr. D. L. Moody will hold union services in the Columbia Rink of the same city on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, October 30th, 31st, and November 1st.

The Death of Two English Bishops is An- nounced. The more prominent of the two is Dr. James Fraser, Bishop of Manchester, who died suddenly, on October 22d, from exhaustion, the direct result of overwork. He was one of the most enlightened and liberal bishops of the Church. His sympathy with the poor, and the laboring classes, made him popular. His death will be generally deplored. He was sixty-seven years old, and had been fifteen years a bishop. Dr. James R. Woodford, Bishop of Ely, died October 23d. He was the author of several volumes of sermons and lectures, and had attained eminence as a preacher before his elevation to the bishopric. He was sixty-six years old, and had been a bishop twelve years.

The Tenth Protestant Episcopal Church Con- gress assembled at New Haven, Conn., on October 20th, and continued its sessions through the week. The Right Rev. John Williams, D.D., LL.D., Bishop of Connecticut, had charge of the services. His assistants were Bishops Whipple, of Minnesota, and Neely, of Maine; among the distinguished foreign clergymen who attended and took part in the deliberations of the Congress, was Archdeacon Farrar, whose portrait and life appeared in this journal last week. The meetings were held in Carl's Opera House, and at the evening sessions, which were public, very large audiences assembled. Dr. Farrar's address on the Christian Doctrine of the Atonement, was listened to with rapt attention. In a talk with the Yale students, Dr. Farrar said: "There are three ways open to you to seek the best things: First, and lowest, but not altogether bad, is personal ambition to gain power, wealth, and rank. Second, to serve your country. Third and highest, the ambition of Christians to bring heaven a little nearer earth. As inscribed as a memorial of three Western graduates who started the missionary spirit in America, 'The field is the world.' To prepare for your work make yourself men, put away all villainess, and respect others as yourselves."

The Trial of Mr. Stead, the Editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, and his fellow-defendants, was commenced on October 23d. The judge who is trying the case is Mr. Justice Lopes, who has evidently taken a view of the case unfavorable to the defence. He expressed his opinion at the outset, that no motives, no matter how worthy their object, were sufficient to justify the taking of the child without her parents' consent, and if the consent had been obtained in a fraudulent manner it was no consent in the eyes of the law. The curious feature of the prosecution is that the Government has singled out Mr. Stead for prosecution, although it is not suggested that the girl suffered injury at his hands. The princes, peers, and millionaires who have been engaged in the traffic in children, and who really had vicious motives, and committed the crimes, have not been prosecuted. The man who exposed the hideous iniquity, and who, in order to satisfy himself that he was not making a false charge, verified his information by practical experiment, is the man who is arraigned. It is evidently a dangerous business in England to expose wickedness in high places. Viewed from this side the Atlantic, it would appear that it is the British Government and the people who are on trial rather than the men and women who stand in the dock of that London court.

An Old Hunter's Secret Source of Pure Water was recently discovered by his neighbors in California. The San Francisco Alta says that Steve Woodward, an old hunter who lives on the shores of Washoe Lake, had always a supply of bright, sparkling water on hand, and his visitors were puzzled as to the place where he obtained it. It has been found that at the bottom of the lake there are living springs of pure water, and when he needs a supply he pulls out in his boat to that part of the lake where they are located and, sinking a large demijohn to the bottom with a stone, draws the cork with a string, and when it is filled raises it to the surface. The demijohn being full, the water of the lake cannot flow in as he raises it. Here is a lesson to all who are seeking to live lives "unspotted from the world." The soul filled with the living water Christ has to give is saved from the pollution that is all around (1 Peter 1: 4).

An Uncommon Respect for a Dead Husband's wishes has been manifested by a young widow in Monroe County, Ky. Her husband bequeathed in his will eight one-thousand-dollar United States bonds to the Fanning Orphan School; but the courts, on account of indefiniteness, set the will aside and ordered its distribution among the heirs. The widow, however, though the sum was more than half her fortune, resolutely refuses to use a dollar of it for her own benefit, but has transferred the bonds above mentioned to the Orphan School. The young widow's concern was not to know how much money she might legally retain, but to have her husband's wishes fulfilled. Her example may be commended to the notice of half-hearted Christians who are frequently heard inquiring whether they can attend theatres and balls and other places of worldly amusement without losing their church standing. The duty of self-sacrifice for Christ's sake needs to be preached very explicitly in these days (John 14: 21).

A Deluded Colored Woman is Suing for compensation in the Indiana courts. Before the war broke out she was a slave. Her owner moved to Indianapolis, taking her with him. She could not read, and was kept so constantly at work that she knew nothing of the events taking place. Being among strangers no one enlightened her, and she has continued in service ever since, believing that she was still a slave. Latterly, however, her employer changed his demeanor toward her. She had been treated kindly before, but during the past year or two she suffered cruelly from her master's ill-humor. Her sufferings at last caused her to overcome her diffidence and to speak to a woman of her own race, a complete stranger to her, about her miserable condition. For the first time she heard of emancipation and learned that she was not a slave. She is now suing for the balance due her over and above the board and clothing she has received. The bond-slaves of Satan have not the sense of this ignorant colored woman. They cannot collect damages from their oppressor, but they might be as prompt as she in claiming the freedom which Christ purchased for them (Isa. 61: 1).

A Hermit Family Living in Cleveland, Ohio, has been for years the subject of curiosity to the city. They lived in a house the doors of which were never opened nor the blinds raised. No one was ever seen to go into or come out of the house. They received no letters, nor could it be found that they held communication with any one. Several schemes were devised to penetrate their seclusion, but all failed. On October 20th the health officers called to look into the sanitary condition of the house. After a great deal of hesitation the door was opened. The officers entered a large room, well furnished. The man who stood before them appeared to be about forty-five years of age, of pleasant address, and well dressed. It was learned that he and his wife had resided there for a number of years, rearing and educating their family. The rooms were always darkened, and the children never permitted to go into the yard or streets, or be seen by any one. It is thought the eldest boy brings all the food to the house before daylight and after dark in the evening. In reply to the question as to what means he had, the man answered that he was rich, and he had everything he wanted, and that he and his family only wished to be left alone. No motive was assigned for this extraordinary seclusion. The man did not mix with society to prey upon it, as some men do, nor to bless it, as others do. He was like the man who hid his Lord's money (Matt. 25: 18). Many have the same spirit who do not carry it to the same extreme, but they do no good in the world, and will be held accountable for neglect of duty (Matt. 25: 44-46).

Beetles and Roaches as Gospel Preachers have been employed by a converted criminal in Moyamensing Prison. The Philadelphia News says that a prisoner who is serving a life-term in that jail, and who has been brought to repentance and righteousness by faith in Christ, was eager to tell his fellow-prisoners the glad tidings of salvation. The authorities of the prison, however, refused his request for permission to read the Bible to them. Then he came to the determination of spreading religious teaching by methods entirely his own. The prison is overrun with black roaches, and the prisoner captured one of the largest of these. He parted the wings, salivated a tiny strip of tissue paper, and stuck it on the insect's back. On the paper was written, in minute characters: "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow." The insect, on being released, scurried through a crack in the floor. Within the next few days the prisoner sent off fifteen or twenty more, freighted in the same manner. Three days afterward he saw one of the beetles again, with the paper still on its back. He caught it, and there was the Gospel message still distinct, but across it another prisoner had written the words: "I know you're right. Signed, 62." In pressing these despised creatures into God's service the ingenuity of the prisoner was chiefly conspicuous. He was anticipating the time when every living thing will be consecrated to the Lord (Hos. 2: 18).

A Wedding in a Poorhouse Took Place at Honesdale, Pa., on October 19th. A prosperous farmer near that city was left a widower about a year ago. He has had considerable difficulty since that time with the housekeepers he has employed to look after his house and family. In despair, he applied for a housekeeper at the poor-house of Sullivan County, but the superintendent objected to any woman being taken, unless it was as a wife. The farmer said that if he could find a reputable woman in the institution who suited him, he would be willing to marry her. The superintendent, therefore, showed him through the house. When they reached the laundry several women were busy there, and among them a comely widow. After watching her for a few minutes, the farmer told the superintendent that if she was willing he would be suited with the woman at the washub. The superintendent spoke to her, and told her what the farmer's errand was. She stopped work, looked at him a moment, and then wiped her hands and arms with her apron, and said she would marry him. Esquire Hunt was summoned, and in the presence of the other inmates of the institution, he married the pair. The bridegroom brought his bride a new dress and other articles, and then the two returned to his farm. It may be hoped that the marriage so hastily arranged may prove a happy one. The wife's gratitude, at least, is due to the man who took her from the poor-house, provided her with apparel, and made her the mistress of his home. But she may forget this as sometimes does the Church which Christ redeemed, covered with the robe of His righteousness and prepared as His bride (Eph. 5: 25-27).

DEPARTED SAINTS YET LIVING.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

SUGGESTED BY THE DECEASE OF THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY.

"Now that the dead are raised, even Moses shewed at the bush, when he calleth the Lord the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. For he is not a God of the dead, but of the living: for all live unto him."—LUKE 20 : 37, 38.

Eulogy of Lord Shaftesbury—A Corrected Phraseology—A Declaration from God—I. A Glorious Relationship—The Choice of the Three Patriarchs—Their Dealings with God—The Covenant Made—II. Eternal Life Implied—In the Promises—Life in Pawns—III. The Life Unveiled—Individuality—Recognition after Death—John Ryland's Opinion—The Dead not Lost—Still of the Human Race—Successors Needed.

DURING the past week the Church of God, and the world at large, have sustained a very serious loss. In the taking home to Himself by our gracious Lord of the Earl of Shaftesbury we have, in my judgment, lost the best man of the age. I do not know whom I should place second, but I certainly should put him first—far beyond all other servants of God within my knowledge—for usefulness and influence. He was a man most true in his personal piety, as I know from having enjoyed his private friendship; a man most firm in his faith in the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ; a man intensely active in the cause of God and truth. Take him whichever way you please, he was admirable; he was faithful to God in all his house, fulfilling both the first and second commands of the law in fervent love of God and hearty love to man. He occupied his high position with singleness of purpose and immovable steadfastness; where shall we find his equal?

Both man and beast may unite in mourning him; he was the friend of every living thing. He lived for the oppressed; he lived for London; he lived for the nation; he lived still more for God. He has finished his course; and though we do not lay him to sleep in the grave with the sorrow of those that have no hope, yet we cannot but mourn that a great man and this day in Israel. Surely the righteous are taken away from the evil to come, and we are left to struggle on under increasing difficulties. It must always be so. The godly must die, even as others. Though our life be perfectly consecrated, yet it cannot forever be continued in this world. It is appointed unto men once to die, and that appointment stands. We expect the present rule to last till He shall come who shall destroy the last enemy. We are not troubled with Sadducean doubts; to us, seeing that Christ rose from the dead, it is a matter of certainty that all His followers must rise also; and seeing that Jesus ever liveth, it is equally a matter of certainty to us that all the saints are still living, for He hath said, "Because I live, ye shall live also."

Let us correct our phraseology by that of Scripture, and speak of departed saints as inspiration speaks of them. Then shall we come back to the simple child's talk which Wordsworth so sweetly turned into rhyme—"Master, we are seven;" and in our family we shall number brothers, and sisters, and friends, whose bodies lie in the churchyard, and shall speak of those who have crossed the border, and passed within the veil, as still our own. Like Jesus, we shall say, "Our friend Lazarus sleepeth;" like Paul, we shall speak of them as absent from the body but present with the Lord, and regard them as part and parcel of the one family in heaven and earth.

A NATION'S RESURRECTION.

Our text was fashioned in a place which has the air of death, burial, and resurrection about it. The voice came to Moses in the desert. This was a strange place for Moses; the living, active, well-instructed mind of Moses, mighty in all the wisdom of Egypt, and full of noble thoughts concerning the living God, was buried in a desert. It is singular to see the foremost mind of the age in the remotest part of the desert, hidden away among sheep. He who was a born king is here feeding a flock. It is death to Moses. Rest assured that Moses cannot be kept in this living tomb; he must rise to life and leadership. While there is a God and a providence Moses cannot continue in obscurity. There are certainties wrapped up in him which cannot fail. A man need not be a prophet to stand at Horeb and prognosticate that Moses will emerge from the desert and shake Egypt by his resurrection.

While Moses is in the desert he is thinking about another case of death, burial, and resurrection—namely, Israel in Egypt. The people of God, the favored nation of Jehovah, with whom he had entered into covenant, saying, "I will be their God, and they shall be my people"—these were in Egypt, ground down by relentless oppression, begrimed with brick-earth, and black and blue with the blows of task-masters. It has come to this, that they are compelled to cast their male children into the river, and so to be the destroyers of their own race. The children of Israel have become a herd of slaves; yet they are God's elect people, God's favored family. It does not require a prophet to declare that this death in Egypt cannot last; the elect nation must live, and rise, and go forth free to serve the Lord.

LIFE IN DEATH.

And so, while Moses in the desert is thinking of Israel in Egypt, he sees a bush, and that bush is all ablaze. An ordinary bush upon the heath needs only to be touched with a match; in one moment there is a puff of flame, and then all is over; nothing is left but a trace of ashes. Yet here was an extraordinary thing—a bush that continued to burn, and was not consumed. Here was life in the midst of death, continuance in the midst of destruction. Now we come to the central matter. Out of the midst of the bush there came a voice, a mysterious and divine voice, which said, "I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." From this voice our divine Lord teaches us to gather this fact: that God's people live when they appear to have been long dead; for He who cannot be the God of the dead, or non-existent, still avows Himself to be the God of the long-buried patriarchs. Our Lord proved from that utterance at the bush the continued life of the Lord's chosen, and also their resurrection; how did He do this?

I. We will not go straight to the answer, but we will beat about the bush a little, that the reasoning may the more gently enter our minds. I would say, first, that in these words we have declared. Moses calleth the Lord "The God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." The glorious Lord did at the bush as good as say, "These three men have chosen me to be their God." So they had; through the grace of God they had deliberately chosen to part with their natural kindred in the country of the Chaldees, and to journey to a land of which they knew nothing except that God had promised that they should afterward receive it for an inheritance. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were three very different characters; yet this was common to the three—that they believed God and took Him to be their God alone. They nestled in the bosom of Jehovah while the rest of the world went after their idols. We also take this God to be our God. There is a nobility about the choosers of the true God which will surely secure them from annihilation.

Next, these three men had learned to commune with God. Those are strangely honored beings with whom God enters into close communion, as He did with these three men. I argue from it that these beings cannot dissolve into a handful of dust and cease to be. Can those eyes cease to be which have seen the Lord? Can those souls perish which have conversed with the Eternal? We think not so. But just now I ask you only to meditate upon the glories to which the patriarchs were lifted up when they were permitted to be the friends of God.

THE DIVINE-HUMAN COMPACT.

What was still more notable, the Lord entered into covenant with them. If God makes men capable of entering into everlasting covenant with Himself, there lies within that fact the clear suggestion that He imports to them an existence which is not for to-day and to-morrow, but for eternity. Moreover, to go further, these men were not only in covenant with God, but they had lived in accordance with that covenant. I do not mean that they had lived perfectly in accord with it, but that the main strain of their lives was in conformity with their covenant relationship to God. Now, doth God enter into covenant with men and help men to live in accordance with that covenant, and after all shall they miss the blessing? Shall it end in nothing? Hiding beneath the shadow of God's wing, shall they, after all, perish? It cannot be; they must live to whom God is God. For this was the covenant: that they should have God to be their God, and that they should be God's people. Oh, brothers, I do not know how to speak on such a blessing as this, though I live in the daily enjoyment of it. This God is our God. All that the Lord is, and all that He can do He hath given over to us, to be used on our behalf: the fulness of His grace and truth, the infinity of His love, the omnipotence of His power, the infallibility of His wisdom—all, all shall be used on our behalf. Blessed above all other beings are those who have Jehovah to be their God, and who are themselves the Lord's choice, and care, and delight. Each one of these points, if well thought out, will go to strengthen our belief that the saints must live, must live forever, and are at this moment living unto God.

II. We now come to that matter more distinctly under our second head: here is for "God is not the God of the dead, but of the living." It is implied first in the very fact of the covenant of grace. As I have asked before—Doth the eternal God covenant with creatures that shall live only to threescore years and ten, and then shall go out like a candle-snuff? How can He be a God to them? I understand how He can be a helper and a friend to men of brief existence, but I see not how He can be a God. How is He a God to me if He suffers me to be blotted out of existence? When David said in dying, "Yet hath He made with me an everlasting covenant," His comfort lay in his belief that he should live in the everlasting age to enjoy the fruit of that covenant. How could there be an everlasting covenant with a creature who would cease to exist?

But next, this covenant was made up of promises of a very peculiar order; for in very deed the covenant that God made with Abraham was not altogether, or even mainly, concerning things temporal. I have not the time to go into this subject; you get it more fully explained to you in the Epistle to the Hebrews; but so it was, that the covenant blessings were of an order and a class that could not be compassed within the space of this present mortal life; the outlook of covenant promises was toward the boundless sea of eternity. Now, if the Lord made with them a covenant concerning eternal blessings, these saints must live to enjoy those blessings. God did not promise endless blessings to the creatures of a day.

More especially it is to be remembered that for the sake of these eternal things the patriarchs had given up transient enjoyments. Abraham might have been a quiet prince in his own country, living in comfort; but for the sake of the spiritual blessing he left Chaldaea, and came to wander in the pastures of Canaan, in the midst of enemies, and to dwell in tents in the midst of discomforts. Isaac and Jacob were "heirs with him also of the same promises;" but they entered not into the pursuits of the people; they dwelt alone, and were not numbered among the nations. They quitted kith and kin, and all the advantages of settled civilized life, to be rangers of the desert, exiles from their fatherland. Since these men put this life in pawn for the next, they were sadly mistaken if there be no such life.

Yet further, to bring out the meaning here, God cannot be the God of the non-existent. The supposition is too absurd. Our Saviour does not argue about it, but He says so most peremptorily! God is not the God of the dead—that cannot be! A living God is the God of living men; and Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are still alive. This even goes far to show that the bodies of these saints shall yet live. Inasmuch as a portion of these chosen ones is still in the earth, God, who reckons things that are not as though they were, looks upon their bodies as possessing life, because they are to possess life so soon. God is not only the God of Abraham's soul, but of Abraham as a whole, his body, soul, and spirit. God is the God of Abraham's body; we are sure of that, because the covenant seal was set upon the flesh of Abraham. Where the doubt might be there is the confirming seal—namely, in his mortal body. There was no seal set upon his soul, for the soul had life and could not see death; but it was set upon his body, which would die, to make sure that even it would live.

At this day we have baptism and the holy supper to be seals as to the body. I have sometimes thought to myself that it were better if there were no water baptism, seeing it has become the nest of so much superstition; and the Lord's Supper, with all its blessed uses, has been so abused that one is apt to think that without outward ordinances there might be more spiritual religion; but the Lord intends that the materialism of man, and of creation, shall be uplifted; and that the body shall be raised incorruptible, and therefore has He given seals which touch the outward and material.

III. Thirdly, and very briefly, beloved friends, my text not only declares glorious relationship, and implies eternal life, but it also unveils, somewhat scantily, but still sufficiently, what the glorious life must be. Look, then, and see the glorious LIFE UNVEILED.

It is clear that they live personally. It is not said, "I am the God of the whole body of the saints in one mass," but "I am the God of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob." God will make His people to live individually. My mother, my father, my child, each will personally exist. God is the God of saints, as living distinct lives. All the saints are existent in their personality, identity, distinction, and idiosyncrasy. What is more, the patriarchs are mentioned by their names; and so it is clear they are known; they are not three anonymous bodies, but Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Many inquire, "Shall we know our friends in heaven?" Why should we not? I cannot forget old John Ryland's answer to his wife: "John," she said, "will you know me in heaven?" "Betty," he replied, "I have known you well here, and I shall not be a bigger fool in heaven than I am now; therefore I shall certainly know you there." That seems to be clear enough. We read in the New Testament, "They shall sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven;" not sit down with three unknown individuals in iron masks, or three impersonalities who make a part of the great pan, nor three spirits who are as exactly alike as pins made in a factory; but Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. That is clear enough in the text.

That glorious life, while it is a personal and a known life, is also free from all sorrow, and misery, and earthly grossness. They are neither married nor given in marriage, neither shall they die any more; but they are as the angels of God. It is a life of perfect blessedness, a life of hallowed worship, a life of undivided glory. Oh that we were in it! Oh that we may soon reach it! Let us think of the many who are enjoying it now, and of those who have attained to it during the last few days. I am sure they are at home in every golden street, and fully engaged in the adoration and worship of their Lord. Those saints who have been in glory now these thousands of years cannot be more blest than the latest arrivals. Within a very short space you and I shall be among the shining ones. Some of us may spend our next Sabbath with the angels. Let us rejoice and be glad at the bare thought of it.

INFERENCES.

And now, taking the whole subject together, I want to say a few familiar things about the influence which all this ought to have upon us.

Concerning those that have gone before us, we gather from this whole text that they are not lost. We know where they are. Neither have they lost anything, for they are what they were, and more. I know your sorrows make an excursion to the grave, to look there for the deceased ones. You want to lift that coffin-lid, and to unwrap the shroud. Oh, do not do so, do not do so! He is not here; the real man has gone. He may be dead to you for awhile, but he lives unto God. Yes, the dead one liveth, he liveth unto God. Draw not the beloved bodies to the cemetery with dreary pomp, and with black horses; but cover the coffin with sweet flowers, and drape the horses with emblems of hope. It is the better birthday of the saint, yea, his truer wedding-day. Is it sad to have done with sadness? Is it sorrowful to part with sorrow?

STILL ALLIES.

I want you also to recollect that the departed have not become members of another race; they have not been transferred into another family; they are still men, still women, still of our kindred dear; their names are in the same family register on earth and in heaven. Oh, no, no! do not dream that they are separated and exiled; they have gone to the home country: we are the exiles; they it is who are at home. We are en route for the fatherland; they are not so far from us as we think. And they are not gone over to the other side in the battle. Oh, do not speak of them as dead and lying on the battle-field; they live, they live in sympathy with our divine conflict. They have marched through the enemy's country; they have fought their fight, and taken possession of their inheritance. They are still on our side, though we miss them from the daily service. Our sacramental host marches onward to the New Jerusalem. Certain of the legionaries have forded the dividing flood. I see them ascending the other side! The much-dreaded stream lies a little before us; it is but a silver streak. We are to the margin come. We shudder not at the prospect. We follow the blessed footsteps of our Lord and His redeemed. We are all one army still; we are not losing our men; they are simply ascending from the long campaign to take their endless rewards at the Lord's right hand.

What then? Why, then, we will take up their work. If they have gone into the upper chamber to rest we will make up their lack of service in this lower room. The work they did was so human that we will not allow a stitch to drop, but take it up where they left it, and persevere in earnest. They are in glory, but they were not glorified when they were here. The work they did was done by men of such infirmities as ours; so let us not fear to go on where they left off, and perpetuate the work which they rejoiced in. There lies the plough in the furrow, and the oxen are standing still, for Shamgar, the champion, is gone. Will no one lay hold of the plough-handles? Will nobody urge the oxen with the goad? Young men, are you idling? Here is work for you. Are you hiding yourselves? Come forward, I pray you, in the name of the great Husbandman, and let the fields be tilled and sown with the good seed. Who will fill the gap made by death? Who will be baptized for the dead? Who will bear the banner now that a standard-bearer has fallen? I hope some consecrated voice will answer, "Here am I; send me."

For, last of all, brethren, we may expect the same succors as they received who have gone before. Wherefore take courage, men and brethren! This God is your God. As you shall rise from among the dead, because the Lord Jesus hath redeemed you from among men, so stand up from among the dead and corrupt mass of this world, and be alive unto God, through Jesus Christ your Lord. What manner of people ought ye to be who serve the living God? Since the living God hath manifested Himself so wonderfully to you, ought you not to live unto Him to the utmost? God bless you for Jesus' sake. Amen.

MISSION WORK IN CHINA.

MR. ARTHUR EASON, of the China Inland Mission, writing from Yun-Nan Fu, says: "The Lord has lately given us encouragement in our work here. We have had the joy of receiving four persons into Christian fellowship. One is the widow of a military official. We became acquainted with her last year, and from the first she seemed especially enlightened by the Spirit of God, and readily received the Gospel. She had been an ardent worshipper of Buddha. Just before the Chinese new year she asked for baptism, but wishing to test her sincerity, we deferred her. Some time after we heard that at the new year she had conformed to the idolatrous customs of that season; this caused us much grief, but after a few days Mrs. Eason took occasion to speak to her about what we had heard, when she explained that she had not the power to put away the idols at home; that since she had heard the Gospel she had not dared to worship them again; but that her only son, who is thirty years of age, was not decided about the Gospel, and at the new year worshipped them through fear of his relations and friends. She herself had not had any part in the matter. We had other evidence that what she said was true, so as she further said she truly believed in the Lord Jesus, and still desired to be baptized, we felt we could not reasonably refuse.

"Lao-ch'iao is our cook; he came to us a year ago, and for some time we have been very pleased with his change of temper and manner. We felt sure that the Lord was working in his heart. He did not ask for baptism till he saw others applying; but we did not feel it would be right to defer him.

"The third is a teacher, who some years ago taught a Roman Catholic priest; he first came to us a year ago, when I gave him two tracts. Last February he again visited us, and continued to come regularly to the services. A short time ago we took him with us on a boat journey, as we wished to become more acquainted with him.

"He had a good knowledge of the truth, but we were somewhat afraid he was not real, having been connected with the Romanists. When we returned he asked for baptism; I deferred him for a time, and one afternoon I had a long interview with him, and explained to him forgiveness of sins and present peace with God: he prayed, confessing his sins in such a manner as I have seldom heard a Chinaman do. Since then we have seen nothing in him to alter the opinion we then formed that he was sincere. He said to me since, when speaking of his repentance, 'I am now getting old: it is time for me to think of eternal things.' He formerly earned his living by fortune-telling, but has now entirely renounced it all. He is widely known in this city; he lately received an invitation to go to Tong-ching as official fortune-teller to one of the Chinese commanders there.

"Mr. Lu is the next one we received; he is an ex-official. He seems to have a very straightforward and sincere disposition; there is none of the overbearing manner so often connected with his class. He attended some of the first meetings we had in the autumn, and at the close of one meeting, when the power of the Lord seemed especially present, he asked for some books. Since then he has come frequently; but about the time of the new year he absented himself, the fact being he was afraid that by his connection with us his name would be injured, and that he would lose all opportunity of again getting into office. However, he has recently come again, and others testify that he has given up his opium-smoking.

THE PHILANTHROPIC EARL.

REFERENCE was made in the biographical sketch of the late Earl of Shaftesbury, published in these columns on October 15th, to a donkey presented to him by the costermongers, or street-venders, of London. On this page is a picture of the beast as he appeared when being photographed at the Earl's residence, St. Giles' House, Cranbourne, England. The other two figures in the group represent the Earl and his daughter, Lady Ashley.

A curious coincidence is worthy of notice. In a valuable history of the English peerage it is recorded that of an ancestor of the Earl in the days of the Plantagenets made himself famous by introducing cabbages into the country from Holland. The vegetable was previously unknown in England. Thus the Earl had an hereditary as well as a personal claim on the gratitude of the costermongers.

The illustration on the left of the page represents another feature of the Earl's philanthropic work. He purchased a number of trucks, one of which any deserving man could hire by the day for a nominal sum, and so earn his living when times were bad in selling vegetables from house to house. The picture at the foot of the page represents the Earl's country house in Dorsetshire.

NEAR the close of the year 1873 there was general political excitement in England about the elections to Parliament, which were then near at hand. Country gentlemen were making friends with their neighbors and conciliating every one who had a vote. One of these magnates was Squire Gifford, who resided near Wolverhampton, a dirty town in the Midland districts. He was made Chairman of the Conservative Electoral Committee.

One Thursday evening, as the squire's carriage was being dragged from under the shed in the yard of "the Angel," the hotel which was the Tory headquarters, and the hostlers were bringing the horses out to attach to it, Mr. Gifford came to the top of the stairs and called his stalwart coachman, whom he saw standing in the quadrangle below. The gorgeous creature, who filled the popular conception of a squire much better than the slight gentleman only five feet in height who was really Squire Gifford, touched his hat in response. "I am not going home at present, James," Mr. Gifford said. "Have the carriage put back again, and give the horses a feed. Come to the Assembly Rooms at half past ten, and wait for me at the Queen Street door."

James gave the requisite orders, and then consulted with Robert, the footman, how they should spend the evening. They had no votes, and did not care to attend the political meeting, at which the squire was to speak, in introducing the candidates for Parliamentary honors. It was decided to take a stroll round the town, and accordingly they set out.

Passing along one of the narrow streets, they heard in a little mission chapel the sound of singing, and James proposed that they go in. Robert demurred, but James had an ear for music, and persisted. "There's something lively going on, you may depend," he said. "We can come out again if it don't suit us." If the building had been a church James would never have proposed going in, or if he had known it was a religious service that was being conducted, he could not have been induced to enter; for he boasted that he had never been inside a church since he was a boy, and never meant to go.

The singing had ceased by this time, but perhaps it would begin again, so the two men entered. It was a low, poor-looking building. The tall coachman's head was not far from the ceiling. On a raised platform at the other end a minister stood with an open book in his hand, and just as the two men walked inside he announced his text. Robert turned to go back, but James was arrested by the preacher's text, announced in a sonorous tone of inquiry: "Jesus I know, and Paul I know; but who are ye?" (Acts 19: 15). James, unaccustomed to religious services, supposed that the inquiry was addressed to himself and his companion, especially as they were dressed in so conspicuous a style as to present a striking contrast to the other people there, and might be supposed to arouse some curiosity. There was nothing to be ashamed of in his occupation, and in a loud voice James responded, "I'm coachman to Squire Gifford, and this—". He did not get any further. A push from Robert and a whispered "Shut up, he ain't asking you," silenced him, and every face in the building was turned round to see who it was that was interrupting the service.

James saw that he had committed himself, and in his confusion he was glad to accept a seat offered him and hide his face from the curious gaze of the people. But for his blunder he would have beat a retreat; but if he had done so then the minister and the congregation would surely think he had come in purposely to disturb the meeting; so he remained quietly, while Robert sat a few feet away from him on another bench.

The preacher was happily a speaker of some tact and readiness. He realized immediately that he had before him at least one man to whom an opportunity of hearing the Gospel was rare. He sketched powerfully the condition of those who were not identified with Christ. He showed how the devils reign unchecked in the hearts of men, impudently usurping control and working ruin in this world and the next, yet dreading all the time the Being before whom they must yield. They knew Jesus; His name was a terror to them; but that name was to their victims the sweet sound of hope, proclaiming emancipation and deliverance from the worst of tyrants. He spoke of the power of Christ, of the readiness with which He comes to reign in the hearts that are opened to Him, and the happiness and peace that His way produces.

James forgot his confusion and his blunder, and listened intently. At the conclusion of the sermon he thought it would be only right and polite to speak to the preacher and apologize for his rudeness, and he did so. It was an opportunity of which the good minister was not slow to avail himself. The big coachman was touched by the evident interest manifested in his welfare and when he left the building it was with a promise to come again. The final issue of the adventure we do not know; but it is stated that the coachman became a regular attendant at the

The Coachman Startles a Congregation.

There was a perceptible fall in the social thermometer, which might be necessary, but was not pleasant.

Standing apart, leaning over the ship's side, looking dreamily at the lights of the city, stood Frank Arnold. He was thinking in a vague, desultory way of the life on which he would enter to-morrow. That great city, with its teeming thousands, that lay before him, held his destiny, and he idly wondered what would be its character. He could hear a group behind him discussing the varied points familiarly, and debating which of the lights shone from this or that prominent building known to them, but unknown to him. The variegated lights moving in and out among the white jets, he heard, were the street-cars, and the people in his rear were naming the different lines by their colors. To him it was all strange, and, unlike most young emigrants, he had a strange shrinking from becoming familiar with it. Even the vessel seemed a home compared with that big, strange city in which he did not know a soul. Several men on board had been friendly, and had described the city to him, but none of them approached him to-night, and one or two to whom he had spoken as the anchor was dropped, answered him curtly, and with some formality. So he stood alone, looking dreamily on his future home.

little mission chapel, and that fact gives ground to hope that a permanent blessing would follow.

THE SILVER LINING.

Under New Skies.

THREE weeks after the events recorded in our last chapter, a large steamer was anchored in the bay of New York. She arrived after sun-down, and it was impossible for her to go to her pier that night. There was considerable grumbling in the saloon at the delay. Passengers returning to their homes in America seemed to feel the few hours of absence from their families more than so many days at another time. The hours had been passed very pleasantly on the voyage according to the varied tastes of the travellers. The young people chatted and flirted; the older ones read novels or listened to the music in the saloon.

There was little inclination for sleep anywhere on board that night as the vessel dropped anchor in the bay. Groups were separating into their landward relations. Acquaintanceships, pleasant for the voyage, but which were not to continue on land, were breaking up. Wealthy and aristocratic voyagers, who, a few nights ago, chatted amicably with their fellow-passengers, withdrew from a too familiar intercourse, and put a little stiffness into their bearing. The groups were chiefly of families, or of members of the same class. The buyers from the dry-goods houses were the only occupants of the smoking-room. The banker and the two merchants who usually joined the party were sitting with their wives to-night talking of family matters, oblivious of their temporary association with the buyers.

In the busy city before him he was come to take a place, and fight for fame and fortune, or, failing these, for a bare livelihood. Utterly unknown he had to win a position, to make friends, and to gain the confidence of the public. Now that he was face to face with the ordeal, he quailed. Yet it was his deliberate choice. His father and mother pleaded with him to remain with them; even in London he had friends who would have formed the nucleus of a practice, but he had resolved to seek a scene entirely new, where no one knew of his bitter disappointment, and the mistake of his marriage. On the other side of the Atlantic that seemed a strong inducement, but here Frank felt that he would have been very glad if he knew that some friendly hand would be stretched out to grasp his as he stepped ashore, even if it were that of a well-meaning blunderer who might offer him condolence—the one thing he abhorred. He wanted to be among utter strangers; he had told himself repeatedly that it would be best so, but now he stood shivering at the prospect as one who stands on the edge of an icy stream into which he must plunge.

He must have stood there half an hour when a hand was gently laid upon his arm, and a timid voice said: "Frank, dear, I have been looking for you everywhere. I wondered what had become of you. Why did you not come into the saloon?"

"Oh, I was feeling moody, Clare," he said, "I was not enjoying the music. You seemed to be cheerful and happy, and I thought you would not miss me."

There was a shade of resentment in his tone, as if he blamed his wife for being out of sympathy with him. Yet he knew that he wanted to be alone, and had stolen away when she was occupied at the piano, and was little likely to notice his departure. The beautiful, accomplished young wife had won the admiration of the young men on board, who, even on this last night of the voyage, when there was general frigidity, continued to pay her homage. The future sat lightly upon her mind. Frank would decide everything, and he was brilliant and talented, and would soon win his way into society. Clare left all that to him, and her only feeling about the brilliantly lighted city before them was one of curiosity and fascination. "You did not object to my playing, did you, dear?" she asked, timidly.

"Not at all; not at all," said Frank. "So long as you were enjoying yourself, I was content; but I was glad to be out of hearing. The airs did not harmonize with my feeling. This is a serious business, the beginning of a new life in a strange land, and one does not enter upon it as one might go into a ball-room. I shall be glad to listen to the merry jingle by and by, but to-night, if I have music at all, my thoughts would find a better accompaniment in a solemn march. But you need not have left your friends on my account, I am not a very brilliant companion for you just now."

"You would prefer to be alone, perhaps?" Clare asked.

"Yes, I think so, to-night. I should be sorry to depress your spirits, and I fear my society would have that tendency."

A glance of love and sympathy lighted up Clare's face for a moment, and then she turned and left her husband to his meditations. Perhaps they might have been less gloomy if Clare had stayed by his side, as she would have done had he invited her to do so. There was enough affection in her parting look to show that her heart was very warm toward him, but she feared to offend him by resisting his wishes, and was, besides, distrustful of her own power to cheer him when he sank, as he often did, into these fits of dejection. He treated her very much as a child. When he was in his bright moods he exerted himself to interest and amuse her, and was evidently proud of her beauty and accomplishments. She could not complain of any lack of tenderness in his manner, and he continued to pay her the attention and deference that had characterized him in the days of their courtship. It was true he did not consult with her, or take her into his confidence, but Clare supposed that men were accustomed to act independently of their wives in the graver matters of life. There was nothing in her school experience, or in the life she had lived under her guardian's roof, to enlighten her on the subject. It was very nice to have a strong man's arm to lean upon through life, and to have no cause to worry herself with problems that he could solve better than she.

But it was an unpropitious commencement to married life. Frank lost the benefit of a woman's intuition, which is often more valuable than a man's vigorous reasoning, and Clare lost the elevating influence which comes to a woman who is conscious that she is her husband's confidante and adviser and consoler in all the vicissitudes of his life. There was, besides, in Clare's case, a source of danger in this feeling that her husband regarded her as inferior in intellect to himself. Was she incapable of understanding and advising him? Perhaps so. But if she was so silly and frivolous, how was it that other men listened to her conversation with interest, and flattered her by the respect which they showed to her opinions? It was a dangerous path that both were treading, though neither of them thought of the peril that night or for many days afterward.

Frank Arnold did not retire all night. The thought of that stifling cabin disgusted him. Once, he went below, but the close smells oppressed him as he came out of the pure, balmy air that he breathed on deck, and he returned to his post without delay. Clare was sleeping peacefully as a child; her beautiful golden hair half covering her pillow, and her long, dark eyelashes showing clear over the delicate cheek. One hand—the one that had on it her wedding-ring, lay outside the coverlet, small and white and of exquisite shape. She was very beautiful, and Frank thought so, as he looked at her for a moment, but somehow to-night he did not exult in his marriage, but rather pitied himself, and regretted that he had voluntarily assumed a responsibility which had caused his expatriation. He returned to the deck, lighted a cigar, and stood gloomily looking down into the water on which the moon cast her silvery light.

Early morning brought all the hurry and bustle of arrival at the pier. Frank watched the excitement; the signals of recognition waved from the party on the dock to one or another among the passengers on the vessel brought his own sense of loneliness upon him again with increased weight, and he hurried below to forget that he, almost alone among the hundreds of men and women on board, would receive no welcome. Clare was dressing as he entered the cabin, and she looked so bright and fresh after her night's rest, and her eyes so shone with delighted anticipation of new sights and scenes after the ten days of monotony, that her husband, weary and gloomy as he was, caught something of her exhilaration, and proceeded with alacrity to renovate his outer man before presenting himself at the breakfast-table for his last meal on board.

A few hours later the young couple had passed the ordeal of the Custom House examination, and were being driven through the noisy streets to an hotel. It was not necessary that serious business should be commenced immediately. Frank had determined to make his home in the Empire City, and to give at least a week to an examination of its characteristics. Now that he had entered upon the scene of his future labors, he lost the shrinking from it which had oppressed him while he viewed it from the bay on the night before. He shared in his wife's interest and curiosity, and was as eager as she was to set out on a tour of exploration.

He soon found that New York was not afflicted with a dearth of members of his profession. If a plague were devastating the city, it seemed that there were enough physicians to give every inhabitant his full share of medical attention. There seemed no place awaiting a new and unknown practitioner. But he was no longer depressed. The busy streets, the invigorating air, the contact with active, energetic life kindled his own energies, and raised his spirits. A week's exploration, and a few inquiries as to eligible locations decided him, and in a short time a modest shingle appeared on the first floor of a French-flat house, announcing that Frank Arnold, M.D., had his office there.

Of course the young physician anticipated a time of weary waiting for employment. A little money remained in his hands which, with care and economy, would suffice to support himself and his wife for some months. There was no need for worry about the finances at present, and by and by patients might be expected. He kept his office hours conscientiously, devoting himself to study, and pursuing a course of experiments which he had commenced in his student days before his marriage. In the intervals of office hours, Clare was ready to accompany him in his walks, and in those days they made excursions which were pleasant to him, and to Clare were a source of unfeigned delight. She took a childish pleasure in planning the routes, and in learning the intricacies of the horse-car system, so as to serve as a guide to her husband in their trips. Frank's fits of gloomy despondency were rare now, and when they came they yielded readily to her merriment and playful raillery.

But the months passed and patients did not come. The little hoard of money was dwindling down to a frightfully small sum, and there was no sign that it would be replenished. Only once since his landing had Dr. Arnold's services been in requisition. A case of sudden illness in a flat above the one he occupied had occurred, and the young physician had been hastily summoned. The patient was an old gentleman—a nervous hypochondriac who had his own physician, and dismissed the young practitioner when the emergency had passed. No other patients seemed disposed to avail themselves of Frank's skill, though he sat persistently in his office, and waited wearily and anxiously for a summons.

Clare did not know how near the finances were to collapse. She took a pride in obeying her husband's injunction to economize, and, though inexperienced in household management, succeeded beyond her own expectations. But the money did steadily dwindle in spite of all her efforts, for the rent must be paid, and no skill or care could achieve the triumph of keeping the table supplied without some expenditure. She read the signs of anxiety on Frank's brow, and though she did not know how near the crisis was, she divined that it was impending.

"There is no walk for us to-day," said Frank, one morning, as he rose from the breakfast-table, and went to the window from which a dreary scene of descending rain and flooded gutters presented itself to his view. "It is like a deluge. I pity any one who has to trudge around in such a storm, though it would be very convenient for us in some respects if I had a dozen patients to visit."

"I hope it will clear presently," said Clare, coming to his side, and shuddering at the pouring torrent. "I must go out to make some purchases, or we shall be reduced to a dinner of herbs. I shall need a little money, Frank."

Her husband went to his desk and produced a five-dollar bill, looking ruefully as he did so at the four slips of like value which constituted his entire capital. "Make it go as far as you can, Clare," he said, wistfully; "they are getting very scarce, and there seems little prospect of the stock being replenished."

"Yes, you may depend upon me, dear. I am getting quite expert in household catering. I wonder that I have not been complimented on my skill and economy. I praise myself continually; it would be pleasant to find some one else of my opinion. Confess now that I have succeeded better than you expected. Have I not, Frank?"

"I think you have done marvels; but you must not have your little head turned by flattery. You must go on improving, so as to be ready for the time when you will have to keep house without any money at all. That will be the supreme trial of your abilities."

"I shall resign if I am overtaxed," said Clare, laughing merrily.

The storm ceased presently, but the sky was heavily overcast, threatening an early renewal of its violence. Clare seized the opportunity for her visit to the store at which she made her purchases. It was some six blocks from their home, and she had selected it because being in a poorer neighborhood, the prices were below those in the more showy stores nearer at hand. She tripped lightly over the wet sidewalk, hastening lest the rain should re-commence before her return. But she was not quite quick enough, for as she emerged from the store, large, heavy drops of rain fell, and before she had walked one block it fell in a torrent. Holding her umbrella firmly to keep it from being blown out of her hand, as a sudden gust sent the rain in her face as she was crossing the avenue, when she saw a carriage rapidly turn the corner crossing her path. The gentleman who was driving, saw her at the same moment, and pulled his horses up with a force that brought them almost on to her haunches. Clare sprang aside, but the wet crossing was slippery, and she fell to the ground. The driver of the carriage was promptly at her side, holding the bridle of the near horse with one hand, while with the other he assisted her to her feet. "But it was a failure."

"I cannot stand," said Clare, blushing deeply, partly from pain and partly from confusion. "I think I must have sprained my ankle."

The gentleman was profuse in his regrets, and two passers-by coming to his assistance, he insisted on Clare being lifted into his carriage that he might drive her to her home.

KING JOASH was succeeded by his son Jeroboam II., the fourth of the line of Jehu. Zachariah, his son, was the last of Jehu's dynasty who sat on the throne of Israel, and thus God's word to Jehu was fulfilled: "Because thou hast done well in executing that which is right in mine eyes, and hast done unto the house of Ahab all that was in mine heart, thy children of the fourth generation shall sit on the throne of Israel" (11 Kings 10: 30). It was in the days of Jeroboam II. that Jonah prophesied; he foretold that Jeroboam should restore "the coast of Israel from the entering of Hamath unto the sea of the plain" (11 Kings 14: 25); and so it came to pass that Jonah was a prophet of good tidings, and consequently he was a popular man; his prophecy was fulfilled, and thus his reputation was established.

But God had in view

THE EDUCATION OF HIS CHILD.

His position was one of danger and temptation. Men in those days, as in these, were too wont to look to the instrument which God might use rather than to God Himself, and thus Jonah ran the risk of getting full of self. God had work to be done which would tend to the humbling, rather than the exaltation, of the prophet: "Now the word of the Lord came unto Jonah the son of Amittai, saying, Arise, go to Nineveh, that great city, and cry against it; for thy wickedness is come up before me." What, be a messenger of evil tidings? Why, his reputation far and wide was as a prophet of good and not of evil; how could he give this message? It would give the lie to all he had been wont to teach; it would be so contrary to himself; he could not bring himself to do it. And then, again, God was a merciful God; it was more than probable that even if he did bring himself to deliver the message the people of Nineveh would repent, God would have mercy, and then Jonah would lose his reputation as a prophet; men would say, "He is not reliable; sometimes his words come to pass, and sometimes not." Jonah could not face such a prospect; he was somebody now, and he saw before him in perspective the renowned Jonah a nobody! How could he face the sneers of those who had been jealous of his popularity? How could he see himself fall in the eyes of those who applauded him and hung upon his lips? Why, his very usefulness would cease; it could not be right to run such a risk. No, such a sacrifice was impossible; Jonah would not offer it. And yet, did not God know all which was involved in it? Surely yes; God saw how large was self in Jonah, and the Lord was dealing it a death-blow. He could never endanger His own work by His dealings with His chosen instruments. Jonah was true to God as a man of faith, but the fulness of his self-life tainted all his testimony; and while God had loving designs toward the men of Nineveh, he was about to make things work together for the good of Jonah at the same time.

It often happens in our Christian work that God calls us to a distinct course; we know it is the call of God, but the consequences involved seem to be such that we dare not venture; we act in disobedience and lose a blessing. God is responsible for the consequences of all which He commands; where He really leads we need not fear to follow. John the Baptist preached only repentance and the law when he first began, but he was not afraid of being called a turncoat when he had a different message: "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world" (John 1: 29).

Jonah took matters into his own hands; he "rose up to flee unto Tarshish from the presence of the Lord." It was quite in the contrary direction; Nineveh lay east and Tarshish west.

"He found a ship going to Tarshish: so he paid the fare thereof (the first passenger ship we hear of), and went down into it, to go with them unto Tarshish."

FROM THE PRESENCE OF THE LORD.

It is a strange thing for a man of God to run away from Him; it is could understand it in a sinner. Yet so it is that every child of God who is not at this moment resting all his burdens, perplexities, trials, cares, pains, etc., on the Lord, is in some measure or in some particular fleeing from His presence. "In Thy presence is fulness of joy" (Ps. 16: 11). No man of God can be at ease out of His presence. What was to be done? Should God ignore the disobedience of Jonah? "The Lord sent out a great wind into the sea, and there was a mighty tempest in the sea, so that the ship was like to be broken." There are many men in our day who speak of natural law as though the God who made it were inferior to His own law; "He commandeth and raiseth up the stormy wind which lifteth up the waves." The elements are made to subserve God's purposes in the education of His children.

The heathen mariners were afraid, and, knowing nothing better, they "cried every man unto his God;" but so little was their expectation of any favorable result from their prayers that they "cast forth the wares that were in the ship into the sea, to lighten it of them." Jonah all this time was fast asleep. He had no fears about his own safety; he does not seem to have been much troubled by sea-sickness; but the worst of all was that he was not troubled by the danger of the poor sailors, who were the innocent sufferers for his sin against God. The captain came and woke him, saying, "What meanest thou, O sleeper? arise, and call upon thy God, if so be that God will think upon us, that we perish not." It argues ill for Jonah that the men of the ship did not yet know that he was a man of God. The crew, heathen though they were, had some conscience; they neither attributed the storm to chance, nor yet to natural law; they believed in an overruling power to which they were accountable, and cast lots that they might discover for whose sake this storm had come upon them. God was overruling, and He caused that the lot should fall upon Jonah.

Then it was time to question him; so Jonah had to pass through an examination as to his occupation, his name, country, etc. Jonah hid nothing. He told out plainly who he was, and that he was a servant of Jehovah, who made both the sea and the dry land, and also that he was now fleeing from the presence of the Lord. Then the ship's crew were exceedingly afraid; they said that it was true, and that they had not to deal alone with a man, but with who made His presence felt. One who would not suffer disobedience in one of His servants, and who had sea and land at His command, and who manifested His power tangibly, and in a way they could not but feel. "Why hast thou done this?" was their natural query. Jonah did not satisfy their curiosity; he would have been ashamed to acknowledge the real truth, that he cared more for his popularity than he did for the lost souls in Nineveh. The sailors asked him, "What shall we do unto thee, that the sea may be calm unto us?" for the storm was only raging more and more terribly. Jonah was not in fear for his life, and mean and selfish as he was, he knew that God loved him; so he said, "Take me up, and cast me forth into the sea; so shall the sea be calm unto you; for I know that for my sake this great tempest is upon you." It was a difficult position for these heathen seamen. If Jonah's God were indeed the true God, would He not be angry if His servant were cast into the sea? They sought by every means in their power to avoid doing this thing; they rowed hard to bring the ship to land, but God was against them, and she made no headway. Then they cried unto the Lord; it was their first prayer to the true God, and only the unusual pressure of the circumstances would have led them to do it. They said, "We beseech thee, O Lord, we beseech thee, let us not perish for this man's life, and lay not upon us innocent blood: for thou, O Lord, hast done as it pleased thee." At first sight it might seem unjust that these poor sailor men should suffer for the sake of a rebellious child of God like Jonah; but we see by this very prayer of theirs that God was making this trial of the storm serve to bring them in contact with Him; and so

THE CURSE WAS TURNED INTO A BLESSING.

Our hearts may be crushed and sickened when we hear tales of fearful oppression, but we do not know all the sequel; God "executeth righteousness and judgment for all that are oppressed" (Ps. 103: 6). When the secrets of all hearts are made known we shall see how fully our God has kept His character in this.

It was as Jonah had said: "They took up Jonah, and cast him forth into the sea; and the sea ceased from her raging. Then the men feared the Lord exceedingly, and offered a sacrifice unto the Lord, and made vows." In all probability the whole of the ship's crew was converted to God. Thus Jonah was, in spite of himself, made an instrument of blessing. He sought to evade the humbling which lay in his direct path, but surely he must have been overcome with shame when it appeared to the heathen sailors that he, the only man on board who knew the true God, and who had experience of answered prayer, should have been the only one who did not pray in this time of danger. According to human expectation, we should think to hear no more of Jonah; but the Lord was going to make him a chosen type of the resurrection of Jesus Christ (Matt. 12: 40), and therefore He preserved his life in an altogether miraculous manner. "The Lord had prepared a great fish to swallow up Jonah. And Jonah was in the belly of the fish three days and three nights." God, who first breathed into man's nostrils the breath of life, knew how to preserve His servant's life in circumstances impossible to nature, just as He threw down the walls of Jericho, just as He divided the Red Sea, and did His other wondrous works. And more. He made it possible to Jonah in his strange shelter to hold communion with Him. Jonah calls it "the belly of hell," or the grave; yet thence he cried to God and testified, "Thou hearest me."

No circumstances could happen in which God could not hear the cry of one of His children. Jonah said, "I am cast out of thy sight; yet I will look again toward thy holy temple;" it was the backslider's return. And then, after describing the place of his living burial, he speaks of his safety as though it was a present fact: "Yet hast thou brought up my life from corruption, O Lord my God." Jonah was a man of faith, and instead of continuing to cry to the Lord for life and safety he said: "I will sacrifice unto thee with the voice of thanksgiving; I will pay that I have vowed. Salvation is of the Lord." It was enough; Jonah was conquered. The Lord spake unto the fish, and it vomited out Jonah upon the dry land.

MRS. SEWELL, the Christian Poetess—Illustrations of Her Street Ballads.

THE LATE MRS. SEWELL, The Christian Poetess.

The lady whose portrait appears on the first page of the CHRISTIAN HERALD this week, won for herself a very warm regard in the hearts of the public by her touching and pathetic ballads. Poverty and hardship moved her soul, as the woes of Lady Vere de Vere could not do. Unsympathetic people might pass the little flower-seller, or the poor street-sweeper, and think of them, if they thought at all, as only dirty, low people, with whom they had nothing in common; to Mrs. Sewell they were her brothers and sisters, with hearts to feel and with sorrows as hard to bear as those of their better-clad neighbors. He who was the Friend of publicans and sinners was her Master, and His example prompted her to have regard to the neglected poor. Her hand was always ready to relieve them, and her days were spent in busy helpfulness, but she did more. She aroused a sympathy for them in the hearts of others. Many a Christian who read "Mother's Last Words" and "Our Father's Care," was stimulated to philanthropic work. They were reminded that they had neglected their Lord's injunction to regard the poor as His representatives on earth, and they set about their long-forgotten duty. Thus her words were seeds which have borne glorious fruit. The lot of the indigent seemed no longer the repulsive thing to the readers of the ballads that it once did. The charm of poetry had raised it to the rank of a tragedy—a tragedy which was being enacted within reach of their hands, and which they might ameliorate. Mrs. Sewell was the advocate of the outcasts, and though her clients could never repay her for the benefits that came to them in response to her appeals, she will be recompensed at the resurrection of the just.

Mrs. Sewell's life was a comparatively uneventful one. She never sought prominence. Her one object was to help those whose woes had entered into her heart, and in that she was successful. She was born in 1797, in the English county of Norfolk. Her family belonged to the Society of Friends, and among them the young Quakeress learned the practical lessons of the Christian life, which are better observed in that communion than in any other. Of her childhood and youth there is little to be said, save that she seemed anxious from her earliest years to lead a life of Christlikeness, and was continually studying to make the Saviour's life upon earth the pattern of her own.

In her twenty-third year she became the wife of Mr. Isaac Sewell, who shortly after his marriage removed to London. There the young Christian couple resided for sixteen years. It was a strange scene for the quiet young Quakeress—that hive of industry, with its dens of squalor, misery, and vice side by side with the palaces of aristocrats and millionaires. There was a field for her early aspirations. On every hand were the ignorant who knew nothing of Christ, the suffering who did not know of Him who heals our sicknesses, the poor to whom the Gospel had not been preached, and those whom Satan had bound with the chains of vicious habit—captives who had not been told of the deliverance worked for them. During those sixteen years she never ceased to work for Christ among the narrow streets and alleys, and it was during that time that she gathered the facts which she afterward immortalized in verse. Many earnest laborers among the Quakers were enlisted in the same work by her earnest appeals, and much good was effected directly and indirectly through her efforts. She was anxious to stir up the whole Church of Christ, in all its sections, to the duty, but it was not until after she had left London and a period of enforced retirement came to her, that the way was opened.

In 1835 Mr. Sewell removed to Brighton, and during the following twenty years the family changed its residence several times. It was in November, 1860, while Mrs. Sewell was residing at Bath, that the Christian world was startled by the appearance of her poem, "Mother's Last Words." It arrested attention everywhere, and was eagerly bought. More than a million copies of it were issued and sold before the demand was satisfied, and it gave an impetus to philanthropic work that has not yet been exhausted. Books and tracts and other poems followed, and the now aged lady found to her great joy and thankfulness that in her old age she was doing more for the cause she loved than in her youth. Her only daughter, too, aided her in her efforts, and Miss Anna Sewell, the authoress of "Black Beauty" and other works, was soon almost as well known as her mother. Mrs. Sewell during her later years separated from the Society of Friends. All people who loved the Lord Jesus Christ were her brethren and sisters, and she found no difficulty in identifying herself with other churches. Doctrines and denominational differences were trivial in her eyes, beside the great mission of Christ's people of proclaiming the Gospel to the poor and helping them bear the crushing burdens of their life. The Church that was doing that best was her ideal church, and with that she became one. At one time she was a member of the Congregational Church, and at another she attended the ministry of a Protestant Episcopal clergyman.

She died in March of last year, at the advanced age of eighty-seven, having lived a life of active service and beneficent effort. Of her more appropriately than of many it may be said, "she being dead yet speaketh." The style and spirit of her work may be inferred from the following extracts, which are illustrated on

THE FRONTISPIECE PICTURE.

The first panel represents a dying mother taking a touching farewell of her two fatherless boys. This, and the pictures numbered 2, 3, and 4 respectively, are pictorial representations of scenes described in "Mother's Last Words," from which we give explanatory extracts. We are introduced to a narrow London court, on a foggy day, and to "a low, damp chamber," "down seven steep and broken stairs, underground," and

"A glimmering light was burning there
Beside a woman on a bed;
A worn-out woman, ghastly pale,
Departing to the peaceful dead.

Two little boys in threadbare clothes
Stood white and trembling by her side,
And, listening to his mother's words,
The youngest of them sadly cried.

The elder boy shed not a tear,
Nor stirred a moment from his place,
But with a corner of the sheet
He wiped his mother's cold, damp face.

'Ah, John!' she said, 'my own dear boy,
You'll soon be in this world alone;
But you must do the best you can,
And be good children when I'm gone.'

* * * * *
The woman ceased and closed her eyes,
And long she lay, as if at rest,
Then opened wide her feeble arms,
And clasped her children to her breast.

And then aloft her hands she raised,
And heavenward gazed with beaming eyes:
'I see, I see the Angel come,
I see him coming from the skies.

Good-by—good-by, my children dear,
My happy soul is caught away;
I hear, I hear my Saviour call,
He calls me up, I cannot stay.'

Then soared her soul from that dark room,
Above the crowd of toiling folk,

And higher, higher, up she went,
Until she saw the golden gate,
Where night and day, in shining bands,
The holy angels watch and wait.

And she went in and saw the King,
And heard the gracious words He spoke

To her, who in this sinful world
Had meekly borne her daily yoke."

After their mother's death the two boys received a sixpence from the landlord of the cell apartment, and with this, their only capital they determined to carry out the dead woman's instructions to them to "earn their living honestly."

"They thanked the man and left the house—
'I'll tell you what we'll do,' said John.
'This sixpence here will buy a broom;
We'll sweep a crossing of our own.'

Away they went with anxious hopes,
And long they hunted, here and there,
Until they found a dirty place
Not very far from Leicester Square.

And here at once they took their stand,
And swept a pathway broad and neat
Where ladies, in their silken gowns,
Might cross, and hardly soil their feet.

At last the streets began to clear,
And people dropped off, one by one.
'Let's go,' said little Christopher;
'My pocket is quite heavy, John.'

They counted up their pence with glee
And went away to buy some bread,
And had a little left to pay
For lodging in a decent bed.

Next day John kept his crossing clean,
Swept off the mud, and left it dry,
And little Christy held his cap,
But did not tease the passers-by.

And many a one a penny gave
Who marked the pale child's modest way
And thus they'd sixpence left in hand
When they went home on Saturday.

* * * * *
'Let's go to church,' said Christopher;
'She'd be so glad to see us there.
You recollect she often said,
'Boys, don't neglect the house of prayer.'

'We're very shabby,' John replied,
'And hardly fit for such a place;
But I will do the best I can
To polish up my hands and face.'

Clear rung the bells that Sabbath morn
As they went briskly up the street;
And, out of sight, the Angel bright
Walked close behind with shining feet.

* * * * *
The second week was bleak and cold,
A drizzling rain fell day by day,
And with the wet umbrellas up
The people hurried on their way.

And no one thought about the boys
Who patiently stood sweeping there;
And sometimes over Christy's face
There fell a shade of blank despair.

Discouraged, wet, and weary oft,
Cold, shivering, to their bed they crept;
But still at night that Angel bright Stood by to guard them as they slept."

One day the elder of the two boys tempted to join a company of youthful thieves but resisted the temptation. The temptation was especially severe because it took this form:

"What do you get to eat?" said John.
Who pondered on these boasting words.
'What get to eat! just what we choose—
We eat and drink away like lords.'

* * * * *

At night, as he went sauntering home,
He loitered round a pastry-cook's Till Christy called, 'John, come along;
You'll eat the cakes up with your looks

'Well, Chris, I say 'tis very hard
We never have good things to eat;
I'm tired of nothing else than bread,
I long for something nice and sweet.'

'Well, never mind,' said little Chris,
'You're out of sorts this evening, John

We'll both be rich, maybe, some day,
And then we'll eat 'em up like fun.'

'No chance of that for us,' said John;
'Our feet are now upon the stones;
We can't earn food and clothing too,
And you are only skin and bones.'

'Tis hard to work and not to eat;
But, John, you would not do what's bad!
'No; I don't mean to thrive—not I;
But when thieves feast it makes one mad.'

One night, between the dark and light,
As they were going down a lane,
And Christopher, with bleeding feet,
Was slowly hobbling on with pain,

John saw some shoes outside a door—
They'll just keep my poor Christy warm!
And quick as thought he snatched them up,
And tucked them underneath his arm.

Then pale as ashes grew his face,
And sudden fears rushed on his mind.
He hurried on with quicker pace
Lest some one should be close behind.

'Don't stop a bit,' his brother cried;
'Do be in such a hurry, John.'
John darted round a frightened look,
And from a walk began to run.

He thought he heard the cry of 'Thief!'
And swifter down the street he fled;
And, black as night, a wicked Sprite
With rapid feet behind him sped.

The cry of 'Thief!' was in his ears
Through all the bustle and the din;
And when he reached the lodging-house
The wicked Spirit followed in.

* * * * *

Remorse followed the theft. The next morning as soon as the shop was opened the shoes were returned. Friends were raised up by God who took care of the orphan lads, one of whom, Chris, dies trusting in the Saviour, and the other, John, was bound apprentice to a trade, and thereby enabled to earn an honorable, honest livelihood, until the time came for him to join his mother and brother in heaven.

"And there, in everlasting joy,
The mother and the brothers meet
To part no more, and weep no more,
Nor dwell in that dark, dirty street;

To toil no more with bleeding feet,
Nor hungering long for something nice;
For they are clothed as angels are,
And eat the fruits of Paradise."

FRONTISPIECE PICTURES 5 AND 6

illustrate scenes depicted by Mrs. Sewell in the beautiful ballad entitled "Our Father's Care." We quote just enough from it to furnish explanations for the engravings:

"Poor Nelly has long had a living to earn—She's thinking, perhaps, 'tis a hardship for her
To get up so early and travel so far
While other girls always have plenty of food,
And she has not anything, pretty or good?
No, trifles like these are not filling her mind
As street after street she is leaving behind.
She's thinking about the poor baby that's come,
And mother so weak, and so helpless at home,
And says, with a shake of her little rough head,
'But I am the woman that works for their bread.'

Good, brave little girl, with your old tattered shoe,
And toes on the cold pavement, frozen and blue;
Despite your poor dress and that careful young face,
You're worthy to rank with the noblest race!

The Farringdon Market is open at five
To sell to a hovering, shivering hiver
Of destitute children and indigent poor
The fresh water-creases they cry at the door.

And Nelly's poor mother is sick and alone,
No neighbor to visit her—no, she had none.
She could not rise up from her comfortable bed,
But this was the prayer that she constantly said,
'Lord, give us this day our daily bread!'

We have not a friend in the world but Thee,
And we are as poor as the poor can be;
O Father in heaven, take pity on me!

Look down in Thy mercy and feed us to-day,
Thou knowest our need, and Thou knowest the way;
Thou knowest that I can do nothing but pray.

Oh! give to my poor little Nelly success,
That she may find custom to-day for her cress;
I do not ask more, and I cannot ask less.

And guard my poor lamb in these wilderness ways,
And bring her to Christ in her earliest days,
Forever, my Father, to live to Thy praise.

Now, Father, I wait for Thy mercy to move:
I watch for the sign of Thy pitying love,
And all my dependence is settled above.

And thus she prayed on in her desolate home,
And counted the hours till Nelly should come.

A gentleman sat in his low window-seat,
And often looked out in the dim, foggy street,
And then looked within at his bright-blazing fire,
And round on his room and its costly attire;
At well-cushioned sofa, and soft easy-chair,
At beautiful pictures, and ornaments fair;
And then his eye fell on his plentiful board,
With many a luxury carefully stored;
Then turned to the Bible that lay on his knee—
'And these precious promises, too, are for me.
I rest in the love of my Saviour and Friend,
Which time will not alter, and death cannot end.
Oh! what can I render, my Father, to Thee,
For all Thy unmerited mercies to me?'

The gentleman thought of his silver and gold,
And then of the destitute, hungry, and cold;
He thought of the friendless, surrounded by sin,
Temptation without and temptation within.
He thought till the color rushed into his face,
And he walked to and fro with a resolute pace.
'Poor creatures!' he murmured, 'and shall I sit here.'

'And waste on myself all this bountiful cheer?
Was this, my dear Saviour, Thy love unto me?
And this the return that I make unto Thee?
Shall Thy needy children, in sorrow and pain,
Be looking for succor, and looking in vain?
He walked once again to the low window-seat,
And earnestly gazed in the dull, foggy street,
When, sweetly and clearly, there fell on his ear
The cry of a water-cress girl drawing near.
'Fresh water-cress-e-s! sweet water-cress-e-s!
Four bunches a penny, sweet water-cress-e-s!
How often he'd carelessly noticed that cry
Draw near to his dwelling and then pass it by!
But now, as he listened, the words seemed to bear
A message for him as they rose on the air.'

* * * * *

And he became their comfortor,
He wiped away their tears,
He softened all their poverty
Through many coming years."

THE LAST PICTURE ON FRONT PAGE shows us little Nelly visiting her dying father in a hospital. The scene is a very affecting one:

"Nelly set off to the great house alone,
'Mongst the dying and sick, as she often had done;
And through the long ward, as the little child passed,
Kind looks of compassion upon her were cast.
She stood by the bed—was her father asleep?
His face was so white, and his eyes were so deep.
She touched his thin hand as it lay on the sheet,
And then, with her little voice steady and sweet,
Said, 'Father! father!' and then kissed his brow.
'Mother wants very bad to know how you are now.'
He opened his eyes with a heavy-drawn sigh:
'Ah! Nelly, you've come to see poor father die.
Sit down on the bed, child—sit down by me here.
'Tis hard work to leave you without any fear;
You must be starved, darling—for what can you do?
The family can't be supported by you.'"

But Nelly's story of how, despite difficulties, God was enabling her to earn bread enough for her mother and herself, and how she had been helped with food, and clothing, and money by the rich gentleman to whom reference has been already made, cheers the dying man; and when she was about taking her leave of him, having mentioned "the happy abode, the city all bright with the glory of God,"—

"She ceased, and her dear father opened his eyes—
'Yes, that is the poor sinner's way to the skies.
I'm going there, Nelly; the sins I have done
Are all put away through the well-beloved Son;
That beautiful raiment is over me thrown,
And I shall stand there by the heavenly throne.
My Saviour is coming; I'm catching the sound
Of sweet angel music all floating around.
I'm going there now—there was light on his brow.
Then up to the skies he lifted his eyes,
With a bright sweet smile on his face the while;
One struggling breath, and the hand of death
Had broken the chain of his grief and pain,
And the soul had fled from the silent dead,
And, free as the lark, and above the dark,
And above the cloud, and the toiling crowd,
Had entered the rest of the good and blest.
But the hand that was grasped and so fondly clasped,
Now lifeless and cold, had relaxed its hold,
And the orphan child was left in the wild."

PRAYER FOR YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATIONS.

ALL Christian people should remember that the week commencing Sunday, November 8th, is the period observed throughout the civilized world as a time of special prayer for God's blessing on the Young Men's Christian Associations of the various countries. The beneficent work they have been instrumental in doing is well known, and encourages us to pray that they may become increasingly useful every year.

The following figures, furnished us by Mr. Richard C. Morse, the General Secretary of the International Committee, are of special interest at this time: This season of prayer had its origin in a resolution adopted by the International Convention of the American Associations held in Albany, N. Y., in 1866, and has been observed every year since at the recommendation of the subsequent Conventions.

There are now 2900 Associations in the world, distributed as follows: North America, 934; Great Britain, 503; France, 72; Germany, 549; Holland, 396; Switzerland, 268; Denmark, 43; Belgium, 24, and a dozen more or less in each of the following countries: Spain, Italy, Turkey, Russia, Austria, Japan, Syria, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, Madagascar, and India. The American Associations are the strongest and best organized of any. They number 629 General Associations, 190 College, 69 Railroad, 34 Colored, and 12 German.

The yearly current expenses of the Associations in America amount to $750,000. They own 82 buildings valued at $3,532,000, and have a total net property of $4,353,000. Four hundred and fifteen men are devoting their whole time to the work as secretaries, librarians, and gymnasium instructors. The expense of the Railroad Associations is $75,000 per year, two thirds of which sum is contributed by the railroad companies, who testify to the great benefit resulting to their employes through this special department of Y. M. C. A. work. Last year 1700 young men professed conversion in the College Associations. There are 31 State and provincial organizations, each with its Executive Committee and annual Convention. These committees expended last year $32,034.

The International Committee, located in New York City in 1866 and continued there ever since, is the Executive Committee of the International Conventions which meet biennially. It consists of 33 members, 9 advisory members, and 15 trustees, representing all parts of the United States and the Dominion of Canada. It employs ten secretaries, whose business it is to visit all parts of the two countries, advising with and counselling Associations, both State and local. The expenses of the committee for last year were $30,496, which amount was contributed by friends of the cause.

Thy Healer: God's Dealings with Soul and Body, Edited by Mrs. M. Baxter, a magazine devoted to holiness and healing, published in London on the first and fifteenth of every month. Copies are sent to subscribers in America direct from Bethsan as soon as printed. Annual subscription, including postage, seventy-five cents. Subscriptions for 1885 should be sent to Mrs. M. Baxter, 10 Drayton Park, Highbury, London, England, or to the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, whence they will be forwarded to London.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Nov. 1, 1885.

"Behold, the half was not told me."—1 KINGS 10:7.

Solomon's Magnificence—His Commercial Enterprises—Personal Pomp—A Jewish Sultan—His Royal Guest—Astonished at the Luxurious Court—Beauty of Consecrated Wealth—Imperial Christians—Attractions of a Religion that Included Wealth—The Queen Convinced by the Gold—Religion a Surprise—Anticipations Exceeded—The Golden Age of the World—The Surprise of Heaven.

SOLOMON had resolved that Jerusalem should be the centre of all sacred, regal, and commercial magnificence. He set himself to work, and monopolized the surrounding desert as a highway for his caravans. He built the city of Palmyra around one of the principal wells of the East, so that all the long trains of merchandise from the East were obliged to stop there, pay toll, and leave part of their wealth in the hands of Solomon's merchants. He manned the fortress Thapsacus at the chief ford of the Euphrates, and put under guard everything that passed there. The three great products of Palestine—wine pressed from the richest clusters and celebrated all the world over, oil which in that hot country is the entire substitute for butter and lard, and was pressed from the olive branches until every tree in the country became an oil well, and honey which was the entire substitute for sugar—these three great products of the country Solomon exported, and received in return fruits and precious woods and the animals of every clime.

A ROYAL TRADER.

He went down to Ezion-geber, and ordered a fleet of ships to be constructed, oversaw the workmen, and watched the launching of the flotilla which was to go out on more than a year's voyage, to bring home the wealth of the then known world. He heard that the Egyptian horses were large and swift, and long-maned and round-limbed, and he resolved to purchase them, giving eighty-five dollars apiece for them, putting the best of these horses in his own stall, and selling the surplus to foreign potentates at great profit.

He heard that there was the best of timber on Mount Lebanon, and he sent out one hundred and eighty thousand men to hew down the forest and drag the timber through the mountain gorges, to construct it into rafts to be floated to Joppa, and from thence to be drawn by ox-teams twenty-five miles across the land to Jerusalem. He heard that there were beautiful flowers in other lands. He sent for them, planted them in his own gardens, and to this very day there are flowers found in the ruins of that city such as are to be found in no other part of Palestine, the lineal descendants of the very flowers that Solomon planted. He heard that in foreign groves there were birds of richest voice and most luxuriant wing. He sent out people to catch them and bring them there, and he put them into his cages.

Stand back now and see this long train of camels coming up to the king's gate, and the ox-trains from Egypt, gold and silver and precious stones, and beasts of every hoof, and birds of every wing, and fish of every scale. See the peacocks strut under the cedars, and the horsemen run, and the chariots wheel. Hark to the orchestra! Gaze upon the dance. Not stopping to look into the wonders of the temple, step right on to the causeway, and pass up to Solomon's palace.

ORIENTAL MAGNIFICENCE.

Here we find ourselves amid a collection of buildings on which the king had lavished the wealth of many empires. The genius of Hiram, the architect, and of the other artists is here seen in the long line of corridors and the suspended gallery and the approach to the throne. Traceried window opposite traceried window. Bronzed ornaments bursting into lotus and lily and pomegranate. Chapters surrounded by network of leaves in which imitation fruit seemed suspended as in hanging baskets. Three branches—so Josephus tells us—three branches sculptured on the marble, so thin and subtle that even the leaves seemed to quiver. A laver capable of holding five hundred barrels of water on six hundred brazen ox-heads, which gushed with water and filled the whole place with coolness and crystalline brightness and musical plash. Ten tables chased with chariot wheel and lion and cherubim. Solomon sat on a throne of ivory. At the seating place of the throne, on each end of each of the steps a brazen lion.

Why, my friends, in that place they trimmed their candles with snuffers of gold, and they cut their fruits with knives of gold, and they washed their faces in basins of gold, and they scooped out the ashes with shovels of gold, and they stirred the altar fires with tongs of gold. Gold reflected in the water! Gold flashing from the apparel! Gold blazing in the crown! Gold, gold, gold!

THE ROYAL GUEST.

Of course the news of the affluence of that place went out everywhere by every caravan and by wing of every ship, until soon the streets of Jerusalem are crowded with curiosity seekers. What is that long procession approaching Jerusalem? I think from the pomp of it there must be royalty in the train. I smell the breath of the spices which are brought as presents, and I hear the shout of the drivers, and I see the dust-covered caravan showing that they come from far away. Cry the news up to the palace. The Queen of Sheba advances. Let all the people come out to see. Let the mighty men of the land come out on the palace corridors. Let Solomon come down the stairs of the palace before the queen has alighted. Shake out the cinnamon, and the saffron, and the calamus, and the frankincense, and pass it into the treasure-house. Take up the diamonds until they glitter in the sun.

The Queen of Sheba alights. She enters the palace. She washes at the bath. She sits down at the banquet. The cup-bearers bow. The meats smoke. The music trembles in the hall and through the corridors until it mingles in the dash of the waters from the molten sea. Then she rises from the banquet, and she walks through the conservatories, and she gazes on the architecture, and she asks Solomon many strange questions, and she learns about the religion of the Hebrews, and she then and there becomes a servant of the Lord God.

HER ASTONISHMENT.

She is overwhelmed. She begins to think that all the spices she brought, and all the precious woods which are intended to be turned into harps and psalteries and into railings for the causeway between the temple and the palace, and the $180,000 in money—she begins to think that all these presents amount to nothing in such a place, and she is almost ashamed that she has brought them, and she says within herself: "I heard a great deal about this place, and about this wonderful religion of the Hebrews, but I find it far beyond my highest anticipations. I must add more than fifty per cent to what has been related. It exceeds everything that I could have expected. The half—the half was not told me."

CONSECRATED WEALTH.

Learn from this subject what a beautiful thing it is when social position and wealth surrender themselves to God. When religion comes to a neighborhood the first to receive it are the women. Some men say it is because they are weak-minded. I say it is because they have quicker perception of what is right, more ardent affection and capacity for sublimer emotion. After the women have received the Gospel then all the distressed and the poor of both sexes, those who have no friends, accept Jesus. Last of all come the people of affluence and high social position. Alas, that it is so!

IMPERIAL CHRISTIANS.

If there are those here to-day who have been favoured of fortune, or, as I might better put it favored of God, surrender all you have and all you expect to be to the Lord who blessed this Queen of Sheba. Certainly you are not ashamed to be found in this queen's company. I am glad that Christ has had His imperial friends in all ages—Elizabeth Christina, Queen of Prussia; Maria Feodorovna, Queen of Russia; Marie Empress of France; Helena, the imperial mother of Constantine; Arcadia, from her great fortunes building public baths in Constantinople and tolling for the alleviation of the masses; Queen Clotilda, leading her husband and three thousand of his armed warriors to Christian baptism; Elizabeth of Burgundy, giving her jewelled glove to a beggar, and scattering great fortunes among the distressed; Prince Albert singing "Rock of Ages" in Windsor Castle, and Queen Victoria, incognito, reading the Scriptures to a dying pauper.

I bless God that the day is coming when royalty will bring all its thrones and music, all its harmonies and painting, all its pictures and sculptures, all its statuary and architecture, all its pillars and conquest, all its sceptres; and the queens of the earth, in long line of advance, frankincense filling the air and the camels laden with gold, shall approach Jerusalem, and the gates shall be hoisted, and the great burden of splendor shall be lifted into the palace of this greater than Solomon.

MILLIONAIRE RELIGION.

Again, my subject teaches me what is earnestness in the search of truth. Do you know where Sheba was? It was in Abyssinia, or some say in the southern part of Arabia Felix. In either case it was a great way off from Jerusalem. To get from there to Jerusalem she had to cross a country infested with bandits, and go across blistering deserts. Why did not the Queen of Sheba stay at home and send a committee to inquire about this new religion, and have the delegates report in regard to that religion and wealth of King Solomon? She wanted to see for herself, and hear for herself. She could not do this by work of committee. She felt she had a soul worth ten thousand kingdoms like Sheba, and she wanted a robe richer than any woven by Oriental shuttles, and she wanted a crown set with the jewels of eternity. Bring out the camels. Put on the spices. Gather up the jewels of the throne and put them on the caravan. Start now; no time to be lost. Goad on the camels. When I see that caravan, dust-covered, weary, and exhausted, trudging on across the desert and among the bandits until it reaches Jerusalem, I say: "There is an earnest seeker after the truth."

But there are a great many of you, my friends, who do not act in that way. You all want to get the truth, but you want the truth to come to you; you do not want to go to it. There are people who fold their arms and say: "I am ready to become a Christian at any time; if I am to be saved I shall be saved, and if I am to be lost I shall be lost." A man who says that and keeps on saying it will be lost. Jerusalem will never come to you; you must go to Jerusalem. The religion of the Lord Jesus Christ will not come to you; you must go and get religion. Bring out the camels; put on all the sweet spices, all the treasures of the heart's affection. Start for the throne. Go in and hear the waters of salvation dashing in fountains all around about the throne. Sit down at the banquet—the wine pressed from the grapes of the heavenly Eschol, the angels of God the cup-bearers. Goad on the camels; Jerusalem will never come to you; you must go to Jerusalem. The Bible declares it: "The Queen of the South"—that is, this very woman I am speaking of—"the queen of the South shall rise up in judgment against this generation and condemn it: for she came from the uttermost parts of the earth, to hear the wisdom of Solomon, and behold a greater than Solomon is here." God help me to break up the infatuation of those people who are sitting down in idleness expecting to be saved. "Strive to enter in at the strait gate. Ask and t shall be given you; seek and ye shall find; knock and it shall be opened to you." Take the kingdom of heaven by violence. Urge on the camels.

RELIGION A SURPRISE.

Again, my subject impresses me with the fact that religion is a surprise to any one that gets it. This story of the new religion in Jerusalem, and of the glory of King Solomon, who was a type of Christ—that story rolls on and on, and is told by every traveller coming back from Jerusalem. The news goes on the wing of every ship and with ever caravan, and you know a story enlarges as it is retold, and by the time that story gets down into the southern part of Arabia Felix, and the Queen of Sheba hears it, it must be a tremendous story. And yet this queen declares in regard to it, although she had heard so much and had her anticipations raised so high, the half—the half was not told her.

So religion is always a surprise to any one that gets it. The story of grace—an old story. Apostles preached it with rattle of chain; martyrs declared it with arm of fire; death-beds have affirmed it with visions of glory, and ministers of religion have sounded it through the lanes, and the highways, and the chapels, and the cathedrals. It has been cut into stone with chisel, and spread on the canvas with pencil; and it has been recited in the doxology of great congregations. And yet when a man first comes to look on the palace of God's mercy, and to see the royalty of Christ, and the wealth of this banquet, and the luxuriance of His attendants, and the loveliness of His face, and the joy of His service, he exclaims with prayers, with tears, with sighs, with triumphs: "The half—the half was not told me!"

I appeal to those in this house who are Christians. Compare the idea you had of the joy of the Christian life before you became a Christian with the appreciation of that joy you have now since you have become a Christian, and you are willing to attest before angels and men that you never in the days of your spiritual bondage had any appreciation of what was to come. You are ready to-day to answer, and if I gave you an opportunity in the midst of this assemblage, you would speak out and say in regard to the discoveries you have made of the mercy and the grace and the goodness of God: "The half—the half was not told me!"

THE GOLDEN AGE.

Well, we hear a great deal about the good time that is coming to this world, when it is to be girded with salvation. Holiness on the bells of the horses. The lion's mane patted by the hand of a babe. Ships of Tarshish bringing cargoes for Jesus, and the hard, dry, barren, winter-beached, storm-scarred, thunder-split rock breaking into floods of bright water. Deserts into which dromedaries thrust their nostrils, because they were afraid of the simoon—deserts blooming into carnation roses and silver-tipped lilies.

It is the old story. Everybody tells it. Isaiah told it, John told it, Paul told it, Ezekiel told it, Luther told it, Calvin told it, John Milton told it—everybody tells it; and yet—and yet when the midnight shall fly the hills, and Christ shall marshal His great army, and China, dashing her idols into the dust, shall hear the voice of God and wheel into line; and India, destroying her Juggernaut and snatching up her little children from the Ganges, shall hear the voice of God and wheel into line; and vine-covered Italy, and wheat-crowned Russia, and all the nations of the earth shall hear the voice of God and fall into line; then the Church, which has been toiling and struggling through the centuries, robed and garlanded like a bride adorned for her husband, shall put aside her veil and look up into the face of her Lord the King, and say: "The half—the half was not told me!"

1. THE SURPRISE OF HEAVEN.

Well, there is coming a greater surprise to every Christian—a greater surprise than anything I have depicted. Heaven is an old story. Everybody talks about it. There is hardly a hymn in the hymn-book that does not refer to it. Children read about it in their Sabbath-school book. Aged men put on their spectacles to study it. We say it is a harbor for the storm. We call it our home. We say it is the house of many mansions. We weave together all sweet, beautiful, delicate, exhilarant words; we weave them into letters, and then we spell it out in rose and lily and amaranth. And yet that place is going to be a surprise to the most intelligent Christian. Like the Queen of Sheba, the report has come to us from the far country, and many of us have started. It is a desert march, but we urge on the camels. What though our feet be blistered with the way? We are hastening to the palace. We take all our loves and hopes and Christian ambitions, as frankincense and myrrh and cassia, to the great King. We must not rest. We must not halt. The night is coming on, and it is not safe out here in the desert. Urge on the camels. I see the domes against the sky, and the houses of Lebanon, and the temples, and the gardens. See the fountains dance in the sun, and the gates flash as they open to let in the poor pilgrims.

Send the word up to the palace that we are coming, and that we are weary of the march of the desert. The King will come out and say: "Welcome to the palace; bathe in these waters, recline on these banks. Take this cinnamon and frankincense and myrrh and put it upon a censer and swing it before the altar." And yet, my friends, when heaven bursts upon us it will be a greater surprise than that—Jesus on the throne, and we made like Him! All our Christian friends surrounding us in glory! All our sorrows and tears and sins gone by forever! The thousands of thousands, the one hundred and forty and four thousand, the great multitudes that no man can number, will cry, world without end: "The half—the half was not told us!"

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Diver's Successes.—At a Recent Meeting Mr. Graham said: "When the Royal Charter went down with her valuable cargo, a diver offered to descend into the water and bring up some of the valuables. He did so, but when the people heard of this they would not believe it until they saw the treasures that he had brought up. Now, if any of us think that we are too bad to be saved, when we see that such a man as the thief on the cross can be saved, let this dispel all our fears, for surely when Jesus was able to save a dying malefactor, such as he was, He is able to save you."

Another Beacon of Warning.—A Christian friend observed: "I know a gentleman who had been a total abstainer for fourteen years, but at the end of that time he miserably fell into habits of intoxication. Why? Because he had not taken Christ. He had been trusting in his own unaided strength to keep him up, and now what is he? He is a moral, physical, and commercial wreck." When will men learn that strength of will, or determined resolutions, or even a long period of reformation cannot possibly save; and that only Jesus, who died for men, can do helpless sinners good?

A Visit From Three Girls.—"I Once Had a Bible-class of from about fifty to sixty girls, and one night, when trying to explain to them that Jesus was a free gift from God, I said: 'Now suppose I said to you, "Come to my house to-morrow, and I will give you a present," would you come, believing you were to get it?' Three of the girls misunderstood me, for the next day they came up to my house. I took them in, and presented each of them with a book. 'Now,' I said, 'when did the book become yours?' 'Just when we received it, sir,' replied Mary, the eldest girl. 'Are you sure that it is yours?' 'Oh, yes,' said Jessie, the second girl, 'we are sure that it is ours, because we have got it.' After some more conversation with them the two elder girls understood my meaning and accepted Jesus. But the youngest one was on her knees weeping, because she could not say Jesus belonged to her. We all knelt down and prayed for her, and when it was concluded she rose, and putting her hand in mine, said: 'Mr. Ford, Jesus is mine; He is the fairest among ten thousand, and the altogether lovely; yes, I can now say Jesus is mine.' That young girl is now dead, but the other two are walking in the way of the Lord."

A Lord Chancellor's Calmness.—Mr. Ross said: "There was one thing which distinguished the late Earl Cairns from the other ministers when they assembled in Cabinet. He was always calm and collected, when the others were excited or ruffled. One day a young member came from the Cabinet, and said to his wife: 'I wonder what makes the Lord Chancellor so calm and unruffled in the midst of so much excitement?' 'Well,' replied his wife, 'he makes a habit of being alone with God for a time before attending any important meeting, and that is the secret of it.' 'Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee.'"

The "Worst" Magnified a Hundred Times.—"Some time ago I went into a house in Paisley, and the woman said to me: 'I am a great sinner, sir.' 'Are you sure that you are a great sinner?' I asked. 'Yes,' she said, 'I know that I am the greatest sinner in the district.' 'Yes,' I remarked, 'but do you know that you are a hundred times worse than you think you are? The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked.' The woman got into a terrible passion of anger. But how many are there like her! Although they say that they are sinners they do not really believe it. Oh, friend, if you saw yourself as God sees you, you would not be able to bear the sight."

THE CHRISTIAN CONVENTIONS.

MRS. BAXTER has kindly sent the following notices of the recent conventions on Holiness and Divine Healing:

"The Convention at Philadelphia, held in the Philadelphia Institute, October 21st to 24th, was well attended. The Rev. A. B. Simpson gave some valuable teaching about Christ as our Life, our All in spirit, soul, and body. Miss Carrie F. Judd, of Buffalo, N. Y., gave a very striking address on "a pure offering from the whole of the Book of Malachi"; it was a word not to be forgotten. Mrs. M. Baxter also spoke in most of the meetings. There were some remarkable testimonies of God's work among the lost, of His power in the lives of Christians, and also some testimonies to bodily healing. One meeting was devoted to the coming of the Lord, and two anointing meetings for the sick were held, several who had been anointed subsequently testifying that they had received healing."

"The Christian Convention in Buffalo, the last week in October, was one of the most precious seasons of Christian fellowship we have ever been privileged to partake in. There was the fullest liberty of the Spirit, an atmosphere of joy in the Lord, and of the fullest consecration to His service pervading all the addresses and testimonies. The subjects were similar to those at the Convention in New York. The testimony meeting on Consecration was a model. Some forty testimonies were given, all fully to the point, bringing out the cleansing from all sin, through the blood of Christ, and then His indwelling and His keeping power. The principal speakers were the Rev. A. B. Simpson, of New York; Mr. John Currie, the Scotch Evangelist, whose Bible teaching is most helpful; Miss Carrie Judd, and Mrs. Baxter. The presence of the Lord was powerfully manifest in all the meetings, and numbers entered into a life of rest and victory, which they had not previously known. Forty-four persons were anointed for healing, and some of these experienced the healing touch of Jesus. A verbatim report will be published in the November number of Triumphs of Faith, published at 260 Connecticut Street, Buffalo, N. Y."

WHO ARE MR. STEAD'S FRIENDS?

MUCH has been said in the American daily press about the coarseness and the immodesty of the revelations made in the Pall Mall Gazette. Efforts have been made to show that the editor, Mr. Stead, was concerned only with the desire to make his paper successful, and that he did not care about the suppression of crime. How unjust is this charge may be inferred from the character of a meeting held on October 14th in Exeter Hall, London, at which some of the most godly men and women in London were present, to express their confidence in Mr. Stead and cheer him before his trial as a criminal.

For some time before the doors were opened numbers waited patiently outside, and at half-past seven the large building was closely packed. The chair was taken by Mr. Francis Peek, supported by Mrs. Josephine Butler, Mr. W. T. Stead, Mr. Bramwell Booth, Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, Professor Stuart, Mr. W. P. Bunting, Mr. R. C. Morgan, Rev. Newman Hall, Miss Murray (of Bethshan), and many other well-known ladies and gentlemen.

The opening address of the chairman explained at once that the meeting was called to express sympathy with Mr. Bramwell Booth and Mr. Stead, who stand committed to take their trial for having abducted a child of thirteen years of age, Eliza Armstrong, from the care of her parents. The reason which had influenced the promoters of the meeting to place this motion in the forefront was their belief that when freed from the mist in which the case has been enveloped the cause of the defendants is in reality the cause of virtue and morality, and that the prosecution is instigated by those whose real intention is to stop the righteous indignation that has been aroused by the crimes which have been made known by Mr. Stead in the Pall Mall Gazette.

Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, when the cheering which greeted his rising had subsided, gave an interesting résumé of the work done in the North by himself and Mr. Stead, who, he said, had suddenly become a great orator, as well as the most brilliant journalist of the day. Not a hand in one of the eleven cities they had visited had been held up against the resolutions. In illustration of the enthusiasm which Mr. Stead's work has excited, he told of a pickpocket who had mistaken Mr. Benjamin Waugh for the editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, when pushing his way to the office of that journal. He had relieved Mr. Waugh of his pocket-handkerchief, and, smitten with compunction, made his way up to him, and said: "If you're the cove as done it, I would not rob you for the world, governor! Here's your wife?"

The chairman stated that a declaration had been sent to the Government signed by two thousand one hundred and sixteen clergymen and ministers, strongly deprecating the employment of funds and Government authority to prosecute the persons who had exposed a great national evil, and secured great remedial measures.

Professor Stuart, M.P., who moved a resolution expressing sympathy with Mr. Stead and Mr. Booth, spoke with great clearness and power, and was cheered to the echo when he said that the Criminal Law Amendment Act was due to the editor of the Pall Mall Gazette. A very enthusiastic reception was given to Mrs. Josephine Butler, who spoke in her usual tone of suppressed emotion. It was easy to see that she was passing through a somewhat severe struggle in facing such an audience with such a question. But she had determined, she said, that a woman's voice should be heard on this question. Right, well, and womanly did she say her little say, and her touch of compassion for poor Rebecca Jarrett, a brand plucked from the burning, and who had been a true friend of the friendless and the fallen, was in its way inimitable. The resolution was adopted.

Mr. W. T. Stead, on rising to propose a motion pledging the meeting to support the New Crusade, was received with a tumult of applause.

For some moments the entire audience, who had sprung to their feet, continued cheering and waving handkerchiefs. His speech from first to last was most effective, and one or two passages in which he referred to the opponents of the New Crusade were received with hissing. It was his aim to ascribe honor to those to whom it is due—to Mrs. Butler, Mr. Jacques, Mrs. Combe—rather than desire to be thought the chief worker in the recent movement. One passage gave rise to great hissing, which he immediately requested should be suppressed. It was when he referred to Mr. Cavendish Bentinck, who, in his estimation, had helped to roll the old chariot along. He, too, paid a generous tribute of admiration to the courage of Mrs. Jarrett. "You thank me and Bramwell Booth," he said, "but neither he nor I has a right to one tithe of the thanks which belong to Rebecca Jarrett. I feel humiliated when I hear your loud plaudits. Those around me deserve them, but I have not done anything compared with the sacrifice of that poor woman, who, at the risk of her own soul, went back into her old haunts of infamy for the purpose you know of. Then you have Mr. Jacques, who has been as anxious to serve the cause as any one, and who last week had been on the Continent tracing English girls who have been carried away to houses of evil; and there is also Mrs. Combe, who has been held up before the country as a criminal." "This is probably the last time I shall stand up in London till I stand up in court, and I wish to say to you all, should it go hard with me, and I should be silenced for a time behind the massive walls of Pentonville, remember and pray for me and mine, as I have tried to work for you and yours." These closing words, delivered with some emotion, were received with cheers loud and prolonged, mingled with shouts of "We will," "God bless you!"

THE WAITING ATTITUDE.

By the Right Rev. Maurice Baldwin, D.D., Bishop of Huron.

FROM AN ADDRESS DELIVERED AT THE PROPHETIC CONFERENCE AT NIAGARA.*

JUST in proportion as we expect our Lord's coming and look for that coming do we grow in divine life. In the third chapter of the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, eighteenth verse, the apostle says: "We all, with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the spirit of the Lord." Now I gather that however difficult this passage may be, and however many interpretations may have been given as to its proper meaning, that it simply teaches us that the view of Christ transfigures us. There is elevating power in the study of the coming of the Lord. None of us deny for one moment that people have taken up unscriptural ground on the subject, that people have run into wild excess, and have brought the subject in the eyes of many into discredit, but the truth is here. It is before us, and just as we keep Christ before us and His coming glory do we ourselves become changed into the likeness of His image, so that if He tarries, and we have fallen asleep, we shall awake satisfied with His likeness. We shall see Him when this corruptible shall have been exchanged for the incorruptible, and this mortal shall be changed into the immortal, and we know not what we shall be, but we know that when He shall appear we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is.

I might speak, too, of the comfort of this doctrine. We are sometimes called to comfort those who mourn, and I think that so often, whilst people comfort the mourner with whatever doctrine they have at their command, they fail to see the mode in which the Apostle Paul would comfort those that weep the loss of friends. So often people get no further than the language of David when he said the child could not come to him, but he could go to the child. True, but we go to the house of mourning with the apostle and say—at least we try to say—that there is strong consolation that that body which represents the home of a sleeping saint is just laid—perchance for a little while—to rest there, perhaps only a day, a week, a month, a year, and then Christ shall come, and the dead in Christ shall rise first. We point them to the fact that the believer's falling asleep is, as it were, momentary; that that body is precious to God; that it has been redeemed as well as the soul; that the Lord knows its resting-place, and that He shall call it forth again, purified, beautified, and made meet for the eternal home.

"Comfort one another with these words." Tell them that the night is far spent and that the day is at hand. In the day of mourning people are told to bear their sorrows, and it is most proper and most true; but there is this further to be said, that while we do bear our sorrow, and whilst we mourn, it is not of those who have no hope; that we know it is only for a little while. If I am called to go to the bedside, and afterward to follow to the grave one who has sunk without hope, what can I say? I say, I know he shall rise, but I know not when the Lord knoweth. There is a darkness and a gloom, but that darkness and that gloom do not rest on the believer's hope—it is bright. It is "the Lord shall come again."

In the Second Epistle to Timothy, fourth chapter and eighth verse, we read: "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only; but unto all them also that love His appearing." Have you ever thought that that crown is for all who love His appearing? It is for those who are looking for it. The Greek verb signifies the waiting for His coming. That crown is not spoken of as being given to those who have achieved great results, not even to those that even the Church have thought the most worthy; but to those who love His appearing; to those who through good and evil report have waited, and with the cry: "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

THE GIFTS.

In First Corinthians, first chapter and seventh verse, is a remarkable statement. The apostle says that they, the Corinthians, come behind in no gift, waiting for the coming of the "Lord Jesus Christ." In other words, that just as they waited they were endowed with the various gifts of the Holy Ghost. Now, just as the Gospel of Christ is proclaimed with the Holy Ghost is with power, and the men who, anterior to Christ's first advent, proclaimed that Christ would come, were men of power. They were the great and mighty of Israel—the men who like Isaiah and Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and the minor prophets, lifted up their voices, and said that Messiah cometh. They were men of power having the gifts of the Holy Ghost. Now, then, we come to our day, and I gather that the apostle's teaching is this: that the men who to-day proclaim the second advent shall have the especial charisma which belong to the Church of Christ—that, in other words, the Holy Ghost will endow with special powers those that boldly, fearlessly, and emphatically make known the hope of the Church in the speedy coming of Christ.

Those true servants in Corinth came behind in no gift. I might expatiate on the subject, but I will only say that these gifts of the Holy Ghost were to dwell in the Church, and just as this truth of the Second Advent is brought forward the servant of Christ may expect power.

Let us, therefore, live very near to our Divine Master in abiding, holy, blessed union; for "he that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit." Christ in me bringeth forth much fruit, and the whole effect of this blessed doctrine is to bring us into closer personal union with Jesus Christ. It is that we may die and He live. Oh, that we may learn more and more the power of our daily death and His daily life!

It will lead us to be more earnest in the re-mation of those that have wandered away; I will make us more in earnest in trying to win lost and erring souls to the Lord Jesus; it will make us preach with more fervor, more earnestness, the Gospel of love to sinners; it will make us feel as Frances Ridley Havergal did she felt, that sainted woman who fell asleep recently: "I try to see my Lord in every person I meet, and I try to minister to every one, that I may minister in every one to my Lord and Master, Jesus Christ."

And, dear fellow Christians, let this Lord dwell richly in you. Let Him be the Alpha and He the Omega. Let Him come with many crowns on His head into your heart, and let Him sit on the throne, and you lie low at His feet. Let Him speak, and do you obey, and just as you dwell in this attitude you will find His yoke easy and His burden is light, and you will get it each day to pray for His blessed coming.

NOTES OF A SECOND ADVENT LECTURE TOUR.

By Rev. M. Baxter.*

LETTER II.*

OTTAWA, the political capital of the Dominion of Canada, contains about 20,000 inhabitants, half English and half French Canadians. Having been the scene of some great fires, its principal part is newly built. A horse-car line runs through its zigzag length, which is the best part of a mile. Its Parliament Houses are magnificent pile of buildings in the form of three sides of a quadrangle. The new Canadian Pacific Railway runs most commodious first and second-class carriages from Toronto to Ottawa, nearly three hundred miles, in ten hours. The fares, as usual in America, are three cents first, and two cents second-class. There are excellent hotels here, as in most of the towns in Canada, at $1.50 or $2 a day.

I had good audiences on Sunday, October 8th, three times in the Opera House, which was 20, and the collections amounted to $30. On two evenings in the ensuing week considerable numbers assembled in the Presbyterian Church in Peterborough to hear what I had to say respecting the prophetic events accompanying Christ's speedy advent. The Rev. Mr. Torrance, premillennial believer, kindly gave the use of the church, which is a large and handsome one, and opened the meetings with prayer. He was with Mr. Moody in the north of Scotland in 1875.

Peterborough, containing 8000 inhabitants, is on the Canadian Pacific Railway, between Ottawa and Toronto. It is a busy junction for three railways, and from the hotel I stayed at the omnibus made thirty-six journeys every day to and from the various trains, between 4 A.M. and 11 P.M. The omnibus conductor of most Canadian hotels raises inside them a peculiar yell, like a Punch and Judy man, that can be heard in every room, just before going to each train. It is a mystery how small towns like Peterborough can support three daily two-cent newspapers. Its namesake, Peterborough, in England, has not one daily paper, though it contains double the population.

Toronto, "the Queen City of the West," contains 120,000 population and has the largest Protestant population of any city in Canada. It is a beautifully built city, on the edge of Lake Ontario, and has plenty of churches and public buildings of every description. Its principal streets are King Street, running parallel with the side of the lake, and Yonge Street, running at right angles to it. On fine afternoons both streets are a fashionable promenade, and the general aspect of the shops and passers-by is the same as in English towns of the same size.

I met in Toronto Bishop Maclean, of Saskatchewan, whom I was acquainted with twenty years ago, and who, like Bishop Baldwin, of Huron, and Bishop Bond, of Montreal, believes in the speedy second advent of Christ. The recent rebellion of half-breeds and Indians, headed by Riel, was in his diocese in the northwest of Canada. He doubts whether they may not be troublesome again. He told me that the Christianized Indians did not join in the rebellion. During the past summer he traversed one hundred miles of the northwest, and found a tribe of Indians in the East entirely Christians, owing their conversion to the Church Missionary Society. He confirmed two hundred and thirty-three Indians while on his visit, and they went miles to hear him, and took him wherever he wished. Bands of Christian Indians west of Prince Albert had remained perfectly loyal, though urged strongly by Riel to join the rebel camp. They said they would leave their homes first, and in some instances had done so, and refused to rebel. Around Battleford there were but few Christian Indians, as the mission had been disorganized, and these facts proved that in proportion to Christianity, so had their loyalty been. The Indian mission work had been carried on by funds from England.

In Hamilton, C. W., open-air meetings are freely allowed. In the principal street, King Street, which is about fifty yards wide, Hamilton's Wizard Oil Company have attracted hundreds of people around them every week evening from 8 P.M. to 9.30 P.M. for two months.

A spiritualist called on me at Hamilton with a manuscript book full of communications from the spirits through a medium. They consisted chiefly of repeated predictions that the Fenians, Romanists, and Socialists in America are going to conspire together for a general revolution to establish a socialist or communist republic. The spirits that control these parties are likely enough to know what they intend doing. It is certain that the tradesunions and labor organizations in America are becoming more powerful every year. They command workmen to strike, whenever considered necessary, and they support the strikers. If they can secure sufficient unanimity among workmen they can dictate their own terms for wages to all great industries, such as factories, mills, railways, and other commercial companies. Unfortunately, past history shows that in great social revolutions the moderate leaders soon get pushed aside, and reckless, violent, unscrupulous demagogues take the lead. A powerful labor organization has been holding its convention at Hamilton for a fortnight. Among many other demands, it urges that the same wages shall be paid for eight hours that are now given for nine or ten hours' work. Many signs show that there will be a great social revolution in America before long.

After speaking for two week evenings in Larkin's Hall, Hamilton, I arrived, after three hours' journey, at London, C. W., which has increased from 15,000 to 25,000 population in the last twenty years. Like Hamilton, it is a prosperous, well-built city, with excellent Young Men's Christian Association rooms, and plenty of churches. The climate here is warmer than at Ottawa, Kingston, Montreal, and other places in Canada East. It is the best neighborhood for farmers, as the winter season is not so long. I learned from agriculturists that in Canada West a man may live well on a $6000 farm (£1200), and have $250 saved up by the end of the year. He was required to pay down half, and the rest could be raised on mortgage. A farmer and his family could, however, exist on a farm half the size, in which case he would only need $1500 capital. There are always advertisements of good farms for sale in the Canadian, London, and Hamilton, and especially the Toronto newspapers.

The depression of trade and agriculture that exists in Britain is unknown in Canada. Trade

* Mr. Baxter is right; the selfishness, cupidity, and cruelty of the employers, especially the great monopolies, is rapidly driving workmen to choose between starvation and revolt. The socialists find ready dupes in men who see their wives and children starving while the capitalists grow rich.—Ed.

† The rent for Mr. Larkin's hall is $5 a night for religious meetings and $20 for other meetings. The Central Hall is $3 a night. The collection at a free-admission religious lecture on a week evening will seldom be more than $5.

never was more flourishing than in all the above-mentioned towns of Canada West, and the farmers are doing well. Free Trade is abhorred, and protection for native industries is the cry, so that mills for paper, cotton, carpet, woolen, and other manufactures are carried on profitably, whereas they would be undersold and have to be closed if the same goods were admitted duty free from the United States or other countries.

In London, C. W., I had the Opera House, seating twelve hundred people, well filled, morning, afternoon, and evening on two Sundays, October 4th and 11th. The hire of the building is $25 each Sunday, and the collection was about double that amount; but ample announcement was given by advertisements in the daily papers and two hundred posters and four thousand handbills, which are called in Canada "doggers." Sufficient attention was attracted to the subject to cause the Rev. Mr. Hunter, of the First Congregational Church, to advertise as his subject for the next Sunday evening, "Mr. Baxter and 1896."

At Guelph (10,000 population) I had a good assemblage in the City Hall, and also in Berlin City Hall (6000 population), but a poor one in the City Hall at Stratford (9000 population), though the same announcement was given at each place by one hundred posters and three thousand handbills. I was then at Paris (3500 population), a beautifully situated town on a river. It has several hundred young women working in its cotton and woolen factories, receiving from $3.50 to $7 a week. Its Town Hall is only $2 a night, but is situated on the outskirts of the town on the top of a hill. Dundas (4000 population) also has factories, but is no larger than when I was there twenty-two years ago.

My best week-day audiences were for two evenings at Brentford (12,000 population), in the Opera House.* Like many of these small towns in Canada, it has two daily newspapers and two or three large hotels, and does an active business with the surrounding country district. Kerby House Hotel here, containing one hundred rooms, was built by a speculator at a cost of $150,000, and sold by him for $13,000 to Mr. Palmer, the present proprietor, who is managing it successfully. I spoke for one evening at Onondaga, close by, where I resided as clergyman over the Church of England in that place for several months in 1861. Death has removed nearly all the old attendants at the church during the subsequent quarter of a century, and the village has declined from 500 to 300 inhabitants.

The pestilence of small-pox, which has been raging among the 200,000 inhabitants of Montreal, has gradually increased during the last five months, until it has killed twelve hundred during the first eighteen days of October—i.e., about seventy each day. Travellers from Montreal are constantly taking the contagion to other towns in Canada and the United States, so that doctors are now placed at the railway stations to compel the vaccination of all unvaccinated travellers from Canada into the United States. The French Canadian Papists in Montreal refuse to be vaccinated, hence the spread of the epidemic. Even riots have been raised by the Roman Catholics against doctors and remedies for small-pox in Montreal, the same as against doctors and remedies for cholera in Spain.

The Rev. Dr. Wild, of Toronto, who has a congregation of twenty-five hundred persons every Sunday, and who is a great Anglo-Israelite believer in the English being the descendants of the lost ten tribes of Israel, tells me that Mr. Hine, the author of "Twenty-Seven Identifications," is coming to Canada to lecture. Unless he can afford to give free-admission lectures and advertise them well, it is doubtful whether he will get many to hear him; but every voice is valuable that helps to raise the midnight cry, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh; go ye forth to meet Him" (Matthew 25).

* The first letter appeared October 15th.

* The City Hall at Guelph is $10, and Stratford $10, and Berlin $5, and Dundas $4 a night, and Brentford $10.

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION, $1.50.

The Gratitude of Our Friends who are Receiving THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during the closing three months of this year, under the arrangement announced a few weeks ago, is due, not to us, but to those who have paid the three months' subscription for them. It is pleasant to learn that the paper is appreciated and that it is doing good, but we ought not to accept thanks due to other people. A practical way of manifesting the gratitude expressed will be to send us next month a subscription for the year 1886. That testimony would be gratifying both to the personal friends of the subscribers and to those who are praying and working for the usefulness of this journal.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Result of the Elections which Took place on Tuesday last is not known at the time THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is obliged to go to press in order to reach subscribers in distant States punctually. We can but hope that the best men may have been elected. It is impossible that every one can be satisfied with the result, but those who have been disappointed may safely console themselves with the thought that the men elected are not worse, but probably a great deal better, than they have been painted during the past few weeks. They deserve a fair trial, and to have their conduct judged impartially, and not in the light of prejudice. The mud that has been flying around lately should not be flung on those whom the votes of the people have placed in positions of honor and responsibility.

The President has Declined to Receive Office-seekers or their advocates for the future. A notice issued last week informs all whom it may concern that persons desiring to see him on strictly public business unconnected with the offices will be received on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday mornings; and on the afternoons of the same days he will meet those who call to pay their respects. He says that for nearly eight months a large share of his time has been devoted to the hearing of applications for office and the determination of appointments. Much of the time thus spent has undoubtedly subserved the public good; some of it has been sacrificed to the indulgence of people in their natural insistence upon useless interviews, and some of it has been unjustifiably wasted. The public welfare and a due regard for the claims of those whose interest in the Government are entirely disconnected with office-holding imperatively demand that in the future the time of the President should be differently occupied, and he confidently expects that all good citizens will acquiesce in the propriety and reasonableness of the new plan. It looks as if the President's patience was exhausted.

The Hon. L. D. Thomas Resigned Last Week his place on the Civil Service Commission. He is the last of the commissioners appointed by President Arthur. It appears that he tendered his resignation several months ago, but at the request of President Cleveland he continued his services until now. In the course of his letter of resignation he said: "While thus asking release from so honorable a trust, I desire to record my gratification of the proved practicability and remedial effectiveness of the reform procedure.

It has been my pleasure within the last two months to visit quite a number of the States and Territories of the Union, and it was my good fortune to meet with many of their citizens. It is gratifying to know that the people confide in the unequivocal intention of the President to sustain the merit system in the civil service. With the precise details of the new procedure their acquaintance was not so intimate. To this they are fast succeeding, and the result will be cordial approval." The President's reply was courteous and appreciative. He said: "I congratulate you upon the fact that in the office which you relinquish you have been able, by sincere and earnest work and by a steady devotion to the cause which you have had in charge, to do so much in the interest of good government and improved political methods." The ridicule cast upon Civil Service Reform during this campaign should not deceive the public. It is a great issue, and it has come to stay.

Ferdinand Ward, of the Late Firm of Grant & Ward, was sentenced on Saturday last to State's prison for a term of ten years, with hard labor. The evidence and the speeches of counsel occupied Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday of last week. The case was given to the jury, and they retired to consider their verdict at half past seven on Wednesday night. At midnight they returned and announced that they had found the prisoner guilty. Sentence was deferred until Saturday to give the defence time to move for a new trial. The principal witness against Ward was James D. Fish, the ex-President of the Marine Bank, who is also serving a term of ten years in State's prison for wrecking that bank. He testified that he directed the certification of Ward's cheque for $71,800 on receiving an assurance from Ward that a cheque of Ward's for $75,000 on the First National Bank, which was held by the Marine Bank, would be duly paid on presentation. That is to say, that he obtained the certification by false pretences, as at that time his balance at the First National Bank was below $300. This was the specific charge selected for trial by counsel for the people from among many others that have been brought against Ward. No light was shed at the trial on the interesting question of what became of the vast sums which disappeared in the Grant & Ward business. It does not appear that Ward secured much for himself. It is suspected that the ill-gotten plunder was shared by several persons who are yet to be tried, and it may be hoped that Ward will assist in bringing the guilty men who used him as their tool to justice, even if it is impossible to make them disgorge. There are several wealthy men in Wall Street who deserve to be in the Penitentiary, and if they can be sent there the public will enjoy greater financial safety.

The Death of General George B. McClellan, at his home at Orange, N. J., on Thursday last, removes another conspicuous figure associated with the war. He was in his usual health until three days before he died, and even the day before, his physician did not consider the symptoms of heart disease, which had developed, an indication of immediate danger. He was considered better on Wednesday, but a sudden relapse occurred late in the day, and early on Thursday morning he died. He was fifty-nine years old, having been born at Philadelphia on December 30, 1826. Probably no name among the generals of the war excites, even at this day, so wide a divergence in public opinion as his does. The vicissitudes of his career were remarkable. On August 20th, 1861, the whole North went wild with enthusiasm over his appointment to the supreme command of the Union armies; ten months later his retirement was made necessary by popular denunciation. Two years later he was the candidate of his party for the presidency in opposition to President Lincoln, and the public passions for and against him were inflamed to the highest pitch. Again in 1877 was before the public as a candidate for the Governorship of New Jersey. He was elected and held the office until 1881. He was personally beloved by a multitude of friends, and even his enemies could not deny that his was a lot and noble character. Whether those months' inaction, and his failure to follow up his successes, were necessary, is a matter still in dispute. It is certain, however, that the work of organization he performed contributed materially to the ultimate success of the Union armies. Dr. Talmage, who knew him personally, paid a high tribute to his Christian character in his Friday evening talk, as "an open friend of Christ and a communicant of the Presbyterian Church."

The Deaths from Small-Pox in Montreal on Friday, October 30th, were 38 in the city and 13 in the suburbs. This makes a mortality of 13 in the week among the Catholics alone in the city of 273; Cote St. Louis, 38; St. Jean Baptist 13; St. Cuneogone, 20; St. Henri, 7; Cote St. Paul, 1; St. Gabriel, 1, and St. Charles, 1. Total for the week, 354, being an increase of 31 over the previous week. If the city alone the increase was only 20. A young man who returned from Montreal about a fortnight since his father's residence at St. Joseph de Levis has been taken with small-pox. Great alarm prevails in consequence on the Levis side of the river.

The Trial of Mr. Stead and the Other Defendants in the Armstrong case was continued from day to day last week. The bias of the judge in favor of the prosecution, was evinced on several occasions. Mr. Stead's speech in his own defence is described as a masterly analysis of the case. On Friday the judge who is trying the case, Mr. Justice Lopes, replying to a question from the jury as to when the case would end, said they might as well ask the date of the Day of Judgment. Though the allusion was somewhat flippant, it is encouraging to infer from it that Mr. Lopes has not forgotten that there will be a Day of Judgment, though he does not know the date.

The Hope that the International Conference will solve the Bulgarian difficulty appears to be abandoned by the European courts. The plenipotentiaries will meet, but their instructions will render them powerless to agree unless some of them can in the course of the discussion hit upon a compromise satisfactory to all parties. If the Conference fails the whole question will be relegated to Turkey. The European press correspondents say that the probabilities are that Turkey, unless driven by self-defence to fight the rebellious States, will remain inactive and allow the Balkan mine to continue being charged with political dynamite until the inevitable explosion rends Europe.

The Declaration that Home Rule for Ireland has been accepted as a principle by Mr. Chamberlain and the Radicals has aroused curiosity as to the details of their scheme. No formal statement of their conception of the idea of Irish self-rule has been formulated, but the Irish correspondent of the New York Herald cables to that journal last week the views of a prominent Nationalist leader who is an intimate friend of Mr. Parnell. That politician said: "What we want is to have the power in our own country to make the laws which affect the Irish people alone. We do not ask for that power as an independent nation. We do not want an army or navy, nor do we wish to exercise the power outside of our own country. What we want is to rule Ireland as Canada and Australia rule themselves, remaining side by side with the empire." It is probable that on that basis an agreement may be reached. The chief difficulty will arise on the question whether Ireland may regulate her own tariff.

Wanted as Evangelists at Mission Stations of the Gospel Army in Canada and America, men or women who can sing or give gospel addresses. Write to the President, Rev. M. Baxter, Post Office, Toronto, Canada.

Mrs. Baxter is Holding Meetings at Nashville, Tenn., from November 4th to November 11th. Thence she will proceed to Baltimore, Md., to assist in Dr. Cullis's Convention on Holiness and Divine Healing, which commences November 12th, in the Madison Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church. Miss Carrie F. Judd, of Buffalo, and the Revs. John Cookman, D.D., and A. B. Simpson, of New York, are also expected to attend the Convention. Similar conventions are announced to be held at Pittsburgh, Pa., commencing November 18th, and at Chicago on November 24th. A brief sketch of the convention at Buffalo, N. Y., last week, appears on page 709.

A Union Christian Convention was Held last week at Newburg, N. Y., conducted by Messrs. Moody and Sankey. It is stated that fully three thousand persons were present at each of the services. On Saturday Rev. W. M. Hay Aitken, who has been conducting a mission at St. George's Church, assisted in the proceedings of the Convention. Mr. George C. Stebbins conducted the choir of two hundred and forty voices. Overflow meetings were held at the First Presbyterian Church when the Columbia Rink, in which the chief meetings were held, was crowded.

Mr. William Noble, the Gospel Temperance evangelist, is holding meetings at Chelsea, Mass., which are crowded nightly. On November 22d he has arranged to commence a fourteen-days' mission at Louisville, Ky., under the auspices of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, in which the ministers of the city will co-operate. Last week he assisted at the Convention of the N. W. C. T. U., which was held in Philadelphia. At the conclusion of his address an intoxicated Englishman, who said he was a physician, sent a note to Miss Frances E. Willard, who presided, asking her to request the delegates to pray for him, as he was in despair, and was contemplating suicide. A letter from Mr. Samuel Morley has been received, heartily commending Mr. Noble to the good will of American Christians. Mr. Morley says: "He has the best wishes of those who have known his work in London. His efforts on behalf of gospel temperance have been of exceeding value. His gift of ready speech and religious earnestness have many times stirred and stimulated large audiences with the best results." Letters for him addressed to this office will be forwarded.

A Reception to Archdeacon Farrar was Tendered on October 29th by the National Temperance Society and the Church Temperance Society acting in concert. Among the gentlemen on the platform were Mr. John B. Gough, who said he came two hundred miles on purpose to attend the meeting, Cyrus W. Field, General Clinton B. Fisk, Chief-Justice Noah Davis, and Dr. Howard Crosby. Dr. Theodore Cuyler pronounced the address of welcome, assuring the distinguished guest that "the generous regard he has ever shown for our country, as well as his noble services for humanity, have already given him, while living, a wider Westminster Abbey in the great American heart." Archdeacon Farrar said he was convinced that the use of alcohol was not a necessity. Nations had lived and flourished without it, but the field of history, from the disgraceful scene of the patriarch in his tent down to the newspaper annals of to-day, proved it to be a curse interminable in its malignity. Dr. Farrar said he was present in the House of Commons when Gladstone declared that the evils wrought by intoxicating drink were more continuous than the three great historic scourges—war, famine, and pestilence—combined. The utterance was not original with Gladstone, but with a brewer in the House of Commons, who knew what he was talking about; but Gladstone had accepted and indorsed it. It was discouraging, the speaker said, that with all the effort that had been made, the temperance people seemed to be as far as ever from efficacious legislation, so great was the power of a callous public selfishness and the resistance of interested wealth. But when the people once rose in their might to speak, it would be in a voice that must be listened to. Judge Noah Davis said that in New York the fault was not with the excise laws, but with the commissioners who failed to enforce them.

A Chinese Lady Missionary will Shortly Proceed to her native land to engage in Christian work. It is announced that Miss Kin Yai Mo, M.D., a Chinese lady of twenty-one, has this year graduated at the head of her class in the New York Woman's Medical College. Her father was a Presbyterian convert and mission minister, and she has been carefully educated for mission work.

A Telegraph Operator's Sleep Having Been the cause of a recent railroad accident, the subject of automatic signals has attracted renewed attention. A correspondent of a New York daily journal, in strongly urging the adoption of an automatic signal system, describes a series of experiments which he witnessed a short time ago at Syracuse, N. Y. The automatic signal he saw notified the engineer of a train coming toward a given section, whether there was a train on that section, whether there was a switch open on that section, and, still more, it also notified any one about to cross the railroad on the country road where the exhibition was made whether there was a train coming. Should such a system come into operation, it would fail of its purpose unless engineers and people having to cross the track understood the signals and knew what each was intended to indicate. As their own safety would depend on this knowledge, it is probable they would be at some pains to acquire it. A similar effort should be made at this time to understand the import of current events. In the prophecies of the Old and New Testaments certain occurrences were described as being premonitory of the close of this dispensation. These events are now occurring, and though many of the Lord's watchmen sleep, every one should understand and take warning (Matt. 24 : 33).

An Obstinate Englishman in a New York jail was referred to by Judge Arnoux in court last week. The judge said that in Ludlow Street Prison was a wealthy Englishman who has been there for seven years. He was formerly a captain in the British Army, but before the war he was a prosperous planter in the South. His cotton was destroyed by the Union troops, and when the British-American Claims Commission sat he presented a claim for two million dollars. He was awarded $297,000. His lawyers claimed one quarter of that sum for their services. The Englishman, thinking the charge exorbitant, refused to pay, and they sued him for it. The court ordered him to pay one half of the award into court to await the issue of the suit, but he refused to do that, and was sent to jail for contempt of court. There he has remained ever since. Judge Arnoux said that he had a good defence, and if he would submit to the court and purge himself of his contempt he might be released. He, however, continues obstinate, and is still in prison. As the court is little likely to humble itself to the prisoner, and the prisoner is too stubborn to humble himself to the court, the prospect of his release is gloomy. Sensible men regard such obstinacy as madness, but it is very common in spiritual matters, where the consequences are infinitely more serious. Christ explicitly charged the impatient with this sin (John 5 : 40).

A Romantic Marriage Took Place in Brooklyn, N. Y., last week. The essential facts in connection with it are taken from a detailed statement communicated to the press by the family lawyer, who is well known in the city. In the summer of 1885 a wealthy widow lady residing in Brooklyn died and left an eccentric will. She bequeathed the whole of her property, valued at $80,000, in trust to her young companion, a charming French lady, who, some years before, had answered her advertisement for a reader and pianist. The young lady was, enjoined to search for the testator's only son, who ran away from home in 1871. It was the widow's wish that if the son could be found he and the young French lady should marry and divide her estate equally. If either of the two refused to marry, the party refusing was to have one fourth of the estate, and the other party the remaining three fourths. The search for the runaway, which the widow had prosecuted without success, was resumed, and this summer he was discovered in Mexico. He returned to Brooklyn six weeks ago, but the nature of his mother's will was concealed from him. The lawyer, however, introduced him to the French lady, who was a total stranger to him. They became attached to each other, and before the young man was informed of his mother's arrangement he asked her to marry him. Then he learned that he was unconsciously fulfilling his mother's wishes. As he was an undutiful son, it is possible that unconscious obedience was the only kind of obedience he would render. God has often made use of ungodly men as instruments to carry out His purposes. They do His will while they imagine they are following their own volition (Isa. 10 : 6, 7).

A Negro's Forgotten Note Caused Him a severe disappointment at Newman, Ga., recently. An old colored man was seen entering the town with a dilapidated wagon containing five bales of cotton, on which his wife was seated with her knitting. His business was to sell the cotton, and with the proceeds buy clothing and provisions for the season. During the past year the old man had been living upon goods purchased on credit, for which he had given his note for $200. Seven and a half cents was the best offer the old man received for some time, but at length a young man came up and offered him eight cents, which offer the negro gladly accepted. His wife went off to a millinery store to buy her outfit, and the two men went to have the cotton weighed and figured up. The account came to $195, and the old man held out his hand for the money. Instead of the currency he expected, his own note for $200 was produced, with a request for the $5 to balance. His disappointment was painful to witness. He shed tears, and it required no little talking to convince him that he was not entitled to any recompense for his year's hard work beside "that bit o' paper." The same mistake is made by people who think to put themselves right with God by reforming their lives and turning over a new leaf. It is only when they see the sins of the past blotted out by the blood of Jesus that they enter into peace and safety (Heb. 9 : 14).

A Clergyman in a Horse-Car Received an equivocal compliment recently from one of the passengers. Dr. Howard Crosby, the earnest worker in the cause of virtue in New York, says that a few days ago he boarded a Fourth Avenue car with two ladies. A drunken man entered shortly afterward, and became boisterous. The two men between whom the toper seated himself reproved him, swore at him, and threatened to throw him off the car. That treatment did not improve the drunkard's temper, and the prospect of a lively disturbance was promising. Dr. Crosby motioned to the men to cease tantalizing the fellow, and went and sat by him himself, talking kindly to him. The drunkard became calm under the doctor's influence, and travelled for a mile without causing any annoyance. He had reached his destination by that time, and wanted to get off. The clergyman signalled the conductor, the car stopped, and the man rose. He stood glaring for a moment at his tormentors, and then putting his hand on the clergyman's shoulder, he said, patronizingly: "You sh a good feller, you ish. Guess you know how 'tish yourself." The left-handed compliment raised a general laugh at Dr. Crosby's expense, which he bore with his usual good-humor. Unjust as the drunken man's inference was in this case, it was not unnatural. The fallen are generally more sure of sympathy from those who, if they have not fallen themselves, know the power of temptation (Heb. 4 : 15).

FIRST THINGS FIRST.

An Address by C. H. Spurgeon,

DELIVERED AT THE MONTHLY MEETING OF THE LONDON BANKS' PRAYER UNION, THE RIGHT HON. THE LORD MAYOR, M.P., IN THE CHAIR.

Hap-Hazard Lives—The Relation of Religion to Life—What Religion is—Warning against Anxiety—It is Needless—Useless—Heathenish—A Wise Anxiety—The Kingdom of God—A Shipwrecked Mother's Telegram—Seeking Righteousness—The Religion for Amusements—The Order of Life—Religion First—In Order of Time—In Preference—A Cant Phrase—In Intensity—The Result Promised—A Life Saved by a Broken Leg—A Man Self-Buried.

MY LORD MAYOR AND GENTLEMEN: I was asked to give an address to the members of the Banks' Prayer Union, and to others occupied in banking; but I beg to warn you all that an address from me is very like a sermon. I am so in the habit of preaching that almost of necessity my talk drops into sermon form. I have heard a story of a painter of sign-boards in Harp Alley in the olden times which illustrates the force of habit. An innkeeper selected an angel as the sign of his house, and asked this knight of the brush to produce one; but the painter replied, "You had better have a lion. I have been painting lions so long that they are more in my line than angels." Mine host answered that there were three or four lions of different colors in the street already, and that he must have an angel. "Well," said our artist, "if you must have an angel, you shall have an angel; but it will be dreadfully like a lion." Thus it comes to pass that when I am compelled to give an address it is extremely like a sermon. I pray you have patience with me, now that I have confessed my weakness.

A MAP OF LIFE.

Possibly I address myself to some who have hitherto lived at hap-hazard, and if so, I invite them to a more hopeful method of living. To have a great many aims and objects is much the same thing as having no aim at all for if a man shoots at many things he will hit none, or none worth the hitting. It is a grand thing to know what we are living for, and to live for a worthy object with the undivided energy of our being. Shall we, when the end comes, have made a success of life? Has our object been a right one, and has it been wisely pursued? Are the results of our conduct such as we shall wish them to have been when the conflict of this mortal life is over? These questions deserve consideration at once.

Another question arises out of them—What position should religion occupy in reference to a man's life? That is a question which naturally arises in the arranging of life; for, whatever we choose to think of it, there is such a thing as religion in the world, and there is within us some yearning after spiritual things. What position should religion occupy in your life and mine? The answer must depend very much upon another question—What is religion, and what does religion itself demand? What are the requirements of the great God, and of the soul, and of eternity? This question has suggested to me the text upon which I shall speak this afternoon:

"Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and His righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you."—Matthew 6:33.

I shall not trespass beyond the appointed time. However prosy I may be during the time allotted to me, I shall stop when the hour is complete. Here is an account of

WHAT TRUE RELIGION IS.

According to the words of Christ Jesus our Lord, it is "the kingdom of God and His righteousness." Just now I read to you a portion of Scripture, Matthew 6:24-34; and I read it to you that you might note that our text occurs in the midst of a warning against undue anxiety. Undue anxiety is very common among city men, and it is not rare anywhere. Certain of us are nervous, timid, doubtful, and prone to fear. As to the sun, they observe with pleasing despondency that he has spots. His light they hardly notice, but they do note upon his spots with amiable horror. Minds of this sort find poisons in trees, deaths in the running brooks, Digres in stones, and ill in everything.

I suppose they cannot help it; yet Christian men must help it; for the Lord's precept is plain and binding: "Be not therefore anxious."

Fretful anxiety is forbidden to the Christian. In the first place, it is needless. "Behold the fowls of the air," said Christ: "they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they?" If you have a Father in heaven to care for you, are you not put to shame by every little bird that sits upon the bough and sings, though it has not two grains of barley in all the world? God takes charge of the fowls of the air, and thus they live exempt from care; why do not we?

FOOLISH ANXIETY.

Our Lord also taught that such anxiety is useless as well as needless; for, with all our care, we cannot add a cubit to our stature. Can we do anything else by fretful care? What if the farmer deplores that there is no rain? Do his fears unstop the bottles of heaven? Or if the merchant sighs because the wind detains his laden ship, will his complainings turn the gale to another quarter? We do not better ourselves a bit by all our fret and fume. It were infinitely wiser to do our best, and then cast our care upon our God. Prudence is wisdom, for it adapts means to ends; but anxiety is folly, for it groans and worries, and accomplishes nothing.

Besides, according to our Saviour, anxiety about carnal things is heathenish: "After all these things do the Gentiles seek." They have no God and no providence, and therefore they try to be a providence to themselves. I was going through these streets one day, driven by a friend in a four-wheeled chair, and he, being a good driver, must needs drive into narrow places, where it seemed to me that we should be crushed by the vans and omnibuses. I shrank back, in my timidity, and expressed my unwise alarms so freely that, with a smile he laid the reins in my hand, and said: "If you cannot restrain, would you like to drive yourself?" From that ambition I was wholly free, and I assured him that he might drive as he liked rather than make me the chauffeur. Surely, the great God might well put the same proposal to those who are complaining of his providence. If we cannot trust Him, could we manage better ourselves?

WISE ANXIETY.

It is plain that within us there is a propensity to be anxious. Can we not utilize it? Can we not turn it to account? I think so. Some are naturally thoughtful and careful; can they not transform this tendency into a benefit? We have a tendency to be anxious. Very well, let us be anxious; but let our anxiety run in the right direction. Here is a mental heat; let us apply it to some useful purpose. Our text sets before us the true sphere of Christian carefulness: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and His righteousness." Seek that with all your care; seek that with all your energy. Be anxious about that. Let your whole mind run in that direction with eagerness and thought. You cannot be too careful or too energetic when God and righteousness are concerned.

In our text there is a description of true religion; what is it? "The kingdom of God." God has a kingdom in this world, but it is too much neglected and forgotten of men. The first thing to be done by us is to enter that kingdom. We can only enter into this kingdom of God by being born again of His Spirit; for "except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." In that new birth we learn to submit ourselves to the Lord Jesus Christ, and to find in Him eternal life. Our next business should be to spread that kingdom—to try to bring others under the dominion of Christ. It is a great joy to the Christian minister to have about him a people who are missionaries in their daily lives. With great joy have I listened to some poor girl who has confessed her faith in Christ, and when has added, very timidly: "There is another girl waiting outside who would like to speak to you." She works with me in a warehouse in the city, and I spoke to her, and she sought Jesus, and I believe she is converted. I fear that many men of position are less diligent in winning souls than the poor workers they employ. Should it be so? He lives most and lives best who is the means of imparting spiritual life to others. May not some of you at the last come to a lonely end from lack of usefulness? We heard not long ago, of the shipwreck from which a mother was washed on shore but found all her children drowned. She telegraphed to her husband two words. The first was very pleasant to his eye: "Saved." The next was full of misery: "Saved alone." Ah! me! would you or I like to have it so—"Saved alone?" God forbid. When we reach heaven-gate may we be able to say, "Here am I, and the children that thou hast given me."

This is the meaning of that first given me—"Seek the kingdom of God. The reign of our Lord is to be our main object if we would lead a well-ordered, useful, happy, and honored life.

FROM SARCASM TO PURITY.

Our text has a second word: "Seek first the kingdom of God, and His righteousness," by which I understand the practical part of true religion. By the phrase "His righteousness," I understand that power in the world which is always working, in some form or other, for that which is good, and true, and pure. Everything in this world which is holy, and honest, and of good repute, may count upon the Christian as its friend, for it is a part of God's righteousness. Does drunkenness eat out the very life of our nation? Do you want men of temperance to battle with this evil? The Christian man cries, "Write down my name." If the horrible sin of the period is to be denounced and punished, we may not shrink from the loathsome conflict. Let each man in his own position labor after purity; and, as God shall help us, we may yet sweep these streets of their infamies, and deliver our youth from pollution. Every Christian man should say of every struggle for better things, "I am in it, cost what it may." Hosts of your professors of religion forget to seek God's righteousness, and seem to suppose that their principal business is to save their own souls—poor little souls that they are! Their religion is barely sufficient to fill up the vacuum within their own ribs where their hearts should be. This selfishness is not the religion of Jesus. The selfishness of Jesus is unselfish: it enlists a man as a crusader against everything that is unrighteous. We are and our bloodless battles are against all things that degrade our fellowmen, whether they be causes social, political, or religious. We fight for everything that is good, true, and just. True religion is diffusive and extensive in its operations. I see people drawing lines continually, and saying: "So far is religious, and so far is secular." What do you mean? The sphere of Christianity is co-extensive with daily life. I am not to say, "I serve God when I stand in the pulpit," for that might imply that I wished to serve the devil when my sermon was over. We are not only to be devout at church, and pious at prayer-meetings, but to be devout, and godly everywhere. Religion must not be like a piece of mediæval armor, to be hung upon the wall, or only worn on state occasions. No; it is a garment for the house, the shop, the bank.

"But," says one, "are we not to have amusements?" Yes, such amusements as you can take in the fear of God. Do whatever Jesus would have done. This is liberty enough for one who aspires to be like Jesus. There is happiness enough in things which are pure and right; and if not, we will not do evil to find more. We find pleasure enough without hunting for it in the purlieus of sin. It is not slavery that I set before you when I say that we are first of all to seek the kingdom of God, and His righteousness: there is a present recompense which justifies the choice; and as for the eternal future, it pleads for it with voice of thunder.

THE TRUE ORDER.

It is time that I changed the subject and dwelt upon a further theme. Here is an account of the proper position of true religion: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and His righteousness." Let the word "first" indicate to you the order of time. True godliness is as good for this life as for the next. If I had to die like a dog I would still wish to be a Christian. Place religion first in the order of time. Begin each week by carefully consecrating the first day to rest and holy worship. Begin each day by giving the dew of the morning to communion with heaven. Begin your married life by seeking the blessing of the great Father, and choosing for a partner one that will agree with you in the fear of God. In opening a new business sanctify the venture with the supplications of godly friends, and in all fresh enterprises be guided of the Lord. If we begin, continue, and end with God, our way will be strewn with blessings.

THE COST.

Seek also the kingdom of God first in order of preference. If it should ever become a choice between God and Mammon, never hesitate. If wealth and righteousness run counter to each other, let the gold perish, but hold thou fast to righteousness. Follow Christ, however dear it cost thee. Blessed is that man who never deliberates, because his mind is made up rather to "suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season." "Well," cries one, "but, you know, we must live." I am not sure about that. There are occasions when it would be better not to live. An old heraldic motto says, "Better death than false of faith." I am, however, quite clear about another necessity—we must die; and we had better take that "must" into consideration, and not quite so often repeat the cant phrase, "We must live."

Let godliness be first in intensity. It is to be feared that many give their force to their worldly pursuits and their feebleness to their religion. They are "all there" during banking hours; but they are not "all there" at the hour of prayer. Alas! the comparative sizes of the Bible and the ledger are frequently symbolical; a neat little Bible is buried under a huge ledger. I claim for things divine a different place; let that be first which is first; throw your whole soul into the love and service of the Lord. "Is your father a Christian?" said a Sunday-school teacher to a child. The girl answered, "Yes, I believe that father is a Christian, but he has not worked much at it lately." No doubt there are many of that sort. Their religion has taken a holiday, and they themselves have gone up to a sluggard's bed. Let them be aroused, for it is high time to awake out of sleep. Seek the kingdom of God and His righteousness first, by giving to true religion a sovereignty over your lives. The helm by which life is steered should be in the hand of God. To glorify God and promote righteousness should be our master passion. This Aaron's rod should swallow up all other rods. Be first a man of God, after that a banker, or a merchant, or a working-man. Then the secondary character would rise in excellence and nobility.

THE PROMISE.

I may honestly claim five minutes more to complete the hour allotted to this service, and I will spend it by taking account of the promise here made to those who "seek first the kingdom of God, and His righteousness." Does any one demand, "What will become of our business if we place godliness first?" The answer is in the text: "All these things shall be added unto you." A young man beginning life, resolving that he will do everything in the fear of God, and that as God helps him he will do nothing that is contrary to the mind of the Lord Jesus Christ—shall he prosper? He shall get on so far as this: he shall have bread to eat, and raiment to put on—all that is needful for this life "shall be added to him." They that serve God shall not have to complain of His deserting them. In the reign of Queen Elizabeth a certain merchant of London was desired by Her Majesty to go abroad for her upon affairs of state. He pleaded that his own business would suffer; whereupon Her Majesty replied, "Sir, if you will mind my business I will mind your business." Rest you assured that God will care for you if you make His service your delight.

MR. GILPIN'S BROKEN LEG.

We do not know what is best for us. It is sometimes very much better for us to suffer loss and disappointment than to obtain gain and prosperity. When that eminent servant of God, Mr. Gilpin, was arrested to be brought up to London to be tried for preaching the Gospel, his captors made mirth of his frequent remark, "Everything is for the best." When he fell from his horse and broke his leg they were specially merry about it; but the good man quietly remarked, "I have no doubt but that even this painful accident will prove to be a blessing." And so it was; for, as he could not travel quickly, the journey was prolonged, and he arrived at London some days later than had been expected. When they reached as far as Highgate they heard the bells ringing merrily in the city down below. They asked the meaning, and were told, "Queen Mary is dead, and there will be no more burnings of Protestants." "Ah!" said Gilpin, "you see it is all for the best." It is a blessing to break a leg, if thereby life is saved. How often our calamities are our preservatives!

"All these things shall be added unto you," and the measure of the addition shall be arranged by infallible wisdom. Temporal things shall come to you in such proportion as you would yourself desire them if you were able to know all things and to form a judgment according to infinite wisdom. Would you not prefer a lot selected by the Lord to one chosen by yourself? Do you not joyfully sing, with the Psalmist, "Thou shalt choose mine inheritance for me?"

SELF-BURIED.

The wording of the text, "All these things shall be added unto you," reminds me that the acquisition of property often decreases a man rather than adds to him. Have you not seen a man become visibly smaller as his riches grew greater? It is a wretched sight, which has often pained me. I have distinctly seen a man become "the architect of his own fortune" and the destroyer of himself. He has built up a palatial estate upon the ruins of his own manhood. It is a pity when a man bricks himself up with his growing gains. See you that hole in the wall? The man stands in it and greedily cries for bricks and mortar. Golden bricks and silver mortar he must have. They bring him the materials. He cries eagerly for more. He cannot be content unless he builds himself in. The wall which shuts him out from his fellow-men, and from the light of peace and true joy, rises higher and higher month by month, and year by year. His sympathies and charities are bricked up, for the wall is more than breast-high. Still he pines for more metallic material. At last he is built in, buried beneath his own gatherings, lost to all manhood through his accumulations. You see his house; you see his carriage and his horses; you see his broadcloth and his broad acres; but you cannot see the man. Heart, soul, aspiration, spirituality—it is all gone, and nothing remains but a vault of greed and care, to be itself buried under a monument bearing these words, "He died worth a million."

A far more desirable idea is for a man to rise above his possessions, elevating life upon stepping-stones of these dead gains; building with them a pedestal, above which the inner manhood rises.

This is what God intends to do in providence to the man who serves Him heartily; He will add to him the things of this life. Do not slice pieces out of your manhood, and then hope to fill up the vacancies with bank-notes. He who loses manliness or godliness to gain gold is a great cheater of himself. Keep yourselves entire for God and for His Christ, and let all other matters be additions, not subtractions. Live above the world. Its goods will come to you when you do not bid high for them. If you hunt the butterfly of wealth too eagerly you may spoil it by the stroke with which you secure it. Men and brethren, let us so live that it will be safe for God to add to us the blessings of the life that now is; but that can only be done with safety when we have learned to keep the world under our feet.

THREE LEADERS IN THE SOCIAL PURITY CRUSADE.

MRS. JOSEPHINE E. BUTLER,

whose earnestness and devotedness have made her name known throughout Christendom, has taken a prominent part in the work of the campaign inaugurated by the Pall Mall Gazette. She has recently issued an appeal to the voters of the country, urging them to elect members of Parliament of good moral character, pledged to legislate for the protection of the weak and the punishment of vicious seducers of all ranks. She says: "I hope the day is past in which it could be said or believed that it was possible for a man who was corrupt in his private life and character to be a useful, just, or beneficent ruler. When women who, like myself, having done what they could to save a few of the lost, have looked at such men in Parliament, and heard them arguing against any proposed modicum of protection for little girls, they have felt sick with anger and sorrow in their knowledge of facts of which they could not speak, because none would have believed or heeded their words. We have listened to cynical arguments in favor of the protection of male vice from men in the House of Commons whose illegitimate children and cast-off paramours we have sheltered and nursed in their disease, and poverty, and desertion, and the victims of whose cruelty we have labored hard to restore to hope and a new life. Sometimes, after looking down from the ladies' gallery there, or vainly arguing with some hardened sinner in the lobby, we have returned to our almost hopeless work among their victims, and have been driven in a moment of darkness to ask, 'Is there indeed a God in heaven?'"

"I have seen a good mother, wild with grief, kneeling by the dead body of her young daughter in my own house, where my husband and I had received the dying outcast, and heard that mother shriek the name of the man, the gentleman, the 'honorable member for —' who had ruined her child. 'If that man could but see her now!' she cried. 'O God, keep me from thoughts of revenge and blood.'"

"It is a matter of regret to thousands of women that they are unable, at this critical moment, to bring any direct influence to bear in the creation of the new Parliament; and all the more do they earnestly pray that the electors—those among them at least who fear God and love justice—will take full advantage of the present wave of public feeling in favor of righteousness which has been promoted, in God's providence. We do hope better things of a new Parliament than we have realized in the past."

part in the movement, as he has previously done in the temperance and other movements, tending to social reform. He was one of the first belonging to his denomination to adopt the blue ribbon, and continues to wear it.

PROFESSOR STUART, M.P., occupies the Chair of Mechanics and Applied Science in Cambridge University. He succeeded the late Mr. Fawcett in the representation of the borough of Hackney in Parliament, and will, it is hoped, be re-elected this year. It is well known at Cambridge and Hackney, that Professor Stuart is a most strenuous advocate for Social Purity, and has a strong antipathy to everything of an immoral character, wherever it exists. From the outset of the current "crusade" he has thrown the weight of his great name and his magnificent oratorical power upon the side of the sufferers, and, while using his influence in Parliament to promote increased stringency of law, he has exerted himself among the young men in the University in which he is a Professor to raise the moral tone of the class from which the wrong-doers come.

NEW BOOKS. SUNDAY READING

for the Young for 1886 will be the delight of many a nursery during the coming year. It is full of short, bright stories of a pure, elevating character, many of which are directly illustrative of Scripture narrative, and others are based on the great events of modern history, with a religious tendency, such as the "Peck of Troubles," describing the adventures of a child in the Indian mutiny. But the great feature of the book which will endear it to the little ones is the pictures, which are really excellent. The engraving, for example, of Moses in the bulrushes [p. 199], is an exquisite work of art. There are two hundred and fifty illustrations in all, the majority being full-page engravings. Pp. 412. Price, $1.25. Published by E. & J. B. Young & Co., Cooper Union, New York.

CHRIST AND CHRISTIANITY, by Philip Schaff. "The time has now fully come," says Dr. Schaff, "for America to produce her own distinctive theology, not indeed in selfish and conceited isolation, but in organic union with the Catholic theology of evangelical Christendom throughout the world." American theology should mark a new era in the progressive development of the Church—a development not of the divine truth itself, which is perfect and unchangeable, but of the human apprehension and application of the truth as it is in Christ and His gospel; for all legitimate and normal progress in theology and religion is simply a growth in Christ." Dr. Schaff mentions among the favorable conditions under which America would undertake the work the existence of the voluntary principle of self-support and self-government, the fact that she has access to and appreciates the treasure houses of European theology, the commingling of denominations which she sees within her borders, and the example recently set her in the union of the Old and New School of the Presbyterian Church. The direction which Dr. Schaff would have this development to take may be inferred from his remark that "Christ is far higher and deeper and broader than all Christologies. No single mind, no church or sect, has ever exhausted the fulness of His divine-human personality. Every age must grapple anew with the great mystery of godliness, and make it alive and fruitful for its own intellectual and spiritual benefit." Reviewing the various doctrines adopted by the different sections of the church from the time when Christ put the question, "But whom say ye that I am?" to the present day, Dr. Schaff proceeds to examine the theories recently propounded in explanation of this central and fundamental doctrine of the unity of the two natures in Christ. He cites with a detail wearisome to any but theological students the hair-splitting refinements of the leaders in the German schools, in which he naturally takes a deep interest. The second portion of his work Dr. Schaff devotes to polemical and Irenical studies, and the third to moral and social studies. The last section deals with the question of slavery, the Sabbath, religious freedom, and the discord and concord of Christendom. There is an immense fund of encyclopædic information in this work, which will be very valuable to theological students. The lay reader will be apt to charge it with the fault that characterizes so many works by German theologians, of being bewildering rather than enlightening. That in spite of his metaphysical refinements Dr. Schaff clearly apprehends the root of the whole matter is, however, evident from his closing words: "Neither immersion nor pouring—neither Lutheranism nor Calvinism nor Arminianism—neither Romanism nor Protestantism nor any other ism availeth anything but a new creature. And as many as walk according to this rule peace be on them, and mercy, and upon the Israel of God." Pp. 310. Price, $2.50. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

CHRISTIAN THOUGHT.

The valuable bi-monthly magazine edited by Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., maintains in its current number the high reputation it has attained. It opens with the Anniversary Address which Dr. Deems delivered last summer at the close of the fifth year of the work of the American Institute of Christian Philosophy, as its President. It is a satisfactory exhibit of the high aims of that organization. "Primeval Man," the second paper, is by George D. Armstrong, D.D., Norfolk, Va., and is an outline survey of a wide field. The writer claims, however, that "no important fact bearing on the question at issue has been intentionally omitted." And in common with an increasing number of those who have undertaken the same task in a candid spirit, he comes to the conclusion "that no sufficient reason, either scientific or historical, has as yet been given for abandoning what has been hitherto the almost universal faith, not of Christian peoples alone, but of the more enlightened heathen also, as manifested in their traditions—that man was created some six or seven thousand years ago, and that he commenced his course as a civilized being, believing in the one only living and true God." The remaining papers are "Ethics and Religion," by Rev. William De W. Hyde, President of Bowdoin College, and a history of "The Summer Schools of 1885," by the Secretary of the Institute. Price 40 cents; $2 a year. Published at 4 Winthrop Place, N. Y.

THE DAWNING

and the Day Spring are two little books specially prepared for children. They are by Mrs. Valentine. The Dawning is a series of familiar talks on the Old Testament, narrating in easy language, with simple comments and explanations, the chief events of the Pentateuch, and very briefly of the books of Joshua, Judges, and the Kings. The Day Spring deals on the same principle with the gospels. Mrs. Valentine has evidently had much to do with little children, and knows what will interest them. She seems to follow with clear insight the course their thoughts naturally take and to anticipate the questions that an intelligent child would ask. When following, as she frequently does, the language of Scripture, she is careful by a foot-note to explain every word that might puzzle the young mind, and by simple comment to point out obvious lessons. Each volume contains a large number of illustrations. Pp. 340 and 342. Price in cloth binding, 75 cents each. Published by Frederick Warne & Co., 20 Lafayette Place, New York.

A DYING SAILOR-BOY'S MESSAGE.

A CUSTOM-HOUSE cutter cruising off the coast of Kinsale, Ireland, one winter evening, sighted a vessel, bark-rigged, bearing the name "Florence Barton." Not a soul was to be seen on board, and the vessel was drifting helpless on the incoming tide toward the shore. The master of the cutter hailed her, but without response. At length a black face showed itself for a moment, and made a signal of distress. When the cutter came alongside, the colored man, who had shown himself, and was apparently the cook, called out that every man on board was dead or dying of fever. Some of the crew of the cutter went on board and navigated the ship to the mouth of the harbor, where she was anchored until a report was sent to the harbor-master. Two surgeons were sent out with the marines who went to take charge of the ship, and they found it as the cook had stated. Not one of the crew was able to do duty, all being down in various stages of the disease. The vessel was laden with palm oil, and was on her way from the coast of Africa.

The news spread rapidly through the port of Kinsale, and two clergymen, one of whom was the Rev. Duncan Craig, vicar of Kinsale, resolved to go on board the fever-stricken ship to administer spiritual advice to the dying crew. It was an heroic act, but where souls are in peril the ministers of Christ know their duty, and do it. It was a horrible experience; the smell from the dead bodies was intolerable, and among them were the dying men. Lighted by a coastguardsman with a lantern, Mr. Craig and his brother minister went from cot to cot, telling the dying men of Him who saved the thief on the cross in His last agony.

At last Mr. Craig came to a cot in which a lad was lying, still dressed in his uniform and with his hands on his head. He had evidently remained on duty until the very last, and, when finally forced to break down, was too weak for anything but to fling himself dressed as he was on his mattress.

"My poor boy," said Mr. Craig, "you are dying."

The glazing eyes closed once and reopened. "Yes sir," he said, "I know it—I could not stand any longer—I held on as long as I could—Will you write to my mother? She is a good woman—Tell her I kept my promise—She knows—Send her my Bible—It's in my locker there—I read it every day—I'm going to Jesus." The words came slowly and with labored breathing. Mr. Craig bent down and whispered, "'Rock of Ages cleft for me.'" And the boy added the next line, "Let me hide myself in thee."

"You are at peace, my boy?" asked the clergyman.

"Yes, sir; I'm not afraid—Jesus is sure to see after me—Don't forget my mother—She'll be glad to know—It'll comfort her—You'll find her address in the locker—It's coming now—Good-by, sir." He slightly turned, looked upward, and was gone.

In the locker his Bible was found, as had said, and it bore marks of frequent perusal. It was duly forwarded to his mother, and with it a record of his dying words. In her acknowledgment of its receipt the mother said that her boy was the child of many prayers, and her knowledge that God had answered them so filled her heart with joy that she could not mourn for his death. She believed that few days remained for her on earth, and she was looking forward to a joyful meeting with her son in heaven. Mr. Craig, who relates this incident, says that in the whole course of his ministry, during which he witnessed many strange scenes, he never saw one that more forcibly impressed him with the value of the Gospel for the dying and the bereaved.

THE SILVER LINING.

A Friend in Need.

FRANK ARNOLD sat in his office on that rainy morning unconscious of his wife's accident. She would be home presently, he knew, but the fact did not affect him pleasantly or otherwise. His brow was knit, and as he sat at his desk, abstractedly trifling with a paper-knife and a few pens, he was lost in thought. Before him was the blank-book in which he kept a record of his chemical experiments, and he intended continuing the work this morning, but as yet he had not written a line. He was wrestling with another kind of problem which just now was a more urgent matter. Twenty dollars was all that stood between him and absolute destitution. It is true that an application to his father would bring him relief, but that application he could not bring himself to make. His decision to emigrate was not approved by Dr. Arnold, and Frank, having persisted in opposition to his father's wishes, could not ask assistance from him without virtually confessing that he had been wrong and his father right. This was a humiliation which Frank would not make if he could avoid it.

"What a miserable hole for a man to be in," thought the disappointed man. Then followed the natural sequence, "What a fool I have been!" The morose fit, which of late had been upon him frequently, took possession of him. He wished he had never seen Clare, wished he had not married her before Crowther died, and as he pitied and blamed himself he uttered a muttered malediction on the old man. Even Clare, innocent as she was of fault in this matter, did not escape Frank's ire. It was owing to her that he was in poverty and difficulty, he said to himself, and he almost hated her as he pitied himself. Like most men who have been snared by their own cupidity, he was disposed to blame every one who had been connected with his disaster. Men of energy and resource, when confronted with difficulty, concentrate their attention upon the difficulty and the means of surmounting it. Weak men make an effort to do it, and, finding themselves unequal to the task, fall to repining and resentment against others. Frank was weak—the problem of ways and means had passed from his mind, and he was dwelling bitterly on the thought that he was an ill-used man. The scheme he had adopted to render life easy for himself had ended in fastening a burden upon his shoulders. In trying to escape from the duty of maintaining himself he had become involved in the duty of providing for another in addition to himself. In trying to escape humiliation at home he had come to America, where it was harder to make his way. Like a school-boy shirking his lessons, he had received chastisement and an imposition harder than the original lesson. All Frank's self-communings ended in this way—irritation, remorse, vexation, but no progress.

He was aroused by the sound of a carriage stopping before his door, and an inquiry for Dr. Arnold. He looked up eagerly, hoping that a patient had summoned him at last. A young man, tall and handsome and frank of manner, stood before him. Frank listened as the stranger told him briefly of Clare's accident, and then went to help her to alight.

"I will not stay now," said the stranger, when Clare had been safely brought in; "but I am very anxious about Mrs. Arnold's injury. She is kind enough to acquit me of blame, but I cannot forget that if I had not appeared so suddenly she would not have fallen. Permit me to call this evening to inquire for her." He laid his card on the table and was gone. Frank glanced at it hastily, read the name, "Mr. George Greville," and went to examine Clare's injured limb.

True to his promise, Mr. Greville called in the evening, and Frank received him alone. It was only a sprain, he said. They were generally very painful, but it would be well in a few days. There was not much cordiality in his manner, but the stranger seemed oppressed by his own responsibility, and anxious to show friendly feeling.

"I am an Englishman, Dr. Arnold," he said, "and I infer from your accent that I may claim you as a compatriot. I wish we had been thrown together by some happier incident. I am only a stranger in the city, and should be glad to make your acquaintance."

The isolation in which Frank Arnold had spent the last few months, and the gloom that weighed upon him, combined to render him susceptible to this ingenuous offer. He had made not a single friend in America, possibly because his proud, reserved manner repelled advances; but the easy friendliness of the stranger leaped the barriers, and he cordially extended his hand, with an expression that had in it just a perceptible touch of gratitude. The two men sat down together, and were soon engrossed with a conversation on English topics.

"I am an idle dog," said Mr. Greville, when, near upon midnight, he rose to leave: "I should regard it as a privilege if you would let me drop in upon you occasionally in the evening. It is many months since I spent so pleasant a time. I have some very good friends here, but I enjoy talking with some one who knows the old scenes and the old people at home."

"I shall welcome you very gladly, Mr. Greville," Frank said, "whenever you care to come. I have not had a single twinge of the horrors of exile to-night, thanks to you."

"And you will let me know if I come at an inconvenient time. You physicians are busy men, I know, and I must not keep you from your patients."

"Oh, you need not have any apprehension of that kind in my case," said Frank, laughing. "I could give you a whole day without imperiling anybody's life. The fact is that I have no patients yet. I am almost ashamed to confess it. I hope I shall do better after a while, but so far the land has been barren of fees."

"And you are naturally disappointed. I ought to be able to help you in that. I have no sick friends, but some of them surely must have some one belonging to them who gets sick occasionally, or fancies himself sick, which is the same thing for your purpose. I will introduce you, and I shall not come upon you for commission."

After this first interview Mr. Greville became a frequent visitor at the physician's quarters. His hearty, genial manner, his inexhaustible flow of high spirits, and his evident good-will, brightened the little rooms on which the grim spectre of poverty was laying its ghastly fingers. He did more than this, too. So persistently did he talk of the skillful young doctor that in a few weeks Frank Arnold had three patients whom he treated so successfully that he was installed as the family physician. But the money anxiety was not dispelled. The poor little store was quite exhausted, and a few articles of jewelry had disappeared from Frank's dressing-case to replenish it. When and how the struggle was to end he did not know, and his gloom deepened.

"What a glorious evening," said Mr. Greville, as he entered the little office one balmy summer day. "What do you say to a stroll through the park? It is a sin to be in-doors in such weather."

Frank assented at once, and the two gentlemen sauntered through the streets toward the Fifth Avenue entrance. It was at the worst crisis through which the young physician had passed. The exchequer was quite empty, and on the morrow something else would have to be disposed of for bare necessities. The knowledge of the fact had weighed on Frank all day, making him more than usually morose. He was the victim of these fits, sustaining all the weight of them. It was particularly painful for her, because of late there had come into Frank's sullenness a suggestion of reproach which she was quick to recognize.

Only an hour before Mr. Greville's entrance Frank had used an expression that left no doubt in her mind that her husband had married her solely for her prospective fortune and had never really loved her. She gave him one startled, shocked look, as if he had struck her, and hurried away to her room, that she might weep alone. Once there her agitation seemed as if it would rend her heart. "Why had he ever professed to love her? Why had he not heeded her warning that she was not sure of her guardian's fortune? It was a cruel injustice to reproach her as the cause of his exile and embarrassment." Clare sat and rocked herself, sobbing as she thought this, and her resentment under the undeserved blame seemed like a flood carrying her away from her husband's side. For the first time since her marriage she felt something like anger toward Frank. She heard Mr. Greville's voice, heard the door close behind them, and then she dressed hurriedly and went out. She cared not where she went. Utterly lonely and miserable, she passed through the streets, and walked for over an hour, as if flying to some refuge, having in her mind all the time the crushing consciousness that in all the world there was no refuge open to her.

Meanwhile the two friends had penetrated to the shady recesses of the park, and, having flung themselves on a seat, lighted their cigars.

"How are you getting on, Arnold?" asked Mr. Greville. "How is the practice? Beginning to look prosperous?"

"No, it is not," Frank said, gloomily. "It is about low-water mark with me, I think. I begin to fear I shall never succeed. I was thinking to-day of applying for a place as car-driver. I believe those fellows are happier than I am."

"You would only waste your time, my dear fellow. You could not get the place without influence. Better try something else. But seriously, is it so bad as that?"

Frank produced two half-dollars from his pocket, and adjusting them with careful nicety on the palm of his hand, said: "There, Greville, that is all my worldly wealth. I have not another cent in the world, and just now I don't know where to get more."

"You are not serious, Arnold?" Mr. Greville said, looking searchingly in his friend's face. "Now I look at you, I believe you are. Why did you not tell me before? You are not too proud to accept help from a friend, are you? I should be delighted if you would let me come to your relief. I do not spend near all my income. My good father, who died three years ago, left me all his fortune, as he had no other child, and I have enough and to spare. If you will accept a hundred dollars or more you are welcome to it. You can regard it as a loan to be paid back when you have hosts of patients and have no time to give to idle gossips like me."

"You are very kind, Greville, you are quite a Good Samaritan. I have always had a poor opinion of a man who accepts money obligations from his friends, but I never knew till now how dire a strait a man may be fixed in. I must get money in some way, and I think I would rather owe it to you than to any one else. I should like you to know my story."

"There is nothing I should like better," said Greville.

"Then I will tell you the whole thing, and you will see that I have had enough disappointment to account for misanthropical sentiments that may have surprised you at times." So Frank related the incidents with which the reader is acquainted, ending with the inquiry: "Did you ever know a man's life so utterly wrecked?"

"I should not admit that," said Greville. "It might have been much worse. Matrimony and finance often end badly when they get mixed. Don't forget that you might have married some vulgar, repulsive woman in like circumstances. I cannot imagine your doing so, but when a man is eager for a fortune he shuts his eyes to the imperfections of the lady. Now, you have a wife of whom any man might be proud. She is beautiful, accomplished, and lovable. Of course missing the fortune is vexatious; but I should not consider the marriage a mistake."

"It was a most unhappy mistake," said Frank. "Mrs. Arnold is singularly unfitted for a poor man's wife. I feel as though I had taken an expensive child and was responsible for her welfare."

Mr. Greville shrank from the man who could so speak of a lady who, to him, seemed all that a man could desire in a wife. The very helplessness dependence at which Frank hinted constituted a charm in his eyes. "Well," he said, "tastes differ; for my part, I could never be attracted by those strong-minded women who know everything and can manage their husband's business as well as his domestic affairs. The simple, child-like dependence which seems to have veiled you would nerve me to ambitious effort. I should like my wife, if I ever have one, to be utterly and completely dependent upon me for every joy in her life."

"You see I have had experience and you have not. If you were in my position, battling for the means of life, you would feel that a helpless burden on your shoulders placed you at a disadvantage."

"Possibly," said Greville, rising, "but I cannot imagine it. Let us walk through this avenue; it will bring us out on my side of the park, and you can come into my quarters, and I will write you a cheque. The sooner you get out of that impecunious position the better."

For the first time in their acquaintance a perceptible chill had fallen upon the intercourse of the two men. Mr. Greville, who was an open-handed, unselfish man, was almost disgusted with the physician's blunt depreciation of his wife, while Frank resented the implied censure upon himself which Greville had uttered, and attributed it to the arrogance which is apt to be engendered by pecuniary obligations. The impulse on both sides, however, was only momentary, and when Greville wrote a cheque for five hundred dollars and handed it to his friend, Frank grasped his hand with hearty and sincere gratitude, and Greville, warmed by the pleasure of acting generously, returned the grasp with as much cordiality. "After all," he thought, "money difficulties change and warp a man's nature. He sees everything for the time in a jaundiced light, and seems a worse man than he really is." The conviction that Mrs. Arnold was not appreciated by her husband, however, remained in his mind as an unpleasant fact which was not forgotten.

The sense of obligation sat more lightly on Frank Arnold's mind than might have been expected. The embarrassment of the past few weeks had been so bitter that relief in any shape was acceptable, and only in a tinge of deference in his manner when Mr. Greville was with him could a close observer have detected any sign that Frank was conscious of obligation. Mr. Greville was as cordial and genial as before, just as much interested in his friend's fortunes, and as eager as ever to promote them. He redoubled his efforts after Frank's confidence, and succeeded in getting him introduced in circles which directly and indirectly would be profitable. No mention was made in their subsequent intercourse of Frank's relations with his wife; both men felt that the subject was a dangerous one, which it was well to avoid. Mr. Greville, however, had not forgotten the feeling expressed by his friend, and, as he saw more of Mrs. Arnold, his own conviction that Frank was unjust was confirmed. Perhaps he was more observant than before, or it may be that Frank, having explained his position, was less guarded in his manner to his wife, but to Mr. Greville it seemed almost unnatural. It was toleration rather than respect or love that Frank displayed when she was present. And she had evidently suffered deeply. The sympathetic observer noticed that all merriment had left her, and, in place of the girlish playfulness that used to characterize her, there was depression and sadness. His sympathy was drawn out toward her, and he endeavored whenever, on rare occasions, she entered the room during his visits, to show by his deference and interest in her remarks that he entertained kindly feeling toward her. It was a dangerous position for a young man to take whose passions were not controlled by strong religious principle.

One evening, near the close of the Indian summer, the danger reached a crisis. It was a beautiful night. The moon was at the full, and all nature, robed in the rich tints of autumn, seemed to invite her lovers to look upon her glory. Greville went home about ten o'clock, but looking around as he stood at his door, he was attracted by the beauty of the scene, and turned away from his close rooms for a stroll. He sauntered into Fifty-ninth Street, and walked slowly westward from Fifth Avenue under the trees that bound the park on that side. The aristocratic residents had not returned from the watering-places, the houses on the south side were still closed, and the street was deserted. Not entirely, however. On the lowest step of a high stoop, clear in the bright moonlight, he saw a woman sitting. Her shoulders were bent forward, her face buried in her hands, as if in an agony of grief. Greville was passing on, thinking that it was some outcast of the streets overcome by liquor, when something familiar about the figure arrested his attention. He crossed over, and looked at the woman. As his shadow fell upon her she raised her face, all tear-stained, and recognition was mutual. "Mr. Greville," was all she could say; while Greville, with a look of tenderness and deep compassion, exclaimed: "Surely it is Mrs. Arnold."

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 15, Jonah 3. Golden Text, Neh. 9 : 17. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Jonah Held to the Duty—His Readiness to go to Nineveh—His Preaching Effectual—Effect of the Royal Example—A Day of Humiliation Proclaimed—Jonah's Chagrin—His Reputation as a Prophet Depreciated—Charges God with Going Back on Him—The Lesson of the Gourd—God's Messengers Should be Neither Rebellious nor Officious.

ALL the trial and discipline, the almost death and burial through which Jonah had passed, did not excuse him from the renunciation of his will to which God called him. Once upon the dry land again, "the word of the Lord came unto Jonah the second time, saying, Arise, go unto Nineveh, that great city, and preach unto it the preaching that I bid thee." There was no longer any resistance. "Jonah arose, and went unto Nineveh, according to the word of the Lord." But did not the very same hindrances exist as did before? Yes, truly. How, then, was that now possible which before had seemed so impossible? Jonah had seen something more of God, and in proportion Jonah was something less in his own eyes.

"Now Nineveh was an exceeding great city of three days' journey," i. e., about a hundred English miles.* Lands and gardens belonging to the houses were comprised within the city. Jonah fulfilled his mission in a very simple way. Alone, without any announcement, he, a single pedestrian, entered one of the approaches to the city, and cried aloud: "Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown."† But how could he know that the people would take any notice of him? How did he know he should not be apprehended as a brawler, or confined as a lunatic? Simply by this:

GOD HAD SENT HIM;

he was not going a warfare on his own charges, and God was responsible for making the people believe and receive his message. Oh, how simple and easy is a life of faith in the living God; fear, anxiety, burden cannot find a place where He is fully trusted! When He makes His will clearly known to us we have not to make it possible by our human contrivances—if He calls His children to impossibilities, to bring the utterly unspiritual to understand spiritual things, and those who seem to have no conscience to understand integrity, then He is pledged to bring it about. The same God who commanded Jonah to preach Himself worked on the hearts and consciences of the people of Nineveh. Jonah did not need to use any compulsion, or to conjure up any powerful arguments in order to bring the people to a right mind. God was teaching Jonah that he was but an instrument, nothing in himself; to be used or not, as God willed. But God did a mighty work. Then arose such an awakening as was unprecedented in the history of nations: "So the people of Nineveh believed God, and proclaimed a fast, and put on sackcloth, from the greatest of them even to the least of them. For word came unto the King of Nineveh, and he arose from his throne, and he laid his robe from him, and covered himself with sackcloth, and sat in ashes." It was the example of the king which led the people to humble themselves; had he simply commanded them to do it they would have done it only as a form. Oh that in our days there were seen this kind of national repentance for and turning from sin, this

NATIONAL ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF GOD!

The King was not ashamed to take the thing to heart, and to let all the people know that his conscience was aroused, and that he felt himself responsible. "And he caused it to be proclaimed and published through Nineveh by the decree of the king and his nobles, saying, Let neither man nor beast, herd nor flock, taste anything; let them not feed, nor drink water; but let man and beast be covered with sackcloth, and cry mightily unto God: yea, let them turn every one from his evil way, and from the violence that is in their hands. Who can tell if God will turn and repent, and turn away from His fierce anger, that we perish not?" Here is a heathen king as amenable to God as the heathen mariners were in the ship when Jonah took passage to Tarshish: the sailors had been praying men, and the King of Nineveh became a preacher of righteousness. And the instrument which God used was the imperfect, self-sufficient, selfish prophet Jonah! It was a sight which pleased God. He "saw their works, that they turned from their evil way; and God repented of the evil, that He had said that He would do unto them; and He did it not."

God was pleased, but

JONAH WAS DISPLEASED.

He had become again the instrument owned of God, a mighty awakening had followed his few words, and Jonah was again beginning to hold up his head. But now God turned from His purpose, and by doing so falsified the very words which had been used to create so great an impression: what would the people think? Would they not think he was a false prophet, a mere adventurer? In the intensity of his mortified pride Jonah became "very angry." Happily he let out the bitterness of his soul to God; he prayed unto the Lord, and said: "I pray Thee, O Lord, was not this my saying, when I was yet in my country? Therefore I fled before unto Tarshish: for I knew that Thou art a gracious God, and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and repentest Thee of the evil. Therefore now, O Lord, take, I beseech Thee, my life from me; for it is better for me to die than to live."

What did Jonah want? Is it conceivable that he should have preferred the destruction of Nineveh so long as he had his own will, and so long as his reputation as a true prophet was intact? Is it conceivable that any child of God could possess such a heart, could so idolize self, could be so heartless and ruthlessly cruel with regard to others? We are apt to think that God uses most those who are most Christlike. This is not always the case. At the very time when Jonah, in his despicable self-will, had fled from the presence of the Lord, and even at the very time when he showed not the slightest consideration for the lives of those in the ship, God made him, in spite of himself, the means of their conversion. They learned that God was good at the very time when they learned how bad a man of God could be. Their recollection of Jonah could never be very flattering to him. We have often remarked by what imperfect and un-Christlike instruments God often works, "that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of man" (1 Cor. 4 : 7). But God has no purpose to leave His children thus unholy and imperfect. When men like Jonah make an idol of their reputation He breaks down that reputation in every conceivable way; when men set up their self-will He crosses that will in every way until it is renounced forever and continuously. Poor Jonah! had the crew of the ship been asked

they would have said: "He fears God, and does not fear death; but he is the most heartless, selfish, sulky man we ever met." Had the men of Nineveh been asked his character, they would have said: "There is wonderful power in his preaching, but all he says does not come to pass." Were any child in one of our Sunday-schools asked, What kind of man was Jonah? they would probably answer: "Jonah was the selfish prophet, who got sulky with God, and cared more about the shadow of a gourd for his own comfort than he did about the lives of a hundred and twenty thousand persons." But oh, how tender is our God! Jonah, even in his evil temper, spoke to God, and God, knowing how thoroughly ill-humored he was, nevertheless spoke back to him, "Dost thou well to be angry?" Jonah did not care to prolong his communion with God when it turned on this point. So he "went out of the city, and sat on the east side of the city, and there made him a booth, and sat under it in the shadow; still he might see what would become of the city."

God did not leave him alone here; He "prepared a gourd, and made it to come up over Jonah, that it might be a shadow over his head, to deliver him from his grief." This touched Jonah's heart: this was something that appealed to self; his comfort and convenience were involved in this. "Jonah was exceeding glad of the gourd." It must have seemed strange to the people of Nineveh that Jonah was not "exceeding glad" of their deliverance; but sympathy with others did not occur to the heart of this mean, selfish man. Joy or sorrow with him always had its rise in what affected himself. God's dealings with him were not at an end; He "prepared a worm when the morning rose the next day, and it smote the gourd that it withered." At the same time God prepared a sultry east wind, and the sun beat on the head of Jonah. It was one of those days of almost insupportable heat, and the shade he had so rejoiced in was gone. It did not take much he was an ungracious, unpleasing man, and he was fertile in finding reasons why he should be uncomfortable and make everybody else so; he got thoroughly out of temper, and wanted to die. This was an old story with Jonah. And God said to him, "Dost thou well to be angry for the gourd?" And he said even to God, "I do well to be angry, even unto death." Then God set the truth before him, and surely if anything could take the conceit out of him this would. "Thou hast had pity on the gourd, for the which thou hast not labored, neither madest it grow; which came up in a night, and perished in a night; and should not I spare Nineveh, that great city, wherein are more than sixscore thousand persons that cannot discern between their right hand and their left hand; and also much cattle?" We do not know the sequel, but the teaching is clear enough. God can use even those whom He is obliged to humble; but how much more blessed is it when His prophets work willingly and consciously with Him, as Elijah and Elisha did, than when, like Jonah, they take their own way, and have to be thwarted at every step! But God is faithful even to His rebellious Jonahs, and He will not sacrifice His work to the self-will or self-interest of man.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

* Layard, who thoroughly explored it, says its area was about two hundred and forty miles. It was from eighteen to twenty miles long and from twelve to fourteen wide.—Ed.

† Jonah appears to have exceeded his commission in fixing a limit of forty days. We do not read that he was authorized to do that or to prophesy its overthrow at all. Hence his chagrin when God did not fulfil the prediction (see Jonah 4 : 1-3).—Ed.

SUNLIGHT IN THE HEART.

There is sunlight on the hilltop,
There is sunlight on the sea,
And the golden beams are sleeping
On the soft and verdant lea.
But a richer light is filling
All the chambers of my heart,
For Thou art there, my Father,
And 'tis sunlight where Thou art.

Thou hast whispered Thy forgiveness,
In the secret of my soul;
"Be of good comfort, daughter,
For I have made thee whole."
Thy "Father's name is broken,"
And loosed my captive wing;
And shall the bird be silent
Which Thou hast taught to sing?

In the dust I leave my sackcloth
As a thing of other days.
For Thou hast girded me with gladness,
And Thou rehest me with praise.
And to that home of glory
Thy hand hath won for me,
In heart and mind a-sending,
My spirit follows Thee.

Choose Thou for me, my portion,
My hither and my sweet.
The cup Thy hand doth mix me,
I will drink it at Thy feet.
While I'm waiting for that moment,
The brightest and the best,
When Thou shalt stoop to lift me
From Thy footstool to Thy breast.

Oh, ye who sit in darkness,
Ever mourning for your lot,
Open the windows of your soul,
Let the warm sunlight in.
In every ray was purchased for you,
By the matchless love of One
Who suffered in the shadow,
That you might see the sun.

Lord Jesus, Thou hast brought me,
And all life, my all is Thine;
Let the lamp Thy love has lighted,
To Thy love and to Thy grace,
A beacon amid the darkness,
Pointing upward where Thou art.
The smile of which Thy goodness
Is the sunlight of my heart.

WORKS OF J. W. KIMBALL.

How to See Jesus with Fulness of Joy and Peace.

250 pp. Cloth. Price, 75 cents.

This precious book has been the means of comfort to many a weary soul, and hoping that many more may be led to read its sweet exhortations, we give a few out of the many commendations we have received. A new edition has just been printed, and we send it forth earnestly hoping that it may be even more blessed in its ministrations than the former ones.

"I have been fifty years a member of the Presbyterian Church. Your 'How to See Jesus' has helped me to a better understanding of some things, and to deeper interest in the Scriptures. Your words are so plain and simple that they come at once to the heart as food in season."—T. C. Upton, N. Y.

"I have read 'How to See Jesus' with much joy; it brings so much help and comfort. I have read it many times. I find in 'How to See Jesus' just the reading we need."—M. M. Earle, N. Y.

"While in Des Moines, Iowa, I found your book 'How to See Jesus.' I have thought many times since the good Lord must have led me to it, as I found it in just the comfort and needed. It was a benefit to many of my friends; have decided to make them a present of it; so please send me twelve."

"Thanks for the precious book 'How to See Jesus.' I have never read a book that has done me any more good."—A. A. Colorado.

"Many thanks for calling my attention to 'How to See Jesus.' I find it grandly helpful."—W. J. Smith, Pueblo, Col.

Heaven: My Father's House.

250 pp. Cloth. Price, 75 cents.

It is often said we know nothing of Heaven, yet Jesus says, "All things that the Father hath are mine." The Comforter shall take of mine and show it unto you." True to his promise, from the day I knew the Lord, the Comforter began to show me heavenly things. What I freely received, He bade me freely give. The kind approvals here record increased my obligation, and not less my delight to share these joy-inspiring things with as many as I may. I pray God that each reader may find them His Lord's own revelations to himself.—Preface.

"I can surely say that, excepting my Bible, no book has ever done me so much good as Heaven: My Father's House. After a day spent in the sick room, weary and feeble, I read the book, and the angels, like him, you cannot imagine with what eagerness I turn to that book for rest, and it never fails to bring it, and with the prayer, 'Not as I will, O Father, but as Thou wilt.'"

"Death, as seen from Mr. K.'s point of view, is a natural event in the order of the Christian's life. In stating of reading from the book, I feel that I have led to this more familiar view to look upon the change without fear, yes, with cheerfulness."—Rev. J. H. Dicks, Antioch Theological Seminary.

"Full of pointed illustrations, fresh, vigorous writing; nothing dull; short, crisp sentences; the reader is home on rapidly; the writer speaks as though his thoughts rushed upon him. A fulness of nature, and joy in life runs through it."—S. K. B.

PRINCE ALEXANDER OF BULGARIA.

THE comparatively unimportant potentate whose portrait appears on the first page, who has suddenly sprung into prominence during the past few weeks and has set all Europe by the ears, is only twenty-eight years of age, having been born April 5th, 1857. Seven years ago he was utterly unknown beyond the circle which takes an interest in the gang of petty royalties and princelets which swarm about Germany. He is one of the Battenberg crowd, a brother of that Prince Henry who recently married the youngest daughter of the Queen of England. His father was Prince Alexander of Hesse, whose sister was the late Empress of Russia. He is therefore a first cousin of the present Czar of Russia.

It was a curious arrangement that placed him on the throne of Bulgaria. The Treaty of Berlin, signed in 1878, cut down the possessions of Turkey in Europe from 138,264 square miles to 62,028 square miles. It was a better arrangement for her than that wrung from her at the sword's point by her victorious enemy, Russia; but the Sultan might well be excused for thinking it was bad enough. Mr. Disraeli came to his rescue and delivered him from the penalty Russia had exacted from him; but Mr. Disraeli concerned himself chiefly in seeing that Russia did not get the plunder rather than in seeing that the Sultan was not plundered at all. Turkey was required to surrender a strip of territory on her southern borders to Greece, and to cease to govern a large tract of territory on her north, extending from the Black Sea on the east to the Adriatic on the west. This latter strip was divided by lines running from north to south. On the west was Bosnia; the next partition was Servia; and the third, which reached to the borders of the Black Sea, was divided into two, the northern half being Bulgaria, and the southern half Roumelia, the dividing line between the two being the Balkan Mountains, which run from east to west. Bulgaria had an area of 24,360 square miles, with a population of 2,000,000—that is, a little smaller than West Virginia, and about three times the population of that State. Roumelia had an area of 13,500 square miles, and a population of 850,000—that is, with the area of Maryland and the population of Philadelphia.

As to government, both countries were to pay a yearly tribute to Turkey, but were to manage their own affairs. Roumelia was to have a governor appointed by Turkey, and Bulgaria was to elect her own executive, subject to the veto of the great Powers. She chose Prince Alexander, prompted thereto, doubtless, by Russia, who had her generals and soldiers in all the great towns of Bulgaria. Much discontent was manifested at the time in Roumelia, but the English statesman's object in giving the executive in Turkish hands was to give Turkey the power of protecting the passes of the Balkans, through which a Russian army might advance to Constantinople if they were held by a weak Power, or a Power friendly to Russia.

Prince Alexander was in a delicate position. He was the nominee of Russia, and his election was favored by that Power because he was expected to be a puppet in the hands of Russia. He soon found, however, that his new subjects had no mind to see their land turned into a Russian province. He was in difficulty from the beginning, and had to decide whether he would offend Russia or brave the danger of losing his throne through Russian animosity and intrigue, or offending his people and braving the danger of their rising in rebellion and deposing him. For some time his course was a vacillating one. He took away the constitution, and attempted to govern as an absolute monarch; then he restored the constitution and coquetted with Russia. Finally, finding his people prepared to stand by him, he shook himself clear of Russia and identified himself with the national desire for independence in fact as well as in name.

Meanwhile the people on both sides the Balkans were in a seething condition. Roumelia was discontented by being under a Turkish governor-general, and Bulgaria was dissatisfied with the knowledge of her own weakness, and with the consciousness that on the other side of the Balkans was a people identified with her in race, language and religion, yet separated from her by a capricious paper barrier. Russia, for reasons of her own, sent agents through both countries to foster the discontent. She hoped to induce the two peoples to unite, but to make Roumelia jealous of accepting the ruler of her sister kingdom, and to demand a new king over the united kingdom, whom the Czar had ready for them in the person of his brother-in-law. But the Prince outwitted the Czar. He had the confidence of his people, and precipitated the revolution before the projects of Russia were ripe. Roumelia rose on September 18th, declared for union with Bulgaria, and proclaimed the Prince ruler over the united kingdom.

A distinguished Bulgarian prelate, and a most intelligent observer, said recently: "This has been purely the work of the people, and no government or statesman had any hand in it. It is not palatable to Russia, which we regret, because we are truly grateful to Russia for what she has done for us. Let us hope that she will not prove resentful, and, above all, avenge herself on our Prince, who has taken the heart of the Bulgarian people into his hand, where it rests in love and confidence. Besides, how deplorable would be the precedent which sanctioned the setting up of a new Prince over us, whenever our national action might not meet the unanimous approval of the Powers. We accepted the Prince that was given us. He has learned to understand us, and we have learned to love him. None has any right to take him from us." We have yet to see what action the Powers will take.

As we have already pointed out, the students of prophecy have formed the opinion that, sooner or later, such a union is likely to take place. It is in the line of the combination which European nations must occupy in the closing years of this dispensation, when the Roman earth will be divided into ten kingdoms, and Turkey will have wasted away. It cannot be definitely stated from the symbolic language of prophecy that this particular union will stand, but that some such change as this will be effected is beyond doubt.

THE REVOLUTION.

ON the morning of September 18th the Turkish Governor-General of Roumelia, Gavril Pasha, had finished his breakfast in his residence at Philippopolis, the capital, and rung the bell for the table to be cleared, when, instead of servants, there entered six soldiers headed by a colonel, who informed him he was a prisoner. The governor, who meanwhile had observed through a window that his garden was also filled with soldiers, remarked, "This is sudden," but offered no resistance, beyond expressing a wish to hand in a written protest, which he was not allowed to do. He was placed under guard but treated with respect, and was soon removed outside the city.

Shortly after his deposition the Roumelian militia, which happened to be enrolled for manoeuvres, assembled outside the palace, and a popular Pan-Bulgarian agitator, M. Stransky, read to them a proclamation inviting them to do homage to Prince Alexander, of Battenberg, the ruler of Northern Bulgaria. To this they joyfully responded, with great excitement. All day long people carried flags through the streets, and cried, "Long Live the Union," and at night crowds collected in the square before the palace, ratified the morning's proclamation, and vowed to sacrifice their lives in defence of the Union. The emblems of Turkish rule were pulled down, telegraphic communication between Philippopolis and Adrianople cut, some miles of the connecting railway destroyed, the railway bridge at Mustapha blown up, the population armed with lances, militia regiments despatched to the chief positions of the frontier toward Turkey, and a message sent to Prince Alexander at Varna inviting him to come and assume the sovereignty. This the message found him quite prepared to do, and he promptly issued a manifesto accepting the title of Prince of the Two Bulgaria, and, accompanied by his Prime Minister, went to Philippopolis. (His entry into the city shown in the picture on the first page.)

Philippopolis, the capital of Eastern Roumelia, lies on the river Maritza, between the Rhodope and the Kutchuk (Lesser) Balkan range. It stands on five tépés, or hills, the largest of which is three hundred and fifty feet high. The streets are narrow and badly paved, with the exception of a new road which leads from the centre of the town to the railway station. Her good modern houses have been constructed. Not, however, that there is any lack of public buildings in the town, there being a Konak, or Governor's Palace, thirty-seven places of worship, a home for orphans, three hospitals, spirit distillery, barracks to accommodate three thousand men, and stabling for five hundred horses, seven public baths, and several schools and colleges. The "Gymnase," or University, is a particularly fine building. The streets are well lighted with petroleum lamps, and an English company has now begun the erection of water-works.

The population numbers nearly thirty-five thousand—nearly one half are Bulgarians. The climate is very changeable, and the heat during the summer drives away the population to the hills, whereas in the winter months the cold is intense, a fine warm and bright day being frequently followed by snow, covering the ground three to four feet deep.

The character of the Bulgarians is suspicious, cunning and selfish; they are nevertheless a intelligent and thrifty race, possessing a great deal of ambition. They generally dislike foreigners. They are inhospitable, and social intercourse is almost unknown to them. March charity balls are, nevertheless, given in winter which are well attended. The Bulgarian language is spoken, although nearly all Bulgarians are acquainted with the Turkish and Greek languages.

THE CZAR OF RUSSIA.

ALEXANDER ALEXANDROVICH (whose portrait appears on the first page), who succeeded to imperial rule in the great Muscovite Empire at the assassination of his father, in March, 1881, was born on March 10th, 1845, and has consequently entered his forty-first year. He was married in November, 1866, to Maria Dagmar, daughter of the King of Denmark, sister to the Princess of Wales and to the King of Greece. She is known since assuming the Greek faith as Maria Feodorovna.

Like most Crown Princes during the lives of their fathers, the actual occupants of throne Alexander Alexandrovich, ever since he attained his majority, passed for a Liberal in politics, and is even believed to have coquetted, lately as 1879, with the more advanced Pan-Slavistic organizations, which were not lacking in points of contact with the associations formed for the promotion of a revolutionary movement in Russia.

When, however, it became evident to the imperial family and all loyal Russians that the chief aim of the nihilistic conspiracy was the assassination of the late Czar Alexander, the reason is believed that his son, the present Emperor, broke off all communications with every secret society in and out of Russia, and identified himself unreservedly with the line of action adopted by his father's advisers for the restoration of order and tranquillity to the Russian realms.

The Emperor is said to be a strong, determined man, though his nerves have been severely shaken by the continual peril of assassination which the first three years of his reign we passed. His face has none of that pathetic melancholy peculiar to his father's. His expression is active, keen, and somewhat severe. H anners are quick, decided, and occasionally brusque. He is not quite so tall as other members of his family, being a little under six feet in eight, but his frame is large, thick-set and muscular. He is the first Emperor since Peter who has married elsewhere than in Germany. The Herald correspondent says: "That the czar has been no carpet soldier is evident from the marks of frost-bites on the third and fourth fingers of his left hand and a slight scar on his temple, where a bullet grazed his head in one of the battles in the Turkish war. He is very popular in Copenhagen, where he and the Princess Dagmar, as she is still fondly called by the aunts, walk about the town together in the most unceremonious manner, and are always ready to take their part in any popular entertainment during the long visits which they periodically pay at her father's court. It also speaks well for him that he is supposed to require no extra amusement there, but to be perfectly happy, leading a simple life with his wife and children, roaming about in the park, and spending quiet evenings in the castle."

The Emperor receives the numerous deputations that wait upon him with a stern dignity which, though accompanied in most cases by a certain kindness of manner, always leaves the conviction that Alexander III. feels himself an autocrat, and is determined to yield none of his prerogatives, but to impress on all who approach him that they are in the presence of an absolute, though kindly master. This species of self-assurance was a trait in the character of the Emperor in his very earliest days.

On October 20th, at Kemuel, the Faith Rest, 7 South Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, was held the second conference that has taken place that city of believers in Christ's redemption of both soul and body. It should be understood that their principles are wholly distinct from the magnetic healers, the believers in the occult, and the spiritualistic laying-on of hands, which they repudiate as of the Evil One. It is worthy of note that the very first conference of this kind ever held in America, apart from those of Dr. Cullis, was held in Philadelphia, in June, 1882.

The Kemuel Home, in which the first session was held, was opened November 3d, 1884, by Mrs. Sarah G. Beck, of Germantown, who called and Mrs. Clift from Washington to assist. The work has been greatly blessed; many have been helped to a better spiritual life, and have been marvelously and instantly healed in answer to prayer. On the walls of the chapel of the Home are appropriate Scriptures, and several articles of special interest, intrinsic or from association. Prominent among the latter is a fine piece of sculpture representing the head of the Saviour, with the motto, "It is shed." Besides its merits as a work of art, it is pleasing from the fact that it was presented to the Home by the artist whose work it is, and is presented it as a thank-offering after being almost entirely recovered of severe lung fever the spring. He has been well ever since, and his work of art, which is an original conception, stands there as a mark of his thankfulness. The meeting was called to order by Dr. Clift, who suggested as a motto or key-note for the conference the significant words of the evangelist (Matt. 17:8): "And they saw no man save us only." After singing and prayer Mrs. Clift spoke. For over an hour the audience listened intently while she urged them to take their sorrows, griefs, trials, cares, burdens, and sicknesses of soul and body, definitely, and forever to the Lord, and let Him carry them away. Having once done this, they were not to repeat the prayer and ask a second time for the same thing, because "He had that matter now in hand," and whatever He undertook never failed. The Government was upon His shoulders.

The conference reassembled on the following day at 3 P.M., the house being densely crowded, even the aisles and stairways being thronged with eager listeners. Mr. G. W. McCalla, editor of Words of Faith, presided. It was a meeting for consecration, at which an address was given by Miss Carrie F. Judd, of Buffalo, N. Y., whose little book, "The Prayer of Faith," has had an immense circulation here and in England, and has been translated into French, German, Italian, Swedish and Spanish. Miss Judd's subject was Christian Consecration. Her address was followed by testimonies from the audience.

At the evening session, held in the Western Methodist Church, on Twentieth Street, below Walnut, Captain R. Kelso Carter presided and made a lengthy address. Rev. A. B. Simpson, of New York, followed, calling attention to the wonderful beneficence that flowed from the life of Christ. He reminded his hearers that their lives, as well as their prayers, should be full of sweetness and perfume, like the "garden enclosed" [Canticles 4: 12-16], that was full of spices and pleasant fruits and living waters.

The morning session of the following day was held, as all subsequent sessions had to be, owing to the large number attending, in the large Institute Hall, on Eighteenth and Chestnut streets. Dr. Clift presided. A number of requests for prayer were presented, some for spiritual blessings, and others for healing of a variety of diseases. Miss Judd then spoke of the faith necessary for the recovery of the body, and cited several cases which she had herself witnessed of complete restoration to health of persons grievously afflicted, some of whom had been sufferers for many years. Mrs. Baxter dwelt upon the miracles recorded in the New Testament. In conclusion, she gave an account of a young lady who was taken to Bethshan some time ago suffering from a complication of dangerous diseases, and who for thirteen years had been unable to sit up. She told how "she was entirely cured through the intercession of God and her faith in Him." The Rev. A. B. Simpson said "there was no contention with natural healing on the part of those who believed in divine healing," but he considered the former treatment necessarily human, and therefore limited. "Natural means for the body were well enough as far as they went, but they were not God's ways for His own children."

At the afternoon session Rev. D. D. Smith, of Wilmington, Del., presided. A number of those present gave their testimony regarding divine healing as exemplified in their own lives. They told of the various bodily ailments to which they had once been subject, and of the cures which they believed had been wrought by divine agency. After the session about twenty persons were anointed under the direction of Rev. A. B. Simpson, Mrs. Baxter and others.

Captain R. Kelso Carter presided over the evening exercises, which were opened with prayer by Dr. Clift. Rev. John Cookman, of New York, referred to the higher Christian life, which, he said, could be followed in this world, and gave personal testimony to prove the divine healing power. Rev. Mr. Simpson made the closing remarks, and narrated some of his experiences.

The testimony meeting on the third day of the conference was deeply interesting. For more than an hour one after another rose from among the crowd in the auditorium and briefly testified to their personal restoration to health from painful and apparently mortal sickness. On a rising testimony being called for more than one hundred and fifty responded, and when it was asked that those would rise who had suffered from organic or incurable disease and been healed by the Master without medicine or surgical appliances, seventy persons stood up.

An anointing service was held in the evening, at which forty sufferers presented themselves for the ceremony. The service was especially solemn and impressive, silent as the grave, save when broken by the notes of the consecration hymn or the voice of the "prayer of faith" offered immediately after Mr. Simpson applied a forefinger dipped in oil to the forehead of each person, and each one had the hands of some "believer" "in these things" on his head, according to James 5: 14-16, and Mark 16: 18: "They shall lay hands on the sick" (failing, Bangs's trans.), "and they shall recover."

Among prominent "believers" who laid on hands in this service were: Rev. D. D. Smith, Dr. Clements, of the Episcopal Church; Rev. John Cookman, of New York; Rev. R. C. Oliver, of South Carolina; Rev. Mr. Stahl and Rev. Philip Haendreges, of Philadelphia; and Rev. C. M. Mytinger, of Washington, D. C., of the Methodist Episcopal Church; Rev. Mr. Johns, of the Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia; Rev. A. Frank, Mennonite; Captain Carter, G. W. McCalla, Dr. and Mrs. Clift, and Mrs. Beck.

On the fourth day of the Convention Rev. D. D. Smith presided. Mrs. Baxter opened the morning session by reading a number of letters asking the prayers of believers for the writers and their friends, some of whom were in spiritual difficulty, and others desired physical healing. Mrs. Baxter then spoke of the "living water" of life referred to in the Bible, and compared it to "God's precious gift of the Holy Ghost, a gift that all believers might possess." She dwelt on the doctrine of "receiving by faith" and the change which the Holy Spirit could create in human beings; and she warned her hearers against wrong spiritual pride and ostentation in prayer. It was especially enjoined that, in the midst of earnest Christian work, there should be perfect repose and trust in the Lord. In conclusion she spoke of a class of persons who, although they attended holiness meetings and other religious gatherings, never did anything practical for Christianity. Rev. D. D. Smith spoke on the true spirit of Christian work as exemplified in the life of John the Baptist.

At the afternoon session Mr. G. W. McCalla spoke on the necessity of implicit and unquestioning surrender to God, without which faith alone was not effective in divine healing or in the "higher life." At the conclusion of his address testimonies were given by members of the audience, and forty sick persons were anointed.

At the evening session a letter was read asking if there was any case on record of a blind person having received sight through divine healing. Several cases of the kind were cited. Rev. R. C. Oliver said that he had preached the Gospel for twenty-four years before his eyes had been opened to the fact that Christ had redeemed his body from sickness, as He had redeemed his soul from the power and guilt of sin. He could therefore sympathize with ministers who were unable to accept the doctrine of divine healing, and deplored the tendency to denounce them which was sometimes manifested by those who had received it. Mr. C. B. Stillwell spoke on special prayer, and said that there could be no doubt in the minds of observant Christians that God did answer it. He was himself a living illustration of the fact, as he owed his conversion to God's answer of a sister's prayer on his behalf.

All the meetings were pervaded by a spirit of reverence and consecrated enthusiasm. Their effect has passed beyond them. Many persons have since visited Kemuel to testify that they were healed of various diseases, and others, at prayer-meetings and religious gatherings in the churches of the city, have given thanks for spiritual blessings received during the Convention. Another remarkable result is the interest aroused in the doctrine of divine healing among the clergymen and physicians of the city. Large numbers of members of both professions were present at the Convention, and paid close attention to the proceedings.

We are indebted for this report of the proceedings of the Convention to the kindness and thoughtfulness of our esteemed friend, Joseph W. Clift, M.D., who is known among the churches of the United States as the "beloved physician." He has saved us from the disappointment we felt on receiving the report of another gentleman contented himself with the rather vague statement: "We splendid meetings."

political excitement, and he left it in ruins that men might learn what a fickle thing is man favor. "But the mercy of the Lord is from everlasting to everlasting to them that fear him, and His righteousness unto the children's children of such as keep his covenant, and to those who remember His commandments to do them." This moment "seek Him that maketh the seven stars and Orion."

LOVE AND WARNING.

Again, Amos saw, as we must see, that the God who made these two beacons of the Oriental night sky must be a God of love and kindly warning. The Pleiades rising in mid-sky said to all the herdsmen and shepherds and husbandmen, "Come out and enjoy the mild weather and cultivate your gardens and fields." Orion coming in winter warned them to prepare for empest. All navigation was regulated by these two constellations. The one said to shipmaster and crew, "Hoist sail for the sea, and gather merchandise from other lands." But Orion was the storm-signal, and said: "Reef sail, make things snug, or put into harbor, for the hurricanes are getting their wings out." As the Pleiades were the sweet evangelists of the spring, Orion was the warning prophet of the winter.

Oh, now I get the best view of God I ever had! There are two kinds of sermons I never want to preach—the one that presents God so kind, so indulgent, so lenient, so imbecile that men may look what they will against Him, and fracture His very law, and put the cry of their impertinence and rebellion under His throne, and while they are spitting in His face and stabbing at His heart, He takes them up in His arms and kisses their infuriated brow and cheek, saying, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven." The other kind of sermon I never want to preach is the one that represents God as all fire and torture and hundercloud, and with red-hot pitchfork tossing the human race into paroxysms of infinite agony. The sermon that I am now preaching believes in a God of loving, kindly warning, the God of spring and winter, the God of the Pleiades and Orion.

You must remember that the winter is just as important as the spring. Let one winter pass without frost to kill vegetation and ice to bind the rivers and snow to enrich our fields, and then you will have to enlarge your hospitals and your cemeteries. "A green Christmas makes a fat graveyard," was the old proverb. Storms to purify the air. Thermometer at ten degrees above zero to tone up the system. December and January just as important as May and June. I tell you we need the storms of life as much as we do the sunshine. There are more men ruined by prosperity than by adversity. If we had our own way in life, before this we would have been impersonations of selfishness and worldliness and disgusting sin, and puffed up until we would have been like Julius Caesar, who was made by sycophants to believe that he was divine, and the freckles on his face were as the stars of the firmament.

HELPFUL STORMS.

One of the swiftest Transatlantic voyages made last summer by the Etruria was because she had a stormy wind abaft, chasing her from New York to Liverpool. But to those going in opposite direction, the storm was a buffeting and a hindrance. It is a bad thing to have a storm ahead pushing us back; but if we are God's children and aiming toward heaven, the storms of life will only chase us the sooner into the harbor. I am so glad to believe that the monsoons, and typhoons, and mists, and siroccos of land and sea are not unchained maniacs let loose upon the earth, but under divine supervision! I am so glad that the God of the Seven Stars is also the God of Orion! It was out of Dante's suffering came the sublime Divina Commedia, and out of John Milton's blindness came Paradise Lost, and out of miserable infidel attack came the Bridgewater Treatise in favor of Christianity, and out of David's exile came the songs of consolation, and out of the sufferings of Christ came the possibility of the world's redemption, and out of your bereavement, your persecution, your poverties, your misfortunes, may yet come an eternal heaven.

THE BECKONING WORLDS.

Oh, what a mercy it is that in the text and all up and down the Bible God induces us to look out toward other worlds! Bible astronomy in Genesis, in Joshua, in Job, in the Psalms, in the prophets, major and minor, in St. John's apocalypse, practically saying, "Worlds! worlds! worlds! Get ready for them!" We have a nice little world here that we stick to, as though losing that we lose all. We are afraid of falling off this little raft of a world. We are afraid that some meteoric inconoclast will some night smash it, and we want everything to revolve around it, and are disappointed when we find that it revolves around the sun instead of the sun revolving around it. What a fuss we make about this little bit of a world, its existence only a short time between two spasms, the paroxysm by which it was hurled from chaos into order and the paroxysm of its demolition!

And I am glad that so many texts call us to look off to other worlds, many of them larger and grander and more resplendent. "Look there," says Job, "at Mazaroth and Arcturus and his sons!" "Look there," says St. John, "at the moon under Christ's feet!" "Look there," says Joshua, "at the sun standing still above Gibeon!" "Look there," says Moses, "at the sparkling firmament!" "Look there," says Amos, the herdsman, "at the Seven Stars and Orion!" Don't let us be so sad about those who shove off from this world under Christly pilotage. Don't let us be so agitated about our own going off this little barge or sloop or canal boat of a world to get on some Great Eastern of the heavens. Don't let us persist in wanting to stay in this barn, this shed, this outhouse of a world, when all the King's palaces already occupied by many of our best friends are swinging wide open their gates to let us in.

When I read, "In my Father's house are many mansions," I do not know but that each world is a room, and as many rooms as there are worlds, stellar stairs, stellar galleries, stellar hallways, stellar windows, stellar domes. How our departed friends must pity us shut up in these cramped apartments, tired if we walk fifteen miles, when they some morning, by one stroke of wing, can make circuit of the whole stellar system and be back in time for matins! Perhaps yonder twinkling constellation is the residence of the martyrs; that group of twelve luminaries is the celestial home of the Apostles. Perhaps that steep of light is the dwelling-place of angels cherubic, seraphic, archangelic. A mansion with as many rooms as worlds, and all their windows illuminated for festivity.

Oh, how this widens and lifts and stimulates our expectation! How little it makes the present, and how stupendous it makes the future! How it consoles us about our pious dead, that instead of being boxed up and under the ground have the range of as many rooms as there are worlds and welcome everywhere, for it is the father's house, in which there are many mansions! Oh, Lord God of the seven stars and Orion, how can I endure the transport, the ecstasy, of such a vision! I must obey my text and seek Him. I will seek him. I seek Him now, for I call to mind that it is not the material universe that is most valuable, but the spiritual, and that each of us has a soul worth more than all the worlds which the inspired herdsman saw from his booth on the hills of Tekoa.

A EUROPEAN PAGODA.

I had studied it before, but the cathedral of Cologne, Germany, never impressed me as it did this summer. It is admittedly the grandest Gothic structure in the world, its foundation laid in 1248, only two or three years ago completed. More than six hundred years in building. All Europe taxed for its construction. Its chapel of the Magi with precious stones enough to purchase a kingdom. Its chapel of St. Agnes with masterpieces of painting. Its spire springing five hundred and eleven feet into the heavens. Its stained glass the chorus of all rich colors. Statue encircling the pillars and encircling all. Statues above statues, until sculpture can do no more, but faints and falls back against carved stalls and down on pavements over which the kings and queens of the earth have walked to confession. Nave and aisles and transept and portals combining the splendors of sunrise. Interlaced, interfoliated, intercolumned grandeur. As I stood outside, looking at the double range of flying buttresses and the forest of pinnacles, higher and higher and higher, until I almost reeled from dizziness, I exclaimed: "Great odology in stone! Frozen prayer of many nations!"

But while standing there I saw a poor man enter and put down his pack and kneel beside his burden on the hard floor of that cathedral. And tears of deep emotion came into my eyes, as I said to myself: "There is a soul worth more than all the material surroundings. That man will live after the last pinnacle has fallen, and not one stone of all that cathedral glory shall remain uncrumbled. He is now a Lazarus in rags and poverty and weariness, but immortal, and a son of the Lord God Almighty; and the prayer he now offers, though amid many superstitions, I believe God will hear; and among the Apostles whose sculptured forms stand in the surrounding niches he will at last be lifted, and into the presence of that Christ whose sufferings are represented by the crucifix before which he bows; and be raised in due time out of all his poverties into the glorious home built for him and built for us by Him who maketh the seven stars and Orion."

Christian Work in Cincinnati is a Matter for which prayer is specially desired. We gladly comply with a request received from that city to publish the following: "The Christian people of Cincinnati, represented by the members of the Noon-day Prayer-Meeting Committee of that city, send forth to the Christian world, a request for their prayers for Cincinnati, its ministers and people. Several evangelists will occupy the field, and supplement the work of the pastors during the coming fall and winter. Let every child of God breathe a prayer to heaven for divine favor upon this city and its special work."

A Letter to President Cleveland from Mrs. Helen Hunt Jackson ("H. H.") was given to the press recently. It derives a melancholy interest from the fact that it was written only four days before her death, and when opened by the President on his return from the Adirondack the earnest and gifted writer's career of usefulness was closed. It ran as follows: "DEAR SIR: From my death-bed I send you message of heartfelt thanks for what you have already done for the Indians. I ask you to read my 'Century of Dishonor.' I am dying happier for the belief I have that it is your hand that is destined to strike the first steady blow toward lifting this burden of infamy from our country and righting the wrongs of the Indian race."

A New Religious Organization was incorporated recently, and its certificates filed in the County Clerk's office in New York by the Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., George L. Taylor, the Revs. Dr. R. S. McArthur, A. F. Schaffner, S. H. Virgin, William T. Wylie, and Owen O. Schimmel. It is called The Christian Giving Society, and its objects are: "To impress upon individuals the practical adoption of proportionate giving, as enjoined in the Scriptures (every one according to his means); to awaken the conscience of the Church and the leading Christians to adopt the principles and methods pointed out by the Head of the Church for the support and spread of the Gospel; to secure a more general discussion of the questions of Christian giving; to furnish tracts, sermons, books, and such other helps as may be useful; to awaken interest and impart instruction on this question, and to look up and enlist all who are in sympathy with the effort."

THE REVOCATION OF THE EDICT OF NANTES.

THIS event forms a conspicuous landmark in the history of Protestantism in France, and its bi-centenary was fittingly celebrated last month all over Christendom by the descendants of the original Huguenots. It may be mentioned that the Edict was originally granted by the French King Henry, in 1598, for the protection of the Protestant followers of John Calvin, Theodore Beza and William Farel. It was granted twenty-seven years after the terrible massacre, of St. Bartholomew, which took place on August 24th, 1572, when six thousand persons were murdered in Paris alone, and the number of Protestants slain throughout the kingdom is moderately estimated at nearly ten times the number.

It was eighty-seven years afterward, in 1685, that this Edict was revoked, and the lives and property of the Huguenots were again at the mercy of their Roman Catholic foes. Louis XIV., the king who revoked the Edict, was the grandson of King Henry, who granted it. He was a narrow-minded, bigoted king, and before the final act of revocation took place he showed his hatred of Protestantism and his impatience of the restraints which the Edict imposed upon him.

Louvois, the chief minister, the king's confessor, the Pere la Chaise, and the ambitious, bigoted, resolute Madame de Maintenon, stimulated the king to a series of measures that have made his name infamous to all time. The "dragonnades" in particular are mainly due to Louvois. Regiments of dragoons were marched into Huguenot districts; the inhabitants were summoned to recant. If they refused the soldiers were quartered upon them, to be withdrawn from those who embraced the Romanist creed. The dragoons thus domiciled in Protestant homes were encouraged to commit almost every kind of cruel outrage. Women and children were the special objects of brutality. No family was safe from molestation. Numberless scenes, like that of a family surprised, depicted in the illustration on page 732, were witnessed, and finally the Edict was revoked formally.

In October, 1685, appeared a declaration in which Louis said the object of the Edict of Nantes had been to bring the Huguenots into the Church; that this was what he himself had all along been aiming at; that heaven had blessed his recent efforts by bringing over the best of the Protestants to the Catholic religion—and that now, since the old arrangement ceased to be useful, he thought it right, in order to efface the remembrance of past troubles, utterly to revoke the Edict of Nantes and every other ordinance which had subsequently been enacted in favor of the Huguenots.

Thousands of the most conscientious and capable inhabitants of France left her shores, openly or secretly, establishing themselves in the cities of free Europe. French communities were established in Switzerland, the Rhine provinces, in Holland, Denmark, even in Russia, while one noble band and, after enduring terrible privations, succeeded in establishing the town on Long Island Sound which they named New Rochelle. Robert Hale Bartow says: "Nothing could have been more depressing at the outset than the privations which these sufferers for conscience' sake were compelled to endure. They put up frail tents or booths as a temporary shelter, and then began the erection of a house to protect them from the rigors of an approaching winter. Having excavated a cellar of sufficient depth, they walled up its sides with stones, and then built upon the stone foundation a log-house of considerable size, one story high, and constructed above it a large garret, which was used for sleeping apartments. The thatched roof of the building was made by interlacing the long sea-grass that grows so abundantly in the salt marshes of Long Island Sound with the poles forming the framework of the roof, the dried sea-grass being bound to the poles with strong cords.

CAME TO AMERICA,

"In this rude dwelling the exiles passed their first winter, and on the Sabbath religious services were held in the house. During the winter a clearing was made in the dense forest, and in the spring agriculture with rude implements and the construction of additional dwellings were begun. The women worked as industriously as the men, and, in addition to their ordinary domestic duties, spun the cloth worn as clothing. But the whole country was then a howling wilderness that resounded with the war-whoop of the Indians by day and the cry of panthers at night." It was not until 1687 that a permanent settlement was made, from which grew New Rochelle.

A century later the streets of Paris ran with noble blood, which would never have been shed if France had not driven out of her borders the pious men and women whose influence would have prevented the excesses of the Reign of Terror.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

The Sins of His Youth.—At a recent meeting an evangelist said: "I know a man who is very ill; I do not suppose he will ever get better. I have visited him several times, and referring to his spiritual state, he observed: 'I feel my old sins, the sins of my youth, all coming up. I believe I am a worse sinner than ever I was.' Ah, dear friends, I think Jesus is coming nearer to that man, although he knows it not. The more we see of Christ, the more do we loathe ourselves. What a mercy it is to know that the sins of all who look to Him are blotted out and forgiven."

"While There's Life There's Hope."—A Christian worker narrated the following: "I remember when speaking recently to a man in an evangelistic meeting about his soul's welfare, he said to me: 'It is too late now; it is too late now; there is no use my trying to be a Christian. Habits are formed within me from which I cannot break away, though I would; it is of no use, it is too late.' My friend, I said, 'had the thief on the cross pleaded all these excuses instead of taking Jesus at His word, he would not have been in Paradise to-day.' God blessed these few words uttered in weakness, and the man went away rejoicing in the Lord."

A Successful Barn Service.—At a noon prayer-meeting, lately, a gentleman from the audience told the following incident: "About sixteen years I lived in the North of Ireland, and one day I had to walk four miles to a town to which I was going. On my way a very heavy storm came on, and I had to seek shelter at a farm-house. A Christian family dwelt there, and they kindly asked me to remain with them over the night. I did so, and on the following morning they asked me to stay that day also with them, and have a Gospel meeting in the barn. Accordingly I agreed, although I was not accustomed to address meetings. My courteous friends let it be known all round the district that there was to be a meeting in their barn at such an hour; and at the time appointed the barn was packed to the door. I delivered my simple address, and shortly afterward left that place. Last summer I happened to be again in that district, after a lapse of sixteen years, and was told that at that one meeting, held in the barn, very many had been led to a saving knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. God says: 'My Word shall not return unto Me void.'"

Jennie's Bridal Day.—On One Occasion I went to see a young girl about seventeen years of age, and when I looked at her I knew that she was dying. 'Well, Jennie, I said, 'are you getting any stronger yet?' 'Oh, no, sir, I shall never be stronger.' 'You may live for some time yet, Jennie, I said, in an encouraging tone. 'No sir, I shall not live long now,' and with a look of despair in her face she said: 'Oh, I wish you would show me the way of salvation.' She was alone, and I thought that this was a good opportunity of speaking to Jennie about her soul. I spoke to her long and earnestly about Christ. Then kneeling in prayer, I besought the Bridegroom to claim His bride and take her at once into His own possession. When I had concluded, she said: 'I am the bride of my King and I soon shall be in the presence of my King. When he shall draw near we were sitting by the bed. There were a few moments of complacency, and we thought that she was gone. I lifted a hymn-book and began softly to sing a hymn beginning with

'My Jesus, I love Thee, I know Thou art mine. I sang the hymn throughout until I came to the last verse,

'In mansions of glory and endless delight
'I'll ever adore Thee in heaven so bright;
'I'll sing with the glittering crown on my brow;
'If ever I loved Thee—'

I paused, I knew not why; I looked at the face of the girl whom I thought was already gone and opening her eyes once more, she clearly and distinctly finished the verse—

'My Jesus, 'tis now!'

She closed her eyes, her spirit had gone to with the Saviour whom she loved so well."

A Letter from an Aged Infidel.—The Rev. James Newby related: "One night in a tea meeting in which I was taking part we received an anonymous letter to the following effect:

'Pray for an old infidel who does not believe God, and has done all he could to break down the faith of others.' We tried to find about the letter, but no one could tell us anything about it. In the prayer-meeting on Saturday evening, an old man stood up and acknowledged himself to be the writer of it. He said that he had come to the meeting as an out-and-out infidel, and had read all the great infidel books. He had spent much of his life in inculcating these principles into the minds of others. But what he had heard and seen began to move him, until at last he felt himself a helpless sinner. He now rose to tell us that Christ had his rebel heart by him subdued, and he was here, a brand plucked from the burning, to testify to the truth he had so long sought to destroy. This man came on with us the next day to our open-air meeting and confessed his new faith. He became a great help and a blessing to the whole place, no using his talents on the side of Christ."

A Sea Captain's Terrible Despair.—Mr. Dunn told the following incident: "I was passing through a street in South Shields when a Bible woman came up to me, and said: 'Mr. Dunn, wish you would visit a sea captain in the next street who is dying.' I promised to do so, but when I knocked at the door, it was answered by his wife, a very nice, gentle-looking creature; told her for what purpose I had come, and she said: 'I am sorry, but you cannot come in; I will not see any one.' But, I said, 'the Bible-woman has sent me: is your husband not dying?' 'Yes, he is dying, but he told me on no account to admit a Bible-woman, a minister, a missionary, or an evangelist.' I must see him, I replied, and walked past her into the house. I entered the dying man's bed-chamber but as I did so, he lifted up his hand as if to waive me off, and as I approached his bed, he cried: 'Don't come near me; don't come near me; I am lost; I am lost; it is all settled.' But, I interposed, 'Jesus came to seek and to save the lost.' Young man, go away, go away, for it is all settled, he shrieked. 'I must say a word,' I answered, 'God is very near heaven is very near; and the Spirit is very near.' But is there not a verse in the Bible that says: 'My Spirit shall not always strive with man?' 'Yes, I said, 'you will find that verse in Genesis.' 'Well, I could take you to the spot where the Spirit ceased to strive with me. It spoke to me for many, many long years. In the storm, in the church, and in the street, I paid no attention to it, and one night, that awful night, I can recall it now, the Spirit was living with me as I walked along the street; got fairly out of temper, and standing, I said: 'I'll settle it,' and walking over to a bar across the road, I entered, and drank about a gill of 'andy. From that time the Spirit of God ceased to strive with me. I am not dead, but I am lost, lost forever.' And in that state, so far as man may judge, he passed away. Oh, friends, aware of resisting God's Spirit!"

Setting the Starlings Free.—"I Was Once availing out the Duntocher road, when I met two boys. Stopping them, I asked: 'Where are you been, boys?' 'We have been away ridding-catching, and we have got a starling each.' Let me see them, boys.' The boys held up their hands to let me see the birds. I looked at them, and said: 'Boys, I really think you ought to let these birds away; they will not live with you, because they are too old; had they been young ones they might have lived.' But the boys had no such intention, telling me they could let them take their chance. 'Well, boys, will you tell me what I will do; I will buy them of you. Set a good price upon them, and do not be afraid of asking too much.' They went off a little way to consult how much they would ask, and soon the one who had gained most success came forward, and said: 'We want threepence for each of them, sir.' I handed the boy his threepence, saying: 'Now open your hand.' 'I will do it,' said the boy, looking rather afraid, still keeping his fingers closed upon the bird. 'Yes,' I said, 'you are bound to do it; the bird is mine; I paid the price for it.' The boy opened his hand, and in a moment the little prisoner was gone. I did the same thing to the other boy, who also was afraid to let go the bird, but it was also set free. Dear friends, although we are shut up in Satan's prison, Jesus has bought us, for He has paid the price which the law justly demanded, and He has set us free if we will only ask Him."

WHY WE EXPECT THE SECOND ADVENT.

By Rev. S. H. Kellogg, D.D.*

THE question is often asked, What are the doctrines of the Pre-millennialists, and in what respect do they differ from the views of other Christians? A clear and unequivocal answer may be of use to the young Christian inquirer.

Pre-millennialists, agreeing that the Scripturesarrant the expectation of a future age of triumphant righteousness upon the earth, maintain that the Second Advent will not follow, but introduce that period, and that until that time of "the wheat" merely, but "the tares" also, the children of the wicked one," must continue to grow.† They therefore expect no universal triumph of holiness till Christ returns. Which of these two is the Scriptural doctrine as to the order of events? Does the Millennium ring in Christ, or does Christ, by His personal return, bring in the Millennium?

This is the simple question fundamental to his whole discussion. To this all others are secondary and subordinate. This question should not, as often, be confounded with other and mistaken or irrelevant issues. The question is not, for example, whether Christ shall visibly return to this earth. That is agreed on both sides. It is not whether the Holy Ghost as the power, with present instrumentalities, convert the whole world before and apart from the visible appearance of Christ. That, again, is agreed on both sides.

The question is not as to what God can do, or as to what He has revealed that He intends to do. Neither is the question whether man, in that future age of righteousness, will be saved in any other way than by the regeneration of the spirit and faith in an atoning Saviour. Both sides heartily agree that in all dispensations there has been, and ever will be, but one way of salvation.

The question, again, is not as to the duty of preaching the Gospel among all nations, nor the certainty that this will be done before the Lord's return. Both parties agree on both these points. Pre-millennialists, no less than others, are found in the forefront of the home and foreign evangelism of the day. The difference of understanding is not as to these points, but as to the divine purpose in this universal preaching. Neither is it the question whether this preaching shall be successful or not. Both sides agree that it must be successful for all that God intends to accomplish by it.

Both, moreover, believe that it is the purpose of God to gather out of the world in the present age, by means of this preaching, "an exceeding great multitude which no man can number."* The question, we repeat, is simply this: Whether the universal triumph of Christ's kingdom, which the prophets predict in such glowing terms, is to be expected before Christ's personal Advent, or only after it. That the latter, and not the former, is the teaching of the Scriptures, we believe, for reasons such as the following:

A MODERN DOCTRINE.

1. Because the former is a modern opinion, while the latter is the primitive doctrine. The now fashionable theory of a Millennium of prevailing righteousness on earth before the Second Advent is a novelty unknown to the Church before the Reformation. On the other hand, Pre-millennialism was the general faith of the Church in the age immediately succeeding the apostles.

2. In the first place, and negatively, we cannot find in the Bible a single declaration that the predicted age of Gospel triumph will come before the Advent. The assertion of this doctrine rests, at the best, only on human inference from the Scriptures, and on no direct teaching of the Word to that effect. Silence is not always proof; but in this case the silence of the Scripture affords a very weighty presumption against the truth of the doctrine in question.

3. The presumption against the doctrine of a conversion of the world before the Advent is made the stronger by the fact that the predicted subjugation of the nations to the Lord is never held up in the New Testament as a motive to the extension of the Gospel. If the conversion of all nations is to be the direct result of our evangelistic efforts, it were certainly most fitting that it should be continually held up as one of the strongest motives to press forward with the work. The first preachers had even more need of this encouragement than we have in these days of peace and quietness and much profession of Christ, yet the Lord never once gave it to them.

4. But not only are the Scriptures silent as to a Millennial age of holiness before the Advent, under circumstances when, if this were God's truth, they might by all means be expected to speak, but they categorically teach what should utterly forbid any Christian to cherish such an expectation. In the first place, they teach that the time of the Advent is so utterly uncertain that no man has a right to be sure that the Advent may not, so far as he knows, occur in his day. "Watch, for ye know not when the time is" is the sum of the Lord's teaching on this subject. Not once, but again and again, are we charged that we remember this uncertainty of the time. We are told that, when the Lord comes it will be like "a snare," like "the lightning," like "the thief at night." How can such teaching be reconciled with the doctrine that a Millennium must yet begin and end before the Lord can possibly appear?

OPPOSED TO A COMMAND.

5. And this brings us to another argument against this doctrine of a Post-millennial Advent. If believed with confidence, it makes it impossible to obey the Lord's command to watch for His return. Just at this point the controversy comes to have a practical bearing.

While we are none of us required to have a certain theory of prophecy, with all the events of the future mapped out in their order, we are required to obey the commandments of the Lord. Of these commands no one is more emphasized than just this, that because the time of His return is so utterly uncertain, we should be ever on the watch for Him. But how can any man who really believes with confidence that a thousand years of universally prevailing righteousness are yet before the Church this side the Second Advent obey this commandment?

6. The doctrine of a Millennial age of righteousness before the Advent is also directly contradicted by the uniform teachings of the New Testament as to the character and history of this present age or dispensation. We have in the Gospels and Epistles many passages which professedly describe the condition of the world between the First and Second Advents. These descriptions are distinct and uniform in their representations. They all agree in representing the condition of the world during the absence of the Lord as marked by the dominance of moral evil.

7. The argument becomes yet more conclusive when we note still more specific predictions touching the course of things from the apostolic age to the Second Advent. On the one hand, it is predicted that the Gospel should be preached "for a witness" to all nations, and that "then"—most significantly it does not say "when all the nations have accepted the Gospel"—but "then," when the world-wide witness shall be complete, "the end shall come."

From the above considerations we are compelled to conclude that the numerous prophecies in the Old Testament of a reign of righteousness on earth cannot possibly refer to a period of time before the Advent of the Lord, but must find their fulfilment after that event.

That in our endeavors to adjust these prophecies in their mutual relations, and frame to ourselves a consistent and clear picture of the precise nature and order of events which shall succeed the Advent, we shall meet with difficulties, and that some of these may even be beyond our power as yet to solve, those who have most studied these questions will be the most ready to admit. But this is only what, in dealing with subjects of this nature, we might reasonably expect, and even though many questions may be asked which we cannot answer, difficulties urged which we cannot explain, it will by no means follow that the arguments adduced above are nullified. Great as the difficulties may be on the hypothesis for which we have argued, yet if to be rid of these we set aside the plain Scriptures cited, and affirm in the face of them an age of universal holiness before the Advent, we find ourselves involved in difficulties greater far.

NOT FANATICISM.

In any case it is not too much to say that, in view of the facts, for an intelligent Christian to treat the Pre-millennial doctrine with contempt and regard a belief in it as indicating a lack of sound and sober judgment, still more, to seek to charge that belief with inevitable tendencies to fanaticism, confounding Millennialism with Millism and like extravagancies, after the fashion of many, is only to evince a degree of ignorance or intensity of prejudice which does little credit to the head or heart of him who makes such imputations. One thing, at least, is certain: We are all bound, whether private Christians or ministers, to conform our thinking and teaching to the model given by our Lord and His apostles. But if we do this we shall never be able to talk as if the Church were sure of centuries of peace and righteousness before the Lord's return.

We shall all do well to remember how the Apostle Paul warned Timothy that the last days should be "perilous times," with much of the form of godliness, joined with denial of its power, and then solemnly added the too oft-forgotten words: "If thou put the brethren in remembrance of these things, thou shalt be a good minister of Jesus Christ."

† See Matt. 13: 30.

* There is the more need to notice these affirmations, that as regards every point named Pre-millennialists are often charged with holding views which they, in the persons of all their representative men, utterly repudiate.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President's Proclamation, in which he designates Thursday, November 26th, as Thanksgiving Day, reminds citizens that there have many reasons for observing the annual custom. In the course of his proclamation he says: "On that day let all secular business be suspended, and let the people assemble in their usual places of worship, and, with prayer and songs of praise, devoutly testify their gratitude to the Giver of every good and perfect gift for all that He has done for us in the year that has passed; for our preservation as a united nation and for our deliverance from the shock and danger of political convulsion; for the blessings of peace and for our safety and quiet while wars and rumors of wars have agitated and afflicted other nations of the earth; for our security against the scourge of pestilence, which in other lands has claimed its dead by thousands and filled the streets with mourners; for plenteous crops which reward the labor of the husbandman and increase our nation's wealth; and for the contentment throughout our borders which follows in the train of prosperity and abundance. . . . And let us by no means forget while we give thanks and enjoy the comforts which have crowned our lives that truly grateful hearts are inclined to deeds of charity, and that a kind and thoughtful remembrance of the poor will double the pleasures of our condition and render our praise and thanksgiving more acceptable in the sight of the Lord."

The Treasury Report Issued Last Week shows a reduction of the public debt during the month of October of $13,000,000. This is, however, mainly in the changes effected in the form of the currency outstanding. The Secretary of the Treasury finds that the calling in of the one and two-dollar bills has succeeded in forcing the silver dollars into circulation. For the first time in many months the Treasury has paid out more than was coined. Its stock on hand was decreased by nearly $1,800,000. These, with those coined during the month, increase the amount in circulation by $4,000,000. But the coins have not gained in popularity.

The Election in New York State, which, as the President's own State, attracted more than usual interest this year, resulted in a Democratic victory. Mr. David B. Hill was elected Governor by a plurality of 11,351. The exact vote for all the sixty counties had not been made up at the time of writing, but it appears that the Democratic vote was less by 62,000 than it was last year, the Republican vote less by 72,000, and the Prohibition vote had increased. A significant feature of the result is that the Republicans made important gains in the Legislature. They made a net gain of two Senators and four Assemblymen, and will have a majority of ten in the Senate and twenty-six in the House, or thirty-six on joint ballot. Many explanations have been offered to account for the Republican defeat. Many of them are mere conjectures. It is evident, however, that the support of the Independents, or Mugwumps, as they are called, is not of itself sufficient to insure Republican success. It was supposed that they held the balance of power in the State. The Democrats lost them this year, but they gained Blaine's Irishmen and the vote that went to Butler last year, which more than compensated.

Among the Important Results of the Election in the country was the Republican victory in Pennsylvania. It was a very significant fact that Colonel Quay was elected, and it is matched with the election of a man named Mouatt to the Common Council in Philadelphia. If the Republicans can win with such candidates, that State ought to be considered safe for the party. In Virginia the Mahone party was decisively defeated, and it is supposed that it will be impossible to re-elect him to the Senate. It is noticeable that Republican newspapers in the North do not grieve over the result, and some of them openly rejoice. In Massachusetts the Republicans elected their Governor, and in Iowa they elected their Governor, and carried both Houses of the Legislature.

Two Civil Service Commissioners were appointed by the President last week. They are Mr. Alfred P. Edgerton, of Indiana, and Mr. William L. Trenholm, of South Carolina. Mr. Eaton has accepted a temporary appointment with them in order to aid them by his experience in their new duties. Both the new commissioners are highly spoken of in their respective sections as men of sterling character and capacity. They are heartily in sympathy with the reform principles. As the majority of the Board will now be Democratic, it may be hoped that the journals of that party will be less volatile and virulent in their abuse of the system.

The War on Polygamy is being Prosecuted with vigor. Several more convictions under the Edmunds law have been secured, and the Presidents and bishops are concealing themselves from the officers of the law. The report of the Utah Commission proposes to extend the provisions of the law in the direction of increased stringency. It suggests that the penalty of six months' imprisonment at present exacted for conviction of unlawful cohabitation shall be made at least two years for the first offence and three years for the second. It is also proposed to hereafter exclude any person from settling on the public lands who refuses to take an oath that he is obeying and will continue to obey the laws against polygamy.

The Startling Disclosure was Made Last week that Boston, Mass., is infected with the vices which have made London notorious through the civilized world. On November 5th an orphan girl, fourteen years of age, appeared in the Municipal Court, and testified that she had been decoyed into a house of ill-fame in that city, and kept there against her will for two months. Her clothes were taken from her, and when she clothed herself in a sheet and tried to make her escape by jumping through a window she was caught and carried back, and beaten until she was nearly dead. The matron of the Tombs, who examined her after her rescue, reported that her body still bore the marks of fearful bruises. The girl ended her testimony with the pitiful words "Oh, sir, there are others there who were taken there just as I was. Can't you save them?"

The Trial of Mr. Stead, the Editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, was concluded on Saturday last. The jury found him and Mrs. Jarrett guilty, and acquitted Mr. Bramwell Booth and Mr. Jacques. Sentence was deferred, and all the defendants were put upon their trial on another indictment in the same case. The bias of the judge was apparent throughout his charge to the jury. Dr. Ridding, the Bishop of Southwell, has published a letter, in which he eloquently and forcibly expresses his sympathy with Mr. Stead and his appreciation of the effects of his work. It is remarkable that it is the most godly men in the country who are supporting Mr. Stead, while the abuse and denunciation he suffers come from men whose efforts in the cause of morality have not been conspicuous. The New York Times says very truly that "the people who will rejoice most in his conviction are those who ought to be in his place, since they have done from vicious propensities what he has done, at least in part, as we think, from public spirit." It is significant that in this city the journals which have most persistently assailed him are the New York Herald and the Evening Post.

The Political Campaign in England is Not at fever heat. No such excitement has been aroused during the past half century. The Liberal prospects declined during the past week owing to a manifesto issued by some influential Liberal peers declaring their opposition to a candidates who are advocating the disendowment of the Church. This is an open avowal of the split in the Liberal party, as nearly all the advanced Liberal candidates of the Chamberlain type are pledged to the measure. The Conservatives are making capital out of the difficulty, and will gain to their support many Churchmen who have hitherto voted with the Liberal party.

The Irish Agitation is Expected to be a important factor in the future government of Great Britain. In several English constituencies there are large numbers of Irishmen, and some they hold the balance of power. A convention of Irishmen was recently held in Glasgow to decide on a course of action, in order that a solid Irish vote might be cast in those constituencies. The delegates pledged themselves on behalf of the Irish people whom they represented in England and Scotland "to have no tralficking with English political parties, to stand aloof from their struggles, to tolerate in their ranks no man who allied himself with either party, and then, when the hour of battle came to receive the word of command from the man who was selected as chief of the Irish race throughout the world." This will give Mr. Parnell an opportunity to deal with individual members on the basis of Irish support in return for pledges to vote for home rule. The number of men who will sit in the new Parliament absolutely pledged to obey Mr. Parnell will, it is now stated, be eighty-six. Two candidates rejected at his desire are making vigorous protests in the newspapers against his dictation.

An Important Movement in the Bulgarian difficulty took place last week when the Czar of Russia decreed Prince Alexander's dishonorable dismissal from the Russian army. That is regarded as a bold and unequivocal intimation of the attitude Russia will take in the impending struggle. It is expected that it will be the prelude to an occupation of the country by Russian troops, in which case Austria and Germany could not honorably avoid a conflict. Should England, France, and Italy join the two powers the struggle may be averted for the time, as Russia would in that case find herself in antagonism to all Europe.

The Emperor of Germany, while Visiting a chapel in Berlin, on October 26th, received an address from his chaplain. In the course of his reply the venerable Emperor uttered these pregnant words: "As for what you have said about me personally, I accept it with all modesty as a man whose days are now numbered. In my life, time heaven has covered me with blessings and mercies, especially in my old age; but the home paid me I lay at the throne of the Highest, from whom we derive strength to execute all the best things that can be done on earth. Within the last few years, before the eyes of all of you, things have happened by which Prussia has been raised higher than ever we expected. You have all been witnesses of the great work accomplished, which will continue to endure if its foundations remain in purity of religion and progress in every good deed. In my old days I can call heaven to witness that I have ever looked upon religion as the sole foundation on which everything reposes, and as the highest of my good people."

Wanted as Evangelists at Mission Stations of the Gospel Army in Canada and the United States, men or women who can sing and give Gospel addresses. Write to the President, Rev. M. Baxter, Post Office, Toronto, Canada.

Mrs. M. Baxter Conducted Two Services in the Congregational church, Ashtabula, O., on Sunday, November 1st, which, in spite of very stormy weather, were well attended. On Monday, November 6th, she conducted a holiness meeting at Cleveland, O., and has since been giving addresses on "The Christian Life" and "Divine Healing" at Nashville, Tenn. Mrs. Baxter will take part in Dr. Cullis's convention at Baltimore, commencing November 13th, and from there will go on to Pittsburg for the convention to be held there, and on November 24th will take part in the convention at Chicago.

Mr. William Noble's Meetings in Chelsea, Mass., last week were densely crowded, and much good was done. We are informed that God's blessing on the work is signally manifested, and some very remarkable conversions have occurred beside the ordinary temperance successes. A happy feature of the work in that city is that the pastors have united in organizing the work, and have taken an active part in it. The Baptist, Congregational, and Universalist churches have been placed at Mr. Noble's disposal, and he has spoken in each, besides the meetings in Hawthorn Hall. This week Mr. Noble is speaking every night in Watertown, N. Y., after which he goes to Louisville, Ky.

The New Hebrew-Christian Church in New York, which was dedicated about a month ago, held its first baptismal service on Sunday evening, November 1st. The young Israelite who was baptized was one of more than ordinary intelligence, and well read in the traditions of his fathers. He gave an interesting account of his first hearing of the Gospel and of the struggle his mind had undergone with the hatred of Christ, which is so common among his people. Rev. Jacob Freshman, who baptized him, preached a suitable sermon to the large audience, most of whom were Israelites. His text was, "And the remnant of Jacob shall be in the midst of many people as a dew from the Lord, as the showers upon the grass, that tarrieth not for man, nor waiteth for the sons of men" (Micah 5:7).

Mr. Moody Closed the Christian Convention at Newburg on Monday, November 2d. The rink was densely crowded. During the services nearly $5000 was subscribed toward paying off the debt of $10,000 remaining upon the building of the Newburg Young Men's Christian Association. It is estimated that as many as fifteen thousand persons attended the meetings, thousands coming from out of town. Pastors of all the Christian churches of the city and members of all gave Mr. Moody the heartiest encouragement and practical assistance during the convention. On November 4th Mr. Moody commenced a series of services at Reading, Pa.

The New York Medical Missionary Society opened its new house at 118 East Forty-fifth Street on November 4th. The society was instituted in 1881, with the motto, "To heal the sick and to preach the Gospel." It aims to fit young men, regardless of race or evangelical sect, for medical mission work at home and abroad. It has now four dispensaries, and since its organization has given medical attendance to thirty thousand of the sick poor. It is supported by voluntary contributions, and the sole limit to its usefulness is the measure of its funds. Most of its students attend the New York Medical School, but receive practical training at the dispensaries. Dr. George W. Dowkott is the Medical Superintendent, and Alfred C. Post, M.D., LL.D., President. On its Managing and Advisory Boards are many of the most prominent physicians, business men, and clergymen in New York. Dr. Dowkott, the devoted superintendent, writes us that Dr. Summers, who is now laboring in Africa in conjunction with Bishop Taylor, and who was educated at the mission, has gone on a pioneer journey to Melange, having only twenty native carriers as his companions. Miss Dr. Myers, another of the students, who is now married to one of the missionaries, reports that her medical knowledge is of great assistance in missionary work. The highest officer in Angola recently sent a special messenger forty miles seeking her assistance.

The Monument to Major Andre which Cyrus Field erected at Tappan, N. Y., was destroyed by some lawless persons with dynamite on the night of November 3d. The explosion shook the neighborhood for miles around, and broke nearly every window in the village. On inspection the shaft was found to be overturned and the base shattered into a thousand fragments. This is the third and most successful attempt to demolish it that has been made since its erection. Mr. Field visited the monument only a few days before the explosion. On that occasion a farmer warned him that it was likely to be destroyed, as he had seen suspicious characters prowling around it at night. The Times says that the philanthropic financier asked the farmer to be kind enough to shoot them if he saw them there again, but the farmer failed to comply with the request. It is said that Mr. Field will not restore the monument, lest it should be destroyed again. But if André is the kind of man he is desirous to honor, there is no reason why he should not erect a monument to him in England, where it would be safe. Here men count their country's enemies as their own. They admit André's good qualities, but they cannot forget that his notoriety is due to the act of treachery in which he was an unconscious instrument, and they are not disposed to do him honor. Christian people are not so sensitive in their allegiance. They often aid in raising to office and honor, the enemies of their King. That was not David's spirit (Ps. 139: 21, 22).

A Diver's Hairbreadth Escape is Described in a despatch from Salem, Mass., on November 2d. He was engaged in inspecting a sunken sloop off Baker's Island, when suddenly his supply of air was cut off. He was at that time in the hold of the sunken ship, and his lines, which connected with his boat on the surface, did not work easily. He gave them a sharp pull as a signal for more air, but got no reply and no more air. Again he gave the signal, but got no reply. Then he realized that something on the sunken ship had rolled on his life-line, cutting off all his communication with the surface. It was hardly a second before he felt his eyes begin to protrude, and then there was a sharp pain, as though a knife was drawn across his forehead, and the top of his head felt as though it was pulled off. Then he lost consciousness. Providentially his assistants in the boat above became alarmed at his silence, and having signalled to him and received no answer, hauled him up in time to save his life. Sometimes an experience of which this incident is typical happens to the Christian. While engaged in the world's business its weight of cares is permitted to interrupt his communion with on High, whence the source of his spiritual life is derived. Often he is rescued from spiritual death by some sharp trial, by which God recalls him to his allegiance (Hos. 5: 15).

The Efficacy of Charms in Curing Disease, is the subject of a long and interesting communication to the press by a gentleman who recently visited a town in Pennsylvania in which are a large number of farmers of English birth. He states that nearly all of them are believers in the efficacy of charms against all the ills of life. One old resident of the settlement carries in his pocket constantly an immense tooth from a human jaw. It is carried as a preventive of toothache. The charmed ring is another remedy in much esteem in the settlement as a cure for epilepsy. The visitor saw one that had just been made by a jeweller at Honesdale, Pa., for a girl subject to epileptic fits. She had begged nine copper coins from nine young men about her own age, and sent the coins to the jeweller, who was directed to cut a piece out of each coin and construct a ring out of the pieces to fit her middle finger, and return the mutilated coins to the girl. This was said to be a sure cure. Educated people laugh at these charms, but it is undeniable that some people who use them are cured. How they are cured we do not know, and shall not know until we understand how the mind influences the body. But if the power of faith is so efficacious even when exercised in a ridiculous nostrum, we need not wonder at the change of heart and life that follows it when exercised in Him to whom is given all power in heaven and in earth (Mark 9: 23).

A Man Died in a Shed at Port Jervis, N. Y., on November 3d, after his wife and mother had both refused to receive him into their houses. He had been drinking heavily, and while intoxicated he fell down some stone steps, fractured his skull, and became unconscious. A physician saw him, and ordered that he be taken home at once. He was placed on a mattress in a wagon, and driven to his house. His wife refused to let him be carried into the house. The unconscious man was then driven to his mother's house. She also refused to receive him. Still unconscious, he was then taken to the poor authorities. They would not have anything to do with his case. He was then driven back to the saloon. The proprietor consented to let the wagon bearing the unconscious man be driven in under his shed, where he died. It appears that the wife and mother did not believe he was injured, but thought he was only drunk, and they knew that when in that condition he was always violent and abusive. The patience of the two women must have been severely tried before they acted as they did. Happily for us, the long suffering of God exceeds that of any human being; but even that has its limits (Prov. 1: 24-28).

A Celestial Plant Unknown to Botanists was exhibited recently in a railroad car between Rochester and Syracuse, N. Y. One of the passengers was noticed carrying a flower-pot, which contained an extraordinary plant. It attracted the attention, among others, of a botanist, who inquired from the owner what its origin was. He said that he had passed many years in the employ of the Hudson's Bay Company, and while so engaged he had taken a great interest in the cosmic dust which falls on the snow and ice in British America. This dust he had gathered wherever he found it, storing it carefully in a bottle. At the end of several years he had gathered the small quantity which the pot contained. He planted a pea in the celestial mould, and left it for a year, locked up in a strong box. At the end of the year he found, sprung from the star dust, the plant which attracted the attention of the botanist. Stirring up the dust with his finger, he further found the pea he had planted dry and unspouted. The plant had sprung from some other seed, and the owner believed that it was a seed fallen, as the dust had fallen, from the celestial spaces. There are around us spiritual growths which, like this plant, had their origin away from this world. The graces of the Christian life never spring from any seed that education can sow. They grow here, but their origin came from God (John 3: 8).

A Curious Accident to a Ship Occurred in the Brooklyn docks recently. On her return from India, two weeks ago, the ship Gryle landed her cargo at the Empire stores, and was then sent to the dry dock to have her bottom scraped. To avoid the expense of taking in ballast to keep her steady while crossing the river, some large timbers, weighing thousands of pounds each, were hired and slung on each side of the ship. Weighted with these she arrived safely at the dock but before entering it a sailor slacked the ropes that held the ballast logs on the port side, and they fell into the water. Instantly the weight of the logs on the starboard side dragged her over on her beam-ends, and her spars collided with the side of the dock, and were broken. Had the accident occurred in mid-stream she would have filled and sunk. As it was, she was righted with much difficulty. Something like this has happened to our human nature. It is dragged down into moral wreck by qualities which the Creator intended for its safety. It is only by regeneration, when the Holy Spirit is imparted, that they fulfil their design (Rom. 6: 19).

THE NOBLEMAN'S FAITH.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"There was a certain nobleman, whose son was sick at Capernaum. When he heard that Jesus was come out of Judæa into Galilee, he went unto Him, and besought Him that He would come down, and heal his son: for he was at the point of death," etc.—JOHN 4:46-53.

Affliction as a Black Horse—Mercy its Rider—Children Leading Their Parents—I. The Spark of Faith—Based on Report—For a Natural Blessing—Limits the Lord's Power—Prays in the Right Spirit—II. The Fire of Faith—True as Far as it Went—Had a Programme Arranged—Persistence and Intensity—III. The Flame of Faith—took Christ at His Word—Obeyed—IV. The Conflagration of Faith—The Pearls of Faith—Full Belief—A Saved Household.

This narrative illustrates the rise and progress of faith in the soul. The same living Christ is here, and His help we as greatly need as ever did this nobleman. May we seek it as He sought it, and find it as He found it!

Observe, then, at the commencement, that trouble first of all led this courtly personage to Jesus. Had he been without trial, he might have lived forgetful of his God and Saviour; but sorrow came to his house, and it was God's anger in disguise. It may be, dear friend, that you are in trouble this morning; and, if so, I pray that affliction may be upon which mercy shall ride to your door. It is a sad, sad thing with some men that, the better the Lord deals with them in providence, the worse return they make. On the other hand, there are hearts that turn to the Lord when He smites them.

The particular form of trial which visited this nobleman was the sickness of his child. A little son he had, whom he dearly loved, and he was down with a deadly fever. The father appears to have been a naturally kind and affectionate person. His servants evidently took a great interest in him, and in the domestic affliction which grieved him; for you observe with what eagerness they came to meet him, to tell him of the recovery of his child. The father's heart was sadly wounded because his dear boy was at the point of death. No doubt he had tried all the remedies known to the times, had sent for every physician that could be found within miles of Capernaum; and now, having heard of one Jesus of Nazareth, who at Cana had turned water into wine, and at Jerusalem had done many mighty works, he resorts to Him with eager petition and desperate hope. He might never have thought of seeking Jesus if it had not been for that dear dying boy.

How often does it happen that children, though they are not angels, yet are used to do better work than angels could accomplish; for they sweetly lead their parents to God and heaven! They twine themselves about our hearts, and then, if we see them sicken, and mark their pains, our sympathetic hearts are wrung with anguish, and we cry, "O God, spare my child! Lord, have mercy upon my little one!" The first prayers that come from many hearts are, under God, fetched forth by grief for little ones most dearly loved. Is it not written, "And a little child shall lead me"? It was so with this man; he was brought to Jesus by trouble; brought to Jesus by anxiety about a child.

I. I want you carefully to mark

THE SPARK OF FAITH.

all the while saying—I am going to look and see if I have such a spark of faith; and if I find it, I will prize it much, and pray the Holy Spirit to breathe softly upon it, that it may rise to something more permanent and powerful. The faith of this nobleman rested, at the first, entirely upon the report of others. He lived at Capernaum, down there by the sea, and among the news-mongers it was common talk that there had arisen a great Prophet who was working great wonders. He himself had never seen Jesus, nor heard Him speak; but he believed the report of others, and he was right in doing so, for they were credible persons. Well, faith often begins in that way. Men believe the report which is brought to them by well-known persons who have experienced the power of divine love, and thus at first, like the Samaritans, they believe because of the woman's report. In future time, they will come to believe because of having heard, and seen, and tasted, and handled, for themselves; but the beginning is good. This faith which comes of a report by others is a spark of true fire. Take care of it, May God grant you grace so to pray about it, that that spark may increase into a flame!

A NARROW RANGE.

Observe that this faith was such a little faith that it only concerned the healing of the sick child. The nobleman did not know that he needed healing in his own heart; he did not perceive his own ignorance of Jesus, and his own blindness to the Messiah; he did not perhaps know that he needed to be born again; neither did he understand that the Saviour could give him spiritual life and light. He had little knowledge of the Saviour's spiritual power, and thus his faith had a very narrow range. What he did believe was that the Lord Jesus, if He would come to his house, could prevent his child from dying of the fever. He had reached as far as that, and such faith as he had, he turned to practical use at once.

Friend, you do not as yet know how great my Lord is, and what wonderful things He doeth for those who put their trust in Him; but you are saying, "Surely He could help me this morning in my present trial, and deliver me out of my present difficulty." So far, so good. Use what faith you have. Bring before the Lord the trial of the hour. Let me encourage you to do so. If you cannot come to Him for heavenly things, you may, for the present, begin with the sorrows and trials of earth; if you cannot come to Him for an eternal blessing, you may come to Him for a passing favor, and He is ready to hear you. Though your prayer should only be about worldly things, and be nothing more than a merely natural prayer, yet pray it, for "He heareth the young ravens when they cry," and they do not pray spiritual prayers.

LIMITED TO PRESENCE.

The nobleman's faith was so feeble that he limited the power of Jesus to His local presence. Hence his prayer was, "Sir, come down ere my child die." If he could but induce the Lord Jesus to enter the room where the sick child lay, he believed that He would speak to the fever, and the fever would be allayed; but he had no idea that the Lord Jesus Christ could work at the distance of twenty-five miles; he had no notion that the word of the Lord could operate apart from His presence. Still, it was better to have that limited faith than to have none at all.

I notice that this man's faith taught him how to pray in the right spirit. Notice the argument he used; he besought Him that He would come down and heal his son, for he was at the point of death. He urged no merit, but pleaded the misery of the case. He did not plead that the boy was of noble birth—that would have been very bad pleading with Jesus; nor did he urge that he was a lovely child—that would have been a sorry argument; but he pleaded that he was at the point of death. His extremity was his reason for urgency; the child was at death's door, therefore his father begs that mercy's door may open. When you, my friend, are taught by grace to pray aright, you will urge those facts which reveal your own danger and distress, and not those which would make you appear rich and righteous. You cannot ask the Lord to bless you because of any desert or merit you have, for you have no trace of any such thing; but you will be wise to plead your necessities. Cry, "O God, have mercy upon me, for I need mercy!" State your child's case, and say, "For he is at the point of death." This is the key which opens the door of mercy.

II. Thus have we seen faith in the spark: we will now look at struggling to maintain itself, and gradually increasing. Let us see how the fire smoulders, and the heap begins to smoke, and thus betrays the inner fire. This man's faith was true as far as it went. That is a great thing to say. He stood before the Saviour resolved not to go away from Him; his only hope for his child's life was in this great Prophet of Nazareth, and therefore he did not intend to leave Him till his request was granted. He does not at first get the answer that he wants, but he perseveres, and pleads on. His faith was true as far as it went; but it was hindered by a desire for signs and wonders. Our Lord therefore gently chided him, saying, "Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe." Now I know that many of you believe that the Lord Jesus can save, but you have fixed in your mind the way in which He must do it. You have been reading certain religious biographies, and you find that such a man was driven to despair, had horrible thoughts, and so on; therefore you settle it in your minds that you must have similar horrors, or you will be lost. You lay it down as that you must be saved in that way, or not at all. Is this right? Is this wise? Do you mean to dictate to the Lord? His Gospel is not, "Suffer to much horror and despair, and live;" but, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." He comes to many, and calls them effectually by the soft whispers of His love; they do but trust Him, and they enter into immediate rest. Why should it not be so with you? Why should you keep yourself out of comfort by laying down a programme, and demanding that the free Spirit should pay attention to it? Let Him save you as He wills. Away with foolish prejudices!

Yet this is to be said of the nobleman's faith: it could endure a rebuff. Think of the Master only saying to this poor anguished father, "Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe." It was sadly true, but it sounded honestly sharp. This man answered our Lord by still greater importunity. He would not go away, not he. Oh, dear heart, may you have such faith in Christ that, though He should rebuke you, you will not leave Him! Jesus is your only hope; therefore do not turn away from Him. Imitate Bunyan when he spake words to this effect: "I was driven to such straits that I must of necessity go to Jesus; and if He had met me with a drawn sword in His hand, I would sooner have thrown myself upon the edge of His sword than have gone away from Him; for I knew Him to be my last hope." O soul, cling to thy Lord, come what may!

Then see how passionately this man pleaded. He cried, "Sir, come down ere my child die," as much as if he had said, "Lord, do not question me just now about my faith. O my Lord, I pray thee do not think of me at all, but heal my dear child, or he will be dead! He was at the point of death when I left him, do hasten down and save him." Limited was that faith, for he still asks Christ to come down, and seems to think it essential that our Lord should make a journey to Capernaum to work the cure; but note how intense, how eager, how persevering was his pleading. If his faith failed in breadth, it excelled in force. Dear anxious friend, keep close to the example now before us. Pray, and pray again; hold on, and hold out; cry on, and cry out; never cease till the Lord of love grants you an answer of peace.

III. We come to a higher stage, and watch

THE FLAME OF FAITH.

The spark increased as a smouldering fire, and now the fire reveals itself in flame. Observe that Jesus said to the petitioner, "Go thy way, thy son liveth." And the man truly believed, and went his way.

Here note that he believed the word of Jesus over the head of all his former prejudices. He had thought only that Christ could heal if He came down to Capernaum; but now he believes, though Jesus remains where He is, and only speaks the word. Friend, wilt thou, at this moment, believe the Lord Jesus Christ on His bare word? Without laying down any rules as to how He will save thee, wilt thou trust Him? Thou hast prescribed dark convictions, or vivid dreams, or strange sensations; wilt thou cease from such folly? Dost thou not know that he that believeth in Him hath everlasting life? Wilt thou have done with thy nonsense about "Come down, and save me," or "Make me feel this, and I will believe thee"? Wilt thou believe in Him now, despite all thy former thoughts, and pretensions, and desires, and just say, "I will trust my soul with Christ, believing that He can save me"? Thou shalt be saved as surely as thou dost thus trust.

FAITH IN ACTION.

The next thing this man did to prove the sincerity of his faith was that he at once obeyed Christ. Jesus said to him, "Go thy way;" that is, "Go home"—thy son liveth." If the man had not believed the word he would have lingered there, and kept on pleading, and looking for favorable signs; but as he has believed, he is satisfied with the word of the Lord, and goes his way without another word. "Thy son liveth" is enough for him. Many of you have said, when you have heard the Gospel preached, "You tell us to believe in Christ; but we will continue in prayer." That is not what the Gospel commands you. If you believe in Him, you will go your way in peace; you will believe that He has saved you, and act as if you knew it to be true. You will joy and rejoice in the fact that you are saved. You will not stop to cavil, and to question, and to follow after all kinds of religious experiences and feelings; but you will exclaim, "He tells me to believe Him, and I believe Him. He says, 'He that believeth on Me hath everlasting life,' and I do believe in Him, and therefore I have everlasting life. I may not feel any peculiar emotion, but I have eternal life. Whether I see my salvation or not, I am saved."

Still, I am bound to say concerning this man's faith at this stage, that it still fell somewhat short of what it might have been. It was a great thing for him to have come so far; but he had farther yet to go. He expected less than he might have expected, and therefore, when he saw his servants, he asked them when the dear child began to amend. He was overjoyed when they virtually said, "He never did begin to amend; the fever left him all at once; at the seventh hour he recovered." You see he expected a gradual restoration. He looked for the ordinary course of nature; but here was a miraculous work. He received far more than he reckoned on. How little we know of Christ, and how little we believe in Him even when we do trust Him! We measure His boundless treasure by our scanty purses. Yet the faith that saves is not always full-grown; there is room for us to believe more, and to expect more, of our blessed Lord. Oh, that we would do so!

IV. So far the nobleman's faith has grown, but now we shall see it become

THE CONFLAGRATION OF FAITH.

As he went home, his servants met him with good news. In the quietude of his faith he was exceedingly delighted when they said, "Thy son liveth!" The message came upon him like the echo of the word of Jesus. The repetition must have astonished him. I often notice about the preaching of the Word, how the sentences strike you as to their very words when God blesses them. People say to me, "You said, sir, the self-same thing that we were talking of when we were on the road; you described our cases even to our thoughts, and you mentioned certain expressions which had been used in our conversation; surely God was speaking through you." Yes, it is often so; Christ's own Word finds many echoes from the mouths of His commissioned servants. The Lord's Providence rules words as well as deeds, and makes men say the right words without their knowing why they say them.

Now the nobleman's faith is confirmed by the answer to his prayers. His experience has come in to the aid of his faith. He believes in a more assured sense than he did before. He has proved the truth of the Lord's word, and therefore he knows and is persuaded that He is Lord and God. The faith of a sinner coming to Christ is one thing; the faith of a man who has come to Christ, and has obtained the blessing, is another and stronger matter. The first faith, the simpler faith, is that which saves; but the further faith is that which brings comfort, and joy, and strength into the spirit.

CONFIRMATION.

"My prayer is heard," said he; and then he spoke to the servants, and after inquiry his faith was sustained by each detail. The more he studied the case the more wonderful it became. The details were singularly confirmatory of his confidence, and by their means he rose to a clearer and firmer faith. Brethren, how many such confirmations some of us have had! Doubters attempt to argue with us about the simplicities of the Gospel; and they want to fight with us upon their own ground of mere speculative reasoning. Dear sir, this is hardly fair to us. Our own ground is of quite another kind. We are not strangers to the business of faith, but adepts in it; and you ought to allow something for our personal experience of the faithfulness of the Lord our God. We have a thousand treasured memories of happy details which we cannot tell you. We do not call you swine, but at the same time we dare not throw our pearls before you. Certain things are so inter-twisted with our lives that we are anchored by them. "Coincidences," you say. Ah, well! say what you please, to us they are other than to you! Our soul has cried out, time after time, "This is the finger of God." A man who has been helped out of a very severe trouble cannot forget his deliverer. Do you reply, "You were fortunate to get out of it"? Oh, sir, this seems a very cold-blooded remark!

A POTENT ARGUMENT.

At the same moment that Christ said, "Thy son liveth," the nobleman's son did live; the same word that Jesus used to the father was used also by the servants who had been thirty miles away; and therefore the father felt that something more than human had crossed his path. Do you wonder at it? Besides, that dear boy, whom he found sound and well, was a potent argument. You could not argue the happy father out of a faith which had brought him such joy. The child was at the point of death till faith received the word of the Lord Jesus, and then the fever fled. The father must believe; would you have him doubt?

Strengthened in his faith by his experience, after having believed the bare word of Jesus, the good man now sees that word fulfilled, and he believes in Jesus in the fullest sense; believes for everything; for his body, and for his soul; for all that he is, and for all that he has. From that day forth he becomes a disciple of the Lord Jesus. He follows Him, not as a Healer only, nor as a Prophet only, nor as a Saviour only, but as his Lord and his God. His hope, his trust, and his confidence are fixed upon Jesus as the true Messiah.

What follows is so natural, and yet so joyous, that I pray it may be true to all of you; his family also believe. Happy household! There was a grand baptism soon after, when they all went to confess their faith in Jesus. Not only was the child cured, but the whole household was cured. The father did not know, when he went pleading about his boy, that he himself needed to be saved; the mother, also, probably thought only of her son; but now salvation has come to the whole family, and the fever of sin and unbelief is gone away with the other fever. May the Lord work such a wonder as that in all our houses! If any of you are groaning under a burden of grief, I trust you will be so relieved that, when you tell your wife of it, she will believe in Jesus too. May the dear child of your care believe in Jesus while yet a child; and may all who belong to your domestic circle also belong to the divine Lord! Grant, at this time, thy servant's desire, O Lord Jesus, for Thy glory's sake! Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

A LAYMAN'S STUDY OF THE ENGLISH BIBLE, by Francis Bowen, LL.D., is a deeply interesting work, full of suggestive and original thought. Dr. Bowen approaches the subject, as its title indicates, as a layman, not as a philologist or a theologian. He does not depreciate the aspects to which those two classes direct their attention, but he believes that, examined purely from a literary point of view, without regard to its other claims, the Bible ranks far above all other books as a study for the philosopher, the historian, and the poet. More than that; it has as a book exerted a more powerful influence over the course of human affairs among civilized nations than all other books put together. Dealing first with its language and literary style, he places it first among English classics, pointing out what seems to be forgotten in these days, that the language in the main is Tyndale's. From that aspect Dr. Bowen proceeds to examine the narratives of the Old Testament and the Parables of our Lord, the exquisite beauty of which in their English dress he dwells on with critical pleasure. Chapters on the philosophy and the poetry of the Bible and the Character and Institutions of Moses complete the book. We believe that the most experienced Christian who has made the Bible his life study will see new beauties in his beloved book under Dr. Bowen's guidance, while to the intelligent young student his work will be an introduction to its study which will stimulate his interest and incite his admiration. Pp. 145; price, $1. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

"MARVELS OF ANIMAL LIFE," by Charles Frederick Holder, is a work that will be a genuine surprise to dwellers in cities. Mr. Holder has been a close as well as an enterprising observer. The stories he tells in this book of the habits of animals and fishes show how much nearer they come to the possession of reason than the majority of people suppose. He tells us that many of the observations he has chronicled were made during a long residence upon a coral reef, some while swimming under water, and others are the memories of many practical collecting tours in various localities in search of specimens. "The chapters relate to widely different subjects; they describe the strange forms of animal life found in various parts of the world, all showing such striking evidence of design in their structure and ways as to convince the sceptical that they are the marvellous productions of the Great Maker." The following is a list of the subjects of the chapters: The Nest-builders of the Sea, Living Homes, Dry Land Fishes, Meteors of the Sea, Parental Care Among Animals, An Ocean Swordsman, Finny Light-Bearers, Old Friends, Is There a Sea Serpent? Animal Electricians, Our Common Snakes, Animal Mimics, Lost Races, The Ink Bearers, The King of Crabs, The Tiger of the Sea, Living Lights, Wonders of the Air, Animal Traps and Trappers, The White Whalers. As this list shows, it is not a beaten highway that Mr. Holder travels on in this work. There are over thirty full-page illustrations in it, rendering his descriptions of the creatures clear and vivid to his readers. Pp. 240; price, $2. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

"THE BLOOD COVENANT,"

by H. Clay Trumbull, D.D. How much we have still to learn of the deep meaning of the Bible after all these centuries of study will be realized by every reader of Dr. Trumbull's lectures. What is the blood covenant, the primitive rite which underlies that mysterious symbolism of circumcision which was the token of the covenant with Abraham? Not one person in a hundred knows. Dr. Trumbull has with immense labor searched mythologies and books of travel for light upon this question, with surprising results. In the course of his inquiries he met an intelligent Syrian who witnessed in a village at the base of the mountains of Lebanon the consummation of a blood covenant. "It was two young men who were to enter into this covenant. They had known each other and been intimate for years; but now they were to become brother-friends in the covenant of blood. Their relatives and neighbors were called together, in the open place before the village fountain, to witness the sealing compact. The young men publicly announced their purpose and their reasons for it. Their declarations were written down, in duplicate—one paper for each friend—and signed by themselves and by several witnesses. One of the friends took a sharp lancet and opened a vein in the other's arm. Into the opening thus made he inserted a quill, through which he sucked the living blood. The lancet-blade was carefully wiped on one of the duplicate covenant-papers, and then it was taken by the other friend," who did likewise. The covenant papers were folded small, and each friend wore one suspended about his neck or bound on the arm, in token of the indissoluble relation. This rite in other forms Dr. Trumbull traces among the Indians; Stanley found it in Africa; it exists in India, and seems in some shape to appear among all primitive peoples. We have not space here to indicate its various Scriptural applications, though they are exceedingly instructive. Dr. Trumbull's book must speak for itself, as, indeed, it is well able to do. It has an excellent topical and a Scriptural index. Pp. 30; price, $2. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

THE PASSENGER'S CHALLENGE.

"TOM," said a sailor to his messmate, as they were keeping watch together one evening on an outward-bound ship, "have you seen that lubber that came aboard yesterday?"

"Which do you mean?"

"Oh, a seedy-looking fellow with check pants. Looks as if he hadn't been sober for a year."

"No; I haven't seen anybody like that on board."

"Well, he is game for you. I heard the party that came aboard with him telling the captain a yarn about him. Wanted the captain to stop his grog all through the voyage. He seems to be a bad egg. He's broke his wife's heart, the party said, and her friends have subscribed and sent him out to Australia to get rid of him. Now, you're always wanting to convert some of us, so you'd better try to work it on him. He seems the sort of lubber that wants converting. You couldn't make him worse, anyway."

The next day after the conversation the man Jack called the whiskey-lubber came on deck. He might have been good-looking once, for he had regular features, and his broad forehead showed that he was not without natural capacity. But he looked a miserable creature: his eyes were bleary, and the corners of his mouth drawn downward, as if he was out of temper. His hair was uncombed, his beard neglected, and his dress dirty and slovenly. Tom saw him, but he knew that as a common sailor he ought not to open a conversation with him. However, the miserable creature was dull and wanted to talk to some one, and, as it happened, he fastened himself on Jack, and was soon talking glibly. A loud laugh from Jack attracted attention, and one after another of the sailors made an excuse to come around and listen to the fun. The passenger was bestowing his curses on things in general, and the ship and the sea in particular. He had no intention of amusing anybody, but the ingenuity and lurid force of his oaths interested men who were not novices in blasphemy.

"Here, Tom," Jack called out, "come and talk to this gentleman; he says you Methodists are a lot of hypocrites," and Jack qualified the reproachful word with the curse the stranger uttered. To the passenger he said, by way of introduction, as Tom came up, "This is our amateur chaplain, sir."

"Oh, you are one of the Psalm-singers, are you?" he said to Tom. "Well, you are either a fool or a knave. You are either too stupid to know that the Bible is a lie, or you do know it and won't own to it."

Tom saw the three sailors were listening and were interested in the debate that the stranger invited. He had not sought the controversy, but as it was forced upon him he would not shrink from it. "I haven't much learning," he said, "but I'm not reckoned a fool by those who know me. I believe the Bible, and I know it's true. I'm no knave, either. I don't expect to make anything by my religion—not in the way you mean."

"Then you are a deluded man—a dupe. Now see here; I know the Bible, and I'll show you it can't be true." He was a glib talker, and he poured out with some adroitness a hash of Ingersoll and Tom Paine. He ended with: "You can't show me a prophecy in the book that came true, that was not written after the event."

Tom saw that he was no match in an argument for the stranger; and though he was not shaken for a moment in his faith, he could not rebut the scientific reasoning that was hurled at him. But he could not be silent under the challenge, even though he had to follow Solomon's prescription for a man wise in his own conceits (Prov. 26: 5), and answer a fool according to his folly. "I'll take you there, sir," he said. "I can find you such a prophecy,"

"Oo, you can? Then you are a wonderful man. Let me see it. Here's a fair issue; now, you men," turning to the three sailors who were listening, "shall be the jury. You shall say whether of us two is right. Come, produce your passage."

Tom had already pulled out a New Testament from his hip-pocket and was turning over the leaves. Presently he found the place he wanted, and handed his antagonist the book, pointing with his big forefinger to the passage 11 Peter 3: 3. The three sailors bent over and read the passage with the stranger: "There shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts." "You're one, you know, sir," was Tom's brief but concise application.

The man looked up with a baffled face, while the sailors joined in a laugh and a "Well done, Tom."

"That is not a fair argument," said the man; "that is abuse, not reasoning."

"Why, you don't mean to deny that you're a scoffer," said Tom; "and as for abuse, isn't that what you've been giving us all the time?"

The stranger rose, saying it was no use talking to a man so obtuse, and shuffled off to see if he could obtain a drink. He sulked for several days afterward, but no more infidel talk was heard from him. After a time Tom succeeded in breaking through his reserve, and had several earnest talks with him privately. He refused to argue, but dwelt on the love of the Saviour to the lost, and succeeded in getting a promise from the man that he would give the New Testament a fair reading without prejudice, and Tom told him that he would pray for a blessing upon it.

THE SILVER LINING.

A SERIAL STORY.

The Foreign Mail.

"A LETTER from New York, papa," cried Kate Arnold, holding up an envelope addressed in her brother Frank's well-known hand. "I am all impatience. Do sit down and read it."

"Do you know what Shakespeare says about impatience, my dear?" said Dr. Arnold, taking the letter from her. "Yours is an undisciplined mind. I am afraid; you will never rise to that sublimity of soul which—"

"May I take the letter first and the lecture afterward, papa?"

"Bacon, in common with other philosophers, teaches us that patience—"

"Papa, why will you tantalize me so? All that Bacon ever wrote would not interest me like the contents of that letter. Mamma, do you take the letter, and let papa go and collect his quotations for his lecture on patience. You will read it to me, will you not? I am so anxious to know how Frank and Clare are getting on. There has not been a word from them since they settled, except that long description of the city. And the Australian mail is in, too, so that we shall surely have a letter from Helen this afternoon. This will be quite a red-letter day."

"You mean a foreign-letter day," said Dr. Arnold. "It is as I am so often telling you, Kate; the female mind is so entirely weak, so given to hyperbole, so inexact, so incapable of expressing the few and puny thoughts that it gives birth to, that until a lady has attained the years of your mother and has had the advantage of long association with a master mind, she is really unfit for intellectual society. You remember that St. Paul insisted on their keeping silence in the church, and if they wanted to know anything they should ask their husbands at home.

"Then I come now, papa. On apostolic principles, I want to know what is in that letter, and having no husband at home—for which I am duly grateful—I ask my father. Papa, do stop teasing, and instead of giving me information about the philosophers that I do not want, be sensible and give me the information that I do want."

"You mean, be indulgent and kind, Kate. If I were sensible and a wise father I should gird myself for the almost hopeless task of developing the thing you call your mind, and refrain from gratifying your curiosity, which is a sign of its inherent weakness."

"If I may be allowed to interrupt the skirmish," said Mrs. Arnold, "I would say that if you two want to show your wisdom you could not do it in a better way than by adjourning your debate and sitting down to breakfast."

"That is a very practical remark, my dear. As you wish it, we will see what Frank has to say about the medical system and mode of treatment in America. If there is anything in the letter apart from professional information I will communicate it." Dr. Arnold quietly proceeded with his breakfast, and having opened his letter, read it as he sipped his coffee.

He had no pleasant news to communicate, Frank wrote. He was weary, disappointed, and sick at heart. He was meeting with little success, and was crushed and humiliated by an absurd act on the part of his wife, which caused him more vexation than anything that had ever happened to him. She had unaccountably disappeared, and he could not find a trace of her. Whether she had committed suicide, or was making some ridiculous attempt to earn her living, or had returned to England, he could not conjecture. She was gone, and though he had searched diligently, there was no clue to her fate. It was due to her, Frank said, to admit that he was not wholly blameless in the matter. He respected her for the wonderful skill she had displayed in her economical management of the little household, but disappointment and pecuniary embarrassment had tried his temper and rendered him at times irritable and impatient. Clare was a mere child in some things, and so sensitive that a hasty word distressed her needlessly. One evening, two weeks before the date of his letter, he was more than usually nervous, and had unfortunately used an expression which Clare interpreted as a reproach. She burst into tears, and declared that she would not be a burden on any man's shoulders. She grew hysterical, and he had endeavored to soothe her; but that night, during his temporary absence, she dressed herself in her poorest garments, and leaving her watch and a few articles of jewelry behind her, she went out, and he had not seen or heard of her since. He was still seeking her, but, not wishing to cause scandal, he was not asking police assistance.

"It is bad news," said Dr. Arnold gloomily. "I am afraid Frank is not acting wisely or kindly." And he handed the letter to his wife. Kate rose, and leaning on her mother's shoulder, read the distressing communication.

"You will send him some money, dear, will you not?" said Mrs. Arnold, appealingly. "We cannot help him in his worst trouble, but we may relieve his material wants. The poor boy must be very miserable. It is cruel of Clare to have deserted him in his difficulties."

"We will not judge her unheard, my dear," said Dr. Arnold. "We do not know how much she suffered. Frank's admission implies a great deal, coming from him. Depend upon it, she was driven to distraction before she took that rash step. I will send him some money, however, and we will hope that good will come out of evil."

Mrs. Arnold and Kate, however, with the natural disposition of women, which is so puzzling to the masculine mind, could spare none of their sweetness and mercy for their missing sister. They judged her harshly, as women invariably do judge a woman who departs from the strict line of duty, and were ready to accept any explanation which exculpated Frank at Clare's expense. When Dr. Arnold had sallied forth to visit his patients the two ladies discussed the subject together, and were so engrossed in it that when, a short time later, Helen's letter from Australia was brought in, they were almost startled, as by an incongruous arrival. Helen's letter was to her sister, so Kate escaped a repetition of the morning's ordeal, even if Dr. Arnold's depression had not precluded him from inflicting it.

Helen Arnold's letter was full of loving expressions, which evidently came from a full heart longing to be once again among the dear ones from whom she was separated. Goodness and mercy, Helen said, accompanied herself and her companion on their strange mission. Among their fellow-voyagers was an intelligent and refined lady, who was returning to Australia under sorrowful circumstances. She left it the happy wife of a prosperous settler, a large wool-exporter, and was returning a widow to a desolate home. Mrs. Raymond's sorrowful face attracted Helen's gentle sympathy, and before the vessel was a week at sea the good Christian girl possessed the widow's confidence. She was wealthy, for her husband was the owner of an immense tract of land and flocks of sheep, which in no other country are gathered in such numbers. All this had been bequeathed to her by her husband, with the desire that she would not dispose of it, but leave it as it then was, under the management of his nephew, Leslie, whom he had adopted as his son. Mrs. Raymond's visit to her native land had been occasioned by the illness of her aged mother, whose last hours she had soothed, and it was on the very day that she laid her to rest in the English cemetery that she received the intelligence of her husband's sudden death.

Thus doubly bereaved, Helen's Christian sympathy was precious indeed, and by the time the vessel approached its destination the widow clung to her as to a daughter, and begged pitifully that the two girls would make their home with her during their visit. She dreaded the loneliness of the home where she had been intensely happy, and where in every room there would be agonizing reminders of him whose love had been her joy and delight. It was there that the two girls went on their arrival, and there Ralph came to woo and win the girl whom his sister had chosen for him.

It was not an easy task, for Jean was sensitively conscious that her lover might feel that her coming out to him had given her a claim upon him which he must discharge, and she exacted from him a devotion such as no lover was ever before required to render, and put his sincerity to tests which excited Helen's surprise by their ingenuity. Jean was resolved that Ralph Arnold should never marry her on any other ground than that he loved her for herself, and would have wooed her if there had been no question of duty or obligation in the case. But she had been convinced, not unwillingly and, they were married.

It was a pleasant home in one of the suburbs of Melbourne which Ralph had prepared for his bride. The first few weeks after the marriage were fully occupied in seeing all that was to be seen of the city and unpacking the well-filled boxes and cases which had come from England. Their contents many times brought tears into Helen's and Jean's eyes, for they reminded them of the loving hearts and hands which had packed them, and it seemed to them that they had been supplied with everything that heart could wish for.

At the same time there was much to charm them in the new home. They were astonished and delighted with much that they saw—with the width of the streets, the regularity with which they had been planned, and the fineness of many of the buildings—for they were hardly prepared to find a city of so few years' standing with so much that was really magnificent about it. They were particularly charmed with the numerous gardens scattered about the city, and Helen was deeply interested in the Botanical Gardens, which promised her many an afternoon of study, as her father had from childhood encouraged her love for trees and plants. Though the gardens seemed to her wanting in the picturesque, shrubs having been allowed too much to supplant the culture of flowers, still they contained many remarkable and rare specimens, and Helen found in Mrs. Raymond a friend who was as much a lover of them as herself.

Jean had a great desire to visit the gold country, and with some of her old impetuosity at last persuaded Ralph to take them to Ballarat, about a hundred miles away. Leslie Raymond, between whom and Ralph Arnold a close friendship had sprung up during the latter's visits to Mrs. Raymond's house in the character of a lover, was of the party, and they set off early one morning in bright spirits. Jean had heard marvellous tales of the gold-fields, and when she

at last found herself walking through the well-ordered, well-built gold town, she was almost disappointed, so different was it from all the ideas she had formed. She greatly longed to go down a mine, to see for herself the gold lying in its natural bed; but Ralph insisted that she must content herself with making her own observations at the mouth of the mine, while he and Leslie descended.

Jean and Helen watched the two as they entered the iron cage till they could see them no longer, and set themselves during their absence to observe the process of separating the gold from the earth, which they saw accomplished on a platform above the machinery. The gold, mixed with mud and soil, was placed in a trough, while water was allowed to pass through it, causing the mud and refuse to run off, while the weight of the gold made it sink to the bottom.

Three times Jean and Helen saw this process repeated, till at last the specks of gold were lying in little heaps—wonderfully little heaps. Jean thought, after all the labor that had been expended on them. She was very glad when at last her husband and Leslie were seen ascending to the top, and determined it should be the last time she would ever propose visiting a mine.

They had been lowered more than four hundred feet, and then found themselves in an underground passage, high enough to permit of a truck being drawn by a horse, where they came upon the men busy at their work. Holding up a light, Ralph said he was able to see the specks of gold glittering in the soil.

The next morning was spent in visiting the public gardens and various places of interest, and they found it difficult to believe that twenty years before there was scarcely a sign of this wonderful town. They reached home the next evening tired and weary, but having enjoyed the trip immensely.

It was easy to read between the lines of Helen's letter, carefully as her modesty would try to conceal the fact, that there were many ready to admire her. Her easy manners, combined with a certain degree of dignity, had evidently made her shine in Melbourne society with a grace quite her own. But sister and mother, as they detected this, were sure that her's was a heart that would not easily be won, that would wait to find a kindred spirit, with ideas refined and noble as her own. Nevertheless there was a suspicious fullness of detail in her references to Leslie Raymond which prepared the readers for a confession that might come at no distant date.

Glad and joyful as the letter was, both the ladies felt that there was pain for them in the inference that they drew from it. They said but little about it to each other, but Mrs. Arnold retired to her own room shortly after they had read it with an anxious face. Left alone, Kate read the letter again, and this time the tears fell heavily. Would she be left alone? she asked herself. Was it possible that of all the five young people who had once made the physician's house bright with merriment and youthful gaiety she would be the only one left? Grace was gone, her young life crushed in that terrible shipwreck; Ralph was at the Antipodes; Frank's hopeful career was among the quicksands in America, and now it seemed as if Helen, her most cherished companion, would be taken from her side. It was no wonder that the beautiful, gentle girl wept as she thought of it, and her heart sank. But with Kate, happily, tears had but one issue. It was natural for her to turn in sorrow to the true and only real Source of consolation, and, as on that Sunday morning months ago when her sense of desolation first fell upon her, she bent her knees in prayer. There came upon her as she knelt silently the same calm courage and peaceful trust which had filled her heart before. Spiritually she placed her hand in that of her Saviour, and looking up to Him in confidence, she asked Him to lead her and sustain her, and though her lot might be solitary and her duty difficult, she was content if only He would guide her steps and help her to live for Him and for those who would be dependent upon her for light and joy.

In her own room Mrs. Arnold, too, was looking to the same Source of peaceful rest. Her prayer was, first of all, for her children. Oh! for God's protecting care over them—for her newly-married boy that God would be the Guide of his life and would bless his home; for her daughter that she might be kept from danger, and that if a new relationship was opening before her that God would guide her wisely, and give her the insight and prudence she would need. For that dearest of all—the wandering sheep of the fold, always the one nearest to a mother's heart—what could she ask? He was in trouble, and knew not the faith that filled her soul, a ship drifting about without a rudder and in spiritual darkness; how his hapless condition wrung her heart with pity! For him she had no prayer but the one that thousands of mothers have uttered since this world began—not that he might be delivered out of his troubles, but that his troubles might lead him to the Saviour. It is not surprising that in one church at least the intercession of saints has been incorporated in its creed. As Mrs. Arnold pleaded for her boy it seemed as though such earnest, agonizing intercession must be effectual, and that he must be the better for it. Surely a man for whom such prayers were offered must have his path to the light opened. Mrs. Arnold wrestled until she was faint and physically exhausted, and then came to her the feeling that she had placed him in the hands of a loving Father, and all would yet be well.

As the family gathered for their evening meal it was not on its two most sensitive members that the agitations of the day lay most heavily. Dr. Arnold looked more distressed than either his wife or daughter. The weight of care which he rolled away while he concentrated his thoughts on the duties of his profession rolled back upon him with heavier pressure, now that no patient was looking up in his face for the words of comfort and encouragement. There was no badinage with Kate, no playful fencing between the two, no cheering words for his wife; nothing on that grave, thoughtful face but gloom and despondency. Well was it for him that at his own fireside there were two loved ones who, looking at the heavy cloud that hung over the home, had looked above it and had seen that it had a silver lining.

HEZEKIAH'S GOOD REIGN.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 22, 2 Kings 18: 1-12. Golden Text, ver. 3. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Pernicious Parental Example—A Good Beginning—Declaration of Principle—The Right Eliminating the Wrong—A Day of Humiliation—Praise Following—An Invitation to Israel—The Purification—The Brazen Serpent Destroyed—A Common Mistake—The Reformation Spreads.

God's next chosen witness among His people was not a prophet, but a king. Hezekiah had no advantages in his own family; his father, Ahaz, was the most notoriously wicked of all the kings of Judah; he had established in Judah the worship of the golden calves, had added to it Baal-worship, and even introduced some of the Assyrian idolatry. How Hezekiah had come to know the Lord in these unfavorable circumstances we know not. But this we know, that the heart of our God is so tender that wherever there is special need, as there must have been in the case of Hezekiah, when in his early youth he stood out a witness for God in his father's court, there special grace is vouchsafed.

Hezekiah began well. "He in the first year of his reign, in the first month, opened the doors of the house of the Lord, and repaired them." (II Chron. 29: 3). He did not wait to secure the good-will of his people, but, standing fast in all the will of God, and having God on his side, he went forward, and lost no time in re-establishing the worship of God in Jerusalem. He did not begin by attempting to overthrow idolatry, but by bringing in the truth and letting it overcome the evil; he attacked nobody, judged nobody, but began by letting all his people see that

HE WAS ON THE LORD'S SIDE, and that he believed the Lord was on his side. Having thus taken the lead in his own royal person, he called upon the Levites to do their part, to begin first at home by sanctifying themselves, and then to sanctify the house of the Lord God of their fathers, and to carry the filthiness out of the holy place. In his words to the Levites Hezekiah showed how completely he understood the situation from God's standpoint, how the neglect of God by the last generation had brought all the trouble upon Judah which his people were now suffering, and he said, "Now it is in mine heart to make a covenant with the Lord God of Israel, that His fierce wrath may turn away from us. My sons, be not now negligent; for the Lord hath chosen you to stand before Him, to serve Him, and that ye should minister unto Him, and to burn incense." How could such an appeal be fruitless? The Levites who had any spiritual life would be encouraged to make a stand in common with their young king, and those whose hearts were in the world would be more inclined to turn to the Lord when they saw that they could no longer hold their own in the way which they had been pursuing. The king made a thorough work of it. Having aroused the Levites, they in their turn influenced the priests, and a thorough cleansing of the temple was effected in the course of little more than a fortnight. On the sixteenth day of the first month of his reign, the Levites brought the glad news that the work was done, the temple cleansed and sanctified, as well as the altar and all the vessels thereof.

Then the king began with the civil governors; he rose early and gathered the rulers of the city, and went up to the house of the Lord. And they brought seven bullocks, and seven rams, and seven lambs, and seven he-goats, for a sin offering for the kingdom, and for the sanctuary, and for Judah, and he commanded the priests, and the sons of Aaron, to offer them on the altar of the Lord." This was a confession of sin in which king, rulers, priests, Levites, and the common people, all were represented, and took their share in the humiliation. It was an ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF NATIONAL SIN, and the offering was typical of atonement for the nation, and of a national consecration to God, "the king commanded that the burnt offering and the sin offering should be made for all Israel." Cleansing, atonement, and consecration accomplished, praise next followed. It was the natural outcome of real consecration, the evidence of faith that the consecration was accepted; "the song of the Lord began." This was no mere form; "they sang praises with gladness, and they bowed their heads and worshipped." Then King Hezekiah, who was acting as the true father of his people, young as he was, made an appeal to his subjects that they should bring thank offerings into the house of the Lord. There was an instant and hearty response; so much so that "the priests were too few," so that the Levites had to "help them till the work was ended, and until the other priests had sanctified themselves; for the Levites were more upright in heart to sanctify themselves than the priests. So Hezekiah rejoiced, and all the people, that God had prepared the people, for the thing was done suddenly." One fortnight and two days had elapsed since Hezekiah came to the throne, and the tide of religious feeling was changed throughout all his kingdom, the votaries of idolatry were no longer in the ascendancy, and his bold, vigorous, uncompromising service to his God had been successful. True, the idol shrines still existed, and, no doubt, idolatrous worship was still extant, but court patronage was withheld from it, and without, as yet, dealing it one blow, its power had begun to decline.

Having gone thus far, Hezekiah took counsel, and his princes and all the congregation to keep the passover. God had enlarged their hearts, they knew that many in Israel had been converted in the days of Elijah and Elisha, and probably later many had been blessed through Jonah and Amos. Many were now living whom Isaiah, Nahum, Micah, and Joel had taught the way of the Lord, and the king desired that the people of Israel, as well as of Judah, should share in this great passover celebration. Since the days of David and Solomon the two kingdoms had never united to keep the feast of the passover, and the heart of Hezekiah beat high with hope that the glorious work already and so quickly accomplished in Judah might as fully go forward in Israel too. The heart of the reformer was truly that of an evangelist; he reminded the children of Israel of their sin, and of the consequent chastisement which had fallen upon them, and then appealed to them in a brotherly way to yield themselves to the Lord, and to enter into His sanctuary and serve Him. He then reminded them of the promises which God had made (Lev. 26:40-42), that if they should turn to the Lord He would bring them again into His land. It must have been at no small expense and trouble that this proclamation was made, but Hezekiah thought nothing too much to do for the God whom he loved and served.

INVITES ISRAEL TO UNITE.

"So the posts passed from city to city, through the country of Ephraim and Manasseh, even unto Zebulun." Hosea was now king of Israel, the very last king who reigned over the ten tribes; there was no favorable response on his part; he is not even mentioned in the history. And his people as a whole laughed the messengers of Hezekiah and their message to scorn. But even in Israel there was a "little flock" who, "humbled themselves and came to Jerusalem." In Judah, which had been but one month previous sunk in idolatry, "the hand of God was to give them one heart to do the commandment of the king, and of the princes by the word of the Lord." After all, it was not so much Hezekiah as the Lord Himself who did the glorious work in Judah; the king was indeed an honored instrument, but the Lord was doing His own work. The young king's fond dream of an international passover was only partially fulfilled. But God made it a largely representative one, and the cream of God's children from both kingdoms were present.

Now was the moment for striking the blow at the prevalent idolatry; the people had found something better; the living God had become a reality to them, and they were beginning to hate what was unreal and untrue. It needed little persuasion, with the king at their head, to overthrow idolatry; "they arose and took away the altars that were in Jerusalem, and all the altars for incense they took away and cast them into the brook Kidron (II Chron. 30:1-14)." And Hezekiah brake in pieces the brazen serpent that Moses had made; for unto those days the children of Israel did burn incense to it; and he

[a piece of brass]. God had commanded Moses to make the serpent of brass as a test of His people's faith, but never as an object to be worshipped. Just as the elements we use in the Lord's Supper, which were never intended to be worshipped as they are in the Romish Church and among the ritualists in the Protestant Episcopal Church. Oh how the heart of man turns aside from God to any other thing or person! Oh how many there are who almost defy a man of God whom He has used for blessing to them! How many look on prayer as though it were something in itself, and regard the prayers of people whom they think good with a kind of superstitious reverence, not seeing God in the matter at all! How many look upon the oil, in anointing for healing, as though it were something in itself, other than a simple symbol and test of faith! Nebrushtan, Nebrushtan, is the cry of faith. It was not the brazen serpent which healed the bitten Israelite, it was "Jehovah Kopheka, the Lord that healeth thee." It is not the prayers in which virtue lies, but it is He to whom they are addressed; it is not the elements in the Lord's Supper which are to us anything in themselves, but it is the broken body and shed blood which they symbolize. It is not the preacher, the messenger of God who is the fount of blessing, it is the Word of the living God which proceeds from the Holy Ghost in him. Hezekiah respected no ancient custom, no "vain conversation received by tradition from [his] fathers" (I Pet. 1:18); with an unsparring hand he brake in pieces this relic of antiquity that it might no more be a stumbling-block to his people.

It was just in the freshness of their new zeal that the people celebrated the passover. Of form there was some lack; the priests and the Levites were shamed into their duty and sanctified themselves; many from the land of Israel were not sanctified, but all was done in the spirit more than in the letter; the king prayed for them, "And the Lord hearkened to Hezekiah and healed the people." The king took a prominent part throughout, praying, exhorting, comforting. So glorious was the impression made upon the people, so happy were they in their return to their God, that "they took counsel to keep other seven days with gladness. The work of reformation went on; those who had been blessed at Jerusalem went out into all the cities of Judah and effected such a revolution that throughout the whole land of Judah images, groves, high places, and altars were exterminated; they utterly destroyed them all. And finally, when the king had re-established the priests and Levites in their courses, he commanded that the portion of the priests and Levites be given unto them. When the hearts of people are fully won to the Lord, there is no necessity to beseech and urge them to give their money for His service; they cannot help it; they look upon all which they have as His.

In all this history we see the divine way of doing things. It was not impulsive zeal which actuated the young king; he was ready to the hand of God, and as such could be used not simply as Jehu was, an instrument of destruction who dealt out death with unscrupulous hand; not simply as Jonah was, when he was driven unwillingly to do the behest of his God; Hezekiah was a willing instrument, entering into and carrying out the mind of God. "He trusted in the Lord God of Israel, so that after him was none like him among all the kings of Judah, nor any that were before him. For he clave to the Lord, and departed not from following Him, but kept His commandments which the Lord commanded Moses." Thus, trusting in the Lord, He led him to do all this just in His own way, by the incoming of good to destroy the reign of evil, using no force or compulsion, but reckoning upon the Lord, who can change the hearts of men. "And the Lord was with him;" this was his power, and the real secret of his strength and wisdom; "And he prospered whithersoever he went forth and he rebelled against the king of Assyria and served him not."

Six years of his reign passed by and Hoshea, king of Israel, whose people had mocked at the loving messages of Hezekiah, was taken captive by Sennacherib, King of Assyria, and the people who had despised the message of God were taken captive away from their own land; a warning indeed to those who hold back from a movement of the Spirit of God.

The late General George Brinton McClellan, whose portrait appears on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., on December 3d, 1826. He was consequently nearly fifty-nine years old when his sudden death occurred, on Thursday, October 29th, last. The McClellan family is of Scottish descent, and some of its members have achieved distinction in the British service. Old citizens of Philadelphia describe the General's parents as people of high intellectual ability. His father, Dr. George McClellan, was an eminent physician and the founder of Jefferson College, and his mother, whose maiden name was Elizabeth Brinton, from which came the General's second name, was a lady remarkable for refinement and culture. The boy acquired the rudiments of his education at home, and was afterward sent to a preparatory school, from which, at the age of fourteen, he proceeded to the University of Pennsylvania. He remained there two years, and though he showed no unusual precocity, he passed his examinations creditably. As he evinced a strong predilection for a military life, his father secured for him an entrance to the Military Academy at West Point. It was there that his brilliant genius as an engineer manifested itself. Though he was under twenty years of age when he graduated, in June, 1846, he was second in a class of fifty-nine, and was first in engineering and geology. It is a curious coincidence that among his classmates was his distinguished foe, who was afterward known as General "Stonewall" Jackson.

THE MEXICAN WAR.

He was ordered to Mexico immediately after his graduation, where, as lieutenant of sappers, miners, and pontoniers, he performed valuable service and won the respect of his fellow-officers by his courage and ability. For gallantry at Vera Cruz, where he was attached to General Worth's division, he was highly commended in official reports; at Cerro Gordo and the City of Mexico he was connected with General Twiggs' division, and was specially commended for gallant conduct; at Contreras and Churubusco he won the brevet of first lieutenant, and at Molino del Rey was offered the additional brevet of captain, which he declined. The offer, however, being subsequently tendered for "gallant and meritorious conduct at Chapultepec," was accepted, and in May, 1848, he assumed command of the company in which he had previously been a subordinate officer.

Among other incidents which occurred during his service in Mexico is one mentioned by the New York Herald, which created no little amusement at the time. When about twelve miles from Puebla the young lieutenant was out reconnoitering unattended, when he observed a tall engineer officer of the Mexican army near by. The discovery was, however, not made a moment too soon, as the Mexican had espied the lieutenant and was advancing toward him. A mutual demand for surrender was made, and a hand-to-hand scuffle commenced, resulting in McClellan collaring his gigantic opponent and taking him to camp.

ENGINEERING SERVICES.

When peace was proclaimed the young Captain returned to West Point, where he was appointed an instructor. During his engagement in that capacity he prepared a manual of bayonet exercise, mainly translated from the French, which became an army text-book. During the following three years McClellan led a life of ceaseless activity. He superintended the construction of Fort Delaware, went with Captain

R. B. Marcy on his survey expedition of the Red River, surveyed the rivers and harbors of Texas, and assisted Governor Isaac I. Stevens, of Washington Territory, in laying out the route of a railroad to the Pacific. So highly were his services appreciated that, in 1853, though he was only twenty-seven years old, he was given a commission in the United States Cavalry, and with two other officers was sent to the Crimea to study the art of war in the field. The war between Russia, on the one side, and England, France, Turkey, and Sardinia, on the other, was then in progress, and the young officer set himself earnestly to his undertaking. His book, entitled "The Armies of Europe," which was published on his return, displayed considerable literary ability, and proved that he had brought to his task remarkable intelligence and quick perception.

QUITS THE ARMY.

There appeared to be little opportunity for promotion in the army when, in 1857, his book finished and published, McClellan settled down for service at home. Just at that time an offer was made to him which the peculiar bent of his mind led him to regard favorably. It was that of the post of chief engineer of the Illinois Central Railroad. Little thinking at that time of the stupendous struggle which was destined to convulse the country only four years later, he resigned his commission and accepted the offered position. A short time afterward he was made vice-president of the road. He took up his residence at Chicago and married Miss Ellen Marcy, a daughter of his old friend and colleague, General R. B. Marcy. Subsequently he exchanged his position for the Presidency of the Ohio and Mississippi Road.

THE OUTBREAK OF THE WAR

called McClellan from peaceful pursuits to the service of his country. Like every man who had received a military education, he recognized in the attack on Fort Sumter a call to arms. He promptly tendered his services, and Governor Dennison, of Ohio, summoned him to Columbus to organize the volunteers who responded to his call. His reputation, his early experience, and his observation of European warfare rendered him conspicuous at a time when military talent and knowledge was in urgent demand. On May 10th, 1861, the rank of Major-General was conferred upon him, and he was given the command of the Department of the Ohio, which included that State and Indiana and Illinois. His promptitude in organizing the forces and moving at once on the Southern forces in West Virginia attracted the attention of the whole North, and when news came that he had won the engagement of Rich Mountain and compelled General Pegram to surrender, while in the more momentous battle of Bull Run the Union arms had been ignominiously defeated, there went up a loud popular cry for his promotion to the supreme command.

AT THE ZENITH.

On August 20th he was placed in charge of the Division of the Potomac, and two months later, when the venerable General Scott retired, he was raised to the post of Commander-in-Chief of the Armies of the United States. The appointment received the hearty indorsement of the people. Confidence was restored. He was dubbed the Young Napoleon, houses and public buildings were illuminated, and there was general rejoicing. It was expected that victory would be speedy and decisive. What were the thoughts in the mind of the man of thirty-five thus suddenly raised to the command of 152,000 soldiers, who can say? That he was conscious of his tremendous responsibility is certain, and it is also true that he knew far better than the men who were shouting in his praise and predicting his triumph what were the difficulties in his path. To the Northern States the army on the Potomac seemed a magnificent and well-nigh irresistible force; to McClellan, who had watched the battles of trained and well-disciplined armies in the Crimea, it probably seemed a mere mob, more intelligent than the European soldiers, but still on that very account more susceptible to panic, and without the stolid insensibility of the true fighting animal.

We have no sympathy with the sneers and contemptuous epithets hurled at McClellan by that dullest of all writers, Benson J. Lossing, LL.D., in what he calls his "history." Neither do we believe that posterity will indorse the judgment of McClellan's enthusiastic admirers, who regarded him as a general of first-class ability. We believe that he was a prudent and humane man—a man who knew that he had a gigantic task before him, and believed that it would be a foolish as well as a cruel thing to commence it until he had in his hands a force of a quantity and quality to render success certain. That he overestimated the forces opposed to him he himself subsequently discovered. But it is also true that the irresponsible writers and speakers of those days, who were shrieking "Or to Richmond!" underestimated them, as we learned afterward on many a field.

McClellan's standard of excellence was a high one, and before he had raised his army to his ideal the impatience of the people could be no longer restrained. All was "quiet on the Potomac" and "the Army of the Potomac was safe," but the people wanted victory, and could not endure the delay. A bolder, more reckless general would in like circumstances have made a dash at any risk and at any cost; but McClellan waited until he could be absolutely sure of victory. A bolder general at that time might have overwhelmed the Confederacy, and we know now that on several occasions McClellan would have won victories had he advanced boldly; but who shall say, remembering the length of time and the terrific labor that a far larger army than McClellan ever had was ultimately obliged to give to the task, that he would have succeeded had he been more impetuous? In McClellan's mental make-up the element of caution occupied a prominent and a predominating place. His tendency in the face of alternatives was to choose the one that was safe rather than the one that was dangerous—to forego a possible advantage if risk was certain and success doubtful. Those who were with him respected him for his care over the army, and many of them admired and loved him. But his critics, and the people who had hoped great things of him were impatient, and a cry of enraged disappointment was heard throughout the land.

McClellan was not idle during the time that "all was quiet on the Potomac." Were those days of seemingly useless parades, of drills and discipline lost time? We think that was not General Grant's opinion. During the long and desperate struggle that he led, every day proved that McClellan's work was bearing fruit. The weapon which General Grant wielded derived much of its temper and adaptation from the labor McClellan had expended upon it. Whether a blunter, a less highly-finished weapon would have done the work is a question for the critics. Certain it is that while McClellan was preparing to strike, a storm of popular discontent arose, before which he was carried away. President Lincoln interposed and insisted on a forward movement. Then there was a dispute about the character of the movement, and the President was overruled. There is no more unsatisfactory episode in the war than that campaign of the Peninsula. McClellan did not approve of the movement on principle, regarding it as forcing his hand before he was ready, while the President and Mr. Stanton did not approve of its details, which were of McClellan's arranging. The movement, therefore, as a whole, had the approval of no one, and it was not surprising that it was disastrous to the Union armies. It was so slow that the enemy had time to mass his troops before Richmond, and present so formidable a front that a general so cautious as McClellan shrank from the risk of attacking it. His offensive campaign speedily became defensive, and though he showed masterly skill in covering his retreat and saving his army, his reputation in the country was ruined.

DEPOSED.

President, however, still believed in him, while relieving him of his command and sending him with the duty of defending the capital. The retreat of his army into Washington, closely pursued by the Confederates brought once more under his command, and on November 2d he was formally reinstated. Then followed the battle of South Mountain, on September 14th, and Antietam, on September 17th, which McClellan led the retreating and demoralized Union troops to victory over the South which had harassed their long march. Here again McClellan failed to satisfy the country. It was expected that Antietam would be followed by a crushing and decisive blow which would annihilate the Southern forces. Nothing was done. Either because the Northern army was exhausted by its victory, or because of the force of circumstances, or because of the inaction and timidity of McClellan, the Confederates were permitted to retreat unmolested, and the victory was barren of results. This sealed McClellan's fate. He was relieved from duty, Burnside was placed in supreme command. A characteristic explanation of why he did not follow Lee's army was given in a report widely published, and is as follows: "The army, however, brought with it grave responsibilities; whether to renew the attack on the South or to defer it even with the risk of the army's retirement was the question before me. At a night of anxious deliberation, and a full and careful survey of the situation and condition of the army, and the strength and position of the South, I concluded that the success of an attack on the 18th was not certain. I am aware of the fact that under ordinary circumstances a general expected to risk a battle if he has a reasonable prospect of success. At that moment—Northern loss, Washington menaced, Maryland—the national cause could afford to run the risk of defeat. One battle lost, and almost the whole had been lost. Lee's army might have marched as it pleased to Washington, Philadelphia, and New York."

RETIREMENT.

There is something very dignified and pathetic in the farewell letter which he penned to the South only a few days after their victory and his personal humiliation. He wrote, November 7th, 1862: "OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC: An order of the President devolves upon Major-General Lee the command of this army. In part from me I cannot express the love and affection I bear you. As an army you have been under my care. In you I have never had a doubt or coldness. The battles you have fought under my command will proudly live in the nation's history. The glory you have won, our mutual perils and fatigues, the loss of our comrades fallen in battle and by sea, the broken forms of those whose wounds sickness have disabled—the strongest associations which can exist among men—unite us by an indissoluble tie. We shall ever be united in supporting the Constitution of our country and the nationality of its people."

"GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN,

"Major-General, United States Army," at a considerable portion of his command and of his deposition with regret is well known, and it is significant that it was those who knew him best who loved him most. Here is testimony printed about that time in Washington, from one who watched him closely. It is of a tender, respectful admiration: "When I am on the march he is ever among the men with a kind and cheerful word for every man—a pleasant look or kind salute, or a grasp of the hand for every officer or private with whom he is brought on speaking terms; and in a fight he is always at the head of the column, in the thickest of the danger, encouraging his soldiers by cheering word and fearless deed. He takes soldiers far beyond the rest, asking no better food and no more luxurious bed than the newest recruited private under his command. If he sees a man without proper shoes or clothing he has that man with his captain sent to his own quarters, where the man is served with the garments he needs, and the captain receives a reprimand that leads him to look more closely after the comfort of his men in future." It is easy to understand how such a man would be loved, but it must be admitted that a large number of his warmest friends acquiesced in the popular verdict, and believed that under the leadership of a man so cautious and so indecisive, victory would never be achieved. While respecting him and loving him as a man, they had little confidence in him as a general.

NOMINATED FOR THE PRESIDENCY.

General McClellan was never afterward invited to take part in the war. He retired to Trenton, N. J., where for two years he led a quiet and unostentatious life. In the fall of 1864 he received from the Democratic party, to which he belonged, the highest mark of their esteem it was in their power to tender him. They made him their candidate for the Presidency. Of his motives for accepting the nomination, his pastor, Dr. John R. Paxton, of the Presbyterian Church, who, by the way, was a soldier in the war, gives a reasonable explanation. He said, when asked since the General's death what could have induced him to become a candidate in opposition to a man whom he respected so highly as he did Mr. Lincoln: "It was this: McClellan felt that he had been wronged before the whole country. He believed that he was in the right, and if he should be elected President it would be a public vindication of his career as Commander of the Army of the Potomac, and a rebuke to those who removed him." His name awakened great enthusiasm among the people, his enemies even conceding his sterling qualities. He conducted the political campaign in a manner which did him great honor. He never descended to personalities, but was always dignified and discreet. But the election in November did not justify the hopes of the Democratic party. McClellan received 1,810,754 of the popular vote, and Mr. Lincoln 2,223,035.

Shortly after the election, General McClellan went to Europe for rest and change. He returned in 1868, and resumed his profession as a civil engineer. He had charge of the construction of the Stevens floating battery at Hoboken, N. J., and was superintendent of the construction of the railway bridge over the Hudson at Poughkeepsie. He also served as Chief Engineer of the Department of Docks in this city, resigning in 1872.

In 1877, General McClellan was the Democratic candidate for Governor of New Jersey, and was elected by about 12,000 majority. Since the expiration of his term as Governor he held no public office.

DEATH.

On Wednesday, October 28th, the General drove out as usual, saw a number of his friends, and appeared in his usual health. He returned home and spent a pleasant evening, but on retiring to rest he was seized on the stairs with severe neuralgia of the heart. Such remedies as medical skill suggested were tried, and the pain was alleviated for the moment only to return with increased violence. For four hours the strong constitution endured the severe torment. Just before the end, the terrible oppression seemed lifted from his chest, he breathed freely once more, and said to those about his bedside: "I feel more comfortable now." But a few minutes later he was past all pain.

PERSONAL CHARACTERISTICS.

The following verbal portrait of the General, drawn by one who knew him well, appeared in the New York World: "General McClellan was a man of most distinguished bearing. Although small in stature—the 'Little Mac' of army days—and unbounded popularity with his soldiers—he was a marked figure in any company. A splendid head poised on stalwart shoulders, a classic, and even noble face, a brilliant eye, a most frank and animated expression when in conversation, but the face in repose full of thoughtful dignity—these personal characteristics gave him an individuality that ranked him first in almost any assembly. While abroad he was received with hospitality at the courts and other distinguished circles of every capital of Europe he visited.

"General McClellan was a most charming conversationalist. Few men of his generation have had such wide and such close acquaintance with foreign and American politics, with literature, ancient and modern; with art, with religious controversy, with history, and military affairs, as he. He had a delightful manner, unassuming to a degree, and gracious, and a peculiar quality of humor. As a raconteur he was perhaps unrivalled by any American. His retentive memory was full of reminiscences, personal, and acquired from extensive reading. He had, besides, that quality which a great Frenchman has declared to be at once the rarest and most excellent in man or woman—he was an eloquent listener."

General McClellan was a deeply religious man, although his religion was conspicuously unobtrusive. He had family prayers every morning and evening. Referring to his death in the course of his Friday evening talk, on October 30th, Dr. Talmage said: "The old hero yesterday broke earthly ranks and went up to the Lord of Hosts, and in the land of eternal justice will meet many of those whose dying moments he soled with sympathetic words at Chickahominy. How sudden his going. Spending the evening at his fireside in health, at three o'clock the following morning exchanging words. But he was fully ready. For many years he had been an open friend of Christ and a communicant in our own denomination. 'I heard a voice from heaven saying, Write, Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from henceforth: Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them.'"

The Trustees of the Peabody Fund Report

hopefully of their work in the South. In two years the number of white children enrolled in the schools has increased by 297,185, and the number of colored children by 199,331. Mr. Curry, the general agent of the board, says that he has observed with extreme pleasure "the subsidence and disappearance of passions and prejudices engendered by the war, the growth of fraternity and helpfulness, and steady progress in Southern industrial development."

The White Cross Movement will receive an impetus, it may be hoped, from the meeting held in Association Hall, New York, recently. An enthusiastic band of young men listened to a paper on the organization of the White Cross Army, and the movement to promote purity of life, after which the Rev. M. Clampitt, of St. Bartholomew's Church, spoke of what had been done for manly purity in Glasgow, where sixty-five hundred men have enrolled their names for this cause; effective work has been done also in Dublin, Liverpool, and other places throughout Great Britain. There were places in this city, he said, as in all the large cities, where vice was fashionable, and into which men walked who had pews in the churches. The way to crush the evil, was for men to band together and make the vice as prominent as drunkenness. President Hoppin, President Webster, of the White Cross Army, Mornay Williamson, and John McCanoughy, Secretary of the Army, urged methods of extending the movement. It was decided to give the widest circulation to documents explaining what is needed, in the hope of helping outside organization, and on November 20th there will be a large meeting in Association Hall, to appoint a Working Committee and to devise practical methods of combating the evil in the city. The army numbers five hundred members. An effort will be made to increase the membership to fifteen hundred by the time of the November meeting.

BRAWN AND MUSCLE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, November 15, 1885.

"And Samson went down to Timnath."—JUDGES 14:1.

Evil of Misguided Strength—The Damage it Does—III. A Giant Slain of a Woman—The Impurities of Modern Society—The Time for Plain Speaking—The Hellish Doctrine of Free Love—IV. Physical Power Must Expire—V. The Account Rendered.

THERE are two sides to the character of Samson. The one phase of his life, if followed into the particulars, would administer to the grotesque and the mirthful; but there is a phase of his character fraught with lessons of solemn and eternal import. To these graver lessons we devote our morning sermon.

This giant no doubt in early life gave evidences of what he was to be. It is almost always so. There were two Napoleons—the boy Napoleon and the man Napoleon—but both alike; two Howards—the boy Howard and the man Howard—but both alike; two Samsons—the boy Samson and the man Samson—but both alike. This giant was no doubt the hero of the playground, and nothing could stand before his exhibitions of youthful prowess. At eighteen years of age he was betrothed to the daughter of a Philistine. Going down toward Timnath a lion came out upon him, and although this young giant was weaponless, he seized the monster by the long mane and shook him as a hungry hound shakes a March hare, and made his bones crack, and left him by the wayside bleeding under the smiting of his fist and the grinding heft of his heel.

There he stands, looming up above other men, a mountain of flesh; his arms bunched with muscle that can lift the gate of a city, taking an attitude defiant of everything. His hair had never been cut, and it rolled down in seven great plaits over his shoulders, adding to his bulk, fierceness and terror. The Philistines want to conquer him, and therefore they must find out where the secret of his strength lies.

THE PHILISTINE PLOT.

There is a dissolute woman living in the valley of Sorek by the name of Delilah. They appoint her the agent in the case. The Philistines are secreted in the same building, and then Delilah goes to work and coaxes Samson to tell what is the secret of his strength. "Well," he says, "if you should take seven green withes such as they fasten wild beasts with and put them around me I should be perfectly powerless." So she binds him with the seven green withes. Then she claps her hands and says: "They come—the Philistines!" and he walks out as though there were no impediment. She coaxes him again, and says: "Now tell me the secret of this great strength," and he replies: "If you should take some ropes that have never been used and tie me with them I should be just like other men." She ties him with the ropes, claps her hands, and shouts: "They come—the Philistines!" He walks out as easily as he did before—not a single obstruction. She coaxes him again, and he says: "Now, if you should take these seven long plaits of hair, and by this house-loom weave them into a web, I could not get away." So the house-loom is rolled up, and the shuttle flies backward and forward, and the long plaits of hair are woven into a web. Then she claps her hands, and says: "They come—the Philistines!" He walks out as easily as he did before, dragging a part of the loom with him.

OVERCOME.

But after awhile she persuades him to tell the truth. He says: "If you should take a razor or shears and cut off this long hair, I should be powerless and in the hands of my enemies."

Samson sleeps, and that she may not wake him up during the process of shearing, help is called in. You know that the barbers of the East have such a skillful way of manipulating the head to this very day that, instead of waking up a sleeping man, they will put a man wide awake sound asleep. I hear the blades of the shears grinding against each other, and I see the long locks falling off. The shears or razor accomplishes what green withes and new ropes and house-loom could not do. Suddenly she claps her hands, and says: "The Philistines be upon thee, Samson!" He rouses up with a struggle, but his strength is all gone. He is in the hands of his enemies.

I hear the groan of the giant as they take his eyes out, and then I see him staggering on in his blindness, feeling his way as he goes on toward Gaza. The prison door is open, and the giant is thrust in. He sits down and puts his hands on the mill-crank, which, with exhausting horizontal motion, goes day after day, week after week, month after month—work, work, work! The consternation of the world in captivity, his locks shorn, his eyes punctured, grinding corn in Gaza!

MORAL WEAKNESS.

I. First of all, behold in this giant of the text that physical power is not always an index of moral power. He was a huge man—the lion found it out, and the three thousand men whom he slew found it out; yet he was the subject of petty revenges and out-gianted by low passion. I am far from throwing any discredit upon physical stamina. There are those who seem to have great admiration for delicacy and sickliness of constitution. I never could see any glory in weak nerves or sick headache. Whatever effort in our day is made to make the men and women more robust should have the favor of every good citizen as well as of every Christian. Gymnastics may be positively religious.

Good people sometimes ascribe to a wicked heart what they ought to ascribe to a slow liver. The body and the soul are such near neighbors that they often catch each other's diseases. Those who never saw a sick day, and who, like Hercules, show the giant in the cradle, have more to answer for than those who are the subjects of life-long infirmities. He who can lift twice as much as you can, and walk twice as far, and work twice as long, will have a double account to meet in the judgment.

RESPONSIBILITY INVOLVED.

How often it is that you do not find physical energy indicative of spiritual power. If a clear head is worth more than one dizzy with perpetual vertigo—if muscles with the play of health in them are worth more than those drawn up in chronic "rheumatics"—if an eye quick to catch passing objects is better than one with vision dim and uncertain—then God will require of us efficiency just in proportion to what He has given us. Physical energy ought to be a type of moral power. We ought to have as good digestion of truth as we have capacity to assimilate food. Our spiritual hearing ought to be as good as our physical hearing. Our spiritual taste ought to be as clear as our tongue. Samsons in body, we ought to be giants in moral power.

But while you find a great many men who realize that they ought to use their money aright, and use their intelligence aright, how few men you find aware of the fact that they ought to use their physical organism aright. With every thump of the heart there is something saying, "Work! work!" and, lest we should complain that we have no tools to work with, God gives us our hands and feet, with every knuckle, and with every joint, and with every muscle saying to us, "Lay hold and do something."

But how often it is that men with physical strength do not serve Christ. They are like a ship full manned and full rigged, capable of vast tonnage, able to endure all stress of weather, yet swinging idly at the docks, when these men ought to be crossing and recrossing the great ocean of human suffering and sin with G supplies of mercy. How often it is that physical strength is used in doing positive damage in luxurious ease, when, with sleeves rolled and bronzed bosom, fearless of the shafts of position, it ought to be laying hold with al might, and tugging away trying to lift up sunken wreck of a world.

STRENGTH IN WEAKNESS.

It is a most shameful fact that much of business of the Church and of the world is done by those comparatively invalid—Richard Baxter, by reason of his diseases, all his sitting in the door of the tomb, yet writing more than a hundred volumes, and sending out influence for God that will endure as long as "Saints' Everlasting Rest." Edward Pay never knowing a well day; yet how he preached and how he wrote, helping thousands of souls like himself to swim in a sea of gloom and Robert M'Cheyne, a walking skeleton, you know what he did in Dundee, and how shook Scotland with zeal for God. P. Doddridge, advised by his friends because of illness not to enter the ministry, yet you know what he did for the "rise and progress of religion" in the Church and in the world.

Wilberforce was told by his doctors that he could not live a fortnight, yet at that very time entering upon philanthropic enterprises that mandated the greatest endurance and persistence. Robert Hall, suffering excruciations, so often in his pulpit while preaching he would stop and lie down on a sofa, then getting again to preach about heaven until the glory of the celestial city dropped on the multitude doing more work, perhaps, than almost any man in his day.

Oh, how often it is that men with great physical endurance are not as great in moral spiritual stature. While there are achievements for those who are bent all their days with success—achievements of patience, achievement of prayer, achievements of self-denial, achievements of Christian endurance—I call upon men of health to-day, men of muscle, men of men of physical power, to devote themselves to the Lord. Giants in body, you ought to be giants in soul.

STRENGTH MISGUIDED.

II. Behold also in the story of my text illustration of the fact of the damage that strength can do if it be misguided. It seems to me that this man spent a great deal of his time in doing evil—this Samson of my text. To pay a which he had lost by the guessing of his ribs he robs and kills thirty people. He was only gigantic in strength, but gigantic in chief, and a type of those men in all ages of world who, powerful in body or mind, or faculty of social position and wealth, have their strength for iniquitous purposes.

It is not the small, weak men of the day who do the damage. These small men who swear and loafing about your stores and shops and banking-houses, assailing Christ the Bible and the Church—they do not do damage. They have no influence. They vermin that you crush with your foot. But the giants of the day, the misguided giants in physical power, or giants in meanness, or giants in social position, or giant wealth, who do the damage.

The men with sharp pens that stab and throw their poison all through our literature; the men who use the power of wealth to sanction iniquity, and bribe justice, and in truth and honor bow to their golden sceptre.

MISGUIDED GIANTS.

Look out for them! In the middle and the latter part of the last century no doubt there were thousands of men in Paris and Edinburgh, London who hated God and blasphemed the name of the Almighty; but they did but little mischief—they were small men, insignificant men. Yet there were giants in those days.

Who can calculate the soul-havoc of a Rousseau, going on with a very enthusiasm of equity, with fiery imagination seizing upon impulsive natures of his day? or David e, who employed his life as a spider em- its summer, in spinning out silken webs to the unwary? or Voltaire, the most learned of his day, marshalling a great host of scep- and leading them out in the dark land of elity? or Gibbon, who showed an uncom- bled grudge against religion in his history of the most fascinating periods of the t's existence—the decline and fall of the an Empire—a book in which, with all the idors of his genius, he magnified the errors ristian disciples, while with a sparseness of e that never can be forgiven he treated of Christian heroes of whom the world was not hy?

men of stout physical health men of great stature, men of high social position, men eat power of any sort. I want you to under- your power, and I want you to know that power devoted to God will be a crown on you typical of a crown in heaven; but aided, bedragged in sin, administrative of God will thunder against you with His con- nation in the day when millionaire and pau- master and slave, king and subject, shall side by side in the judgment, and money- and judicial ermine, and royal robe shall ven with the lightnings.

FOOLED BY A WOMAN.

hold, also, how a giant may be slain of a an. Delilah started the train of circum- that pulled down the temple of Dagon t Samson's ears. And tens of thousands of s have gone down to death and hell through same impure fascinations. It seems to me it is high time that pulpit and platform and ing-press speak out against the impurities odern society. Fastidiousness and Prudery "Better not speak—you will rouse up ad- criticism; you will make worse what you to make better; better deal in glittering ralities; the subject is too delicate for polite " But there comes a voice from heaven powering the mincing sentimentalities of ay, saying: "Cry aloud, spare not, lift up oice like a trumpet, and show my people transgressions and the house of Jacob their ie trouble is that when people write or k upon this theme they are apt to cover it h the graces of belles-lettres, so that the e is made attractive instead of repulsive. Byron in "Don Juan" adorns this crime it smiles like a May queen. Michelet, the French writer, covers it up with bewitch- hetic until it glows like the rising sun, t ought to be made loathsome as a small- hospital. There are to-day influences ad which if unresisted by the pulpit and the ing-press will turn New York and Brooklyn Sodom and Gomorrah, fit only for the s of fire and brimstone that whelmed the s of the plain.

A CRUSADE NEEDED.

ou who are seated in your Christian homes, passed by moral and religious restraints, do realize the gulf of iniquity that bounds you e north and the south and the east and the e. While I speak there are tens of thousands en and women going over the awful plunge n impure life; and while I cry to God for y upon their souls, I call upon you to mar- in the defence of your homes, your Church your nation. There is a banqueting hall you have never heard described. You know bout the feast of Ahasuerus, where a thou- lords sat. You know all about Belshazzar's usual, where the blood of the murdered king ted into the faces of the banqueters. You know of the scene of riot and wassail when e was set before Esopus one dish of food cost $100,000. But I speak now of a dif- it banqueting-hall. Its roof is fretted with Its floors is tessellated with fire. Its chal- are chased with fire. Its song is a song of Its walls are buttresses of fire. Solomon s to it when he says: "Her guests are in lepths of hell."

Our American communities are suffering from the gospel of Free Loveism, which, fifteen or twenty years ago, was preached on the platform and in some of the churches of this country. I charge upon Free Loveism that it has blighted innumerable homes, and that it has sent innumerable souls to ruin. Free Loveism is bestial; it is worse—it is infernal. It has furnished this land with about one thousand divorces annually. In one county in the State of Indiana it furnished eleven divorces in one day before dinner. It has roused up elopements, North, South, East, and West. You can hardly take up a paper but you read of an elopement. As far as I can understand the doctrine of Free Loveism it is this: that every man ought to have some- body else's wife, and every wife somebody else's husband. They do not like our Christian or- ganization of society, and I wish they would all elope, the wretches of one sex taking the wretches of the other, and start to-morrow morning for the great Sahara Desert, until the simoon shall sweep seven feet of sand all over them, and not one passing caravan for the next five hundred years bring back one miserable bone of their carcasses. Free Loveism! It is the double-distilled extract of nux vomica, rats- bane and adder's tongue. Never until society goes back to the old Bible and hears its eulogy of purity and its anathema of uncleanness— never until then will this evil be extirpated.

IV. Behold also in this giant of the text and in the giant of our own century that great PHYSICAL POWER MUST CRUMBLE and expire. The Samson of the text long ago went away. He fought the lion. He fought the Philistines. He could fight anything, but Death was too much for him. He may have required a longer grave and a broader grave; but the tomb nevertheless was his terminus.

If, then, we are to be compelled to go out of this world, where are we to go to? This body and soul must soon part. What shall be the destiny of the former I know—dust to dust. But what shall be the destiny of the latter? Shall it rise into the companionship of the white-robed, whose sins Christ has slain? or will it go down among the unbelieving, who tried to gain the world and save their souls, but were swindled out of both? Blessed be God, we have a Champion. He is so styled in the Bible: A Champion who has conquered death and hell, and He is ready to fight all our battles from the first to the last. "Who is this that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah, mighty to save?" If we follow in the wake of that Champion death has no power and the grave no victory. The worst man trusting in Him shall have his dying pangs alleviated and his future illumined.

THE ACCOUNTING.

V. In the light of this subject I want to call your attention to a fact which may not have been rightly considered by five men in this house, and that is the fact that we must be brought into judgment for the employment of our physical organism. Shoulder, brain, hand, foot—we must answer in judgment for the use we have made of them. Have they been used for the elevation of society or for its depression? In proportion as our arm is strong and our step elastic will our account at last be intensified. Thousands of sermons are preached to invalids. I preach this sermon this morning to stout men and healthful women. We must give to God an account for the right use of this physical organism.

These invalids have comparatively little to account for, perhaps. They could not lift twenty pounds. They could not walk half a mile without sitting down to rest. In the preparation of this subject I have said to myself, How shall I account to God in judgment for the use of a body which never knew one moment of real sickness? Rising up in judgment, standing beside the men and the women who had only little physical energy, and yet consumed that energy in a conflagration of religious enthusiasm, how will we feel abashed!

Oh, men of the strong arm and the stout heart, what use are you making of your physical forces? Will you be able to stand the test of that day when we must answer for the use of every talent, whether it were a physical energy, or a mental acumen, or a spiritual power?

HARK! IT THUNDERS.

The day approaches, and I see one who in this world was an invalid, and as she stands before the throne of God to answer she says, "I was sick all my days. I had but very little strength, but I did as well as I could in being kind to those who were more sick and more suffering." And Christ will say, "Well done, faithful servant."

And then a little child will stand before the throne, and she will say, "On earth I had a curvature of the spine, and I was very weak, and I was very sick; but I used to go out and gather flowers out of the wild wood and bring them to my sick mother, and she was comforted when she saw the sweet flowers out of the wild wood. I didn't do much, but I did something." And Christ shall say, as He takes her up in His arm and kisses her, "Well done, well done, faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

What, then, will be said to us—we to whom the Lord gave physical strength and continuous health? Hark! it thunders again.

THE JUDGMENT! THE JUDGMENT!

I said to an old Scotch minister, who was one of the best friends I ever had, "Doctor, did you every know Robert Pollock, the Scotch poet, who wrote 'The Course of Time'?" "Oh, yes," he replied, "I knew him well; I was his classmate." And then the doctor went on to tell me how that the writing of "The Course of Time" exhausted the health of Robert Pollock, and he expired. It seems as if no man could have such a glimpse of the day for which all other days were made as Robert Pollock had, and long survive that glimpse. In the description of that day he says, among other things:

Begin the woe, ye woods, and tell it to the doleful winds.

And doleful winds wail to the howling hills,
And howling hills mourn to the dismal vales,
And dismal vales sigh to the sorrowing brooks,
And sorrowing brooks weep to the weeping stream,
And weeping stream awake the groaning deep;
Ye heavens, great archway of the universe, put sack- cloth on;

And ocean, robe thyself in garb of widowhood,
And gather all thy waves into a groan, and utter it,
Long, loud, deep, piercing, dolorous, immense.
The occasion asks it, Nature dies, and angels come to lay her in her grave.

What Robert Pollock saw in poetic dream, and I will see in positive reality the judg- ment! the judgment!

HINDOOS AT THE GANGES.

A RECENT visitor to the mission field in India thus describes what he saw during his stay at Benares: "The banks of the sacred river Ganges present a spectacle which arouses in the heart of the Christian an intense and all-absorbing desire for the spread of the Gospel among those benighted and superstitious worshippers. They are so devout and so earnest that one can but think how sad a thing it is that they do not know the true God, and offer to Him the worship they give to their idols."

"The banks of the river are steep, and lined the whole length with ghats, temples, and long flights of stone steps. Booths and awnings were so arranged as to afford every facility for bathing. All classes of men, women and children were plunging in the waters of the sacred river, and worshipping their little idols at the same time that they performed their ablutions. Small white flowers were sprinkled by thousands upon the bosom of the river and in front of the little shrines on the banks. No Hindoo may eat or go about his daily avocation until he has first bathed in the sacred stream and worshipped at the shrine of his particular deity."

A MIDNIGHT STRUGGLE BY A LAKESIDE.

IN a letter from a Christian worker in the French capital the following thrilling incident is recorded: One dark night this summer, a woman, with a loaded revolver in her hand, was pacing up and down the lakeside, close to a town in Switzerland. The midnight darkness around was not more deep and drear than the despair which filled her soul. Again and again she tried to summon courage to fire the fatal shot; but again and again an invisible hand seemed to stay the hand of the would-be suicide.

God was answering prayer. In an upper room in the neighboring town, all through that night another woman was upon her knees pleading for the salvation of that poor sin-crushed soul who was thus trembling upon the border of the abyss. She had come forward in the meeting that evening under the deepest conviction, and this officer had spoken to her, but she had failed to find peace. There was evidently something awful upon her mind, which she felt she ought to confess, but she resisted, and at the close left with a look of despair. But our sister's heart felt drawn out in agonizing prayer for her in such a remarkable manner that she could not think of sleep, but pleaded, hour after hour, until she received the witness of the Spirit that her prayer was answered.

Little did she realize why the spirit of prayer had thus come upon her, and that out in the dark night yonder, the devil, seeing his prey about to escape him, was urging her to suicide.

But the Prince of Darkness was defeated by the power of prayer, and, as the watcher rose from her knees, the poor lost creature stole back into the town, resolved to confess all and commit her sin-stained soul to the Saviour whose wondrous love she had heard in that meeting.

Having found the officer's lodgings, she told her all with tears of deepest contrition. "I am a murderer," said she. Then she went on to tell how that in her native town in another country, years ago, she had committed the awful crime. A young man had asked her to marry him, but her mother having for a long time opposed and prevented their union, he suggested to her one day that she should put poison in her mother's food. She consented, and he procured her the poison. The sight of her mother's dying agonies and the thought of her guilt, were so dreadful that she fainted away. After the funeral she left home, the mental torture became so great that she attempted to commit suicide by discharging a revolver in her mouth. The wound was not fatal, though one of her eyes was destroyed, and she lay long in the hospital in the greatest agony of body and soul.

She had refused to marry the young man, thinking (being a Catholic) that this might in some way atone for her crime; but its awful memory haunted her, day and night, from place to place, for years, until, passing through the town of —, she was attracted by curiosity into our hall. There, in the light of the Spirit, she realized that there were pardon and peace, even for her; but in that light the awfulness of her deed came also before her as never before, and she saw that she must confess it. But death seemed preferable. Then followed that awful night in which she went again to destroy herself; but the invisible hand had brought her back from the shadow of death, and now, as she cried to God, acknowledging her sin, the Salvation Sister of Mercy pointed her to the Lamb of God who taketh away the sins of the world, and her soul found peace in believing.

When her father received her letter of confession, he came a long journey by rail to see her. He refused to believe the story of her crime, saying she had been "hallucinated," by the Salvation Army. He took her to —, hoping that the change would drive away the "mania." In the train her heart became so filled with gratitude to God for His pardoning love, and for having allowed her to see her father again, that she fell upon her knees in the carriage and prayed, and praised God aloud. Her father tried angrily to make her rise, saying that this was all "hallucination," but she continued to praise God out of a full heart, and to pray for her father.

Three months have passed, during which she has been a bright, rejoicing Christian. She is in a good situation, and I have heard to-day from the officer of the corps that she has been remarkably used of God in a rescue case within the past few days.

IN EUROPEAN PRISONS.

Mr. Charles Cook's Evangelistic Tour.

MR. CHARLES COOK, the modern John Howard, whose portrait appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on September 15th, 1881, with some account of his Gospel work in prisons, supplies the following brief notes of his present tour:

HUNGARY.

We have had a splendid and successful journey through this country. Everywhere our books were received with grateful thanks, and every facility afforded us for distributing the Word of God among the prisoners. From Buda Pesth to Vienna, on our homeward journey, we were able to throw out of the carriage windows Testaments and Gospels to the signalmen along the line, who were much surprised and delighted at so unexpected a gift.

AUSTRIA.

Very different did we find this country to the above. Three persons are known to me who have been arrested for simply giving away tracts, yet we did not hesitate to distribute New Testaments, giving them to all who came across our path, even in some cases to policemen.

Greatly to my surprise, and beyond my expectations, I have, even here, been permitted to supply the prisoners with Bibles and Testaments, and have received written and stamped acknowledgments of the same. Crossing the Semmering Railway—the first mountain railway ever constructed—we came down to Graz, the capital of Styria, and here again we were soon hard at work distributing the Word of Life. In the large convict prison here we found an Englishman under a sentence of eighteen years. Happily, we had English Testaments in our bag, and he also was supplied with the precious volumes.

A long day's journey down to Trieste, and we were soon gazing on the beautiful Adriatic, with Venice only about a journey of seven hours' distance on the other side.

ITALY.

Who shall describe Venice? This unique city with its three hundred and sixty bridges and its silent waterways; its magnificent buildings, and its awful prisons?

It is six years since I was last here. Then I saw the Prison of the Inquisition, now I have seen them all. The State Prison in the Ducal Palace is still used, but not the lower cells beneath—those which were used to confine the prisoners who were doomed to cross the Bridge of Sighs and meet their death in the dungeons of the Old Palace. The cells here we found tolerably clean and well ventilated, but on visiting another part of the city, and inspecting the prisons there, we found room for complaint, for the poor wretches were exposed to the persecution of countless mosquitoes, who seemed to delight in the foul air of the overcrowded prisons. It is October, and yet I have been bitten and worried beyond measure by the mosquitoes in the bedroom of the hotel—a room as large as a small mission hall. I shudder to think what these prisoners must endure in the heat of summer, for the walls of their cells were bespattered with the blood of these insects, which they had killed by hundreds. No work was provided for them, and, worse still, no books were supplied. In signing the Visitors' book I took care to call the attention of the authorities to the need of cleansing the prisons, etc.

MILAN.

Here we found two large prisons. Captain Watson (of Dublin), whom we had met at Venice, accompanied me in my visits here, as my companion, Mr. Clark, gave signs of severe illness. In both of these places we supplied numerous Bibles, Testaments, and portions.

At Venice, in the station, we gave away hundred portions before the train left the station, and through all the stations in Italy we were enabled to do similar work. Except having a bad eye through getting something, while throwing the books out of the window of the train, my own health is good, but Clark is very unwell.

SWITZERLAND.

I have been obliged to give up the idea of reaching Constantinople this journey. We had so much to do in other places, while lution in some of the parts through which we must have gone, with other circumstances, hindered; besides which, the health of friend, and time and means prevent for the present.

Across the Italian Lakes, through the Gothard Tunnel to Fluelen on the Lake of Lucerne, and we are once more in Switzerland. Passing through Strassburg we re-enter and presently Brussels is reached. Ten cities visited in six weeks, with thousands of copies of the Word distributed, and our work is nearly done.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Sad Scene at a Grave.—At a recent meeting a minister observed: "I knew a man whose wife suddenly died, and, indeed, I think he the real cause of her death. He mourned her loss greatly, and as he stood weeping over her open grave, I thought it would have been good thing if he had given a little of his tenderness and his sorrow to the poor woman whose life fluttered in her breast; it might have been her way smoother and her end happier. O that you your friends while you have them, your repenting tears will profit but little to those whom you have wronged have done to another world."

Duncan's Wise Decision.—An Evangelist related: "One night I spoke to a young man in the meeting, and found him very anxious to know of the love of Jesus in dying for us and put before him some precious promises of God. He was eager and willing to be to Jesus, and remarked, 'I believe it is my mother that have made me so.' He was grieved when he spoke of his mother, and quired, 'Might I ask what those words were?' Tears sprang to the eyes of the young man; he replied, 'When mother was dying she came to her and said, 'Duncan, will you come?' These were her last words, and have been ringing in my ears ever since.' 'I can,' I said, 'will you follow Jesus, and then will follow your mother.' He calmly responded, 'From this night I will follow Jesus, and my mother in heaven.'"

George's Fifteen Jewels.—Mr. Ferrie said, "Mr. Moody used to tell a touching story of a boy who was dying. The one whom God was instrumental in bringing him to Christ can visit him, and found the little fellow in tears. 'Why do you weep?' she asked, kindly. 'Cause I am dying and I have never led soul to Jesus,' was the reply. 'George,' said, 'you might be the means of leading a soul to Jesus still. You cannot go into the pit and preach; you cannot go to the street and tell them of Jesus; but still there is thing left that you might do; you can I George, for your unconverted companion. 'Would that be doing something for Jesus?' eagerly asked. 'Yes, George. Would name some of your friends who as you know not trusting Jesus?' Slowly the dying boy repeated fifteen names, while his Christian friend wrote them down on a slip of paper, and handing it to the boy, she said, 'George, do read over these fifteen names one by one and pray over each one as you read. George gladly agreed to do so, and faithfully kept his promise until Jesus called him home."

Shortly afterward a great revival occurred in the place, and the first to be brought to the Lord were the fifteen companions whom Georgie had so faithfully prayed for, and each one of them became an earnest worker for Jesus. No matter how weak or how humble you may be, only be willing to honor Christ, and God will use you."

A Lion Changed into a Lamb.—A Friend recently confessed at a testimony meeting as follows: "I was drawn from the lowest depths of human degradation. I was a terror to my wife and children who ran and hid themselves when I entered the house. But all the time I thought I was very respectable; I was a professing member of a church in Scotland, but my whole mind was taken up by political matters. One day a friend came to a number of us and asked, 'What think ye of Christ?' I had never thought much of Him, but I went home with these words in my ears. I now began to see a little of the love of Jesus for sinners. Completely overburdened with a sense of sin, and wishful to turn from it, I went home one day and threw myself upon my knees, and cried to the Lord to have mercy upon my soul, and, glory be unto Him, the intolerable burden was taken away, and He took me as I was,

"Weary, worn, and sad,
I found in Him a resting place,
And He has made me glad."

Oh, friends, accept the Lord now, for He will assuredly have mercy upon you. 'He waits to be gracious.' Open your heart to Him, and let Him in."

A Safe Place for a Prodigal Son.—Mr. Stuart remarked: "I was very much struck in learning lately what an American lady said not long ago. A relative came to visit her, and while they were at tea they heard a noise in the lobby. She quietly left the table, and found that her son, who was a prodigal, had come home the worse for drink. She composedly gave orders that he should be taken to his own room, and then returned to her guest, and calmly talked of different subjects as if nothing had occurred to disturb her peace of mind. Her friend was very much impressed with this, and inquired how she could be so undisturbed about her son. She answered: 'Ah, sir, he nearly broke my heart. I was bearing the burden too long, the load became too heavy, and I put my boy into God's hands, and since then my burden has gone, and I am willing to wait the Lord's time.' The next morning the young man came in to breakfast not a little put out, and their visitor said to him, 'Do you know that you are in a terrible position? You are in the Lord's hands.' Who said that?" asked the young man, rather surprised. "Your mother said it; she has given you into the Lord's hands." These words proved to be the means of this young man's conversion to Christ, and he has since lived nobly for Jesus."

A Warm Welcome Home.—Mr. Fraser narrated: "I read some time ago of a bad but much-beloved youth, who went away from home to a foreign land. With a wasted life and ruined health he subsequently came home to die. It was a beautiful moonlight night as he walked through the wood near his father's house, and wretched and forlorn he stood at the gate of the manse—his father was a minister—fearful of knocking. In the stillness of the night he could hear that they were at family worship, and tears started to his eyes as he heard his father's voice raised in supplication for him. He did not wait until they were finished; he knocked gently at the door, and his father, now an aged man, with silvery locks, opened the door. At once he recognized his son, although he was so greatly changed, clad in the garments of a foreign land and marred by the sin of a wretched and misspent life. But the joyful father overlooked them all; it was enough, his son had returned, and the old man put his arms around him, and clasped him in a tender embrace. Not a word of reproach was uttered by that father for all the miserable past. Once more he bent his knee at the family altar.

The tender love of his father touched the son's heart; he repented, and accepted Christ as his Saviour, and although he died soon afterward, he gave modest, but most satisfactory testimony that he was truly redeemed by God's grace."

THE PARALLELS OF PROPHECY.
By Elizabeth Sapsworth.
Two Outline Visions of Daniel—God's Cipher—The Key to It—Consecutive Order—The Image of Gold—Correspondence with the Four Beasts—The Vision of the Dragon in the Apocalypse—The Ram and the He-Goat.

THESE are in the Book of Daniel two symbolic outline visions of the historical sequence of events, extending through the times of the Gentiles to the establishment of the kingdom of Christ. The writings of this prophet are the key to the method of interpretation to be followed in the kindred, but still more highly figurative, Book of the Apocalypse. Prophecy being history foretold, the page of history is where we may expect to discover its fulfilment. The page of prophecy may be called its partial fulfilment in history is His key to that cipher, by means of which we may not merely translate past chapters of its wonderful unfoldings, but may even hope to gain some sure light upon those not fulfilled as yet. It must also be remembered that prophecy partakes both of the literal and the figurative. Many believe that it must be accepted as all the one or the other, though no greater mistake can be made. A chief difficulty in this kind of interpretation lies in the just discrimination between the two. Some portions must be understood exactly as they are read, while, woven in the same passage, are, perhaps, some purely symbolic; and the facts, historical or otherwise, that may be imagined as appropriately described by such, have to be ascertained by careful analysis and adjustment of both. What do these symbols mean, and how far is the passage symbolic, and how far literal, is the one question! If we are able to decide satisfactorily with regard to those looking back upon the past, we gain the clue to the nature of events still future.

Another important point in interpretation is the consecutive and orderly arrangement of the events predicted. In outline only, with some portions more fully described than others, Daniel and John alike appear to give from the time in which they themselves wrote, but John is more comprehensive and more lucid than Daniel, giving fuller details of events to come than did the Old Testament seer. They both, however, close at the same point—the possession of the kingdom by the saints. Here, indeed, John goes further than his great predecessor, for the radiance of the Gospel, bringing "life and immortality to light," had dawned upon his day. It is this consistent, comprehensive, magnificent outline which, though none can dovetail it in every part, commends itself as stamped with a divine origin, and as sealed with the signet of Truth.

The first vision in the Book of Daniel—
"THE IMAGE OF GOLD" and silver, of brass and iron mixed with clay," seen by Nebuchadnezzar in his dream—stands in the forefront for examination. It is the simplest of all in its construction and meaning, and deals only with primary events. There can be little question as to its main reference. It gives a very distinct outline of the four great, earthly, universal monarchies of Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome; the chief point worthy of note being this, that between Rome and the fifth universal kingdom, which is, undoubtedly, Christ's, there is no other. A second thing also must be marked in the interpretation given by Daniel—viz., that it is in the "days of the kings," or the Roman Empire split up, as represented by the ten toes, "the God of heaven" sets up His kingdom; proving, that whatever may be signified by its establishment, the reference is not to its planting by our Lord at the period of the First Advent, which took place long previously in the days of the undivided empire.

THE NEXT OUTLINE VISION is one seen by the prophet himself, representing the same period of time and course of events, but under different symbols and with much more fullness. In the first year of the reign of Belshazzar, he beholds four beasts coming up out of the sea, corresponding to the four metals of which the image was composed. The first is like a lion, shorn of its wings, denoting the Babylonian Empire, whose power was already on the wane; the second resembles a bear, "devouring much flesh," or the Medo-Persian monarchy, so cruel in its conquests; the third is a winged, four-headed leopard, a graphic symbol of the founding of the Grecian kingdom by means of the rapid victories of Alexander the Great, the four heads at once recalling its division, soon after his death, into those four dynasties of which the Seleucidæ of Syria, and the Ptolemies of Egypt, are the only two belonging to Scripture story. Then arises the fourth beast, "great and terrible," whose appearance and actions so disturbed the prophet as to lead him to ask for and obtain added information respecting it, which, however, left him scarcely less troubled and perplexed. This beast corresponds with the great red dragon of Rev. 12:3, and with the beast rising up out of the sea, in Rev. 13:1, which was like

A BEAR, A LEOPARD, AND A LION,
in one. The seven heads of John's dragon and beast are wanting in Daniel, though the ten horns, akin to the ten toes of the image, are in all three. This omission of the number of the heads by Daniel (for it by no means follows that the seven were invisible to him), is probably due to the fact that he was only giving the bare outline of the Roman Empire, as symbolized by this fourth beast, where it coincided with the three preceding ones as a universal power; but when, from verse eight of the seventh chapter, he not only refers to events of a totally different nature, but to those belonging to the same period as the Apocalyptic predictions, then we discover the symbols of both prophets to be identical. This later vision concludes at the same point as the former one—the giving of the kingdom to the saints—but with many additional particulars. There is the slaying of the beast, or the final overthrow of the latest form of Roman dominion; there is the setting of the judgment, the opening of the books and the giving of the kingdom to the "One like unto the Son of Man." There is, besides, the first appearance of that much controverted date, "the time, times, and dividing of times," distinctly associated with what takes place during the continuance of the ten kings, or kingdoms.

Two years after this vision, in the third of Belshazzar's reign, Daniel has another, not complete, like the two previous ones, including the whole of the times of the Gentiles, but taking up, under the second and third of the four great universal empires. The figures are a ram with two horns for the Medo-Persian power, and a he-goat, so swift in its rapid progress as seeming scarcely to touch the ground in its pursuit and destruction of the ram. The notable horn between its eyes brings Alexander the Great again before us, as the founder of the Grecian dominion, and its first king; and in the upspringing of the four other horns, after the breaking of this one, we have again represented the four-fold division of his kingdom after his death. The particular value of this prophecy is that the interpretation is given, showing most clearly that the solution of all prophetic symbols is to be found in the page of history, while the three united visions teach us that the same historical events may be prefigured in different ways and under different signs, prominence being given sometimes to one series of events and sometimes to others.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The First Assistant Postmaster-General's Report submitted last week affords gratifying indications of the progress made during the past year. It appears that the number of Post Offices established during the year was 2121, and the number discontinued 886, making the whole number of Post Offices at the end of the fiscal year 51,252, a net increase of 1235 during the year. The mileage increase during the past year was only 4007 miles. The increase in the number of pieces of mail matter handled, exclusive of registered matter, was 428,397,500. There was a total distribution of 4,948,059,400 pieces. Under the head of the free delivery system the report states that the number of free delivery offices at the close of the year was 178, an increase of 19. The service has now been extended to nearly all cities having a population of 20,000 inhabitants or returning $20,000 gross receipts per annum, and its further extension must, under the law, await the growth of cities to the requirements above noted, or the qualifications must be lowered by legislation. The First Assistant Postmaster-General says that in view of the success of this system, in his judgment, it warrants the recommendation that authority be conferred by legislation for its extension to places of 10,000 inhabitants having a gross revenue of $10,000.

The President's View of the Indian Question was explained by him on November 10th to the Committee appointed at the recent conference at Lake Mohonk, New York, to present to him the result of their deliberations on the Indian grievances. The Hon. Erastus Brooks, Rev. Lyman Abbott, Mr. M. E. Gates, and General Fish spoke, and each advocated the abolition of the present system of Indian reservations, and favored the adoption of a policy in regard to them similar to that so successfully employed in the case of the colored population. The President pointed out the difficulties involved in the plan suggested, and said that while it might not be well for the cause to disturb the Indians in their present homes, he believed that the reservations would ultimately be given to them in severalty, and the Indians thrown on their own resources. The President reminded the Committee that the cause which they advocated would require years to consummate, but intimated that he hoped to be able to make a beginning in the right direction during the remaining years of his administration.

The City of Galveston, Tex., Was the Scene of an appalling conflagration on November 13th. About an hour after midnight a small fire was noticed in a car-repairing shop. Unhappily a gale was blowing at the time at the rate of thirty miles an hour, which carried the flames across the avenue. Before the firemen could get to work two whole blocks were on fire in a district in which almost every building is composed of Texas pine, a very inflammable wood. A vivid description of the scene is given by the correspondent of the New York Times, who says: "The wind blew the tongues of flame from house to house, making them roar with the noise of a thousand furnaces in full blast, and as they leaped across the streets the light was so intense that the whole city from the Gulf of Mexico to Galveston Bay was lighted up as brilliantly as though the sun were shining in full glory. The sleeping inhabitants jumped from their beds and rushed affrighted into the streets. Men, women and children half clad, and some of them shrieking pitifully, rushed about in the piercing north wind, and the city of Galveston presented a scene of desolation and confusion such as was never witnessed here before. The alarm bells were rung vigorously, and this added to the din made by the roaring of the flames and the shouts of men and shrieks of women, and a reign of terror began which lasted all night, and which none who participated in it will be likely to forget during their lives. By 9:30 o'clock the firemen had the fire under full control. But forty solid blocks of buildings had been destroyed before this was effected, and of these over four hundred houses were the dwelling places of the poor, the shelter of one thousand families, who found themselves thrown homeless on the streets, most of them with the loss of all that they possessed. The burned district covers just one hundred acres, including streets. It is remarkable that in so enormous a fire there appear to have been no deaths. Amid so much that is distressing in the occurrence this is a matter for thankfulness.

The Office of Chief Weigher in the New York Custom House, which for many weeks has been a subject of interest throughout the country altogether out of proportion to its intrinsic importance, was filled last week. When General Grant's protégé, Captain Bacon, was removed and Collector Hedden disgraced himself by appointing in his place a run-seller, who acted as chief mourner at the funeral of a pugilist and gambler who was killed in a saloon battle, there was general indignation. There was also some curiosity as to how the President, whose Civil Service Reform promises were thus outraged, would view the appointment. The saloon-keeper was suspended, and a competitive examination of candidates was held. Last week appeared the announcement that the appointment was given to the candidate at the head of the list, who is one of the assistant weighers, and was a soldier in the war, one of the veterans of the famous Sixty-ninth Regiment.

A Vigorous Warning Against Sunday Newspapers is contained in a pastoral letter issued last week to the members of his church by Dr. Howard Crosby. He says that he has seen with great sorrow that Christian families take the Sunday newspaper, and members of the Church even buy it from the stands. He adds: "There is no influence more insidiously seductive than this for the demoralization of our Christian households. Its air of respectability, the brief notice of some religious event in a corner of the sheet, the fact carefully proclaimed that the paper is not made upon Sunday, all furnish easy excuses to the conscience for harboring and encouraging that which unfits the mind for serious thought, which draws it away from God's Word, and which thus nullifies all the sacred influences of the Lord's day." All the New York dailies are now issued on Sundays as on other days. The Tribune, which, a few years ago, was not printed on Sunday, has now fallen into rank with the others, and, like them, boasts of the efforts it is making to get it into the hands of readers in the suburbs early on that day.

The Sentence on Mr. Stead, the Editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, was pronounced on November 10th. He was condemned to three months' imprisonment; his sub-editor, Mr. Jacques, to one month; Mrs. Jarrett, the woman who assisted in the investigation, to six months; and Louise Mourey, the French midwife, to six months, with hard labor. It was a refinement of cruelty which shows the malignant nature of the judge to punish Mr. Stead's agents more severely than Mr. Stead himself. The judge doubtless calculated that an honorable man, such as Mr. Stead has proved himself, could be made to suffer more acutely through the sufferings of others than through his own person. The prisoners were marched off to the penitentiary. Meanwhile the wealthy and aristocratic sinners whose villanies Mr. Stead exposed are at liberty. Whether the English people will tamely witness the scandal and make no protest remains to be seen. The American people, however, must be on their guard against being deceived by the statement that the sentence is approved by the English public, which is made by some prominent journals, of which the New York Herald is the leader. The statement is not true. The proprietor of the Herald has probably been misled by his friends in England, who might be expected to approve of the sentence; but if the editor of the Herald would inquire of his brother-clergymen in England he would learn that a very different opinion prevails in religious circles.

England has Another Little War on Her hands. The barbarous King of Burmah, a State lying on the eastern frontiers of India, has for a long time past been committing outrages on British subjects, and in other ways manifesting his antagonism to his powerful neighbor. He is apparently a brutal madman, whose ferocities have made him the terror of his own subjects. On November 13th, after several weeks had been spent in a fruitless attempt to obtain satisfaction from the king, Lord Dufferin ordered the advance of the British forces into Burmah.

The Political Campaign in Great Britain increases in interest as it proceeds. Mr. Gladstone received an imposing ovation in Edinburgh last week, where he went to deliver a campaign speech. He deprecated the agitation for the disestablishment of the Church, which he regarded as a question for the distant future, and indirectly censured his colleague, Mr. Chamberlain, for dragging it to the front. He said the questions requiring the attention of the Liberal party were the reform of the Land laws, the reform of the procedure of Parliament, the completion of the Reform bill, and the settlement of the imperial relation toward Ireland. He was laboring for Liberal unity and was preaching unity to the best of his ability, but he hoped the Liberal party would split before it sacrificed conscience. It is evident, however, that the Church question will be the most prominent in the struggle, and it will determine, in the English and Scotch constituencies, a larger number of votes than any other.

War Between Servia and Bulgaria was Formally declared on November 14th. As is usual where two armies have been glaring at each other for some time across a frontier, each charges the other with being the aggressor. That question, however, is not important, as the attitude of the two governments is well understood. King Milan placed himself promptly at the head of the Servian army and marched into Bulgarian territory. Three skirmishes took place during the day, in which the Servians were successful. The reports which the cable brings agree in representing the Servian army as in numbers and discipline superior to the Bulgarians. The attention of Europe, however, is mainly occupied with the attitude of the great Powers, which this conflict may draw into armed antagonism. It is believed that Servia would not have moved without the consent, if not at the suggestion of Austria, while Russia, though not disposed to go to the help of the Bulgarians while Alexander is on the throne, would be promptly in the field in their defence if they would get rid of him and accept a king more amenable to Russian influence. The situation is ominous, and every development will be watched with anxious interest.

Wanted as Evangelists at Mission Stations of the Gospel Army, in Canada and the United States, men and women who can sing and give Gospel addresses. Write to the President, Rev. M. Baxter, Post Office, Toronto, Canada.

Four Dollars Have Been Received Since Our last acknowledgment for the fund for supplying colored ministers in the South with the CHRISTIAN HERALD: From Smiths Falls, Canada, $1; from "a Friend," $2; from Independence, Iowa, $1. We sincerely thank our friends who are continuing these contributions. Every dollar received carries to some study spiritual help every week for a year. Some of those studies are rather sparsely supplied, and the paper, with its two sermons every week and other interesting matter, is a very welcome and useful visitor there, the influence of which is felt in the pulpit and in the Church.

Mrs. M. Baxter Conducted Meetings in Nash-ville, Tenn., on Wednesday, November 4th to Tuesday, November 10th. The audiences were large, and all classes and denominations were represented. Personal holiness and divine healing are subjects which are arousing much attention among the Christians at Nashville just now, and Mrs. Baxter's addresses were listened to with eager attention. The newspapers of the city devoted much of their space to the meetings, and to letters from those who attended them, and were concerned in the discussions that arose. Two very marvellous cases of healing of well-known persons in the city contributed to impress the doctrines taught on the minds of the people. In a note received from Mrs. Baxter she requests us to state that all requests for prayer she has received have "been placed in the Lord's hands" at the prayer-meetings in connection with her work. Time will not allow her to answer the many letters which every mail brings her.

Christian Conventions on Holiness and Di-vine healing will be held at Pittsburgh, Pa., on November 24th and 25th; in Chicago, Ill., on December 1st to 3d; and Detroit, Mich., December 3d and 4th. The Pittsburgh meetings will be held in the Third Presbyterian Church on Sixth Avenue; the Chicago meetings in the First Methodist-Episcopal Church, corner of Clark and Washington streets. Rev. A. B. Simpson, Rev. John E. Cookman, D.D., New York; Mrs. M. Baxter, Mrs. E. E. Stroud Smith, Liverpool, England; Miss Carrie F. Judd, Buffalo, N. Y., with other Christian workers and teachers, are expected to take part in the services.

Messrs. Mateer and Parker, Mr. C. H. Spur-geon's evangelists, have been laboring during the past two weeks at Kingston, N. Y., following Mr. Moody's work there. On Sunday, November 1st, the Rink, in which the meetings are held, was thronged almost to suffocation. Above three thousand people were present. On week days meetings were held in the Reformed Dutch Church and the Presbyterian Church, both of which were crowded. These successful evangelists are this week at Oneonta, N. Y., where they are holding meetings which will continue through next week. Afterward they have accepted invitations in Western States which will occupy them for several weeks.

A Mission to University Students Has Been commenced by Mr. J. E. K. Studd, formerly chief of the Cricket Club at the Cambridge University, England. Mr. Studd has undertaken this mission at the suggestion of Mr. Moody. He began by a visit to Princeton, Monday, November 2d, where he spent three days. His reputation as an athlete attracted large audiences, in which were many who do not ordinarily attend such services, and his earnestness and thorough sympathy with student feelings made a deep impression. Dr. McCosh spoke of his visit with great interest.

The Bowery Mission and Young Men's Home, New York, held its fifth anniversary at the rooms, 36 Bowery, on Sunday, November 8th. There was a large attendance. Some original hymns by Miss Fanny Crosby were sung, with others, wonderful testimonies were given by men who had found deliverance from degrading sins, and brief addresses were made by clergymen and laymen. A contemporary justly remarks of this effort: "This unpretending, persistent, evangelical work, in the very heart and face of the lowest life of this great city, has been blessed from its beginning, and deserves the earnest prayers and co-operation of those who believe that Jesus Christ is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him."

Two Tell-tale Fences in Maine Afforded amusement to a party of travellers in that State recently. One was a fence leading across a graveyard, and was the relic of a fierce theological controversy which was waged some half a century ago. The controversy gave rise to feuds between old friends and neighbors, and stirred up strife in families. The bitterness not only invaded the home, the shop, the store, the lawyer's office, the doctor's den, the church, and the parsonage, but actually got into the cemetery. A fence was built across it to separate the graves. Another singular fence was observed by the party when driving through a town in Sagadahoc County. This fence divided the walk leading to the front door of a neat house. The fence ran up to the door over the steps. They were informed that the man who set it up has cut the property in two as literally as he can. He extended the fence idea by building a wall in the front entry, which cuts his half of the house off from the other half. These fences cause amusement by their rarity. The Church has been very busy of late years pulling down its fences, and so far as they separated the Lord's servants from united action in the Lord's service, the work has been a good one; but when we see Christian people at the theatre, or dancing at midnight, with worldlings, we doubt whether one fence too many has not been removed (II Cor. 6: 17).

A Tragedy at Niagara Falls Occurred on No-vember 8th. Shortly after noon on that day two men in a small rowboat were observed by some boys on the Canadian shore of the Niagara River near the Rapids, just above the Falls. Apparently they were unconscious of their danger at the time. They were close to the shore, but again headed out into the river. When they were warned by those on shore of their danger they paid no heed, but steered more down stream than ever. When in the Rapids their boat was seen to break. A man who was rowing on the river above the Rapids saw them, but could not go to them. Clinging to their broken boat, they were swept over the Horseshoe Fall in full view of many spectators. Soon after going over a piece of the boat and a coat which was recognized as belonging to one of the men were picked up below the Falls. The sleeve of the coat was turned inside out and badly torn. No trace of the bodies was seen. The tragedy has the same characteristics as those that have marked others at that fatal spot; those in danger are unconcerned and pay no heed to warnings until they cannot be saved, by their own efforts or those of others. It is so with those approaching the moral rapids. They do not realize their danger, and they scoff at warning until, on the current of the gambling passion, or the appetite for liquor or opium, or some other seductive stream of sin, they are carried to destruction (Prov. 29: 1).

The Identification of Chinamen Has Exer-cised the ingenuity of the Government officials since the enactment of the law prohibiting the admission of any who have not been here before. It is suspected that Chinamen sell their certificates authorizing their return, and strangers gain admission by them. Various plans have been suggested to prevent this evasion of the law. The new scheme is to take impressions of the top of the outgoing Chinaman's thumbs. The thumb is first pressed lightly on an inkpad, and then on a piece of white paper. The resulting impression is characteristic to a remarkable extent. It is said that no two thumbs give similar impressions, and that right and left thumbs are always markedly different. It is, indeed, asserted that the lines of the thumbs present more distinct varieties than can be found in any other part of the body, and that identification by means of such impressions is practically infallible. If this is true the Chinaman will find it more difficult to escape the vigilance of the officials. The custom is believed to be a very ancient one. The writer of the Book of Job probably had in mind some variety of it when he said, "Thou settest a print upon the heels of my feet" (Job 13: 27). It was a warning needed by men in his day as ours, that God is cognizant of every step they take.

The Curse of Good Luck has Been Realized by a tradesman in New York. Last week a dealer in hair was taken to the Jefferson Market Police Court and committed to an institution for dipsomania. The proceedings were taken by his wife. It was said that the man had won $15,000 in a lottery, and his great fortune proved a curse to him. Before that he was a sober, industrious man, but after he obtained the money he became an habitual drunkard. He lost all control of himself when he started on a carouse. His friends knew that unless he was checked he would continue in his course for months, and it was deemed best to put him under restraint. He would have been better off, even from a worldly standpoint, if he had never won the prize. He is not the first by many to whom worldly success has been a fatal boon. The ordeal of prosperity is a fierce one, though every one is ready to undergo it. There are many who, when their eyes are clearer than they are now, will thank God that He withheld from them their desire for affluence (Mark 8: 36).

A Medical Martyr's Death is Reported From Lima, Peru. The Star and Herald says: "A young medical student in Lima, studying for his final examination, selected as the subject of his dissertation a report on the disease, indigenous to Peru, known as Verrugas or Oroya fever. To form a perfect diagnosis of the disease he caused himself to be inoculated with virus from a Verrugas pustule, and then awaited the result. He soon exhibited all the symptoms of Oroya fever, and was confident that his experiment would prove valuable to the medical profession. Unfortunately his strength was not sufficient to withstand the virulence of the fever, and two weeks later, after suffering excruciating agony, he died. The remains were followed to the grave by the scientific and medical notabilities of Lima, who declare that the student was a martyr to science, and that his name must be associated with those of Pasteur, Jenner and Ferran." The saddest feature of this incident is that the self-sacrifice appears to have been useless. No benefit accrues to science or the world from the young man's death. It is not so with the sacrifice which was made on Calvary. By it the captives of Satan are delivered, and by His stripes we are healed (Isa. 53: 5).

A Speech at a Fair is Never a Success, says Senator Cullom, of Illinois, who explained his presence at the recent State Fair to a reporter of the Chicago Tribune. The Senator said he attended to tie on the blue ribbons and not to make a speech. He said: "The last time I tried to make a speech at a fair was at Lincoln. There were two rings near the stand. One was for cattle and the other for the horses before the races. I had got fairly started when some fellow led a couple of horses into the ring. The crowd began to leave me, and in five minutes every soul in the crowd except the man who presided had left me. He looked as if he wanted to go, too, so we followed the crowd over to the ring. The remainder of that speech is still undelivered. No, a Governor, a Senator, or even a President, is out of place making a speech at a fair. When I hear of friends who have not learned this great lesson I always pity them, for I know the fate of their oratorical efforts, however brilliant they may be." The Senator realized that men are not easily drawn from business or pleasure to listen to a political speech, though he naturally regarded politics as more important than either. Preachers have reason to make a like complaint, though their message transcends in importance every other subject of consideration (Matt. 22: 5).

THE TRUE ANTIDOTE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And that from a child thou hast known the holy scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus."—II TIMOTHY 3:15.

Times Repeating Themselves—Tried Remedies—The Work in Timothy—It Commenced with Early Instruction—Lord Shaftesbury's Nurse—The Subject of the Teaching—The Curse of the Present Day—II. Quickened by Saving Faith—III. Becomes a Solid Character—Religious Ostriches—The Bomb Proof Shelter—IV. It Produces Usefulness.

How very remarkably the times repeat themselves! The warning which Paul gave concerning his own times is quite as needful for this present age. Again darkness thickens, and the mists hang heavily around our footsteps. Evil men and seducers wax worse and worse, and very many have turned away their ears from the truth to hearken to fables. Nor do we wonder that it is so. History must repeat itself so long as we have the same human nature to deal with, the same sins to ensnare mankind, the same truth to be trifled with, and the same devil to stir men up to the same mischief.

But, brethren, when the same evils come, we must apply to them the same remedies. Let us not talk of inventing wise measures for the present distress in the spiritual world, but let us use the great remedy which was so effectual in Paul's day. Paul taught young Timothy the Gospel himself: he made him not only hear his doctrine, but see his practice. We cannot force truth upon men, but we can make our own teaching clear and decided, and make our lives consistent therewith.

TRUTH AND HOLINESS

are the surest antidotes to error and unrighteousness. The apostle said to Timothy, "Continue thou in the things which thou hast learned and hast been assured of, knowing of whom thou hast learned them."

He then dwelt upon another potent remedy which had been of great service to the young preacher—namely, the knowing of the Holy Scriptures from his earliest childhood. This was to young Timothy one of his best safeguards. His early training held him like an anchor, and saved him from the dreadful drift of the age. Happy young man, of whom the apostle could say, "From a child thou hast known the Holy Scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus!"

There is no cure after all for midnight but the rising sun: no hope remains for a dark world but in that light which lighteneth ever man. Shine forth, O Sun of Righteousness, and mist, and cloud, and darkness must disappear. Brethren, keep to the apostolic plans, and rest assured of apostolic success. Preach Christ; preach the Word in season and out of season; and teach the children. One of God's chief methods for preserving His fields from tares, is to sow them early with wheat. Upon that I am going to speak this morning as the Holy Spirit shall help me.

I. The work of God's grace in Timothy commenced with

EARLY INSTRUCTION

—"From a child thou hast known the Holy Scriptures." Note the time for instruction. The expression, "from a child," might be better understood if we read it, "from a very child;" or, as the Revised Version has it, "from a babe." It does not mean a well-grown child, or youth, but a child just rising out of infancy. From a very child Timothy had known the sacred writings. This expression is, no doubt, used to show that we cannot begin too early to imbue the minds of our children with scriptural knowledge. Babies receive impressions long before we are aware of the fact. During the first months of a child's life it learns more than we imagine. It soon learns the love of its mother, and its own dependence; and if the mother be wise, it learns the meaning of obedience and the necessity of yielding its will to a higher will. This may be the key-note of its whole future life. If it learn obedience and submission early, it may save a thousand tears from the child's eyes, and as many from the mother's heart. A special vantage-ground is lost when even babyhood is left uncultured.

THE BEST PRIMER.

The Holy Scripture may be learned by children as soon as they are capable of understanding anything. It is a very remarkable fact, which I have heard asserted by many teachers, that children will learn to read out of the Bible better than from any other book. I scarcely know why: it may, perhaps, be on account of the simplicity of the language; but I believe it is so. A Biblical fact will often be grasped when an incident of common history is forgotten. There is an adaptation in the Bible for human beings of all ages, and therefore it has a fitness for children. We make a mistake when we think that we must begin with something else and lead up to the Scriptures. The Bible is the book for the peep of day. Parts of it are above a child's mind, for they are above the comprehension of the most advanced among us. There are depths in it wherein Leviathan may swim; but there are also brooks in which a lamb may wade. Wise teachers know how to lead their little ones into the green pastures beside the still waters.

I was noticing, in the life of that man of God whose loss presses very heavily upon many of our hearts—namely, the Earl of Shaftesbury, that his first religious impressions were produced by a humble woman. The impressions which made him Shaftesbury—the man of God, and the friend of man—were received in the nursery. Little Lord Ashley had who spoke to him of the things of God. He tells us that she died before he was seven years of age; clear proof that early in life his heart had been able to receive the seal of the Spirit of God, and to receive it by humble instrumentalities. Blessed among women was she whose name we know not, but who wrought incalculable service for God and man by her holy teaching of the chosen child. Young nurses, note this.

Give us the first seven years of a child, with God's grace, and we may defy the world, the flesh, and the devil to ruin that immortal soul. Those first years, while yet the clay is soft and plastic, go far to decide the form of the vessel. Do not say that your office, you who teach the young, is in the least degree inferior to ours, whose main business is with older folks. No, you have the first of them, and your impressions, as they come first, will endure last; oh that they may be good, and only good! Among the thoughts that come to an old man before he enters heaven, the most plentiful are those that aforesaid visited him when he sat upon his mother's knee. That which made Dr. Guthrie ask for a "bairn's hymn" when he was dying is but an instinct of our nature, which leads us to complete the circle by folding together the ends of life. Childlike things are dearest to old age.

It is well to note the admirable selection of instructors. We are not at a loss to tell who instructed youthful Timothy. In the first chapter of this epistle Paul says, "When I call to remembrance the unfeigned faith that is in thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice; and I am persuaded that in thee also." No doubt grandmother Lois and mother Eunice united in teaching the little one. Who should teach the children but the parents? Those who think that a woman detained at home by her little family is doing nothing, think the reverse of what is true. Scarcely can the godly mother quit her home for a place of worship; but dream not that she is lost to the work of the Church; far from it, she is doing the best possible service for her Lord. Mothers, the godly training of your offspring is your first and most pressing duty. Christian women, by teaching children the Holy Scriptures, are as much fulfilling their part for the Lord, as Moses in judging Israel, or Solomon in building the temple.

Nowadays, since the world has in it, alas! so few of Christian mothers and grandmothers, the Church has thought it wise to supplement the instruction of home by teaching held under her fostering wing. Those children who have no such parents the Church takes under her maternal care. I regard this as a very blessed institution. I am thankful for the many of our brothers and sisters who give their Sabbath-days, and many of them a considerable part of their week evenings also, to the teaching of other people's children, who somehow grow to be very much their own. They endeavor to perform the duties of fathers and mothers, for God's sake, to those children who are neglected by their own parents; and therein they do well. Let no Christian parents fall into the delusion that the Sunday-school is intended to ease them of their parental duties. The first and most natural condition of things is for Christian parents to train up their own children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.

THE STANDARD.

Note the subject of the instruction. "From a child thou hast known the Holy Scriptures:" he was led to treat the book of God with great reverence. Especially is this feeling of reverence needed nowadays. I meet with men who hold strange views, but I do not care one half so much about their views, nor about the strangeness of them, as I do about a certain something which I spy out at the back of this novel thinking. When I find that, if I prove their views to be unscriptural, I have nevertheless proved nothing to them, for they do not care about Scripture, then I have found out a principle far more dangerous than mere doctrinal blundering. This indifference to Scripture is the great curse of the Church at this hour. We can be tolerant of divergent opinions, so long as we perceive an honest intent to follow the Statute-book. But if it comes to this, that the Book itself is of small authority to you, then we have no need of further parley; we are in different camps, and the sooner we recognize this, the better for all parties concerned.

Once more upon this point: it appears that young Timothy was so taught as a child that the teaching was effectual. "Thou hast known the Holy Scriptures," says Paul. It is a good deal to say of a child that he has "known the Holy Scriptures." You may say, "I have taught the children the Scriptures," but that they have known them is quite another thing. The opinion that children cannot receive the whole truth of the Gospel is a great mistake; for their child-condition is a help rather than a hindrance; older folk must become as little children before they can enter the kingdom. Do lay a good groundwork with the children. Let not Sunday-school work be slurred, nor done in a slovenly manner. Let the children know the Holy Scripture. Let the Scriptures be consulted rather than any human book.

II. Our second head was to be that this work was quickened by

A SAVING FAITH.

The Scriptures do not save, but they are able to make a man wise unto salvation. Children may know the Scriptures, and yet not be children of God. Faith in Jesus Christ is that grace which brings immediate salvation. Many dear children are called of God so early that they cannot precisely tell when they were converted; but they were converted; they must at some time or other have passed from death to life. You could not have told this morning, by observation, the moment when the sun rose, but it did rise; and there was a time when it was below the horizon, and another time when it had risen above it. The moment, whether we see it or not, in which a child is really saved, is when he believes in the Lord Jesus Christ. I mention this, simple as it is, because I want all teachers to feel that if their children do not as yet know all the doctrines of the Bible, and if there be certain higher or deeper truths which their minds have not yet grasped, still children are saved as soon as they are wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus.

Notice, that by this faith in Christ Jesus we continue and advance in salvation. The moment we believe in Christ we are saved; but we are not at once as wise as we may be, and hope to be. We may be, as it were, saved unintelligently; I mean, of course, comparatively so; but it is desirable that we should be able to give a reason for the hope that is in us, and so be wise unto salvation. By faith children become little disciples, and by faith they go on to become more proficient. How are we to go on to wisdom? Not by quitting the way of faith, but by keeping to that same faith in Christ Jesus by which we began to learn. In the school of grace faith is the great faculty by which we make advances in wisdom. Keep therefore close to the practice of faith, from which so many are turning aside.

A PRACTICAL DIFFERENCE.

Observe, that the text gives us a plain intimation that by faith knowledge is turned into wisdom. Exceedingly practical is the difference between knowledge and wisdom. See it in the text, "From a child thou hast known;" but it is faith, faith alone, that turns that knowledge into wisdom; and thus the Holy Scriptures are "able to make wise unto salvation." "Knowledge is power," but wisdom is the application of that power to practical ends. Knowledge may be bullion, but wisdom is the minted gold, fit for circulation among men. You can give your children knowledge without their having faith; but they must have faith given them of the Holy Ghost before that knowledge can become wisdom. Oh, teachers, pray for your dear children, that God would give them faith in Christ Jesus, that so the knowledge which you have given them may turn to wisdom! Go as far as you can go with the teaching; but ever cry mightily unto the Lord, that His Holy Spirit may work regeneration, create faith, impart wisdom, and give salvation.

III. Time fails me; I cannot dwell as I would upon other points; but I beg you to notice, in the third place, that sound instruction in Holy Scripture, when quickened by a living faith, creates

A SOLID CHARACTER.

The man who from a child has known the Holy Scriptures, when he obtains faith in Christ will be grounded and settled upon the abiding principles of the unchanging word of God. I wish it were so with the bulk of those who profess and call themselves Christians. In these days we are surrounded by unsettled minds, "ever learning, but never coming to a knowledge of the truth." These are carried about by every wind of doctrine. What numbers of professors I have known who go into one place of worship and hear one form of doctrine and apparently approve it because the preacher is "a clever man!" They hear an opposite teaching, and they are equally at home, because again it is "a clever man!" They join with a church, and you ask them, "Do you agree with the views of that community?" They neither know nor care what those views may be; one doctrine is as good as another to them. Their spiritual appetite can enjoy soap as well as butter; they can digest bricks as well as bread. These have a marvellous power of swallowing everything; they have no spiritual discernment, no appreciation of truth. They follow any "clever" person, and in this prove that they are not the sheep of our Lord's pasture, of whom it is written, "A stranger will they not follow; for they know not the voice of strangers." The true believer's great reason for his faith is, "It is written." Christ our Master met the tempter in the wilderness with, "It is written." Though He was Himself inspired, yet His teaching was full of the Old Testament; He was always quoting the words of the Inspired Book, and therein setting us an example. If you and I would contend with Satan, and with an evil world, so as to overcome in the conflict, we must take care to take our stand squarely and firmly upon the Scriptures. We are bomb-proof when we shelter beneath the Word of the Lord.

INDEPENDENCE.

Those who know the Scriptures, and so believe in Jesus, are pillars upon a personal acquaintance with the foundations of their faith.

From a child thou hast known the Holy Scriptures; they were not treated with an ignorant reverence, but with an intelligent homage. How much I desire that each one of you may be a personal student of the Holy Scriptures! We need to know them for ourselves. Personally grasping them as a revelation to himself, the godly man loves them, studies them, feels them, lives upon them, and so knows them. By this means he becomes independent of other men. Paul is to die. Poor Timothy! Yes, it will be "poor Timothy!" if he carries his faith in Paul's bosom, and has none in his own heart. But Timothy's Bible is not going to die. Timothy's knowledge of Scripture is not going to be taken from him; nor is the Holy Spirit about to depart from him.

Look at some of our churches: while a well-instructed Gospel minister leads the way, the brethren abide in their steadfastness. The good man dies, and where is the church? No doubt, those who are instructed in the Scriptures remain in their places, but the more ignorant are scattered like chaff. There are numbers now in this part of London wandering about, who were once zealous for the faith, but are now almost indifferent to it. I will not mention names, but I could do so readily enough—I mean the names of esteemed brethren who gathered an earnest following about them; but they are gone, and with their going, numbers of their followers have gone, too. I fear there could not have been a sound knowledge of the Word, or these people would have survived the great loss of their teacher.

IV. Now, lastly. As this early teaching creates a fine solid character, so will it

PRODUCE GREAT USEFULNESS.

I will say nothing more than just this. Thus Timothy became above all others a choice companion for Paul, one upon whom Paul looked with love, and remembered with joy. Companions for apostles are only to be produced in the school of Holy Scripture. Those who have communed with Moses, and David, and the prophets are fit to associate with an apostle. It is something to produce out of a child a comrade for a veteran servant of the living God. Let a man of God get side by side with a youth who knows the Scriptures, and he feels, "This is fit company for me." Paul, worn with years of persecution, strokes his gray beard, and his eyes light up with joy as he looks on that young Timothy. What is there about him more than about any other? Why, only that he knows the Scriptures, and they have made him wise unto salvation.

There were, no doubt, fine young fellows to be found who gloried in preferring the advanced thought of philosophers to the stereotyped teachings of Holy Scripture; but had they begun to talk to the apostle upon their new theories, Paul would have dismissed them with words of warning. He knew nothing of them or of their "other gospel," except that they troubled him and the churches. Without a scriptural training a convert has no grit, no backbone, and no soul in him. But when Paul looked on a gracious youth who knew the Scriptures, and held fast to them, he thanked God, and took courage.

Timothy became, also, a great champion for the faith. He came forward, and in the midst of all those who were preaching false doctrine he stood firm to the end; steadfast, unmovable, courageous, because as a child he had known the Scriptures. Oh, teachers, see what you may do! In your schools sit our future evangelists. In that infant class sits an apostle to some distant land. There may come under your training hand, my sister, a future father in Israel. There shall come under your teaching, my brother, those that are to bear the banners of the Lord in the thick of the fray. The ages look to you each time your class assemblies. Oh, that God may help you to do your part well! We pray with one heart and one soul that the Lord Jesus Christ may be with our Sunday-schools from this day and till He cometh. Amen and Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

THE SABBATH:

Its Permanence, Promise, and Defence, by W. W. Everts, D.D., is a work which in these days of Sabbath desecration ought to be useful. His aim appears to be to brace up Christian thought on the subject rather than to convince the general public of the value of the Sabbath. It may be, and we are sorry to see indications that there is need for this effort. There is a laxity among Christians as to the day which did not exist in the last generation. The daily papers are read in Christian homes on Sunday as on other days, and there is a tendency to secularize the day not in engaging in business, but in making it a day of recreation. It is to this danger that Dr. Everts directs his attention, and it may be hoped that his arguments will have a good influence, in reminding his readers that the Sabbath is a divine institution which cannot be desecrated without God's displeasure. The other danger to which the day is exposed, that of godless men who are trying to introduce the Parisian Sunday into America, will not be met by this book. Dr. Everts relies on the old grounds of defence, which are powerless against those antagonists. It is useless talking about what God enjoined in Eden to men who regard the whole account of the creation and the fall as a myth. If, however, Dr. Everts can quicken the Christian conscience of the nation on the subject, and induce Christian people to keep the day as it should be kept, a great and important step will be gained. Then we may hope that men with more practical sense and tact than he appears to have will engage in the defence of the day against its worldly foes, taking the more effective, though lower ground, that the observance of the Sabbath is necessary to the well-being of society and the prosperity of the nation. Thus Dr. Everts's book may do good indirectly, and may have a beneficial influence. He is thoroughly in earnest, though he does not seem to have kept himself abreast of the current of modern thought. STONES FOR THE TEMPLE.

Poems by Mrs. Harriet Warner Re Qua. It was with a feeling of utter weariness that we opened this little volume of poems. So much miserable stuff which the writers call poetry has passed through our hands of late, that it was with reluctance that we read a line of Mrs. Re Qua's book. But after perusing the first two poems, it was difficult to close the book while a single stanza remained unread. It is long since poetry so sweet, clear, and true has been offered to the American public. The poems are evidently the product of one who has suffered much, and who has learned in suffering lessons which are learned in no other way. The consolation which she received of the Master she distributes in tuneful language to her fellow-believers, and we think no Christian, and especially none who are passing through trial, can read her work without thankfulness and profit, as well as pleasure. Rather than use the space at our disposal for further comment, we devote it to a few extracts, which will show better than any words of ours the spirit and character of the book.

Of a bereaved father and mother she writes an exquisite sketch, of which this is the last stanza:

"And not in vain
Were they afflicted: on their vision rose
The unsullied splendor; clouds and rain
Had brought forth fruit celestial; deepest woes
The choicest clusters. For Christ fed them still,
And cheered them with His brightness evermore;
Till every longing merged into His will;
And all the way they praised, seeing He went before."

Here are three beautiful stanzas from the poem "In His Footsteps":

"Sometimes the snow of a drifting cloud
Comes sifted among the flowers,
But my dearest treasures it cannot enshroud,
And the sun-rays stoop to the heads that are bowed Till snow turns to freshening showers.

"The way is rough, is often rough,
And over the mountains high;
But I sing as I climb o'er each frowning bluff,
The shining summit I'm sure enough,
Is nearer the throne-lit sky."

"And it may be there, it may be there;
I shall catch a passing gleam
Of the garnished towers of the city fair:
Or the sapphire arch of the gateway where
The glorified go in."

In a poem on the late General Gordon are these graceful lines:

"Oh! it was wonderful that he should choose
To dwell among the poor, and vile, and lost,
All things repulsive; where was all to lose,
And naught to gain; save, at extremest cost,
A few dark souls—jewels the Lord might see—Whose sight is not as ours: whose love is broad—
Which, purged from ignorance and infamy, Might glorify the living Father, God.

"'Twas wonderful, because so like his Lord!
He had won honors but to cast them down,
Uncared for, at His feet, whose smallest word
Was more to him than any regal crown.
And still he chose the cross, and loneliness;
With just a sigh sometimes for full release;
'I fear not death,' he said, 'This weariness
Were only so exchange for perfect peace.'"

There are over seventy of these charming poems in this little volume of 217 pages. They will shed light on many a dark way and point many a sufferer to the Source of consolation. We do not know who is the publisher, but Mrs. Ke Quæ's address is Aurora, Ill.

THE BLOOD REDEMPTION.

AN English traveller in Africa relates that during his journey he found a wretched captive, who had been taken in war by a savage tribe and was condemned to a barbarous death. The traveller was filled with pity for the man, who had more intelligence than most of his countrymen, and he offered many bribes for his redemption. "Man of the pale face," said Libe, the chief of the tribe, in his native tongue, "Libe has ivory and gold, and oxen and slaves, and when he wants more he calls out his warriors, and rushes on the neighboring tribes, as the river-horse crashes through the reeds, and bears off all that he will. Libe needs not thy spoils, oh white face! Libe seeks not gold, but blood!" and at a sign from the chief one of his followers flung another dart at the wretched Garra.

The traveller saw the sign, and by an instinctive impulse threw himself forward with uplifted arm, as if to stay the murderous weapon. It struck that uplifted arm, pierced through the young man's sleeve, and hung quivering in his flesh!

An exclamation burst from the lips of Libe when he saw that the Englishman was struck. Not only had he, in his dealings with the natives, won, by his conduct, their esteem, but there was a wholesome fear among the coast-tribes of the power of England. Libe, who would have thought little of sweeping hundreds of his dark fellow-countrymen from the face of the earth, feared the vengeance of the pale-faces.

The traveller read dismay on the countenance of the savage, and instantly followed up his advantage. "Thou dost not seek gold, but blood," he cried; "see, here it flows before thee, and for it account must be given!" He drew out the dart from his arm, and large drops fell on the ground.

"Oh, son of the ocean, Libe meant it not; Libe's heart is heavy," began the chief.

"Have I not bought the slave?" the wounded Englishman exclaimed, pointing to the Garra with his bleeding arm; "his life shall be thy fine; give him up, and there yet shall be peace between the white men and their dark brothers."

"Be it so," answered Libe, glad to escape so easily from the consequences which he dreaded; "thou hast bought him, he is thine; and Libe will send for the great medicine-man to see to the white man's hurt."

It was some little time before Libe and his wild train could be induced to depart. When at length Libe and his party dashed down the bank, and began passing the river on their homeward way, the poor redeemed slave uttered a wild cry of joy, and crawling up to his deliverer embraced his knees, and covered his feet with kisses! "Garra, the slave of the son of pity, the blood-bought, always a faithful slave!" murmured the grateful savage.

Happily the Englishman was able to tell the poor creature of Him whose blood was shed for the redemption of the world and to lead him to the Saviour.

MATTIE'S SOLEMN QUESTION.

By Mary S. Brennan.

"Is grandma going to see Aunt Polly too?" "Yes, darling," said Mrs. Greely to her little daughter. They were seated in the train, just leaving the station, and the mother had promised Mattie a visit to a beloved relative whose charming home offered many pleasant attractions to them both. In the seat opposite sat a stranger, apparently a weary traveller, whose face lost its care-worn expression in its interested study of the little girl. At last, leaning forward, he said:

"Little girl, do you like to ride in the cars?" Mattie looked shyly, and then said: "Yes, sir, I do; but I am glad, because I am going to see my auntie and cousins. Have you any cousins?"

"Yes, little one, I have; but they are far away on the other side of the ocean, and I cannot go to see them," said he.

"Don't you feel lonely without them?" "Yes, I do sometimes. But I must attend to business, you know. It is such a long journey to where they live."

"Is it nice where your auntie and cousins live?" said Mattie.

"Yes, it is beautiful. When I was a boy I used to like going there better than anything. In the autumn we went nutting, and those that gathered most would be crowned king or queen of the day; and in the summer we went to the seashore and gathered shells and made necklaces of them. Then in the evenings it was such fun listening to auntie's stories around the fire."

"You didn't wear a necklace, did you?" said

Mattie, looking at the stranger's swarthy neck.

"No; but my girl cousins did—they had all the shells. But what do you think they did? When I was going such a long way off they had ever such a pretty knife made of them for me to cut paper with. Look, isn't it pretty?"

"Is that really pearl?" asked Mattie, "like mamma sings about—the 'pearly gates,' you know?"

"You must ask mamma that; I don't know anything about it."

"Not know about the pearly gates! Don't you know about heaven and Jesus? Didn't your mamma tell you?"

"Yes, she did, my dear; but I'm afraid I've forgotten. It is a long while ago, and I've no mamma now—she is dead."

"Then she is gone through the pearly gates. Mamma says so. All the good people who love the Lord Jesus go in. You must love Jesus, and then you will go in too."

"That is if I am good, you mean?"

"Well, you are, ain't you? If you aren't you will have to ask the Lord Jesus to make you good. Mamma says He will if people ask Him. I ask Him every night when I go to bed. Then you'll see your mamma again."

"You are quite a little theologian, my dear," said the stranger, who was evidently embarrassed by the turn the conversation had taken.

"I don't know what that is," said Mattie.

"Well, you will some day, I expect, and I hope you will feel as sure then as you do now."

"Shall I ask Jesus to make you good? I will if you like; mamma says He hears me pray."

"Do, my dear. I should like you to do so. Here, let me give you my little knife to remind you of it."

Mattie looked longingly at the knife, but was not sure if she should accept it, but at a whisper from her mother she took it timidly. "I will give you a kiss for it," she said.

There were tears in the man's eyes as he received the salute, and as he rose shortly afterward to leave the car he stooped and gave the child another kiss, saying, as he did so, "You won't forget?"

"No," said Mattie. "I'll pray for you every night."

It was many years afterward, and Mattie had grown a tall young lady, when Mrs. Greely's ill health necessitated a voyage to Europe. During her residence there she attended a series of revival services conducted by an evangelist whose name was honored among all the churches as one of the most successful among the Lord's servants. On taking her seat she was troubled by an uneasy sense that the preacher's face was familiar to her, but where and when she had seen him she could not remember. Before the sermon was over she was enlightened.

"Little things," said the preacher, "that seem of no account when they occur are often used by the Lord to change an entire character. My own experience is an illustration. One day, many years ago, I was travelling on an American railroad, a careless, impenitent sinner. A little child, a bright, winsome little girl, talked to me about my mother, and reminded me that I should see her again if I loved the Lord Jesus. The dear little thing promised to pray for me, Mattie Receives a Gift.

I believe that under God I owe my conversion to that child's prayers, for I had no rest afterward day nor night until I had given myself to the Lord. I have never seen her from that day to this; I do not even know her name; but wherever she may be I pray God to bless her with His choicest blessings.

THE SILVER LINING.

A SERIAL STORY.

An Unpleasant Complication.

FRANK ARNOLD's statement of his trouble, which added a deeper furrow to those on his father's brow and sent his mother and sister to their knees in intercession for him, was substantially true. He had done his utmost, as he said, to find his wife, but without avail. His utmost, however, was little likely to be successful in such a city as New York unless he had the aid of experts. Those he did not employ. He had not the funds to pay private detectives, and to the city police he would not apply. He told himself that it would be painful to Clare, that she would probably return in a short time, and would feel humiliated if she heard that the police had been seeking her. But Frank Arnold, had he listened to his conscience, would have been aware that his motives were not wholly or chiefly of that unselfish character. It was for himself that he was caring, and his imagination was busy with the scandal which would gather about his name if the actual facts were disclosed. He shrank, as weak men do shrink, from the questions he would have to answer and the censure he might have to meet if his wife's flight were discovered. He waited anxiously and uneasily for Clare's return as the best and most probable solution of the difficulty.

The hours of the first day of her absence were very dreary ones to the lonely man. He had a few patients to visit, but he delayed making the calls, hoping that Clare would arrive before he set out. Her temper, he believed, would have subsided before morning; but she did not come. His professional visits paid, he returned to his face. Greville noticed the look and interpreted it correctly. He was pleased, for his mission was that of a peacemaker, and he inferred that the look betokened a frame of mind amenable to peaceful influences.

"You are alone, Arnold," he said; "come out, like a sensible fellow, and breathe the fresh air. You look seedy; if you were not a doctor I should advise you to get some one to give you a tonic. Come, Doctor, write yourself the prescription in proper gibberish: 'Take of fresh air quantum suff,' and then go and do it."

"No," said Arnold; "my wife is out, and I must wait for her. When she returns I think I will lie down. That is my best remedy for such a headache as I have to-night."

Both men stood just within the room; Arnold, with a lack of hospitality unusual with him, neglecting to invite his visitor to be seated. He evidently did not desire his company that evening, and Greville would at another time have been quick to take the hint. To-night, however, he had come hoping that Frank would confide in him, and then, by a little judicious tact, be led to express such a strong desire for his wife's return as, when conveyed to Clare, she would accept. Greville had the wholesome dread of interfering in a quarrel between husband and wife, but if mediation would bring these two together he would gladly be made useful in that way. "I'll invite myself to do you the honor of staying and smoking a cigar with you pending Mrs. Arnold's arrival," he said at length.

"Don't think me inhospitable," said Frank. "I could not bear smoke to-night, and I am expecting Mrs. Arnold every minute. I am suffering intensely, and must be quiet."

"He is a silly fellow," was Greville's comment as, after expressing the sympathy politely demanded, he strode away from the physician's door. "Well, I cannot force my good offices on him. If he had told me honestly about his trouble I might have helped him, but if I introduced the subject I should be powerless for any good. Volunteered advice never helped a man yet. I must wait for another opportunity.

quiet rooms expecting that his wife would be awaiting him, but there was no sign of her. By turns he was irritated and alarmed. At one moment he fretted at the thought that Clare was adding, by her absurd conduct, to the burden of his anxieties, which were already heavy. It was cruel, he said, that she should misbehave after the trouble that the marriage had brought upon him. The least she could have done was to cheer and comfort him under his disappointment. Had Clare appeared at such moments he would have met her with reproaches. At other times he thought of her with dread. What if she had committed suicide! The thought appalled him, and he involuntarily shivered and dreaded to look in his newspaper, lest he should see that her body had been found in the river.

A ring at the bell, as the evening was closing in, brought him to his feet with a start. Clare was so fully in his thoughts that he opened the door in the full expectation of seeing her. But it was only Greville, and Frank met him with disappointment plainly written on his

In the mean time something must be done to save the lady from annoyance."

Bending his steps in the direction of Broadway he entered a store in which some water-color drawings were exposed for sale.

"Ah! Monsieur d'Angleterre," said the proprietor, with a polite obeisance. "Good-morning, good-morning. I am charmed to receive you. Come see these beautiful drawings. No one has had the privilege yet. You will buy the best. Have your choice."

"No, no, to-day, M. Bonhomme. I am on other business; but you will not lose. I wish you to oblige me by doing a little commission with delicacy; you understand? A little confidential negotiation. I should like you to go to this address," handing him a card, "and see the lady and tell her that you will buy water-color sketches from her. Tell her that your English customer mentioned her. Ask her to oblige you by having a pair ready in two days, and pay her twenty dollars in advance for them. She will need materials, and those you can send to her when she asks you, but you must not charge her for them. She is a very unsophisticated lady who thinks she can earn a living by her pictures. We know better than that, do we not, Bonhomme? But I know her family, and I want to spare her the humiliation of going around to try to obtain employment. It is a little family difficulty that will soon be arranged, and it is best to trust a discreet gentleman like you than to let things be talked of."

The Frenchman's small eyes twinkled under the judicious compliment, and he pointed off the rich Englishman's instructions with nods and gestures intended to express perfect comprehension.

"Yes, certainly," he was honored by the confidence of Monsieur, and would not fail to be silent on the delicate business. He would wait on Madame to-morrow morning. Some bills passed from Greville's pocket to the picture-dealer, and the arrangement was complete.

"It is better so," Greville muttered, as he left the Frenchman's store. "She will go home in a few days, and all this will be forgotten. It would have been horrible to think of a lady going the round of the dealers on so childish an errand. There will be no need for me to see her again until I can carry her some message of good-will from her husband." The big, good-tempered Englishman chuckled over his clever stratagem, by which he was to play providence to this estranged couple, and bring them together again in peace. The little difficulty would do neither of them any harm, he thought, "and as for that fellow," with a nod in Frank's direction, "it will do him good to be alone and anxious. He will appreciate his wife better afterward."

Nothing could have given clearer evidence of Clare's childlike nature than this idea that the little amateur skill in drawing which she possessed could be made available for a livelihood. But on that night when Mr. Greville found her sitting on that stoop weeping, she spoke of it with confidence that amused him, with his knowledge of the world's ways. He knew but little of the hardships of those who try to earn a living, having had no occasion to earn a cent in his life; but he knew enough from his observation of other people's ways to be assured that Clare's idea was chimerical. So he refrained from disheartening her, and promised her that he would use his influence to secure her employment. That was after he failed to induce her to return home, which naturally he endeavored to do first of all. Clare put her hand timidly on his proffered arm, but quickly withdrew it when he turned in the direction of her husband's domicile.

"No," she said, "it is useless to urge me, Mr. Greville. I cannot return. Dr. Arnold has spoken words that I cannot forget or forgive. If I could I should not respect myself. I must support myself for the future."

"But, my dear Mrs. Arnold, you cannot do that, I assure you. It is a difficult matter. You have no marketable talents, unless you become a school-teacher, and even that profession needs influence to make it productive."

Then Clare told him timidly that her drawing-master at the boarding-school where she had been educated had assured her that her sketches were saleable, and showed artistic skill of a high order.

It was useless to argue with her in her present agitation, and a party of tipsy revellers strolling up Fifth Avenue, singing as they pursued their belated way, reminded Greville that to be out so late alone with his friend's wife was in itself a compromising matter for her. As the shortest, and therefore the best way out of the difficulty, he took her to a respectable hotel where he was known, and installed her there for the present. He then walked rapidly to his own bachelor home, a few blocks distant, to consider the problem thus thrust before him, and to solve it if possible. Greville had a strong faith in the old-fashioned notion of "sleeping on" a difficult question, and accordingly, having considered it in all its points without seeing a solution, he fell asleep, to take it up in the morning. His visit to Frank and his arrangement with the picture dealer were the result of his morning cogitations.

It is a curious result of temporary expedients adopted to postpone the solution of a difficulty, that they seem invariably to add fresh complications which render the original problem doubly difficult. This fact Mr. Greville discovered in a few days. His solicitude about Clare's reputation precluded him from calling upon her. He sent her his card with an intimation that he should hold himself at her disposal if she needed help in any way, and received in reply a note informing him that, happily, she had arranged with the picture-dealer he had kindly sent to her, and had hopes of meeting her wants quite easily. She added that she had seen no reason to change her resolution to support herself. Greville made several attempts to meet Frank Arnold, but had not found him at home. He reflected that every day rendered an explanation with that gentleman increasingly embarrassing as he would have to account for his protracted silence on a subject on which Arnold would naturally be anxious. Altogether, Mr. Greville did not think so exultingly of his smart scheme as he did on the day of its inception.

It became necessary to see the French picture-dealer again. However careful of her funds Clare might be, the twenty dollars she had received would soon be exhausted at the hotel to which Mr. Greville had introduced her. He therefore called and secured the two pictures Clare had already produced, and instructed the man to negotiate for a second pair. But it was with no sense of exultation that he quitted the store on this occasion. He chafed under the consciousness that he was in a false position, from which it would be difficult to extricate himself. He resolved that he would see Dr. Arnold without delay, though he might wait for hours for the opportunity. It was now two weeks since Clare's flight, and if anything could be done to bring about a reconciliation, it must be done immediately. Accordingly that night he was again at Dr. Arnold's office. On former evenings since his last visit he found it closed, and there was no response to his ringing of the bell. But Frank would certainly return at some time, and Greville was determined to see him before he slept. With dogged resolution he paced the blocks on each side of the office for two hours, "till no light shone from the window at which he looked eagerly at every turn in his sentinel-like walk. He was just about to turn once more when he came face to face with the man he sought."

"Why, Arnold, where have you been all this time? I have been to see you often, and have departed sorrowing."

"I have been spending my evenings at the club lately. But I was thinking of looking you up. I want to speak to you. Could you spare time to come in now?"

"Certainly. I am a night-bird. I do not mind being out late as I have no wife to give me a certain lecture when I return."

"Neither have I now," said Frank, as he opened the door and admitted his guest. "That is why I wanted to see you." He lighted the gas as he spoke, and then Greville saw with surprise a marked change in his appearance. He had clearly been drinking, and, though perfectly sober, there was a lurid light in his eyes that told with what oil he was trimming his lamp.

"Explain the mysterious announcement, Sir Oracle," he said; "I am all attention."

Frank related the circumstances of Clare's disappearance and his efforts to find her. He admitted the fact of their "little tiff," and added, "I should have told you when you came the other evening, but I fancied that the last time we spoke of Mrs. Arnold you were disposed to lecture me on my manner toward her, as if you thought she was not appreciated at her proper value. I was not in the mood to hear a lecture then. Nor am I now, for that matter." Again Greville noted the angry light in Frank's eyes as he raised them from the carpet on which he kept them fixed during his recital.

"You will hear no lecture from me, my dear fellow. I hope Mrs. Arnold will return to you, and all will be well. It is only a little angry resentment, I suppose, that will pass away, and when she comes back you will give her a loving welcome."

"That will depend on whether she satisfactorily explains her absence. It is not a light matter for a man to condone."

"I think you need not doubt Mrs. Arnold's being able to explain her absence honorably. She has always seemed to me an extremely pure-minded lady."

"I wanted to inform you of the circumstances," said Frank, haughtily, "as you are almost the only gentleman who has visited us in the character of a friend, but I do not need to be informed of my wife's merits by a third party. I have decided to remain here another week, and then, if the mystery is not cleared up, I shall return to England. It is due to you to tell you of my intention, as you were kind enough to assist me with money. I will let you have my address in England before I leave, if I should go, and will remit you from there." Frank rose as he said this with some assumption of dignity, and Greville took the hint and silently departed.

Making all necessary allowances for Arnold's condition, there was yet enough in the interview to cause Greville uneasiness. It was imperative that Mrs. Arnold should be made acquainted with her husband's intention, and the necessity of a speedy return to him. Yet Greville shrank from urging it, fearing that her reception would be by no means a cordial one. Yet it must be done, and the next day he wrote and dispatched a letter to her couched in language as earnest and emphatic as he could use.

Three days passed, and having received no reply Greville began to hope that his advice had been taken. On the fourth day, however, he was astonished, on returning home from his customary walk, to find Mrs. Arnold awaiting him. It was easy to see that she was utterly unconscious that she was committing any indiscretion in visiting him, and the sad, innocent, child-like eyes which looked with perfect frankness into his, silenced the words that rose to his lips.

"I received your letter, Mr. Greville," Clare said, "and I thank you so much for your good will. I have tried several times to write you, but I could not make it clear to you in a letter that I appreciated your advice, while I must act contrary to it. Do let me tell you the reason of my leaving home."

Greville placed a luxurious arm-chair for her, and stood leaning against the mantel to listen.

"You were so kind to me on that sad night when I left my husband," Clare said, "and were so sympathetic that—"

There was a slight noise in the hall, the heavy tapestry portiere was lifted, and Frank Arnold walked into the room. He uttered a few words of apology when he saw a lady there, and was retreating, when, in a mirror before him, he saw reflected the face of his wife.

HEZEKIAH'S PRAYER ANSWERED.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 29, 11. Kings 20: 1-17. Golden Text, James 5: 14-16. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Hezekiah's Accumulated Troubles—Assailed by Enemies—Sick unto Death—His Self-Righteous Prayer—Heard Nevertheless—Healing Promised—The Word before the Remedy—Remedies as a Test of Faith—A Sign Asked for—The Uses of Adversity—The Trial of Prosperity—Arrival of Foreign Ministers—An Opportunity Missed—The Punishment Decreed—A Mitigation.

KING HEZEKIAH was no exception to the general rule that God's children are a tried people. "In those days," we are told, "Hezekiah was sick unto death." What days are we reading of? Those very days in which Sennacherib, king of Assyria, had surrounded Jerusalem with his armies, and his general, Rabshakeh, had reproached and blasphemed the Lord God of Israel. Jerusalem seemed within an inch of her ruin; but Hezekiah and Isaiah united together in the prayer of faith: "For this cause Hezekiah the king, and the prophet Isaiah the son of Amoz prayed and cried to heaven. And the Lord sent an angel, which cut off all the mighty men of valor, and the leaders and captains in the camp of the king of Assyria. So he returned with shame of face to his own land" (II Chron. 32: 20, 21). It was in those days, probably previous to this time of deliverance, that Hezekiah was sick unto death. It is an old proverb that troubles never come alone; and surely the king was oppressed to the utmost when he saw his country ruined, his capital besieged, and his own body fast fading away by sickness, almost unto death.

There is little doubt that he was suffering from a malignant carbuncle. His prayer (Isa. 38) expresses great physical suffering, which enhanced the oppression which came upon him from all sides. And there is no doubt that his soul also was brought into great bondage, for he cried, "I am oppressed; undertake for me." To add to his trouble, Isaiah the prophet the son of Amoz came to him and said, "Thus saith the Lord, Set thine house in order; for thou shalt die, and not live." To die under such circumstances, when the enemy without was blaspheming his God and turning Him into contempt; that he who believed in the Lord as his Healer should die under the power of sickness; that he who had served the Lord so faithfully should succumb just at this moment, was almost more than he could bear. He could almost have said, with the psalmist, "All Thy waves and Thy billows are gone over me." Hezekiah turned his face to the wall, and prayed unto the Lord, saying, "Remember now, O Lord, I beseech Thee, how I have walked before Thee in truth and with a perfect heart, and have done that which is good in Thy sight." This would be a strange prayer under the Gospel; and if this had been all we might well have wondered that he was heard. But Hezekiah did not rest here. He speaks of going softly all his years in the bitterness of his soul; he speaks of God casting all his sins behind his back. That self-righteous prayer must have been quickly corrected by the grace of God. "It came to pass, afore Isaiah was gone out into the middle part of the city, that the word of the Lord came to him, saying, Turn again, and say to Hezekiah the prince of My people, Thus saith the Lord, the God of David thy father, I have heard thy prayer, I have seen thy tears: behold,

I WILL HEAL THEE:

on the third day thou shalt go up into the house of the Lord; and I will add unto thy days fifteen years; and I will deliver thee and this city out of the hand of the king of Assyria; and I will defend this city for mine own sake, and for my servant David's sake" (Rev. Ver.)—not for the sake of Hezekiah's truth or perfect heart. Here was the Lord's distinct declaration of healing, which came in answer to his prayer, and came by a message from the Lord through His prophet. "He sent His word, and healed them" (Ps. 107: 20). It was subsequently to this that Isaiah said, "Take a cake of figs. And they took and laid it on the boil, and he recovered."

The word of the Lord came first. The remedy, which in this case the Lord prescribed, came afterward. But Hezekiah trusted so little in this remedy, that even after it had been applied he said, "What shall be the sign that the Lord will heal me, and that I shall go up into the house of the Lord the third day?" There is no doubt that in the old dispensation the Lord's healing came almost always directly from His hand, without the intervention of any kind of means. It is perfectly true that when the sinful Israelites were bitten by the serpents, and when Moses was directed to make a serpent of brass, they were told to look to the serpent of brass and live; and yet we never find in times succeeding that, when any one was bitten by a serpent, the same thing was repeated, as if that were a specific for the bite of a serpent. It was simply a test of their faith. If it had been a specific, then Paul, when the viper fastened on his hand in the island of Melita, would have wanted a serpent of brass to be made, in order that his hand might be healed. Again, in the case of the man born blind, when he was sent to the Pool of Siloam to wash, his eyes covered with clay which Jesus had made. The clay was by no means a specific for birth-blindness, but simply a test of the man's faith. Just so, when we are directed to call for the elders of the Church, and that they shall anoint with oil in the name of the Lord; the application of oil is not remedial, but is only a test of our faith.

Hezekiah trusted so little in the remedy that he said, "What shall be the sign that the Lord will heal me, and that I shall go up into the house of the Lord the third day?" And Isaiah said, This sign shalt thou have of the Lord, that the Lord will do the thing that He hath spoken: shall the shadow go forward ten degrees, or go back ten degrees? And Hezekiah answered, It is a light thing for the shadow to go down ten degrees; nay, but let the shadow return backward ten degrees. And Isaiah the prophet cried unto the Lord; and He brought the shadow ten degrees backward, by which it had gone down in the dial of Ahaz. The very necessity which Hezekiah felt for a sign showed a want of faith in the Lord's promise. "I will heal thee," and an equal want of faith in the remedy which had been applied. And perhaps we see here one reason why the Lord permitted trial to come so crushingly upon him just at this time. Hezekiah had been so faithful, so prosperous, and so respected up to this time that the Lord would not suffer him to be puffed up, and he allowed even the good king's faith to fail, that he might see there was no good thing in him, but that he must rely upon the Lord his God for everything; and perhaps in those words, "I am oppressed; undertake for me" (Isa. 38: 14), there was a deeper cry of need than is at first apparent. Probably spirit, soul, and body were crying out to God under the oppression; and surely spirit, soul, and body reaped the glorious benefit of the new life which God Himself poured in. When Hezekiah sang his song of praise, he said,

"The living, the living, he shall praise Thee, as I do this day: the father to the children shall make known Thy truth. The Lord was ready to save me: therefore we will sing my songs to the stringed instruments all the days of our life in the house of the Lord."

After having tried him in this way of extreme suffering, the Lord tried him again by prosperity. "At that time Berodach-baladan, the son of Baladan, king of Babylon, sent letters and a present unto Hezekiah: for he had heard that Hezekiah had been sick. And Hezekiah hearkened unto them, and shewed them all the house of his precious things; . . . there was nothing in his house, nor in all his dominion, that Hezekiah shewed them not."

NOTHING EXCEPT HIS GOD!

Nothing except the greatness and the power of the God of his salvation. But not one of these messengers from Babylon heard Hezekiah praise God. Although he had made profession in his song that he would sing songs to the stringed instruments all the days of his life, these messengers of Babylon heard only the praises of his temporal possessions. Hezekiah, who had begun his life as an evangelist-king, who had instituted the worship of God when the honor of God was fallen in the dust; Hezekiah, who had abolished idolatry, and who had gathered together nobles and priests and Levites, and had led the worship of God in the presence of all his people, was now the one to leave God out of his reckoning when he shewed the precious things of his possession to those heathen people. It was Hezekiah who so neglected the good of souls; it was Hezekiah who lost his opportunity. "But Hezekiah rendered not again according to the benefit done unto him; for his heart was lifted up: therefore there was wrath upon him, and upon Judah and Jerusalem" (II Chron. 32: 25).

Isaiah the prophet, God's special witness in Hezekiah's days, came, and said unto him, "What said these men? and from whence came they unto thee? And Hezekiah said, They are come from a far country, even from Babylon. And he said, What have they seen in thine house? And Hezekiah answered, All the things that are in mine house have they seen: there is nothing among my treasures that I have not shewed them. What a poor account to send in to God! Here was the man of all others to whom God had confided the testimony of Him in that age of the world, and when he had the opportunity of showing the word of the living God and speaking of His answers to prayer, and telling these messengers of His faithfulness and His holiness and His truth, all he had to show them was gold and silver, furniture and garments, buildings and lands, but nothing that would last for eternity.

Wrath was upon him from before the Lord. And then Isaiah declared unto the king that all which was in his house, all which had been laid up in store, should be carried away to Babylon. Hezekiah received the rebuke, and "humbled himself for the pride of his heart, both he and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, so that the wrath of the Lord came not upon them in the days of Hezekiah" (II Chron. 32: 26).

These last words give us the clue to the whole of God's dealings with Hezekiah in this history. It was not ruthlessly that God allowed affliction to come, but Hezekiah must be made to know what was in his heart. "Thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldest keep His commandments or no" (Deut. 8: 2). The Lord must show us what is in our hearts, that we may learn to lose all confidence in ourselves and trust in Him alone. And although from this time Hezekiah would be a humbler man, and one who thought less of himself than ever before—a man far less remarkable than in his younger days, yet he was a man better fitted for the society of his God forever and forever.

MY MOTHER'S PRAYER.
"Her children rise up, and call her blessed." Prov. xxi. 26.

As I wandered 'round the homestead,
Many a dear familiar spot
Brought within my recollection
Scenes I'd seemingly forgot;
There, the orchard-meadow, yonder—
Here, the deep, old-fashioned well,
With its old moss-covered bucket,
Sent a thrill no tongue can tell.

Though the house was wild with strangers,
All remained the same within;
Just as when a child I rambled
Up and down, and out and in:
To the garret dark ascending—
Once a source of childish dread—
Peering through the attic cobwebs,
Lo! saw my trundle bed.

Quick I drew it from the rubbish,
Covered o'er with dust so long;
When, behold, I heard in fancy
Strains of one familiar song,
Often sang by my dear mother
To me in that trundle bed:
"Hush, my dear, be still and slumber!
Holy angels guard thy bed!"

While I listen to the music
Stealing on in gentle strain,
I am carried back to childhood—
I am now a child again.
'Tis the hour of my retiring,
At the dusky eventide;
Near my trundle bed I'm kneeling,
As of yore, by mother's side.

Hands are on my head so loving,
As they were in childhood's days;
I, with weary tones, am trying To repeat the words she says:
'Tis a prayer in language simple
As a mother's lip can frame,
'Father, Thine who art in heaven,
Hallow d, who art Thy name."

Prayer is over: to my pillow
With a "good-night" kiss, I creep,
Scarcely waking while I whisper,
Now I lay me down to sleep,
Thou my mother, o'er me bending,
Prays in earnest words, mild;
'Hear my prayer, O heavenly Father, Bless, oh bless my precious child!"

Yet I am but only dreaming;
Ne'er I'll be a child again;
Many years have passed dear mother
At the quiet graveside again;
But her blessed angel spirit
Dally hovers o'er my head,
Cying me from earth to heaven,
Even from my trundle bed.

THE LORD MAYOR OF LONDON.

THERE is no city in the world outside our own borders in which the American people take so much interest as the British metropolis. In spite of the antipathies of our grandfathers, in spite of the unpleasantness during the war of secession, in spite of all that the Irish element of our population has done to arouse hostility toward England, there is no nation in the world to which we feel so closely akin. The Atlantic cable, and the increased swiftness of ocean travel has developed this feeling perceptibly during the past seven years. Distinguished visitors from England, too, have come here uttering sentiments of good-will, have assisted us in our religious and philanthropic movements, and have shown their liberalism by studying our institutions, the superiority of which to their own they doubtless have recognized, if they have not always admitted. On the other hand, a hearty welcome has been accorded to Americans visiting England. Messrs. Moody and Sankey are as dear to English hearts as they are to those of their own countrymen, and the greatest in the land have sat as disciples at their feet. Mr. James Russell Lowell received as much honor of another kind. Wherever he went he was heartily welcomed, and his retirement called forth expressions of regret from press and platform. It is therefore natural that we should take a deep interest in the affairs of London; and the portrait of its new chief magistrate and his two colleagues, which appear on the first page will be welcome to our readers.

THE EX-MAYOR,

who retired from office on November 9th, was a man whom the new official will find it difficult to surpass in public esteem. Lord Mayor Fowler was a distinguished example of the possibility of a Christian man becoming eminent in public life. He is a man of profound piety, and he was not afraid in his high position to let it be known that he held his religion dearer to him than worldly honors. He was always ready to assist any religious or philanthropic society by presiding at its meetings, and he went farther still, for, on September 27th, he preached in a large Congregational church in London a good Gospel sermon.

THE LORD MAYOR'S SERMON

was in aid of a fund for establishing a city mission, but it was not of that chiefly that he spoke. He realized that the great end of a sermon is to bring sinners to the cross, and it was to that mainly that he directed his effort. One who heard the sermon writes: "The Lord Mayor almost literally filled the pulpit, for he is a gentleman of the traditional aldermanic presence. He took his text from Micah 6:8: 'He hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?' The chapter had been read earlier in the evening. The prophet, said the speaker, had alluded to Balaam, and he was an instance of a man who knew what was right, but did it not. Still, his evil deeds had been overruled for good. There were but two classes of people, the speaker maintained, in God's sight—those who believed in Him, who had accepted God's great salvation, and those who had not. To the first class he did not intend to speak that evening—that he should leave for ministers of the Gospel; probably there were many present who could speak better than he could on such subjects, and to such persons; but he did wish to offer the message of the Gospel to those who had not accepted the overtures of mercy.

"Some persons might urge they were good moral people. That was all very well; but it was not sufficient. If it were possible that they could live to the end of their lives without sinning again, still that would not atone for the sins that they had committed in the past. Every one had sinned and come short of the glory of God. Christ had atoned for sin. He had borne the punishment, and there was no other name given under heaven among men whereby men could be saved. Every one wished to be happy; every one wished to stand on the right hand of God at the last great day. Faith in Christ was the way to this.

After speaking in this strain for a short time, the Lord Mayor said, concerning the object of the collection there that evening, it was for a mission in that neighborhood. "The tendency of people to come out from the centre and reside in the suburbs was becoming very marked, and these people must be looked after. The poor must be reached and helped, and their souls must be saved. No doubt it was right to answer the calls of the heathen for the Gospel; but the wants of those at our own doors must not be neglected. The Lord Mayor then again made an earnest appeal to those who had not yet come to Christ."

The rule in the London municipality is rotation in office, and accordingly an election was held on September 29th, and on November 9th the new Lord Mayor, commenced his civic reign. Mr. Alderman Staples is the eldest son of the late Mr. John Staples, of Belmont, who was also a prosperous merchant in the city of London, but spent the latter years of his life in a rural retreat in Wiltshire. In 1842, Mr. Staples, in conjunction with his brother (Mr. T. H. Staples), entered upon business in London, in which they were united until 1864. Mr. Staples was then elected to the Court of Common Council as one of the representatives of the ward known as Aldersgate, and speedily achieved a civic reputation. On January 26th, 1877, he was unanimously chosen alderman. He served the office of sheriff in conjunction with the late Mr. Alderman Notgate, who was Lord Mayor last year, but who died early in his year of office. During his shrievalty he represented the corporation at the ceremony of laying the first stone of the deep sea harbor at Boulogne, by M. de Freycinet, the then Minister of Works. He accompanied the Governor and Deputy-Governor of the Irish Society, to Londonderry, to take part in the proceedings on New Year's Day, 1878, to celebrate the free opening of the bridge, a result produced by the assistance of the society, added to the voluntary contributions of the inhabitants. He has given a large part of his valuable time to the business of the city in various capacities, and has been for some years a member of several of the most important city committees. He has also found time for literary pursuits, is a Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries, and is the author of an interesting historical work entitled "Notes on the Church of St. Botolph, Aldersgate."

ALDERMAN STAPLES,

The new Lord Mayor seems to have a passion for work, for, besides his high office, he is one of the members for the city at the Metropolitan Board of Works, and at the General Assessment Sessions. He is a governor of the United Westminster Schools, an almoner of Christ's Hospital, and is also Chairman of the Visiting Justices for Holloway Prison.

It strikes an American citizen as remarkable that one of the first things a Lord Mayor of London does after his election, is to go in state to church with the aldermen, sheriffs, and city officers, to hear a special sermon. Doubtless this is only a form in many cases, but even as a form it has a healthy significance as a public acknowledgment on the part of the highest official of the city that the welfare of the city and the prosperity of his government is dependent on the will of the Most High. The sermon on the occasion of Lord Mayor Staples's election was preached by Dr. Forest, an eminent Episcopal clergyman, who chose as his text the words: "Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty" (II Cor. 3:17), and having spoken of liberty in relation to the individual and the Church, the doctor proceeded to speak of it in relation to national life, and said:

"The love of liberty, I need not tell you, is innate in man—part of his original birthright. It is not more natural for a bird to fly whither its wishes urge or its necessities require than it is for man to be free. Hence the treasures that have been spent for liberty, the struggles undergone for it, the blood that has been shed for it. True Christianity has ever proved itself the friend of freedom—where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty—and repudiation of that religion has more than once led a nation into bitter bondage, as was the case in France."

Having referred to the secularism of the day, the preacher went on to say: "Our presence here to-day is in itself a protest against the views to which I have adverted, for we are met to invoke the solemn sanction of religion in connection with the duty of electing a chief magistrate for the ensuing year. Of that high office, its various duties and weighty responsibilities, and of the history and traditions of the Corporation, some of the representatives of which I have the honor to address, of all that it has done and is doing in the cause of civil and religious freedom, in upholding our ancient throne, maintaining our noble Constitution, and in furtherance of the interests of charity and philanthropy; of this I need not remind you."

The next ceremony to be observed was the attendance of the Lord Mayor-elect at the bar of the House of Lords to receive the royal indorsement of his election. There, in the customary time-honored phrase, the Lord High Chancellor conveyed to him the assurance that her Majesty had been pleased to confirm the choice of the Livery. The civic party having been conducted to the Princes' Chamber, the recorder introduced the Lord Mayor-elect to the Queen's representative, remarking that probably none of his predecessors had entered upon the duties of the Mayoralty with a longer or more varied experience of municipal functions.

After pronouncing the Queen's approval, the Lord Chancellor remarked that Mr. Alderman Staples was the successor of a long line of distinguished men in the commercial world, and he was distinguished by a great variety of circumstances from those who had preceded him. A graceful compliment as to his antiquarian research was followed by the remark that he was conspicuously one of those who had sought to obtain in modern times the best use of the property and interests of the city companies in fostering and taking care of those technical arts by which the great city of London had been distinguished. Furthermore, he had been desirous of maintaining the principles of municipal government. The ceremony terminated by the quaint observance of the circulation of the loving cup.

THE INAUGURAL CEREMONY,

on November 9th, was somewhat of a disappointment to the show-loving Londoners. Former Lord Mayors have exercised their ingenuity in finding novelties to render the procession delightful to the crowds which collect to see the Lord Mayor go to receive the seals of office. It is the show-day of the year, and there is always an immense crowd to witness the spectacle. This year there were fewer novelties than usual. The Lord Mayor contented himself with the production of a number of wagons displaying old London workshops to illustrate former methods of working up gold and silver into service plate, watch-cases, etc., and other industries. These were the only novelties, in addition to the ordinary display of gorgeous liveries, men in armor, etc.

America came near having a melancholy interest in the show, in the loss of one of her heroes, who was for a moment in imminent danger of death. In the Strand is the American Exchange, the favorite resort of American visitors in London. It was, as usual, decorated for the occasion, and was filled with members of the American colony. A band on the balcony played American airs during the passage of the procession. Lieutenant Greely, of the United States Army, was among the throng, and sat on the edge of the balcony. At one time, as he was leaning over to watch a row in the street between some costers and the police, he lost his balance, and would have fallen headlong to the pavement but for another American, appropri-tely named Clench, who grabbed the trousers of the Arctic hero and pulled him up to a place of safety. It would have been a grotesque, as well as a sad thing, if the brave lieutenant had escaped the horrors of Cape Sabine to perish in London pagant.

The day was closed with the usual banquet, at which the Lord Mayor entertained the Cabinet Ministers and a distinguished circle of guests.

THE LONDON SHERIFFS.

MR. THOMAS CLARKE (whose portrait is given on our front page) was born at Holbeach, Lincolnshire, in 1843, and belongs to a family long settled in that neighborhood. He was educated locally at Holbeach Grammar School under Mr. Charles Webb. He is an architect and surveyor. His father, who was also in that profession, gave considerable care to his education. His method of training was severe but wholesome, as he made him begin at the bottom, and keep the same hours for labor and meals as an ordinary workman. He thus acquired a thorough knowledge of the method of constructing buildings, of the prices of materials, and of the methods adopted in renovating, building, and improving properties of all kinds. He put this knowledge to practical use when he entered upon his profession in London at the age of twenty-one. He at first devoted attention to suburban property, but the chief source of his prosperity was in the sagacity he displayed in buying and remodelling ancient and dilapidated buildings in the heart of the city. Several old thoroughfares rendered familiar by name to Americans in the pages of Dickens are among these; notably Chancery Lane, the abode of Mr. Snagsby, and Lincoln's Inn fields, where Mr. Tulkinghorn lived.

Mr. David Evans (whose portrait also appears on our front page) was born at Llantrissant, Glamorganshire, in 1849, and resided for some years at that place; but he has since lived upon an estate near London, which he purchased from Sir John Reid, Bart. He is a member of a prosperous firm of merchants in the city of London.

THE LORD MAYOR'S EAST INDIAN VISITORS.

THE group of natives represented in the picture on the first page were recently seen at the official residence of the Lord Mayor, where they tended on the invitation of that functionary. They were taken to London to occupy a model village erected in the suburbs of London in connection with the Albert Palace, where they exhibited their arts and customs to the delight of visitors. The party numbered forty-five in all, and included snake-charmers, nautch girls, and crobats, musicians, spinners, weavers, dyers, dressmakers, printers, embroiderers, potters, brass-workers, jewellers, carvers, inlaid box makers, musical instrument makers, model figure makers, and cooks. No less than twenty-four distinct castes are represented. The ages of the party vary from fifty-two to nine, and there are among them two nautch girls, one aged sixteen, a native of Delhi; and the other, aged twenty, from the Carnatic.

The arrival of the natives, in their picturesque dresses and turbans, caused much commotion in the city, and a large crowd assembled outside the Mansion House to see them. The party having made their salaams to the Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress, who had invited a numerous company to see them, Sir Edward Lee, the manager of the Albert Palace, made a brief statement as to the objects of the authorities of that institution in bringing the native Indians to this country, and the Lord Mayor replied, observing that anything which tended to increase the interest which English people ought to feel in their fellow-subjects in India, and cement the bonds between them, could not fail to be of importance and value. The snake-charmers with their weird music then went through an interesting performance with several cobras, and some wonderful conjuring feats followed, the proceedings concluding with the singing of the nautch girls. At its close the natives partook of fruit and sweetmeats.

PRISON GATE WORKERS.

To Christian men who have time on their hands, and especially to such as have also money to spare, the following narrative is commended as an example of one of the ways in which they may render valuable service to the Master:

As the man who has done wrong steps forth from the portal of the gloomy building in which he has served out the punishment imposed on him as the penalty of his crime, he finds awaiting him old and hardened companions in sin. They know too well his day of discharge, and they are there to see that he does not escape them. Left to these, left to himself, the poor fellow has no resource but to follow the old pursuits. Here and there one, with bitter repenting, may endeavor to break the chain; he soon finds no one will employ a convicted thief, while all the time tempters are at his side whispering how easy it is "to prig." In such case, isolated and unhelped, he is indeed lost.

Some English Christians, considering these things, have arranged to make an effort at this propitious moment for the rescue of such men, and haunt the gates of the London prisons to catch them. As the liberated prisoner steps forth he meets friends—close by the gate an earnest company—the prison gate workers. Inside the gate one of their number is engaged passing down the line, as the men about to be liberated stand mute in Indian file, giving to each an invitation to breakfast and a few words of warning and comfort. Then as the men pass slowly out, the workers outside urge them to come to the Mission Room, and thus escape temptation. To a new-comer, an inexperienced worker, it is a painful and saddening sight as one after another the men and boys pass out to freedom.

"All out!" is at length announced; and crossing the street we find in the Mission Room some twenty or thirty assembled. Breakfast is served, and enjoyed heartily, by men long inured to hard prison fare. After breakfast the Secretary of the St. Giles's Christian Mission, or some of his helpers, address the men in plain, direct, straightforward words of Gospel entreaty. Temperance is insisted upon—for drink is the great snare of such, and the folly and stupidity, in the long run, of wrong-doing are forcibly pointed out, and the Gospel of God's grace lovingly proclaimed to them. There the unhappy men listen to plain words that nowhere else and in no other circumstances would they bear.

But this is only preliminary. A day's work among lost men means much more. Many of these accept cards for the Home in Brooke Street, many of them plead for "a show." Well, let us go down to the Brooke Street rendezvous and see what is doing. Entering the new Home, passing through the waiting-room (crowded with applicants hoping against hope), the class-room and hall, we reach, on the second floor, the audience-chamber. Here Mr. Wheatley interviews the men. His first endeavors are to make sure the applicant is really desirous of well-doing; for, unless it be so, it is useless to waste time and money, when so many others are pressing forward. Long experience and considerable natural shrewdness have made him very expert in getting at the true state of the case. When, however, sincere repentance is manifested, sharpness vanishes, and he is tender and loving in seeking to lead the men to the one and only way of escape, in Christ.

Meanwhile the convicts have arrived; for day by day a number of "long-term men," those who have committed some crime of sufficient gravity to demand penal servitude, are discharged in the Home. These men are committed to the care of the mission, their allowance is paid over to the mission, by it to be disbursed on their behalf.

Here we have the "regular" burglar, one who has been five times in prison, has spent the most of his life within the prison walls, and appears to have come to the conclusion that "the way of transgressors is hard." "Give me a chance, sir; I've never had one; I was trained for a thief. Try me. God help me, I mean to drop it." He is pointed clearly and directly to the only source of strength, and advised to unite himself with the praying company (of reformed men) who meet in the Home to wait on God.

So on through a long list—even in the course of this one morning what sad revelations of the folly and bitterness of sin! Blasted lives, homes broken up, wives broken-hearted, children starving, fair fame and name gone through yielding to temptation. Criminals all of them. But are they to remain so? A helping hand, a loving word, a little real practical aid, just at the right moment, and these men, as many before have done, become steady, honest, God-fearing, godly men. Round the mission are gathered many such even now in good positions in London, and letters have been received from others in distant lands, who are seeking to serve and honor God, and, moreover, are doing all they can to save those fallen as they once were. They know, as do few others, the peculiar difficulties besetting a man who has been convicted of crime.

The results of this one day's work among lost men are registered in heaven, for souls have been born again, lost ones have been found, runaway husbands restored, wandering boys brought back, and the ranks of crime distinctly thinned by the operations of the day.

If all this work costs money—and money it does cost—who shall say it is not money spent to the best and most remunerative purposes? A Christian gentleman, of considerable experience in police and prison matters, remarked the other day, "I don't know any way in which a hundred pounds a day could be more profitably spent than in such rescue work. The work is an untold benefit to the nation as well as to the men themselves."

The Radical Programme in England has struck terror into the landholding class. It was formulated last week in Mr. Chamberlain's bold announcement at Hull of a platform calling for the abolition of primogeniture, for graded taxation, for free education, for a restitution to communities of common land filched in past times by nobles, and for almost socialistic land reforms. In other speeches he is to deal with other questions, but what he has already said appalls even the average Liberal. The opinion grows that the Whigs must sharply and publicly dissent, and the fears of a violent disruption of the party increase.

The Evangelical Alliance have Issued their usual invitation for the annual week of united and universal prayer, at the commencement of the year, January 3d-10th. In their circular the Committee say: "Never was a time, perhaps, when God's people had more need, with prayer and supplication and thanksgiving, to spread forth their hands toward heaven. We live in wonderful days. Men go to and fro, and knowledge increases everywhere. It is to be said that while the lightning encompasses the earth with its belt of fire, and while men have frequent and almost instantaneous communications with each other in far-off regions of the globe, Christians make but feeble use of that more wonderful power of prayer, by which they communicate with heaven? Hitherto the Divine blessing has rested remarkably upon the universal Week of Prayer. God in His mercy grant that our fervent and united prayers may, in the chain of His marvellous providence, prepare the way for the conversion of the nations, for the more speedy manifestation of the kingdom of His dear Son, and for the creation of all things anew in Christ." Sermons will be preached on January 3d and 10th, while the respective topics of prayer and exhortation for the intervening days will be Praise and Thanksgiving, Humiliation and Confession, the Church and the Family, Home and Foreign Missions, Nations and Governments, the Christian Life.

HISSED OFF THE STAGE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, November 22, 1885.

Men shall clap their hands at him, and shall hiss him out of his place."—JOB. 27: 23.

A Dramatic Allusion—The World's Stage—Every Man has a Part—Often Badly Prepared—Time Wasted in Criticising—Many Failures—Dissipation a Common Cause—The Pins in a Drinking Cup—Dr. Sax's Discovery—Where the Snakes Come from—The Drunken Butler in the Tempest—The Failure of the Indolent—A King Burned to Death by his Physician—The Failure of the Selfish—The Millionaire's Death and Burial—The Clapping and Hissing—A Consecrated Home—The Exit—A World's Applause.

This allusion seems to be dramatic. The Bible more than once makes such allusion. Paul says: "We are made a theatre (or spectacle) to angels and to men." The theatre is so old that no one can fix the date of its birth. Archilochus, Simonides, and Solon, who wrote for it dithyrambs, lived about six or seven hundred years before Christ. It is evident from the text that some of the habits of were known in Job's time, because in the text he describes an actor hissed off the stage. The impersonator comes on the boards, and either through lack of study of the part he is to take or inaptness, or other incapacity, the spectators are offended, and express their disapprobation and disgust first by over-applause, attempting by great clapping of hands to drown out what he says, and that failing, to stop the performer they put their tongue against their teeth, and make terrific sibilation until he disappears behind the curtain. "Men shall clap their hands at him, and shall hiss him out of his place."

EVERY MAN HAS A PART.

My text suggests that each one of us is put on the stage of this world to take some part. McCullough, the actor recently buried, was no more certainly appointed on any occasion to appear as Spartacus, or Edwin Forrest as King Lear, or Charlotte Cushman as Meg Merrilies, or John Kemble as Macbeth, or Cooke as Richard III., or Kean as Othello, than you and I are expected to take some especial and particular part in the great drama of human and immortal life. Through what hardship and suffering and discipline these artists went year after year that they might be perfected in their parts, you have often read. But we, put on the stage of this life to represent charity and faith and humility and helpfulness—what little preparation we have made, although we have three galleries of spectators—earth and heaven and hell! Have we not been more attentive to the part taken by others than to the part taken by ourselves, and while we needed to be looking at home and concentrating on our own duty, we have been criticising the other performers, and saying, "That was too high," or "too low," or "too feeble," or "too extravagant," or "too tame," or "too demonstrative," while we were making ourselves a dead failure and preparing to be ignominiously hissed off the stage?

Each one is assigned a place, no supernumeraries hanging around the drama of life to take this or that or the other part, as he may be called upon. No one can take our place. We can take no other place. Aye, it is not the impersonation of another; we ourselves are the real Merchant of Venice or the real Shylock; the real filial Cordelia or the real cruel Regan; the real Portia or the real Lady Macbeth. The tragedian of the playhouse, at the close of the third scene of the fifth act, takes off the attire of Gonzalo or Edward Mortimer or Henry V., and resigns the character in which for three hours he appeared. But we never put off our character, and no change of apparel can make us any one else than that which we eternally are.

MANY FAILURES.

Many make a failure of their part in the drama of life through dissipation. They have enough intellectual equipment and good address and geniality unbounded. But they have a wine-closet that contains all the forces for their social and business and moral overthrow. So far back as 959 King Edgar of England made a law that the drink-cup should have pins fastened at a certain point in the side, so that the indulger might be reminded to stop before he got to the bottom. But there are no pins projecting from the sides of the modern wine-cup or beer-mug, and the first point at which millions stop is at the gravelly bottom of their own grave.

AN IMPORTANT DISCOVERY.

Dr. Sax, of France, has recently discovered something which all drinkers ought to know. He has found out that alcohol in every shape, whether of wine or brandy or beer, contains parasitic life called bacillus putomanie. By a powerful microscope these living things are discovered, and when you take strong drink you take them into the stomach, and then into your blood, and getting into the crimson canals of life they go into every tissue of your body, and your entire organism is taken possession of by these noxious infinitesimals. When in delirium tremens a man sees every form of reptilian life, it is only these parasites of the brain in exaggerated size. It is not a hallucination that the victim is suffering from. He only sees in the room what is actually crawling and rioting in his own brain. Every time you take strong drink you swallow these maggots, and every time the imbibor of alcohol in any shape feels vertigo or rheumatism or nausea, it is only the jubilee of these maggots. Efforts are being made for the discovery of some germicide that can kill the parasites of alcoholism, but the only thing that will ever extirpate them is abstinence from alcohol and teetotal abstinence, to which I would before God swear all these young men and old.

A DREADFUL CROP.

America is a fruitful country, and we raise large crops of wheat and corn and oats, but the largest crop we raise in this country is the crop of drunkards. With sickle made out of the sharp edges of the broken glass of bottle and demijohn they are cut down, and there are whole swathes of them, whole winnows of them, and it takes all the hospitals and penitentiaries and grave-yards and cemeteries to hold this harvest of hell. Some of you are going down under this evil, and the never-dying worm of alcoholism has wound around you one of its coils, and by next New Year's Day it will have another coil around you, and it will after a while put a coil around your tongue and a coil around your brain and a coil around your lung and a coil around your foot and a coil around your heart; and some day this never-dying worm will with one spring tighten all the coils at once, and in the last twist of that awful convulsion you will cry out, "Oh, my God!" and be gone.

The greatest of dramatists, in the tragedy of the Tempest, sends staggering across the stage Stephano, the drunken butler; but across the stage of human life strong drink sends kingly and queenly and princely natures staggering forward against the footlights of conspicuity, and then staggering back into failure, till the world is impatient for their disappearance, and human and diabolic voices join in hissing them off the stage.

THE FAILURE OF THE INDOLENT.

Many also make a failure in the drama of life through indolence. They are always making calculation how little they can do for the compensation they get. There are more lazy ministers, lawyers, doctors, merchants, artists, and farmers than have ever been counted upon. Community is full of laggards and shirkers. I can tell it from the way they crawl along the street, from their tardiness in meeting engagements, from the lethargies that seem to hang the foot when they lift it, to the hand when they put it out, to the words when they speak.

Two young men in a store. In the morning the one goes to his post the last minute or one minute behind. The other is ten minutes before the time, and has his hat and coat hung up, and is at his post waiting for duty. The one is ever and anon in the afternoon looking at his watch to see if it is not most time to shut up. The other stays half an hour after he might go, and when asked why, says he wanted to look over some entries he had made, to be sure he was right, or to put up some goods that had been left out of place. The one is very punctilious about doing work not exactly belonging to him. The other is glad to help the other clerks in their work. The first will be a prolonged nothing, and he will be poorer at sixty than at twenty. The other will be a merchant prince.

THE AMBITIOUS.

Indolence is the cause of more failures in all occupations than you have ever suspected. People are too lazy to do what they can do, and want to undertake that which they cannot do. In the drama of life they don't want to be a common soldier carrying a halberd across the stage or a falconer or a mere attendant, and so lounge about the scenes till they shall be called to be a Macready or a Junius Brutus Booth. They say, "Give me the part of Timon of Athens rather than that of Flavius, his steward." "Let me be Cymbeline, the king, rather than Pisano, the servant." After a while they, by some accident of prosperity or circumstances, get in the place for which they have no qualification. And very soon, if the man be a merchant, he is going around asking his creditors to compromise for ten cents on the dollar. Or, if a clergyman, he is making tirades against the ingratitude of churches. Or, if an attorney, by unskillful management he loses a case in which widows and orphans are robbed of their portion. Or, if a physician, he by malpractice gives his patient rapid transit from this world to the next, as the clumsy surgeon of Charles II., King of Navarre, having sewed up the feeble limbs of the king in a sheet saturated with inflammable material, and having no knife to cut the thread, took a candle to burn off the thread, and the bandages took fire and consumed the king.

Our incompetent friend would have made a splendid horse doctor, but he wanted to be professor of anatomy in a university. He could have sold enough confectionery to have supported his family, but he wanted to have a sugar refinery like the Havemeyers. He could have mended shoes, but he wanted to mend the Constitution of the United States. Toward the end of life these people are out of patience, out of money, out of friends, out of everything. They go to the poorhouse or keep out of it by running in debt to all the grocery and dry-goods stores that will trust them. People begin to wonder when the curtain will drop on the scene. After a while, leaving nothing but their commitments to pay their doctor, undertaker, and Gabriel Grubb, the grave-digger, they disappear. Exeunt! Hissed off the stage!

THE FAILURE OF THE SELFISH.

Others fail in the drama of life through demonstrated selfishness. They make all the rivers empty into the sea, all the roads of emolument end at their door, and they gather all the plumes of honor for their brow. They help no one, encourage no one, rescue no one. "How big a pile of money can I get?" "How much of the world can I absorb?" are the chief questions. They feel about the common people as the Turks felt toward the Asapi or common soldiers, considering them of no use except to fill up the ditches with their dead bodies while the other troops walked over them to take the fort. After a while this prince of worldly success is sick. The only interest society has in his illness is the effect that his possible decease may have on the money markets. After a while he dies. Great newspaper capitals announce how he started with nothing and ended with everything. Although for sake of appearance some people put handkerchief to the eye, there is shed between Central Park and the Battery or between Brooklyn Heights and Brooklyn Hill. The heirs sit up all night while he lies in state, discussing what the old fellow has probably done with his money. It takes all the lively stables within two miles to furnish funeral equipage, and all the mourning stores are kept busy in selling weeds of grief. The stonemasons send in obsequies for a monument. The minister at the bequests reads of the Resurrection, which makes the hearers fear that if the unscrupulous inancier does come up in the general rising he will try to get a corner on tombstones and graveyard fences. All good men are glad that the moral nuisance has been removed. The Wall Street speculators are glad, because there is more room for themselves. The heirs are glad, because they get possession of the long-delayed inheritance. Dropping every feather of all his lumes, every certificate of all his stock, every bond of all his investments, every dollar of all his fortune, he departs, and all the rolling of Dead March in Saul, and all the pageantry of its interment, and all the exquisiteness of sarcophagus, and all the extravagance of epitaphology cannot hide the fact that my text has come gain to tremendous fulfilment: "Men shall lap their hands at him, and shall hiss him out of his place."

APPLAUSE FIRST.

You see the clapping comes before the hiss, the world cheers before it damns. So, it is said, the deadly asp tickles before it stings. Going up is he? Hurrah! Stand back and let his galloping horses dash by, a whirlwind of plated harness and tinkling headgear and rched neck. Drink deep of his Madeira and cognac. Boast of how well you know him. All rats off as he passes. Bask for days and years in the sunlight of his prosperity. Going down is he? Pretend to be nearsighted, so that you cannot see him as he walks past. When men ask you if you know him, halt and hesitate, as though you were trying to call up a dim memory, and say: "Well, y-e-e-s; yes, I believe I once did know him, but have not seen him for long while."

Cross a different ferry from the one where you used to meet him, lest he ask for financial help. When you started life he spoke a good word for you at the bank. Talk down his credit, now that his fortunes are collapsing. He put his name in two of your notes; tell him that you have changed your mind about such things, and that you never indorse. After a while his matters come to a dead halt, and an assignment or suspension or sheriff's sale takes place. You say, "He ought to have stopped sooner. Just as I expected. He made too big a splash in the world. Glad the balloon has burst." Ha! ha! Applause when he went up, sibilant derision when he came down. "Men shall clap their hands at him, and hiss him out of his place." So high up amid the crags the eagle flutters lust into the eyes of the roebuck, and then with eyes blinded it goes tumbling over the precipice, he great antlers crashing on the rocks.

Now, compare some of these goings out of life with the departure of men and women who in he drama of life took the part that God assigned them, and then went away honored of men, and applauded of the Lord Almighty.

A CONSECRATED HOME.

It is about fifty years ago that in a comparatively small apartment of the city a newly-married pair set up a home. The first guest that was invited in that residence was the Lord Jesus Christ, and the Bible given the bride on the day of her espousals was the guide of that household. Days of sunshine were followed by days of shadow. Did you ever know a home that for fifty years had no vicissitude?

Years passed on, and there were in that home ilarities, but they were good and healthful; and sorrows, but they were comforted. Marriages are bright as orange blossoms could make them, and burials in which all hearts were riven. They have a family lot in the cemetery, but all the place is illuminated with stories of resurrection and reunion. The children of the household that lived have grown up, and they are all Christians, the father and mother leading the way, and the children followed. What care the mother took of wardrobe and education and character, and manners! How hard she sometimes worked! When the head of the household was unfortunate in business she sewed until her fingers were numb and bleeding at the tips. And what close calculation of economies, and what ingenuity in refitting the garments of the elder children for the younger! And only God kept account of that mother's sideaches and headaches and heartaches and the tremulous prayers by the side of the sick child's cradle, and by the couch of this one fully grown. The neighbors often noticed how tired she looked, and old acquaintances hardly knew her in the street; but without complaint she waited and toiled and endured, and accomplished all these years.

AN EXIT.

The children are out in the world, an honor to themselves and their parents. After a while the mother's last sickness comes. Children and grandchildren, summoned from afar, come softly into the room one by one, for she is too weak to see more than one at a time. She runs her dying fingers lovingly through their hair, and tells them not to cry, and that she is going now, but they will all meet again in a little while, in a better world, and then kisses them good-by and "God bless and keep you, my dear child!" The day of the obsequies comes, and the officiating clergyman tells the story of wifely and motherly endurance, and many hearts on earth and in heaven echo the sentiment; and as she is carried off the stage of this mortal life there are cries of "Faithful unto death; she hath done what she could," while overpowering all the voices of earth and heaven is the plaudit of the God who watched her from first to last, saying: "Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things. Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

But what became of the father of that household? He started out as a young man in business and had small income, and having got a little ahead sickness in the family swept it all away. He went through all the business panics of forty years, met many losses, and suffered many betrayals, but kept right on trusting in God, whether business was good or poor, setting his children a good example, giving them the best of counsel; and never a prayer did he offer for all those years but they were mentioned in it. He is old now, and realizes it cannot be long before he must quit all these scenes; but he is going to leave his children an inheritance of prayer and Christian principles which all the defalcations of earth can never touch; and as the Church of God blesses him, and the poor ring his door-bell to see if he is any better, and his grave is surrounded by a multitude who went on foot and stood there before the procession of carriages came up, and some say there will be no one to take his place, and others say, "Who will pity me now?" and others remark, "He shall behold in everlasting remembrance." And as the drama of his life closes all the vociferations and bravos and encores that ever shook the amphitheatres and the Drury Lanes and the Covent Gardens and the Haymarkets and the Coliseums of earthly spectacle were tame and feeble compared with the long, loud thunders of approval that shall break from the cloud of witnesses in the piled-up gallery of the heavens. Choose ye between the life that shall close by being hissed off the stage and the life that shall close amid the acclamations supernal and archangelic.

SHAKESPEARE'S WILL.

Oh, men and women on the stage of life, many of you in the first act of the drama, and others in the second, and some of you in the third, and a few in the fourth, and here and there one in the fifth, but all of you between entrance and exit, I quote to you as the peroration of this sermon the most suggestive passage that Shakespeare ever wrote, although you never heard it recited. The author has often been claimed as infidel and atheistic, so the quotation shall be not only religiously helpful to ourselves, but grandly vindicatory of the great dramatist. I quote from his last will and testament: "In the name of God, Amen. I, William Shakespeare, of Stratford-upon-Avon, in the county of Warwick, gentleman, in perfect health and memory (God be praised!), do make this my last will and testament in manner and form following. First, I commend my soul into the hands of God, my Creator, hoping and assuredly believing through the only merits of Jesus Christ, my Saviour, to be made partaker of life everlasting." Then follow the bequests and the signature: "By me, William Shakespeare." "Witnesses to the publishing hereof, F. Collins, Jesse Shaw, John Robinson, Hamnet Sadler, Robert Whatcott."

MILITARY-HOSPITAL NURSES.

A SYCOPHANTIC writer in an English journal announces that Queen Victoria has "generously" conferred the decoration of the Royal Red Cross on eleven ladies who served in the hospitals during the recent campaign in Egypt. The statement in associating the word generosity with her Majesty's action must not be taken as implying that the Queen has changed the disposition of a lifetime. These decorations are paid for out of the national treasury, and as the ladies had fairly earned some public recognition of their services, there was no generosity exercised by any one in letting them have a reward specially provided for just such services as they had rendered.

The decorated ladies are depicted in the scene of their labors. The military hospitals during a war are frequently located in public buildings, but sometimes they are wooden structures, erected at convenient localities expressly for the purpose. When an army is in the field there is a hospital tent provided. During the Red Cross Conference, in August of last year, a model hospital tent like that in our illustration was exhibited.

The ladies of the Red Cross Society who act as nurses are specially trained for their duties. Many of them belong to families of high social position, who prefer to give their lives to useful service rather than to spend them in idle frivolity. Their courage cannot be too highly commended. Many of our readers know by painful experience what are the hardships of a campaign, and can easily understand how much courage and devotion a lady must possess who voluntarily endures them. In Egypt they were exceptionally severe, owing to the climate and the horrors of travelling in the desert. There was besides in that campaign a serious element of danger. The blunders of General Wolseley and the vacillating policy of Mr. Gladstone made the campaign a series of disasters; and as surprises and wholesale slaughter were continually occurring, it was quite within the bounds of possibility that the ladies might fall into the hands of the ruthless Mahdi. All honor, then, to them for giving up home comforts and venturing their lives that they might alleviate the pain and comfort the sorrows of the brave soldiers of the army. They deserve that their names should live in history and should be remembered whenever the war is spoken of. We gladly do our share toward giving them the immortality of honor by publishing their names. They are: the Misses M. C. Jerrard, H. King, S. Ireland, J. M. C. Barker, S. F. Hart, M. C. F. K. Cole, R. M. Burleigh, L. Parsons, A. Hind, C. L. Byam, and R. Williams. As they live in a country where a bit of metal and a few inches of ribbon are considered a "generous" reward for services like theirs, we may hope that their motives for undergoing the hardships were Christian motives, and that they serve Him who promised that even a cup of cold water given in His name should not miss its reward.

GOD HEALED ME.

MISS LIZZIE FAY, of No. 480 North College Street, Nashville, Tenn., gives the following account of her healing:

"It was last March. Miss G—— seemed to come like an angel, and I seemed to get well from that minute. It was not a sudden cure, as with Bessie Rich. I grew better by degrees, though it seemed very fast after lying in bed as helpless as any baby, and all full of such terrible pains, for nineteen months and seven days.

"I was struck down with meningitis one night, the 22d of August, 1883. When it was gone they found my spine was affected and I had lost the use of my lower limbs. Then I just lay there and got worse and worse. At last the doctors gave me medicine every fifteen minutes for days and days, and I kept growing weaker.

"I was a Catholic, and I never thought of missing a service when I was well, and I prayed during my illness; but I did not know that I was without faith. I had heard of faith healing and of Bessie's cure, and I sent for Miss G——. She came one day at twelve o'clock and stayed till twenty minutes to two in the afternoon. She asked me some questions, mostly about my religious feelings, and then explained to me, by reading from the Bible and talking, what divine healing is. And then she asked me whether I was willing to give up the doctors and the medicine, and just trust and have faith. I said, 'Oh, yes; I will give up all, and I believe I can then get well.' Then she said she would not say what day I should get out of bed; it would come to me, and I should know what to do. Then she and the lady with her prayed, and afterward we all three prayed. Then she went away, and has never entered the house since. It was not necessary. She had taught me how to have faith.

"The very next day, when my mother was in the yard and only my little sister was in the room with me, I said I believed I could walk. My sister said I must not try, but I did. I walked across the room and then the porch, and then I called to mother, who could hardly believe her eyes. Every day after that I walked, sometimes two minutes, and then more, and finally, on the fifteenth of the month, I went across the street and paid three calls. The neighbors were all thunderstruck, for they had said, 'Lizzie never can get well no such way as that.' It has just changed our family completely. Mother kind o' laughed when I told her I was going to try the faith cure; but she never laughs about it now. Neither do the doctors nor the neighbors.

"When I first tried to walk I just felt like I wanted to go, and I did go. It made me kind o' tired, but I never had any pains from it—and just to think I had never been out of pain all those months! I gained a little every day after the fifteenth, and got stronger and stronger, and I am stronger now than during the summer. In fact, I am picking up in flesh and strength all the time. My doctors said if I didn't get well by faith I wouldn't get well at all.

"Bessie Rich lives on Goat Hill, over northwest from here. She is a little girl about thirteen. I think her cure was more remarkable than mine, because it was all of a sudden. Bessie never had the use of her back like other children. They had to nurse her for years. Then she took to her bed, and lay there without putting her feet to the floor and perfectly helpless for six months, till they sent for Miss G——. She went there and talked to Bessie one day, and that very night Bessie got out of bed and danced about the house for joy, and the next morning she got up and made the beds and swept the house. She's been well ever since—hasn't an ache or a pain. I often met her up-town. The doctors had every one said her case was a peculiar one, and was incurable.

"I believe this thing is from God. So many say, 'She did it.' Why, I don't believe for one minute she did it herself. You could do it just as well as she did it by prayer; of course, without faith in God we can't be healed that way. Many people have come here to see me, of all kinds. From up-town, from round the neighborhood, from the country—everybody that ever heard of me. They ask me all sorts of questions; some believe it and some don't. But everybody seems to take a deal of interest. People stop me on the street, and they all want to know whether I really believe it was in answer to my prayers. I tell 'em it was, for of course it was.

"I haven't taken a dose of medicine since March 2d, and I am happy as the day is long. I am contented with most anything I can get, now that I have got back my health, and I don't believe anybody could doubt me now."

THE FIRST RESURRECTION.

By Rev. T. C. Desbarres, of Toronto.*

The Place in Prophetic Chronology—Indicated by the Apostle Paul—How to Attain the Highest Honor—The Next Great Event—The Church Prepared—Presented—The First Sheaf—The Order.

THE Apostle Paul in his Epistle to the Colossians reminds them at that time that the Gospel had come to them as to all the world. The purpose of God, so far as they knew, had a fulfilment, so that He might at any moment appear. There was a divine reason for this. We see it in the frequent exhortation of our Lord to His disciples to watch for His Coming, for the day and the hour knoweth no man (Matt. 24: 36), and in the words of the apostle to wait (1 Thess. 1: 10), to watch (1 Thess. 5: 10), to look for (Phil. 3: 20), and to love (1 Tim. 8). The waiting, watching, looking, loving attitude would bring them within the sphere of the highest honor. Wherever there was a lack of this there would be an experience of loss. To speak of Jesus then as coming again is to speak of resurrection, rapture and glory.

Our Lord seized the opportunity that presented itself upon the death of Lazarus to associate His Coming with the resurrection and rapture of believers in these remarkable words: "I am the resurrection, and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die" (John 11: 25). "I am the resurrection," referred to the dead in Christ, "I am the life" to the living in Him at His Coming. From a survey of the events that have taken place we conclude that in the history of our world is the Coming or presence of the Lord. As the living Head has passed into glory, all the members must be glorified before any purpose of God or blessing can come to any nation or people.

To the First Epistle of the Thessalonians I would now direct your attention. In the fourth chapter, from the fourteenth verse and onward, we have the Word of the Lord: "For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep through Jesus will God bring with Him. For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent them which are asleep. For the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first: Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord." As this is the first epistle that the apostle wrote, we would naturally suppose that, as the early believers were on the tip-toe of expectation for their Coming Lord, the Holy Ghost would move the apostle to give this doctrine a prominent place in his teaching, and so we learn that this and the following Epistle are luminous with truth upon this subject, the First Epistle making prominent His coming for His people, the Second His coming with them. In the sixteenth verse we read: "For the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout." This is the first notice of His presence in the air to resurrect the dead and rapture the living saints. And who are the living saints? Do they embrace every believer? the one who is watching for His Coming, and the one who scarcely gives or ever gave the subject thought?

Let the Epistle speak for itself. Glance at the first chapter: "Remembering without ceasing your work of faith, and labor of love, and patience of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ. . . . Knowing, brethren beloved, your election o' God. For our Gospel came unto you by word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance." Was not the completeness of the Christian character exhibited in these saints? There was "the work o' faith, and labor of love, and patience of hope." These people had "turned from idols to serve the living and true God, and to wait for His Son from heaven."

In the last verse of the second chapter the apostle speaks of them in joyous triumph "For what is our hope, or joy, or crown o' rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence o' our Lord Jesus Christ at His Coming? For ye are our glory and joy." At the closing verse of the third chapter we have

THE PRESENTATION.

But what precedes it? The intense desire o' the part of the apostle that they might not be lacking in anything in view of it. "To the end that the Lord may stablish their hearts, unblameable in holiness before God, even our Father, at the Coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all His saints." In the last chapter we are furnished with a remarkable exhortation: "Let us, who are of the day, be sober, putting on the breastplate of faith and love; and for a helmet the hope of salvation. For God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ, who died for us, that whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with Him."

If these words mean anything they mean (as the imagery was drawn from the Roman soldiery) that, as no soldier was regarded as fully equipped for the battle without his helmet on, so no Christian soldier, though he had on the breastplate of faith and love, could come up to the standard of the Great Captain unless armed with the helmet of the hope of salvation. The crowning glory of the defensive armor would be "the blessed hope."

Come with me to the fifteenth chapter o' First Corinthians. Here we have a treatise o' the resurrection of the just. Let me fasten your attention upon the twenty-second verse.

"As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." But each one in his own order each one in Christ, in His own band, cohort company, regiment. Christ the firstfruits afterward they that are Christ's at His presence. It is evident, if we examine this passage closely that Christ is not spoken of here as a cohort o' regiment, and those that follow as another cohort or regiment. He is simply set forth as the sheaf of the great harvest. The harvest is to be gathered at and during His presence. The order is clear: Christ the firstfruits—that is past; afterward the next event in order—"They that are Christ's at His presence."

There is a beginning and a close of this presence. The beginning may take place at any moment. While I speak the Lord may descend from heaven with a shout, and gather to Himself the dead in Christ, and rapture with them the living watchful company. Cast your eyes upon the fifty-first verse: "Behold, I shew you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling o' an eye, at the last trump." (Why at the last trump? Does not the word "last" imply a previous sounding?) "When this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory."

The order is the same here as in the fourth chapter of the Epistle to the Thessalonians, and in the eleventh of John. It is the closing scene of the presence, as related to the first resurrection. The apostle quotes from the twenty-fifth chapter of Isaiah, eighth verse, not as an accommodation, but as a fulfilment. He carries us back to the very spot where there was a prophecy of this wondrous gathering. The Holy Ghost speaking by the apostle, and the Holy Ghost speaking by Isaiah, has His eye upon one and the same event. Let us glance at the passage: "He will swallow up death in victory; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces; and the rebuke of His people shall He take away from off all the earth: for the Lord hath spoken it." And shall not this period be distinguished as a period of rejoicing? And what event is to precede and be almost synchronous with this? The resurrection and rapture spoken of by the apostle, "Death will then be swallowed up in victory." In very truth the harvest will all be gathered in, the first resurrection will have closed.

THE STORY OF AN AMOY PASTOR.

At the last meeting of the Presbytery of Amoy the Rev. Ng Ho-seng—or, as he was commonly called, Chia—was ordained to the pastorate of a large church in Amoy, China, which was formerly under the charge of an American missionary. With the Presbyterian mission this newly ordained pastor has had most tender and intimate relations. He was received into the church in 1861 by Dr. Douglas, and for some years he was a faithful and valued servant in one of the mission families. With some of the older missionaries he took a most active part in stirring up the native Christians to the privilege of supporting Gospel ordinances and extending the knowledge of Christ among his countrymen. His history is strange. It shows some of the horrors of Chinese life, and remarkably illustrates God's grace in overruling evil for good.

He was born in the neighborhood of Foochow. When a lad of twelve or thirteen years of age he and several other boys were enticed away from their homes to go and see a theatrical play, then said to be performing across the river not very far off. The abductor thus got them into the boat, which he had prepared for the purpose, and conveyed them away from Foochow in a southerly direction, selling them one by one as he could find buyers willing to give what he regarded as sufficient prices. They were not bought to be slaves, but to be adopted as sons. This kind of merchandise (and of kidnapping, too) is not at all uncommon. For a generation or more there has been such wholesale murdering of female infants in some parts of this region that at present the price of girls is greatly enhanced, and it is said that there is more danger now of girls being abducted than boys. They are sold as slave girls, or for a worse purpose.

Chia was sold to a man at Chin-chew, the capital of the department to which Amoy belongs. This was long before missionary work commenced at Chin-chew. He was purchased by a man of the surname Ng, hence the reason why he is now called by that name. His purchaser had no family, neither wife nor children. Doubtless he purchased this lad to have some one to take care of him in his old age, and also to worship his spirit after death.

His adopted father had a brother at Amoy. Chia occasionally spent some time at Amoy assisting this man. On a New Year's, when almost every one has leisure, and when Chia was nearly twenty years of age, in strolling about he came within sound of the Gospel. The Holy Spirit fastened the Word in his heart, and in due time he was received into the Christian Church.

It was not till Chia was nearly thirty years of age, after he had been a Christian some nine or ten years and had been away for some sixteen years, that he was able to return on a visit to his native place. He found his father and mother and two sisters still living. His brothers had died, but two more had been born since his abduction. None of the family recognized him except his mother. She burst into tears as soon as she saw him. His kidnapper was also still living, but Chia did not expose him, thinking it would not probably lead to any beneficial result, and only cause serious trouble in the place. As far as his own case was concerned, he was full of gratitude to God, who had overruled his abduction to his salvation. He always speaks of his abduction as God's great kindness to him. His father was employed in a mandarin's office, an employment usually most demoralizing, to which his younger brothers have succeeded, to which he too would probably have succeeded had he not been abducted.

He has two or three times since then visited Foochow, and has labored faithfully, I think, and prayed earnestly for the salvation of his parents and sisters and brothers. His father died last year without leaving much ground for hope concerning him. His mother and the rest of the family still live.

Ng Ho-seng, a few years after his conversion, married a young woman connected with one of the mission churches. They have evidently been blessings to each other, as the Christian character of both has steadily developed. They have five children, the eldest of whom is now in the Middle School, and is a lad of much promise. He was received to the ordinance of the Lord's Supper in the church at Chioh-be some months ago. Ng Ho-seng has been connected with the Presbyterian mission, as student and helper, about eighteen years.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Large-Type Christians.—At a recent Meeting Mr. Rodger observed: "One day going down the street I noticed a placard posted up on the corner of a building by some one who was advertising large-type Bibles for the old. The most prominent word, which could be seen a good distance off, was the word 'Christian,' standing out in very large type, and the rest of the print could not be read until you came very near. And as I looked at it I thought, 'That is just what every Christian ought to be, standing out prominently from the world; for this is what the world needs to-day, large-type Christians.'"

Lost on Mont Blanc.—Mr. Johnston Related: "In the year 1870 eleven men ascended Mont Blanc. Darkness came down upon them and they lost their way. When the morning dawned the whole party had perished and were found five steps from a place of shelter. Oh, how near they were! Five steps would have saved them. Friends, you are lost, but one step will save you; will you not take it ere the night falls and you perish?"

Lending a Pair of Spectacles.—A Devoted evangelist observed: "I had the privilege lately of addressing the Cowdaddens Gospel Meeting. In the after-meeting I spoke to a man who had come in on his way from his work. I asked him what led him to come in, and he at once said, 'Well, as I was returning home, I stood for a minute to hear the singing in the open air, when one of the workers offered me a share of his hymn-book, and I told him I could not see for want of my glasses, and he replied, 'Oh, but I will lend you my glasses.' That kind act brought me into the Church.' He went away saved and rejoicing in the Lord."

A Tea-Meeting Instead of Suicide.—Mr. Stuart related: "A man came into our Gospel meeting the other night and told us how he had been battling against the accursed drink for many years, but was getting no better. A short time ago he determined to end his miserable existence, and with this purpose he went into a drug-store and bought as much laudanum as the druggist would give him. But now he remembered that it was the Lord's day, and his conscience would not allow him to commit so vile an act on the Sabbath. The following day, with the laudanum in his possession, sufficient to poison three men, he walked into the country by the side of the canal, fully determined on accomplishing his purpose. Still the restraining hand of God was with him, and kept him from committing this sin. While retracing his steps homeward one of our lady workers met him, and stepping forward offered him a ticket for a tea-meeting, which he accepted. He came to the meeting, where God was pleased to meet with him. The next night he came back, and came out clearly for Christ. He was drawn by the love of Jesus, for he repeated several times, 'I never thought the Lord Jesus loved me so much.' Now he is rejoicing in salvation."

A Young Lady's Fear Dispelled.—Mr. Jack said: "I will tell you how a young lady to whom I spoke in a meeting came out of darkness into the marvellous light of God. As I sat down by her side she seemed to be under deep conviction of sin, for I saw that she was trembling much, and when I spoke to her she exclaimed, 'Oh, tell me, tell me how I am to be saved, for I am such a sinner I am afraid that Jesus cannot save me.' 'Jesus came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance,' I answered. As I told her the sweet and simple story of the cross she listened, and believed; and as she gave herself to Jesus a calm, quiet look took the place of the troubled expression, and now she is rejoicing in the fulness of Christ's precious love."

Why the Man Did Not Stand.—Mr. Wilson said: "I lately called upon a man in my neighborhood, and found him just recovering from a course of drinking. He had signed the pledge some time previous, and had faithfully kept it for six weeks. He was an habitual drinker before, and now, when he had abstained for six weeks, what was the reason of his fall? When he thought he was strong enough he had taken his eyes off Jesus and looked to himself to be kept, neglecting a prayer for the help he needed, and the great enemy of souls soon destroyed the good seed that had been sown. But, thank God, with tears he has confessed his sin to Jesus, who has said, 'Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out,' and is again reconciled to the Father through the infinitely compassionate Saviour."

What an Infidel Tract Did for Mr. Studd.—Mr. Oatts observed: "When Mr. Stanley Smith and Mr. Studd were here lately Mr. Studd told me something of his own private history. He said that when living at home he came across an infidel tract, and the infidel was speaking on that verse, 'What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?' And the writer went on to say that if he believed that verse, as many Christians say they do, that he would give up everything for the Lord, that it would be his first thought in the morning and his last thought at night; and he made some more remarks about this very impressive verse, and Mr. Studd said that it made so powerful an impression upon his mind that he resolved to give up all for Christ, and from that day to this he has closely followed Christ, and is to-day in China declaring the glad tidings of the Gospel."

Prayer Answered for Soldiers.—Mrs. Baxter said: "I was on one occasion speaking with a lady friend of mine, who exclaimed, 'Oh, I wish I could do something for the poor soldiers in the hospital. I have been there, and I spoke to one soldier who was very anxious about the spiritual condition of his comrades.' There were four of us present, and we knelt down and put these soldiers into the hands of the Lord. This was in October, and we took no further thought about them until Christmas, two months later, when the Lord put it into my friend's heart to invite a hundred soldiers to a tea-meeting, for it was in a garrison town. After tea we invited testimony. Many of the men rose and told how they were brought to the Lord, and most of them said that it was within the last two months that they had been led to give their hearts to Jesus. Friends, we do not need to make vain repetitions to the Lord, but let your requests be made known unto Him, and leave them there, believing that He will answer in His own good time and way."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Observance of Thanksgiving-Day, which will be witnessed throughout the land to-day, is a national acknowledgment of the source of all our many blessings. Though many will spend it as any other legal holiday, and without any regard for the purpose for which it was set apart, it is the duty of Christians to show by their example that they are sincere and intelligent in its observance. No nation on earth has the abundant cause we have for thankfulness, and we know that all our blessings come from one beneficent Hand. In addition to the material blessings of the year, there is to-day another reason for humble thanksgiving. In all our churches there is noticeable a quickening of spiritual life and an earnest desire to win souls for Christ. While we thank God for this, let us pray that it may go on and increase, and that He will guide it and give it success.

President Cleveland's Policy in the Matter of appointments does not, it has been frequently stated, receive the approval of his party. An appointment made in New York State last week by the Governor appears to confirm that opinion. He made the rum seller, Sterling, whom President Cleveland suspended from the office of chief weigher in the Custom House, a Port Warden. Whether Sterling is fit for the office is not a question of national importance, but the appointment is significant in view of the fact that the Governor's first appointment after his election was of a man who has been somewhat conspicuously snubbed by the President. The citizens whose motive in voting for Hill was to indorse President Cleveland's administration will be puzzled by the effect of their indorsement. Those who voted for Hill because they believed he was a fit man for Governor will, of course, be satisfied, as all intelligent citizens of the State knew the kind of man he was when they voted for him. The Democratic party will evidently have to decide whether the President or the Governor is the true representative of their principles. Their decision will have an important influence on the next Presidential election.

An Effort to Secularize the Lord's Day in New York is being made by Mr. S. P. Putnam and his friends of the American Secular Union, who have sent out for signature five thousand petitions, asking for the opening of the museums on Sundays. What support the movement will have has not yet appeared. Two important utterances have, however, been made. One of them, published in the New York Times, is from Mr. R. Hoe, of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, who, says that journal, looks at the matter from both standpoints, that of the religious as well as the secular. "We have not," he said, "been formally advised of what is the general public desire, but in a general way know that it is desired to have the museums open on Sundays. Now, if this can be done to the intellectual profit of the masses, without offending the solid religious elements that sustain our museums by their voluntary contributions, it would seem desirable." Mr. Hoe's "religious standpoint" is peculiar. To us it seems to be somewhat secular, as it is concerned not with religious principle, but with the contributions of religious people. We imagine that Mr. Hoe can satisfy himself on that point without much difficulty. Another influential voice is that of Mr. Henry Clews, who does discuss the question on the basis of principle. He says: "By all means let the museums be thrown open—wide open to the public on Sundays. The old notion that in order to secure salvation one should attend religious service thrice on Sunday no longer prevails. Open museums on Sundays would be loadstones which would draw a popular attendance, the benefits to whose members can scarcely be estimated." Mr. Clews is as hazy as to his history as he is as to his grammar, or perhaps he would have told us when it was that "the old notion" prevailed that salvation might be secured by attending three services on Sunday. He is, perhaps, right in thinking that the museums would be "loadstones which would draw a popular attendance," but the benefits that the people attending would gain are more easily estimated than he supposes. It is the injuries they would sustain that it would be difficult to estimate.

An Interesting and Valuable Report was issued last week by Col. W. F. Switzer, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics. It shows that there was last year a decrease in the value of our imports of merchandise of $90,000,000 as compared with the previous year. The decrease occurred mainly in the values of imports of sugar and molasses, silks, wools, and manufactures of silk and wool and iron and steel, and manufactures of iron and steel. Among the exports of our manufactured products which show the most rapid development since 1866 are agricultural implements, clocks and watches, manufactures of cotton, manufactures of iron and steel, including locomotives, sewing machines, tools, and hardware. Great Britain not only takes about sixty per cent of our agricultural and unmanufactured products, but also a large share of our manufactures. Colonel Switzer says there has been since 1860 a marked decline in the percentage of imports of manufactured articles, and a corresponding increase in the percentage of imports of crude or partially manufactured articles. This is a significant fact, showing a steady growth in the demand for crude articles to be used as materials in the various processes of home manufacture.

A Battle between the Servians and the Bulgarians took place on November 18th, at Slivnitsa, in which the Servians were defeated. King Milan, of Servia, sent his army into Bulgaria in four columns, which he intended to unite at Slivnitsa, and crush the Bulgarians. Prince Alexander, however, adopted the tactics of the first Napoleon. He kept his own army in one column, and attacked the first column of the Servians which arrived, before it could effect a junction with any other column, and almost annihilated it. Then wheeling rapidly he attacked a second column, and drove it back. He is receiving assistance in officers and money from Berlin, in spite of the protest Austria is making against it. In spite of his success, however, the European press believes that if the great powers do not interfere he will be beaten in the end.

Mr. Stead has been Visited in Prison.—His warder was present at the interview, and the visitor was not allowed to shake hands with the prisoner. Mr. Stead was in prison garb, consisting of a Glengarry cap, loose-fitting yellow collarless jacket, stamped on the left breast with "Circle R 2, Stroke 8;" baggy, coarse yellow trousers, bearing the government broad arrow, and oversided, patched boots. His hair was cropped short. Mr. Stead appeared to be suffering severely from cold, his hands being tucked in his capacious sleeves for warmth. Mr. Stead is allowed a Bible in his cell, but the light is not sufficient to enable him to read it. His breakfast consists of thin porridge and brown bread, dinner of suet pudding, and supper of porridge and brown bread. He sees nobody between 6 P.M. and 6 A.M. Mr.

Stead's daily task is to pick one pound of oakum. The ordinary prisoners have to pick three pounds. The publication of these facts was promptly followed by government action. The Secretary of the Home Department sent orders to the prison to cease treating Mr. Stead as a common thief, and to give him the position of a first-class misdemeanant; that is, treatment such as prisoners waiting trial receive in our prisons. A fact which will carry weight is that among those who subscribed to a fund for the defence of Mr. Stead were the names of Samuel Morley, M. P., who gave $1000; Samuel Smith, M. P., who gave $1000; the Bishop of London, $250, and Frank Crossley, $750, while smaller sums were given by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, Rev. Newman Hall, Cardinal Manning, Canon Liddon, Canon Butler, and Rev. E. R. Conder, D.D.

The British Elections are being Held this week. There is much anxiety as to the result, both in England and on the Continent. An impression prevails in Austria, Germany, and Russia that if Lord Salisbury obtains a majority England will be a factor in European affairs; while if Mr. Gladstone is raised to office by the election no fear need be entertained of English interference. Mr. Gladstone's speeches to the electors in Scotland have been as eloquent as on former occasions, but have failed to produce their usual effect. He has made no definite statement of policy on any of the questions awaiting settlement. The subject of the disestablishment of the English Church, which is the one about which there is most excitement, he refuses to deal with, and deprecates its discussion as inopportune. It is, however, the question which his opponents force to the front.

The Irishmen in Great Britain have Received their instructions from the leaders of their party in Parliament. A manifesto signed by Healy, Justin McCarthy, and other confidential friends of Mr. Parnell cautions them against voting for the supporters of Mr. Gladstone, who has done more to benefit Ireland than any living statesman. Irishmen who obey the manifesto will, therefore, if they vote at all, vote for Conservatives, who have opposed every measure for the relief of Irish grievances. The concluding paragraph of the manifesto is a specimen of its style and the violence of its language. It runs as follows: "We feel bound to advise that no confidence be placed in the Liberal or Radical party, and, as far as possible, to prevent the government of the empire from falling into the hands of a party so perfidious, treacherous, and incompetent. The Irish Nationalists should not vote for a Liberal or Radical except in some few cases in which courageous fealty to the Irish cause in the last Parliament has given guarantee that the candidate did not belong to the servile, cowardly, and unprincipled herd who would break every pledge, and violate every principle in obedience to the call of the whip or a mandate of a caucus." The exceptions are Messrs. John Morley, Joseph Cowen, Henry Labouchere, Thomas Burt, and Samuel Storer.

The German Reichstag was Opened on November 19th. The emperor in the course of his speech, said: "The Pope's mediation is expected to settle the Carolines question in a manner corresponding to the friendly relations existing between Spain and Germany." He stated that the foreign relations of Germany are peaceful and friendly with all nations. The emperor confidently hopes that the Balkan conflict will not disturb the peace of Europe, and trusts that the signers of the Berlin Treaty will succeed in securing respect for the treaty among the peoples whom it rendered independent. It is, however, an ominous circumstance that in spite of these pacific assurances, the speech points out the necessity of increasing the grants for the army and navy.

Wanted as Evangelists at Mission Stations of the Gospel Army in Canada and the United States, men and women who can sing and give Gospel addresses. Write to the President, Rev. M. Baxter, Post Office, Toronto, Canada.

The Convention Held in Madison Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church, Baltimore, from November 12th to 18th, and conducted by Dr. Cullis, was well attended. The testimonies to blessing received were very numerous at the morning, afternoon, and sometimes at the evening meetings. Mr. Daniel Updegraff, the Quaker evangelist, was much used of God, both in his clear, forcible preaching and also in his inimitable after-meetings. Dr. Cookman, of New York, preached to an overflowing congregation on Sunday, November 15th, on which day six pulpits were supplied by the delegates to the Convention. Dr. Cullis leads a convention with the utmost care and simplicity, and his teaching is full of power and point, which only the Spirit of God could give him. He held a service for anointing of the sick on Monday, November 16th, when one hundred and twenty persons presented themselves to the Lord for healing. Captain Keiso Carter and Mrs. M. Baxter were also among the speakers. Mrs. K. Carter conducted the singing. The convention at Pittsburgh, commenced November 24th, and that at Chicago will open on December 1st. There will be also a convention at Detroit, Mich., on December 3d and 4th. Mrs. M. Baxter will take part in all these.

A Grand Reception to Mr. William Noble was tendered him in Brooklyn, N. Y., on November 17th. The meeting was held in Dr. Cuyler's church on Lafayette Avenue. The large building was crowded, and many well-known temperance workers took part in the meeting. In the course of his address of welcome Dr. Cuyler said that in behalf of the cause he extended a hearty welcome to Mr. William Noble, the great advocate of temperance. His temperance labors were known all over England. His name there was as a household word. It was therefore a pleasure as well as a duty to give a cordial welcome to the man who had done so much—had worked such a wonderful revolution in morals and habits in the east end of London, enlisting the active sympathy of the highest classes of that land as well as the commonalty. Brother Noble was doing a grand work. He had set on foot against every odds a movement that is affecting for good the happiness of five millions of people. It were useless at this time to enter largely into the history of his labors. They were such as all good men might rejoice in and heartily commend. A desire was expressed to have Mr. Noble hold a lengthened mission in Brooklyn, if his arrangements will admit of it. The following day Mr. Noble went to Jamaica, L. I., where large meetings were held on that day and Thursday. On Friday he started for Louisville, Ky., where he will remain for fourteen days, holding union services. His address, while in that city, is 410 West Breckinridge Street.

Special Meetings for Young Men will be conducted by Mr. D. L. Moody in the large hall of the Brooklyn Young Men's Christian Association, from the 9th to the 15th of December. It is earnestly hoped that at this time when temptations assail young men with unprecedented violence, drawing them to scepticism, unbelief and vicious indulgences, Christians will pray for God's blessing on these meetings.

The Local Option Campaign in Atlanta, Ga., which closed yesterday, has been one of the most vigorous ever known in the Southern States. So persistent and thorough has been the temperance work in Georgia, that now there are out of the one hundred and thirty-seven counties in the State only fifteen in which liquor can be sold. Those fifteen are, of course, the counties in which are the large cities. In the rural counties the temperance workers met with but little organized opposition. It has been otherwise at Atlanta, which is the first stronghold of the city class attacked. There the liquor interest, led by Senator Brown's son, has made a resolute stand. A poll to decide the question was ordered under the Local Option Act for November 25th, and for more than ten days there has been the most active effort made by both sides. Senator Colquitt and District-Attorney Hill have been among the most earnest of the temperance workers. The result will be looked for with deep interest, as it will have an important bearing on other cities.

By Crawling through Flames an Engineer succeeded in saving his life last week. On November 17th the tug-boat Whitney took fire while in the lower bay of New York. It was not discovered for some time, and when at last the alarm was given the flames held possession of the boat. The captain, who was at the wheel, headed for the beach, calling aloud to the cook, fireman, and deck-hands, who were in their berths. They got out, and managed to lower a boat, into which they sprang. But the engineer was in the engine-room, and his egress was cut off by the hottest of the fire, which burned right in front of the door. He at first gave himself up for lost, but finally resolved to crawl through the flames, as he might as well die that way as be burned to death where he was. He came through with his mustache and whiskers burned off and his clothes on fire. He sprang into the water, and was dragged into the boat and carried to the hospital, where he is recovering from his burns. Many a man has had as dreadful an experience in escaping from sin. Quite recently a New York physician said to a patient who announced his intention of abandoning a sinful habit: "It will be like crawling through hell." Such men, however, know that unless they make the attempt they will meet a worse doom, and Christ's almighty power may be had to support them (Matt. 1:21).

A Wedding Ceremony above the Clouds was solemnized in Colorado on November 12th. A despatch from Silverton, Col., says that on that day a lady from Lake City was married to a gentleman from Animas Forks, and the ceremony took place on the summit of the divide, at an altitude of over thirteen thousand feet, the party being on snowshoes. The groom and the minister arrived first at the designated meeting point, but they did not have long to wait, for the bride and her brothers were soon observed nearing the spot, trudging along cheerily. The bride seemed less fatigued than any other member of the party. After a short rest the clergyman performed the wedding ceremony with as much impressiveness as if it had taken place in a church. At its conclusion the party descended the mountain to the home of the bride, where a banquet was to be held. The bride had enjoyed the realization of her romantic idea, and for the prosaic duties of her new life she had to descend from above the clouds to the ordinary world. That is inevitable for all who climb, and it may be wished that Christians would remember the fact. There are joys and delights on the mountain-top, and, as Peter said on the Mount of Transfiguration, it is good to be there; but its best use is to give strength for the performance of the duties waiting in the valley (Heb. 8:5).

The Legal Standing of a Dog has been the subject of litigation in the Supreme Court of New York State for three years. Seven years ago the plaintiff bought a diminutive Skye-terrier, but lost it after about a year. Subsequently he claimed that it was in the possession of the defendant. There was a lawsuit about the identity of the dog. Then there was another suit about the purchase of the beast. Finally the plaintiff, exasperated by the opposition he encountered in recovery of his pet, sued for damages, and the case was appealed twice. On the last appeal the question was raised whether a dog, being in the eyes of the law a wild beast, could be regarded as property in the sense on which an action for damages for its detention could be sustained. Judge Brady, in giving the decision of the Appellate Court last week, settled the position of a dog in law by declaring that property in a dog, notwithstanding ancient laws, was clearly established. So it may be presumed that the plaintiff will recover his dog and damages for its detention. The spiritual property in men has been long settled, but in comparatively few cases has it been realized. In one sense men are free, but Satan still claims many of them as his own, and they serve him, though they belong to God by original right, and Christ has redeemed them with His own blood. Satan is a thief, and those who remain in his service connive with him in defrauding God (Rom. 6:16-18).

Pouring Oil on the Waves has Saved Several vessels from shipwreck recently. The North Atlantic Pilot Chart for November strongly urges sea-captains to take with them on their voyages a supply of oil for the purpose, and cites several instances of its utility. Among them is a statement made by Captain E. L. Arey, of the schooner Cheney, who says that in a severe hurricane recently, "the wind having carried away the mainsail, the vessel was shipping large quantities of water, the sea being very irregular, nearly every one breaking. Finding it necessary to do something to save the ship and crew, I took a small canvas bag, and turned about five gallons of linseed oil into it, and hung it over the starboard quarter. The wash of the sea caused a little of the oil to leak out and smooth the surface, so that for ten hours no water broke aboard. The waves were seen to break on the edge of the oil-covered spot. I consider that the oil used during the last and heaviest part of the hurricane saved vessel and crew." The Christian has often witnessed something like this in his experience. The waves that looked threatening at a distance were broken before they reached him. The influences of the Holy Spirit, who in the Bible is often compared to oil, produce a calm around him (Ps. 107:28-30).

A Novel Lawsuit has Been Commenced in Texas by a widow who sues a prominent citizen of Wharton for damages for the assassination of her husband. It is believed that this is the first time the United States Courts have ever been appealed to on such grounds. The killing was the result of an old feud between two families. The man whose death is the basis of the suit shot one of his enemies in the public street, and was placed on trial for the crime. The judge held him in $50,000 bonds, and he was going out to look for bondsmen when a brother of the man he had shot met him and killed him. The avenging brother was tried and acquitted, and it is he that the widow is now suing for damages, which she fixes at $100,000. If the widow wins her case the defendant will realize that crime has a double aspect—besides being an offence against the State, it is a wrong to the individual. Criminals usually remember the former but forget the latter. Sin, too, has this double aspect, but the sinner reverses the error. If his fellow-men acquit him he forgets his state before God, until he is awakened by the Holy Spirit (Luke 16:15).

How a Lady Received a Fortune of Fifty thousand dollars is told in a despatch from Kingston, N. Y., dated November 16th. It states a young lady who is now a dressmaker at Highland, Ulster County, was about a year ago employed in New York City. One day she saw an old lady in distress in the city. She had lost her pocketbook, and was wholly without money. The young lady lent her a small sum, and seeing she was infirm and nervous, she guided her across the street and put her on her way to her destination. The old lady was grateful, and begged her friend to give her her name and address. They were given, and the young lady forgot all about the circumstance. A few days ago, however, she was reminded of it by receiving a letter from a lawyer in Buffalo, N. Y., who informed her that the old lady was dead, and she had bequeathed to her young friend who assisted her in New York the sum of $50,000. So it appears that people who follow the example of the good Samaritan sometimes receive a reward in this life; but such cases are rare, and those who expect them are likely to be disappointed. Those who do good to others for Christ's sake are, however, sure of the reward promised (Luke 6:35).

JUBILATE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Then sang Moses and the children of Israel this song unto the Lord, and spake, saying, I will sing unto the Lord, for He hath triumphed gloriously: the horse and his rider hath He thrown into the sea. The Lord is my strength and song, and He is become my salvation: He is my God, and I will prepare Him an habitation; my father's God, and I will exalt Him."—EXODUS 15: 1, 2.

The First Song on Record.—To be Sung at the Last.—Full of Significance.—I. The Time of Singing It.—The Moment of Realized Salvation.—Of Distinct Consecration.—At All Times.—II. The Tone of It.—Enthusiastic.—Congregational.—Personal.—Positive.—III. The First Clauses of the Song.—All of God.—The God of the Fathers.—To be Exalted.

THIS is the first song unto the Lord which is recorded in Holy Scripture. In Jacob's blessing of his children there are verses which may be regarded as songs; but they are mere fragments, and can scarcely be said to be sung unto the Lord. There are other couplets in the Book of Genesis, but this is the first connected song upon record. I should think that Abraham often sang unto the Lord; but we have no record of it. We can hardly doubt but that Isaac had his quiet psalm, as Enoch had, and Noah, and others who called upon the name of the Lord; but none of these hymns are left to us. This is the very first of those sacred songs preserved in Scripture, and in some respects it is first in merit as well as in time. At any rate, its august occasion lifts it into the highest place among patriotic hymns.

THE FIRST AND LAST SONG.

The song of Moses appears to have been chanted by an exceeding great multitude. Miriam, the prophetess, took her timbrel and led the strain, all the daughters of Israel going forth with her with their timbrels and dances, and the whole multitude of the people taking up the strain. Never had the shores of the Red Sea, or any other sea, heard such a song. We saw just now, in our reading in the fifteenth chapter of Revelation, that the Song of Moses, the servant of God and of the Lamb, will be sung toward the close of this dispensation, when those who have gotten the victory over the beast and his image shall stand on the sea of glass, having the harps of God. Before the seven last plagues shall be poured out upon the earth, and God shall overthrow the hosts of Antichrist once for all, then shall this song be heard, sung, not by the Israelitish nation, but by that higher Israel who have escaped by the grace of God from the power of the spiritual Pharaoh, and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. How sweetly will they together take up the song, "Sing unto the Lord, for He hath triumphed gloriously! Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty."

It is obvious, then, from the plentiful allusions to this song in Holy Scripture, that it is full of deep spiritual significance. It teaches us not only to praise God concerning the literal overthrow of Egypt, but to praise Him concerning the overthrow of all the powers of evil, and the final deliverance of all the chosen. It is God's intent that from the day of Moses downward, even to the hour when flames of fire shall lick up the works of men, and the heavens themselves shall be dissolved with fervent heat, that this shall be the song of the chosen people everywhere, "Sing unto the Lord, for He hath triumphed gloriously."

I. It will be instructive to notice of this song. To everything there is a season, and a time for every purpose under heaven; there is a time of the singing of birds, and there is a time for the singing of saints. "Then sang Moses."

THE TIME OF THE SINGING

It was first of all at the moment of realized salvation. "The Lord saved Israel that day out of the hand of the Egyptians; and Israel saw the Egyptians dead upon the seashore; and Israel saw that great work which the Lord did upon the Egyptians; and the people feared the Lord, and believed the Lord, and His servant Moses. Then sang Moses and the children of Israel this song unto the Lord." There was no singing in Egypt; sighing, and crying, and groaning, and lamentation abounded there, till the Lord said, "I have surely heard the cry of My people." The hour of their complete deliverance had not yet fully come. They marched on steadily, but they had hardly reached the time for timbrels. When they had crossed the sea, and the waters thereof rolled between them and the house of their bondage, "Then sang Moses and the children of Israel this song unto the Lord." Their previous lives had been one long-drawn sigh, or one discord of anguish and fear and woe; but when their slavery was altogether a thing of the past, then sang Moses. The depths have covered the Egyptian host; there is not one of them left; "Then sang Moses and the children of Israel this song unto the Lord."

THE SONG OF VICTORY.

You will have noticed, perhaps, in reading the previous chapter, that Moses had said to the people (14: 14): "The Lord shall fight for you, and ye shall hold your peace." But now that God has fought for them, they are not commanded to hold their peace any longer. The battle is fought, and the victory is won, and "Then sang Moses and the children of Israel this song unto the Lord." How could they help it? Surely "if these should hold their peace, the stones would immediately cry out." What does that teach us, brothers and sisters, but that we cannot sing in the land of bondage while under the dominion of sin and Satan? How shall we sing the Lord's song in that strange land? We do not even sing in the first moments of our spiritual life, when our question is how to escape destruction through the sprinkling of the blood. When we doubt our salvation we suspend our singing; but when we realize it, when we get a grip of it, when we see clearly the great work that God has done for us, then we sing unto the Lord who hath for us also triumphed gloriously. I say again, how can we help singing? How can our joy of heart any longer be pent up? It must pour itself forth in floods of harmony, in tunes of realized salvation. So is it also in times of

DISTINCT CONSECRATION.

You may not see this at first, but I would remind you that the apostle assures us that all Israel were "baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea." When Pharaoh and his hosts had been destroyed, Israel stood for the first time, as a nation separated from Egypt. The Red Sea was a most effectual division; Israel became a distinct people, a race redeemed from among men. "Then sang Moses and the children of Israel this song unto the Lord." Oh you that hope that you are Christians, but have never yet taken the distinct step to avow yourselves to be wholly the Lord's; Oh you that have never come clean away from Egypt, and made the waters to roll between you and a guilty world—you have delayed a joy which I trust you may no longer miss, lest that dreadful text be fulfilled in you, "Whosoever shall be ashamed of Me and of My words in this adulterous and sinful generation; of him also shall the Son of man be ashamed, when He cometh in the glory of His Father with the holy angels." "Then," in the day of realized salvation, "then," in the day of distinct consecration, they sang this song unto the Lord.

Brethren, it was also a day of the manifest display of God's power. Our hearts are heavy; at least, mine is so, when God seems to put His right hand into His bosom and not to vindicate His own cause. I am most sad because I see error prevalent everywhere; falsehood reigns, and Jannes and Jambres withstand Moses, and the prince of this world disdainfully demands, "Who is Jehovah?" But when we hear of conversions, when we see God blessing the work of the Sabbath-school, when we hear of sinners turning to Christ and seeking mercy, when we notice the children of God diligent in service, when we see the work of the Lord wrought with vigor, then is our heart exceeding glad, and then, like Moses and the children of Israel, we sing unto the Lord. How can we be silent when God's arm is made bare?

But this song may be sung at all times throughout the life of faith. I want to put it to the people of God here whether it is good to save up our songs for special occasions of great joy, or for times when we have something visible to sing about. Should not the believer sing by faith as well as live by faith? Do you not think that the song of Moses and the children of Israel at the Red Sea was, after all, a poor affair as far as faith is concerned? The bulk of the Israelites had very little faith indeed; and loud as was the song, there was more noise than faith in it; for within a day or two they began to murmur against God. Sing in fine weather! Any bird can do that. Praising God when all goes well is common-place work. Everybody marks the nightingale above all other birds because she singeth when the other minstrels of the wood are silent and asleep; and thus doth faith praise God under the cloud. Songs in the day are from man, but God Himself giveth songs in the night. Oh come, let us sing unto the Lord under the clouds; let us pour forth His praises in the fires! Let us praise Him under depressions; let us magnify Him when our heart is heavy. Faith believes in God when there is nothing to support her but the bare promise.

Thus we have spoken upon the time for singing. That time is NOW, I think. Let your hearts begin to ring all their bells, and let not their sweet chimes cease for ever more.

II. Notice, secondly,

of this song. "Then sang Moses and the children of Israel this song unto the Lord."

Note, first, that the tone is enthusiastic. There is not a dull line, there is not a dreary sentence, all through; it is full of force, life, power; it is Luther's Old Hundredth psalm, and more; it rises to a height of intense enthusiasm which cannot be excelled. The words are, "I will sing unto the Lord, for He hath triumphed gloriously;" and the singers endeavor to sing gloriously, too.

The tone is also congregational, being intended for every Israelite to join in. Though Moses began by saying, "I will sing unto the Lord," yet Miriam concluded with, "Sing ye to the Lord, for He hath triumphed gloriously." This is a hymn for every child of God, for all that have come out of Egypt. Should not there be praise from every one of you? You in the back settlements, you that bear the mark of Egypt's lash, and smart from wounds still unhealed; you that remember well the task-master, and the iron furnace; yet sing ye unto the Lord. From Egypt lately come, sing ye unto the Lord! There should be sent up unto God by His Church a perfectly unanimous harmony of praise. "Oh that men would praise the Lord for His goodness!" Let all the redeemed of the Lord say so. "Oh come, let us sing unto the Lord; let us make a joyful noise to the rock of our salvation." Let the song be enthusiastic and unanimous.

Yet please to notice how very distinctly personal it is. It is strikingly so. "I will sing unto the Lord, for He hath triumphed gloriously. The Lord is my strength and song, and He is become my salvation; He is my God, and I will prepare Him an habitation; my father's God, and I will exalt Him." Do not lose yourself in the throng. It is no egotism to resolve that if nobody else will sing, you will say with David, "I will sing unto the Lord as long as I live." The fact is, that unanimity cannot become fact if each mind is not active in praise. We cannot have a perfect accord unless each child of God feels that he must make his own distinct music melodious in the ears of the Most High.

Note, again, the tone of this song is exceeding confident. There is not a shadow of doubt in it; it is all the way through most positive in its ascriptions of praise. The lip does not quiver, the mind does not waver. It begins, "I will sing unto the Lord, for He hath triumphed gloriously." It declares a fact, about which there can be no doubt; "the horse and his rider hath He thrown into the sea" and it goes on to make statements which are not qualified with hopes, and desires, and "ifs," and "buts," but are bold assertions which cannot be challenged. "The Lord is my strength and my song, and He is become my salvation." That is the kind of singing. I do not mind occasionally singing with Cowper, when he is down in the dumps; for some of his dreary hymns admirably express the experience of the weaker members of the family; but I would not always keep to the minor key. Oh, no! let us sing songs of joy and victory. Doubts and fears ill become the children of God.

THE SONG OF JOY.

Note, too, all through, that this song is immeasurably joyous. The Israelites were slaves enjoying new liberty; children let out to play. How merrily did they disport themselves! They did not know how to be glad enough. Let us give to God our unlimited joy. David said, "God is my exceeding joy." I know of no greater word than that word "exceeding;" because, however far you go, if your joy is "exceeding," it is above the highest; and however brave the description, if your joy be "exceeding," it surpasses all language. Believers ought to be unutterably happy. Men redeemed with the precious blood of Christ ought habitually to be almost too happy to live; men that are children of God, and heirs of the covenant, and are soon to be where Jesus is in the ineffable splendor of Jehovah's light, ought to feel their soul overflowing with delight. Yet I must say, however enthusiastic that song was, and however full of joy it was, it was only such a song as was due unto the Lord. But, brethren, the tribes of Israel did not even then praise the Lord half as He should be praised. If all the angels in heaven had left their seats and descended to the Red Sea shore, and if cherubim and seraphim had joined the lofty song, it had not been more than meet for the occasion. So to-day, if we could arouse all on earth, and all in heaven, as well as all that is within us, to bless and magnify the Lord, the song would not be equal to the majesty of the divine goodness; it would be but a faint expression of what God deserveth from each one of us. Therefore, let us sing unto the Lord, for He hath triumphed gloriously.

"Sound the loud timbrel o'er Egypt's dark sea!
Jehovah has triumph'd, his people are free.
Sing—for the pride of the tyrant is broken,
His chariots, his horsemen, all splendid and brave,
How vain was their boasting! The Lord hath but spoken,
And chariots and horsemen are sunk in the wave."

III. We are to dwell for a few minutes upon the first clauses of this song. "The Lord is my strength and song, and He is become my salvation; He is my God, and I will prepare Him an habitation; my father's God, and I will exalt Him." Notice, the song is there is not a word about Moses. Read this song through, and neither Moses, nor Aaron, nor Miriam are in it; God is all in all: "I will sing unto Jehovah." That is blessed praise when self lies with the Egyptians at the bottom of the sea, and when everything that is in us that is commendable is traced to the grace of God, and the Lord is magnified for it. Oh for the glorification of Jesus, and none but Jesus! Brothers, we spoil our music by diverting our thoughts to man. Let us forget men, forget earth, forget time, forget self, forget this mortal life, and only think of our God.

Take up the first note: "The Lord is my strength." What a noble utterance! Poor Israel had no strength! She had cried out by reason of her sore bondage, making bricks without straw. Poor Israel was weakness itself! but Jehovah drew near in power. The Lord is my strength when I have no strength of my own. By the strength of the Lord, Israel came forth with a high hand and an outstretched arm. Thus the Lord is our strength when we are at the extremity of weakness.

The Lord was also Israel's strength against strength. Pharaoh was exceeding mighty. The kings of the earth trembled at the neighing of his warhorse; the rattling of his chariots made the very heavens to resound; but God was more than a match for him. When strength comes out against God's people, God meets it with His omnipotence. It is well to say, "The Lord is my strength" when we are weak, and the enemy is strong; but we must mind that we say the same when we are strong, and our enemies are routed.

THE SONG INSPIRED.

The next is, "The Lord is my song," that is to say, the Lord is the giver of our songs; He breathes the music into the hearts of His people; He is the creator of their joy. The Lord is also the subject of their songs; they sing of Him and of all that He does on their behalf. The Lord is, moreover, the object of their song; they sing unto the Lord. Their praise is meant for Him alone. "The Lord is my strength and song, and He is become my salvation." I look for nothing but what is in Thee, and if Thou givest Thyself to me, Thou hast given me a perfect salvation, salvation from bondage, salvation from worldliness, salvation from death and hell, salvation into light, and liberty, and love, and joy, salvation that shall culminate in eternal glory. A full salvation is God to His people.

Next "He is my God." Perhaps this is the most joyous note of all. "He is become my salvation"—this is very sweet; "He is my God"—this is the sweetest of all. "He is my God," I choose Him to be my God, but I choose Him of necessity; I can do no other. Where else can be my God? In the Revised Version it is, "This is my God," and a very proper translation, too; as if Israel saw what God did at the Red Sea, and then exclaimed, "This is my God." This God of justice, this God of vengeance and power, is my God. Beloved, choose Jehovah to be your God; whom else can you choose? Let your hearts cling to Him.

A HABITATION OF PRAISE.

Note, once more, that as Moses said, "He is my strength, my song, my salvation, my God," now he adds, "He is my praise." The text in the Old Version is, "I will prepare Him an habitation." This jars a little on my ear; it rather sinks the majesty of the infinite for Israel to think of Jehovah as One for whom she could prepare a habitation. The Revised Version of the Old Testament, which is infinitely superior to the Revised Version of the New Testament, renders it: "This is my God: I will praise Him." The fact is, there are two words so nearly alike that it is hard to tell which is correct—"habitation" or "praise." Some of the oldest versions of all have it, "He is my praise." I never like meddling with the Old Version, however; so we will take them both, and make sure that we do not miss the meaning. Doth not the Lord inhabit the praises of Israel? Let us build our God a house of praises; let us lay the deep foundations in love, set up the pillars with gratitude, and roof in the whole with joyous hallelujahs. The thought of care comes before me in the Authorized Version: "I will prepare Him an habitation," as if Israel said, "I will take pains to praise God, I will do it intelligently, and with my best powers; He shall have the best I can give to Him."

The verse closes with, "He is my father's God, and I will exalt Him." How can we exalt Him who is already high above all thought? We cannot make God really greater, but we can make Him greater in the estimation of our fellow-men. Perhaps I have groaned too much over my trials; perhaps I have been too depressed and heavy in spirit; but from this day I will exalt my Lord, and sound forth His praises. If He will permit me, I will make the glory of the Lord the one object of my being." Come, ye young men and maidens, ye old men and fathers, let us praise the Lord on the high-sounding cymbals, and spend the rest of our days in crying, "Sing ye unto the Lord, for He hath triumphed gloriously." Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

"THE WONDERS OF THE HEAVENS,"

by Camille Flammarion, translated from the French by Mrs. Norman Lockyer, presents the romantic side of astronomy. It has five divisions: the first, introductory; the second is devoted to the sidereal world; the third to the planetary system; the fourth to the moon and the astronomical influences on our own world; the fifth to the general consideration resulting from the preceding divisions. The author's aim is to interest and instruct those who have not acquired scientific knowledge. Everything is stated in the simplest language attainable, and scientific terms are generally avoided. The reading of this book cannot be called a study of astronomy; it is rather a pleasant talk with one who understands the subject and is attempting to fascinate some learner with a sketch of the beauties and marvels to which the science will introduce him. Pp. 289; price, $1. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

"CITY COUSINS,"

by Mrs. W. J. Hays, is a story for children conveying in an attractive style lessons that children have much need to learn. It contains much of adventure, and will certainly be popular among the young folks. Mrs. Hays has evidently watched children closely, and perhaps retains some vivid recollections of her own youth. Her little folks talk naturally, and act on impulses which always weigh with the juvenile mind. Amy's sorrows and Belle's mistakes are very common ones, as the child readers will realize. As they follow the story, and see how much trouble results from enterprises undertaken without parental guidance, they may perhaps be less disposed to venture on thorny paths themselves. It is a good, healthy story. Pp. 217; price, $1. Published by Thomas Whitaker, 2 Bible House, New York.

"MOVEMENTS OF RELIGIOUS THOUGHT

During the Nineteenth Century," St. Giles Lectures, by John Tulloch, D.D., LL.D. This work is professedly historical, and it is evident that Principal Tulloch has done his utmost to make it so. We can imagine that the effort was one of great difficulty, and the critical reader will notice in several places that the lecturer has not wholly succeeded. He has too strong convictions of his own, too keen an insight in theological differences, to speak with perfect impartiality of the different religious teachers whose portraits he places on his canvas. Perhaps it was well that this personality was not entirely suppressed. Wherever it appears it is wholesome. The one feature which predominates, and which surely breathes the spirit of Christ, is the tendency to see in every movement, and in the men who originated and led it, the good motive which animated them. There is a disposition among theologians, as among politicians, to condemn those who differ from them as something worse than fools—as men who are morally wrong. There is nothing of this in Principal Tulloch's teaching. He recognizes in the circumstances that surrounded these leaders a tendency to error which they set themselves to oppose. They were themselves carried by the force of their own energy into the opposite error, and a new movement was required to correct that. Thus constant movement, or, rather, a succession of movements, none of them wholly commendable, took place, each of which, with all its imperfections and defects, was better than the stagnation which is the dreariest of all states. It is with the first sixty years of the century that Principal Tulloch deals, leaving the last quarter of a century, the key-note of which is the word evolution, to other hands. Those sixty years have seen the rise of Coleridge, of Hampden and Arnold, of Pusey and Newman, of Carlyle, of John Stuart Mill, Grote and Lewes, of F. D. Maurice, and Kingsley, and of F. W. Robertson and Bishop Ewing. Of all these and their respective disciples Principal Tulloch writes reverently, but with discrimination, noting in each case the elements both of strength and weakness which they evinced. The survey is deeply interesting and instructive. Dr. Tulloch's concluding words show the spirit in which his work has been performed, and which we can but wish to see more prevalent: "The truth can only be seen by a large vision. What we perhaps all need most to learn is not satisfaction with our opinions—that is easily acquired by most—but the capacity of looking beyond our own horizon; of searching for deeper foundations of our ordinary beliefs and a more sympathetic appreciation of the beliefs of others. While cherishing, therefore, what we ourselves feel to be true, let us keep our minds open to all truth, and especially to the teaching of Him who is the Way, the Truth, and the Life." Pp. 338; price, $1.50. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

THE SEETHING NATIONALITIES.

In the course of his Friday evening talk, on November 20th, Dr. Talmage said: "A New England paper of this morning in its editorial says: 'Altogether it looks as though the blood Dr. Talmage saw on the European moon last summer was not due to any inflammation of the optic nerve.' You see that my sanguinary anticipations are being realized. At last the European war opens. The clouds have been gathering for a year, but within the past week the lightning bolts have sped. As the clash between Forts Moultrie and Sumter plunged this American Continent into the strife which had for forty years been fomenting, so the battle between Serbia and Bulgaria this week begins the slaughter European. Serbia victorious in one battle and defeated in the next, and so the shuttle will swing to and fro, weaving the deep scarlet robe of Continental suffering that shall wrap Turkey, and Russia, and Germany, and England, and France, and other nationalities in its horrid folds. They may hold as many conferences as they please, and may make new treaties and re-establish old ones, and the Lord Salisbury, and the Bismarcks, and Russian and Turkish diplomatists, with unpronounceable names, may put their ingenuity together, but there is so much bad blood over there that nothing but the phlebotomy of the sword can let it out.

"The war-dance of nations has begun, but he who attempts to foretell when it will close would be a rash prophet. What a pity it is that nearly nineteen hundred years after the song of peace and good-will was chanted about Bethlehem the world has nothing to prescribe for the settlement of international strife but wholesale cut-throatery!

"The fact that this transatlantic armageddon will rouse our American commerce and augment the tidal wave of financial prosperity already setting in, and put hard times behind all classes of our population, cannot keep merciful and right-minded people from deploring a contest which is to fill Europe with the groan of hospitals and the piercing cry of widowhood and orphanage. No doubt Europe will want all the bayonets we can manufacture, and all our harvests, because they will have no time either to plough or sow or reap, and our factories that run only half the time will run day and night, and all our unemployed people will be called into service, at large wages, and we shall have all the commercial prosperities that we had during our civil war, without any of the carnage. Still it is at a sickening cost to others, and that is a fiendish spirit which would be gleeful at foreign desolations, though they resulted in the reconstruction of our national finance. It never pays for one Continent to deride another, because our own turn might come next.

"Many of the European nations rejoiced at our internecine strife of 1861. We were for four years the butt of foreign aristocracies. They cried out in the words of Lord John Russell: 'See the bubble-bursting nationality.' They said, 'Going to pieces as we prophesied; have stuck together longer than we expected; what a farce Republican and Democratic form of government!' Multitudes in Europe got rich on our misfortunes. The more we writhed under our calamities the better they liked it. But our Government did not go to pieces, and it is stronger now than it was before the war.

"Now, the turn of our transatlantic neighbors has come, and they are going to be in an awful plight. But let us be more Christian toward them than they were toward us, and instead of exulting over their disaster, let us be sympathetic and pray for their speedy deliverance. The settlement of that quarrel is far beyond the capacity of human politics, and only the God of nations can guide or arrest it. Alas that ever since Cain slew Abel the blood of contest has trickled down the cheek of the world!

"All statistics fail to give any idea of the waste of life and treasure. When Napoleon's army marched up toward Moscow they burned every house for one hundred and fifty miles. The exorbitant and exhausting taxes of Great Britain and the United States are for the most part resultant from conflicts. When we complain about our taxes we charge the fault upon this administration or that administration, upon this line of policy or that line of policy, but it is a simple fact that to-day we are paying for the shot and the shell, and the ambulances, and the exploded fortresses, and the broken bones, and the digging of the grave-trenches, and for four years of national martyrdom. Edmund Burke estimated that the nations of this world had expended $35,000,000,000 in war. But he did his ciphering before our great American and European wars were plunged into. Careful statistics estimate that thirty-five times the present population of the earth have fallen in battle, and yet the grave-trenches are not satisfied, and yet, through the jealousies of potentates and under the inspiration of Satan, the arch enemy of mankind, the widest and most terrific war of the centuries seems this moment opening."

A SUCCESSFUL TUTOR IN AN ATTIC.

A PARTY of clergymen were discussing methods of preaching, theological books, and the best system of training for efficient work in the Master's service. The conversation had lasted for a long time, when one of them, turning to one of the most successful preachers in the party, said:

"We have not heard your views yet. How have you found the Princeton system work?"

"Excellently," said the clergyman addressed. "But such success as God has blessed me with, did not, I think, come through my college training at all, useful and necessary as that was."

"You had a private tutor, then, I presume?"

"Yes, and the strangest tutor you can imagine. When I was converted I was a clerk in a dry-goods store. I soon began to centre my hopes on ministerial labor, but the way was not open then. I wanted to do something for the Lord at once, but it seemed to me that my wisest course was to spend all the time at my disposal in study. Accordingly my evenings were given up to Latin and Greek, which, as I had no instructor, I found rather severe study. On Sundays between services I used to study the Bible in English, and try to plan sermons on any text that impressed me. That way of life answered for a time, but by and by I found my mind getting sluggish. I did not assimilate the mental nourishment I took in. I was troubled, and went to my pastor for advice."

"Get some work to do, young man," he said. "Teach in the Sunday-school, visit the poor and the sick."

"But the time," I replied. "I have so little, and I am so ignorant."

"You could not spend it in a better way. Don't be afraid. You will learn more in that way than the books can ever teach you."

"I took his advice, and found he was right. I had a class in the Sunday-school, and those lads, with their original questions, set me thinking, and I visited among the poor, and soon learned what religion is to them. But my most profitable visits were to an aged woman. Many an hour I have spent in her little room, which was so small that there was barely room to turn around in it. She had scarcely any education, but she could read, and she had one of the most original and vigorous understandings I have met with. She had very little to do and much time for meditation, for an infirmity in her feet prevented her getting about. She had spent days, I found, sometimes over a single passage, trying to understand its full meaning. That woman was taught of the Spirit. On my first visit to her I read and prayed with her, supposing she was like others of her class. When I had finished she asked me, to my surprise, what I thought was the meaning of the passage I had read. I told her, and she differed with me. I thought she was wrong, and said so. 'Well, young man,' she said, 'you think it over again and pray about it.' I did so, and I found she was right. After that our positions were changed. I no longer went to her as a teacher but as a learner, and I went often. Those seasons were times of intellectual activity, for I had preconceived notions of my own, and was driven to my defences. But the old woman was generally right, and she knew more of the mind of the Spirit than my study of the Greek had ever given me. She is dead now, but she lived to see me commence my ministry, and to openly acknowledge, as I do to-day, that to her, under God, I owe the most precious part of such knowledge as I possess."

THE SILVER LINING.

A SERIAL STORY.

Entangled.

WHEN Frank Arnold saw and recognized the startled face reflected in the mirror, he turned and confronted Mr. Greville with a look in which astonishment, scorn, and indignation were blended. It was inevitable that he should misunderstand his wife's presence there. As we have seen, her visit was caused by Mr. Greville's loyalty to his friend, and his desire to restore that friend's domestic happiness; but Frank regarded it as a proof that Greville had been plotting a foul wrong against him. At his best, Frank was prone to act on impulse and to be guided by appearances, and at this time he was not at his best. His mind was irritated by his long experience of money embarrassment, his uneasiness about Clare, and by dissipation. He was, moreover, conscious that he was a blunderer, and that from the time of his marriage he had done nothing but make mistakes. He had taken upon himself to regulate his own life, neither seeking wisdom from God nor taking counsel with his godly parents, and he was fooled and thwarted at every step. Some men in recognizing the fact would have turned to God, confessed their failure and their incapacity, and besought Him to lead them in the future. But Frank was not one of those; he became sullen and morose, and in that mood was ready to put the worst construction on what he saw.

For the moment embarrassment held Greville tongue-tied. Though conscious of the purity of his motives, he was aware that appearances were against him, and that neither the angry man before him nor the public would credit him with innocence in the face of the facts. Nor was Clare able to speak. She glanced timidly at her husband's face, saw the look there which she knew too well, and covered her own face with her hands.

Frank was the first to break the silence. "So," he said, "this is the explanation of the mystery. You are a dastard, and she—well, I shall not quarrel with you; but retribution will surely overtake you both. You will not escape."

"Arnold, Arnold," said Greville, as the indignant man turned toward the door, "you are making a deplorable mistake. There has been no treachery to you. Your wife has never been here before, and she is here now only because I have been trying to effect a reconciliation between you, and have urged her to return to your roof."

"And," said Frank, sneeringly, "you found her reluctant to do so? That shows that she has a clearer notion of the decencies of society than you have, or perhaps she prefers the protection of a wealthy man to the bond of wedlock with a poor man. Spare your explanations. I have been blind, but I am not so obtuse as to allow you to blindfold me now that my eyes are opened. I came to give you my address in England, little suspecting that I should interrupt a private conversation. There is the address; in a short time you shall hear from me from there, and that will close our account."

Frank hurried away in spite of Greville's efforts to detain him, leaving the two misunderstood persons helplessly gazing at each other.

"What does he mean?" said Clare at length. She had mixed so little with the world that even her husband's coarse words failed to convey to her the knowledge of her position.

"Your husband has drawn a wrong inference from your being in my room, Mrs. Arnold. He supposes that, from improper motives, I have lured you away from home, and am even now insincere in urging you to return. You know how false is his presumption, but appearances were certainly against me."

"Oh! how can he think so badly of you?" Clare said, her eyes filling with tears. "And I have been the cause of your being wrongfully suspected! Oh! call him back and let me tell him how kind you have been, and how honorable."

"I am afraid it would be useless, Mrs. Arnold. Dr. Arnold would give no credence to anything that either you or I could say. Unhappily, guilty people in similar cases have been so in the habit of declaring their innocence that people who are really innocent are not believed."

"Oh! I am so sorry," said Clare. "I ought not to have come. I am making you a sad return for your kindness to me. I can never forgive myself. Tell me what I can do."

"I fear there is nothing in your power. But, for your own sake, I would avoid any further ground for scandal, so, if you will allow me, I will escort you to your hotel. I must think this matter out, and try to find some way of convincing your husband of his mistake."

Clare scarcely heard his last words. She was weeping bitterly. Not on her own account, for she had no conception of her own painful situation, but because another was suffering through her indiscretion. Neither under the care of her widowed father, nor at the boarding-school, nor during her residence with her guardian had she learned how sensitive to the breath of scandal is a woman's character, nor how merciless is the world toward a woman whom it judges, rightly or wrongly. But she was grateful, and it grieved her that the man who had befriended her should have cause to regret his kindness.

Greville vainly tried to calm her sufficiently to permit of her return, but his soothing words had a dangerous effect. Clare was deeply agitated, and when, at last, she rose to go, her head swam, she staggered blindly, and would have fallen, had not Mr. Greville caught her and bore her to a lounge. The deathly pallor of her face alarmed him for a moment, and he was about to summon medical assistance, but, reflecting that it was probably only a fainting fit, he refrained. It was a novel and by no means a pleasant situation for the young man, and he stood looking at the death-like form before him in bewilderment. Something must be done, however. A college reminiscence crossed his mind. He remembered that an undergraduate fainted on one occasion in the University boat after a hard-winner race. They bathed his face and hands with cold water and he recovered. In a moment he was at his icewater cooler, and was saturating handkerchiefs to lay on Mrs. Arnold's brow, while with others he moistened her hot hands. A faint tinge of color in the pallid lips rewarded his efforts, and he patiently awaited returning consciousness.

As he stood watching her and renewing the moist handkerchiefs, he could not help feeling increased resentment against Frank Arnold. He was not an impressionable man, but no one could have gazed on Clare's face, as she lay there insensible, without admiration. Her golden hair had escaped from the comb and lay disordered on the pillow, giving a warmth of color to the pale, delicate complexion of her face and throat. He noticed, too, for the first time, that she was not wearing any of the rich dresses in which he had been accustomed to see her, but was attired in a robe which, as even his inexperienced eyes told him, was common, and had seen service. Evidently, in her flight, Clare had cast off her valuable belongings under an impatience of indebtedness to her husband. The tiny foot that peeped from the hem of her dress was covered by a shoe much worn, and but for her beauty and graceful carriage she would have passed for a woman of the poorest class. A man must be very hard and cruel, Mr. Greville thought, who could so wound a wife that she would humiliate herself as Mrs. Arnold had done. In his sympathy he forgot his own annoyance, and when Clare opened her eyes and tried to utter an apology for her weakness, he spoke to her with more than his usual deference and respect.

As soon as she was sufficiently recovered for him to leave her, Greville summoned a hack and sent her back to her hotel, and then sat down to think of some plan for the future. He was so strangely situated, so utterly unaccustomed to deal with a social problem like this, that he grew more perplexed every moment, and finally resolved to seek assistance from some more experienced mind. Rapidly running over the list of his acquaintances, he determined to consult an aged lawyer whom he had frequently met at his club—a man of considerable experience, whose vigorous mental powers had more than once vanquished him in political discussion. He seized his hat, and hurried to the club, where, as he knew, his friend was generally to be found at that hour.

"You seem to have drawn a hornet's nest about your ears," said the lawyer, when he had heard Greville's narrative from beginning to end. "I think there would be no difficulty in getting substantial damages from you if this doctor decided to carry his grievances into court, and if he shot you, I doubt if a jury would not acquit him. The web that a man generally gets caught in when he interferes in a matrimonial quarrel has twisted around your feet with a vengeance. There is nothing to do but to await developments. We do not permit duelling in New York, so, if your friend wants to fight, we can have him locked up. If he brings suit you must be defended. There will be plenty of time."

"Yes, I am not distressed by the dread of his vengeance, but I should like to know what is my wisest course with respect to the lady. She cannot support herself; honor forbids my supporting her, and yet she cannot be left to starve."

"My dear fellow, she would not starve. A beautiful woman is always sure of a livelihood. Let her alone; she will drop into her proper niche. She has no claim on you. You have already done more than you were required to do by the laws of friendship."

"No, she has no claim," Greville admitted, "but she is utterly friendless and helpless; I should like to aid her in some way that would compromise neither her nor myself. The only niche that awaits her if no one helps her, is one from which I would save her if possible."

"You Englishmen are Quixotic in your notions of friendship. I doubt if you will be successful any way. But some way might be found, perhaps. Give me a night to think of it."

"I will come to your office to-morrow. I am anxious to get the thing off my mind," said Greville, nervously.

As he was leaving the club, feeling thoroughly uncomfortable and anxious, he was greeted by another friend, who was walking rapidly down the avenue. He was a clergyman, the chaplain of a Masonic lodge with which Greville had connected himself.

"How are you, Greville?" he asked. "You look worried. The imperturbability of an Englishman is disturbed. That is unusual. What potent cause has moved you?"

The impulse to confide in the good clergyman was irresistible. Possibly he might find in him the most efficient friend he could secure for Mrs. Arnold, in whose future he was more deeply interested since he had been hurt by the cynical predictions of the lawyer.

"It is a long story," he said, "but I will tell it to you gladly, if you will listen."

"With pleasure, if you will walk with me. I am going to see a sick member of my church, and am walking off the effects of a long day at my desk."

Again Greville related the incidents of the past few weeks.

"It is a difficult case," said the clergyman. "I do not see how I can help you."

"I do not need help, my friend; that is, personally. What I am concerned about is that this lady has to face the world, with a reputation unjustly tarnished, and without any means of living. She is as ignorant as a child of the ways of the world, and if cast on her own resources will be subject, especially in this city, to temptations which I fancy she has not the tact nor the principle to avoid."

"I will see her if you like. I appreciate your thoughtfulness. It is best, as matters stand, that your connection with her should be severed. It is a pretty heavy burden for me to take from your shoulders, but I think it is a Christian duty. Give me her address, and a line of introduction, and I will visit her and let you know the result. Can your pocket-book bear another call upon it, if that should prove necessary?"

"Certainly; but money must go from me to her indirectly, if at all, or she will be injured irretrievably."

"I see that," said the clergyman. "This is my destination, so I will say good-night, and shall expect to receive my credentials to-morrow."

Mr. Greville at last felt relieved of the weight of anxiety which had oppressed him for many days. He could, he was sure, have enlisted no better friend for Clare than this devoted clergyman. He was a stranger to religious influences, yet somehow the conviction that a religious man could be of more use in this complication than another, was fixed. The fact struck him as being significant. How was it that the kindly feelings of his own heart, which appeared Quixotic to the man of the world, were recognized and appreciated by the clergyman? The inference could not be avoided that Christianity was in accord with benevolence, and was, in fact, a higher development of it. The clergyman's readiness to take up a burden which did not belong to him, to engage in a labor that must involve time and trouble at the request of a comparative stranger, who had done no more than show him that there was an opportunity of doing good, was in itself a phenomenon worthy of consideration.

"I have been a useless fellow all my life," he said to himself, "yet I must have had many opportunities of being useful in the world. No one yet has ever been the better for me or my money. I am a mere loafer, while this clergyman fills a place in the world that it would be a public calamity to have vacant. I wonder if religion is really the key to a useful and happy life? I will make a friend of this clergyman if possible."

He had strolled by this time to a considerable distance from home, and without paying any heed to the direction. Looking at the lamp on the next corner he found that he was far from the west side of the city, and fully three miles from his abode. His thoughts were busy, and he shrank from entering a public conveyance. He decided on walking home, hoping that physical weariness might induce the sound sleep from which he might awake mentally refreshed. His inveterate habit of smoking, however, must be indulged, and his cigar-case was empty. He stepped into the first cigar-store he saw, to purchase a fresh supply. He was vexed at finding that he had no small bills, and after vainly searching his well-filled pocket-book he offered the proprietor a twenty-dollar bill. The change was given him more readily than he expected, and lighting his cigar he strode out on his long walk, his mind busy with the train of thought his new idea of religious life called up.

Meanwhile a few miles away Frank Arnold was spending the night in a disreputable resort, utterly reckless, excited by liquor, and half mad with resentment at his fancied wrong. As the hours passed he drank more deeply and wandered from place to place in a delirious frenzy. His household goods were to be sold on the next day, his passage to England secured, and in twenty-four hours he would be on board a ship that was to sail at sunrise of the second day. Where he wandered, how he got through the night he did not know, but the morning found him sleeping uneasily in a chair in a low hotel in a strange neighborhood.

He was roused by a dirty waiter, and ordered to leave the place. Frank would have resisted with drunken pugnacity, but he was quickly hurried out with scant ceremony, and, boarding a car, arrived at his home with soiled clothes, rumpled linen, and all the marks of his night's debauch upon him. He went straight to bed, and slept long and heavily. He was awakened by the broker who came to purchase his furniture, and that bargain concluded, he packed his clothing and such articles as he intended to take with him and removed to an hotel near the docks. A few hours later he went on board, and retired to his stateroom to be away from the noise and bustle of the deck.

The time for sailing was near at hand when he heard his name called, and a man whom he supposed to be the steward entered his cabin.

"Your name is Dr. Frank Arnold?"

"Yes; what do you want?"

The man threw back his coat, exposing a policeman's shield, and claimed him as his prisoner.

"What charge have you against me?" Frank asked.

"I expect it will be murder by this time," said the officer. "You know a Mr. Greville?"

"Yes," said Frank.

"He was found in the street badly wounded yesterday morning, and is believed to be dying. A friend of his—a lawyer—has given information against you, so I must trouble you to come with me." The man dexterously slipped a handcuff on Frank's wrist and conducted him to the Tombs.

THE SINFUL NATION.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 6, Isaiah 1: 1-18. Golden Text, Verse 18. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Preaching Prophet—No Miracles Worked—God's Complaint Against Israel—The English People Similarly Guilty—The Nation Photographed—Insincerity in Worship—The Privileges on the Worshipper's Side—The Invitation—God's Living Words.

ISAIAH was one of the Lord's teaching prophets—not one who was used of God in the working of miracles as Elijah and Elisha were, but one who preached the living, burning Word of God—and was no doubt used very much in the way of preaching during his long life in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah. Even in our day how many precious souls are awakened, consoled, and sanctified through God's Word in Isaiah! The prophet had open eyes. He saw things in the light of God, just as Elisha did when he saw the mountain of Dotham filled with horses and chariots of fire round about him. Isaiah could see things in the spiritual world which were hidden from the eyes of those who lived around him.

Isaiah's first words are very significant: "Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth: for the Lord hath spoken." Were there no human beings with spirits fitted to understand the Word of God that the dumb and deaf creation should be called upon to hearken? Truly the people of God were deaf, or their ears dull of hearing that the Word of the Lord should call for such auditors! Isaiah's first message runs thus: "The Lord hath spoken; I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against Me: the ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib: but ISRAEL DOETH NOT KNOW, My people doeth not consider." God's complaint here is not so much against the open vices which are recognized as crimes by all men. He does not speak so much of theft, murder, adultery, blasphemy, but that His people do not know Him. He is their Owner, but they do not know Him even as the ox or the ass know their masters. He was in the world, and the world was made by Him, and the world knew Him not. He came unto His own, and His own received Him not (John 1: 10, 11).

"Israel doeth not know, my people doeth not consider." Surely this is not peculiar to Israel! If we look at the masses of the people in the streets day by day, if we read the newspapers of our time, and the leading political and social magazines, we see and hear very little to remind us of God. When an epidemic breaks out in our own or other lands, discussions are raised by medical and scientific men as to its cause, and how the evil is to be met; but we seldom hear mention of the hand of God, the first cause in all these things. We hear of terrible famines in India, in China, in Syria, and elsewhere. Again, man consuls with man as to the best measures to be taken, but the famine and the cholera sweep away their thousands before men are brought to say "the hand of the Lord is in this." People do not consider, or, in their consideration they leave out God, the first Cause, the primary Mover in all things which are done upon the face of the earth.

God calls His people "A sinful nation, a people laden with iniquity, a seed of evildoers, children that are corrupters:" but again His great complaint is: "They have forsaken the Lord, they have provoked the Holy One of Israel unto anger, they are gone away backward." Again and again He reverts to the same thing—the want of knowing God, the want of taking God into their reckoning. And yet how tender is His Word!

"WHY SHOULD YE BE STRICKEN ANY MORE?" As though His heart were yearning to heal His wounded children. He thus photographs the state of the nation in His eyes: "The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint. From the sole of the foot even unto the head there is no soundness in it; but wounds, and bruises, and putrefying sores: they have not been closed, neither bound up, neither mollified with ointment." What a picture of disease! What a picture of want of soundness! Yet so God sees every country where He Himself is not recognized as the prime Mover. So God sees a church where the pastor, where doctrine, where ritual is preferred to His living presence. So God sees a soul where Jesus Himself is not; where He is not known, where He is not considered.

After speaking of the desolation of Israel and Judah, God goes definitely into His relations with His people. "To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices unto Me? saith the Lord." Oh how well it would be for every professor in church to ask himself this question:

TO WHAT PURPOSE

is this prayer which I have offered? To what purpose is this hymn which I have sung? What do I expect it to accomplish? Is God a party to the transaction, or must I count Him out? Is it a something which I do under a sense of duty, or am I really transacting business with the Most High? Shall I have tangible proof that this transaction is acknowledged on the other side, and that my God Himself is pledged to undertake for me? How stands it between God and me? There are many who think that if they pray to God and go through the service in some place of worship on Sunday morning, they are laying God under an obligation; they seem to think they are conferring a favor upon Him, and that in some way or other He will benefit. Oh how unworthy is this thought! How we need to know God and to see the true relations between Creator and creature, in order that we may know our true place before Him! That God, who upholds the universe, should ever deign to listen to a single prayer from one of His sinful, insignificant creatures is indeed a wonder; and surely the forcing upon Him of prayers which are utterly unreal, which are spoken more to satisfy our own consciences or to maintain our respectability, than to obtain any face to face communion with God, must be a grievous mockery in His sight. When we repeat, again and again, that we are sinners, and ask, again and again, for mercy, without having any real consciousness of our sins, or any real appreciation of what mercy means, all this must be a sad, unmeaning farce in the sight of our Holy God. If that sin has brought His Son to the cross, if that mercy has cost Jesus His life, surely God cannot think lightly of it! And it behoves us, as His creatures, to set God's value on Christ's redemption, it behoves us to be real in our prayers and real in our praises. God's description of the utter rottenness of Judah applies too terribly to modern Christianity, even Protestant Christianity; there is in it as a whole, no reality, no substance. The little flock of true believers are but an exception; but oh, how blessed is the promise of the Lord to those who will turn to Him, "I will turn My hand upon thee, and purely purge away thy dross, and take away all thy tin." We read in this chapter of offerings made to God of which He says, "They are a trouble unto Me, I am weary to bear them." We read of many prayers of which He says, "I will not hear." We read of the calling of assemblies of which He says, "I cannot away with, it is iniquity, even the solemn meeting." We read of oblations which God calls "vain oblations, an abomination unto Me." Oh, if the veil were dropped and we could for one single Sunday of our lives see, as God sees, the offering of worship which goes up to Him from countless churches, and how much of it is a trouble to Him, how much of it He is weary to bear, surely there would be a reformation, and man would flee from his unreality to seek real terms with God.

He says, "Wash ye, make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before Mine eyes; cease to do evil; learn to do well; seek judgment, relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless, plead for the widow. Come now, and let us reason together." Let us have something to do with one another. Let us come to a fair understanding. "Come now," saith the Lord, for He does not want to put it off. "Come now." He does not first say that we must get rid of sin. Here is His part of the reasoning: "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." And here we see the reason of the command, "Wash ye, make you clean." Oh how impossible this would be if God did not undertake the washing, for surely nothing but the blood of Jesus Christ could cleanse us from all sin; but He says to the poor, guilty, defiled one, who comes to Him, "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow." There is the pledge of God that it shall be so. All the sinner has to do is to come face to face with God, to have something really to do with God, to come just as he is, into a reasoning attitude with God. He has to say to God what is on his heart, to hear what God has to say to him, to believe that God hears what he says, and to receive God's answer in return. Once the channel of communication open, once communion with God established, and the heart is won. Oh, if this invitation of God's were received, no sinner would remain unsaved, no backslider unreconciled, no believing soul longer unsanctified. When God speaks of sin He always brings forgiveness side by side with it. He always shows the way of purification.

Should there be any reading these words who know that they are without God and without hope in the world, let me ask you God's question: "Why will ye be stricken any more when such a way of salvation lies open to you?" Don't seek peace through sermons, or through meetings, or even through your own prayers, but be determined to have an interview with God. Don't do all the talking yourself; let God have His say, and as you leave space for Him to speak He will do so, and you will hear the voice of God and live. "Hear, and your soul shall live" (Isa. 55: 3). God's words are living words; as He spake the world into being, the light, the night and day, and the animal world into existence, so His Word can speak forgiveness, or cleansing, or deliverance into your soul. The Holy Spirit, who alone can make God's Word real to you, is in the world as in the very atmosphere, watching His opportunity to rush into and fill every vacant space in a heart turned toward God. All on God's side is for you, working out your deliverance. But He waits your response to this "Come now." It is the one great thought of the heart of God toward man to make him one with Himself, and the first step toward this is for man to hearken, to accept God's first advances. He will not force Himself on any single soul, but He calls to each one, "Come."

THE Ragged-School movement, which has now grown to vast proportions and has been the means of doing good to an extent that can never be fully estimated, had its origin in the devotion of the singular man whose picture appears on the first page. It may be inferred from the portrait that John Pounds was not of prepossessing appearance. That, however, does not affect his place in history. Many of the men whom the world will never forget, whose names are never mentioned without reverence and gratitude, have been men destitute of personal beauty. A notable instance was Socrates, whose ugliness is said to have been repulsive. It is the work that men do that counts, and the world can afford to forget whether God, who gave them the power to do it, gave them also an attractive exterior. Many a miserable child had reason to thank God that John Pounds lived, and for the love for the poor and neglected that filled his heart. And since he died other men have taken up his work and carried it forward to a state of efficiency of which the poor cobbler never dreamed. He little knew how potent a force he was starting; he had no thought of fame, but he simply did what he could; and his name will be had in everlasting remembrance.

John Pounds was born in the English seaport of Portsmouth, in 1767, and died in 1839, at the age of seventy-two years. His life was humble and unostentatious from beginning to end. Neither wealth nor power ever came to him. It is, however, a remarkable fact that, notwithstanding the immense value of the movement which he originated, and the universality of its adoption, so few details of his history should be on record. Only one really reliable biography is in existence, and that is a meagre one; enough, however, is given to make the picture of the man's simple, childlike character very vivid.

THE PORTRAIT.

Of which the picture on the first page is a copy, which is the only one in existence, has a singular history, which is thus set forth by the Rev. Henry Hawkes, the author of the biography mentioned:

"Mr. Thomas Sheppard, a boot and shoemaker of High Street, a member of my flock, called upon me one morning and said: 'There is a young man of the name of Sheaf, a journeyman shoemaker, living in Landport, who has a taste for drawing and painting; he has done several Scripture pieces which seem to me very creditable and promising for so young an artist, entirely self-taught.' He asked me if I would go and look at them. 'For it may cheer and encourage him,' he said, 'to see that some take an interest in his efforts.' I willingly consented; and we went in the afternoon. The young man showed us several oil-paintings that he had done. The subjects were all from Scripture.

"Shortly after Mr. Sheppard called on me again, and said, 'I have advised Sheaf to try something local in its interest, as more likely to help him forward, and bring him more into notice with his fellow-townsmen.' There's in St. Mary's Street," I said, "sitting at work on his bench, in the midst of his school; try that." And I took him to see the old man, with his host of little scholars about him, all so busy and happy. He took the hint, and has done the picture. And I want you to go and give us your opinion of it.' We went immediately. It was an oil-painting. On first seeing the picture I felt, 'There's the old cobbler! done to the life!' The general form and appearance of the old man were well given. He was sitting on his bench, with a shoe in his hand, mending. A boy was standing beside him on his right reading. Other boys were near him on the same side, some sitting, some standing, at their lessons. On the other side several little girls were sitting close to the old man, one with her arms round the neck of another. His cat was brushing against him, as if pleased with all that was going on. Bird-cages were hanging on the wall, all characteristic. And we heartily congratulated the young man on his success."

It appears that John Pounds's father was a carpenter in Portsmouth Dockyard. For some reason not difficult to guess he gave his son but a scanty education. At the early age of twelve John was apprenticed in the Dockyard. One day while at his work he missed his footing and fell headlong over the parapet into the dry dock (see illustration), and was picked up a mass of broken bones, and carried home on a stretcher. It seemed impossible that the lad could live, but live he did. He lay utterly helpless for months, hovering between life and death, but he gained strength and eventually was able to get around. The shock, however, to his nervous and physical strength frustrated all hope of his ever being able to work at such a trade as a ship carpenter, and he was accordingly set to learn the art of shoemaking.

As Dr. Kitto might have been a mason to the end of his days but for his fall, so John Pounds might have been a ship carpenter and nothing else, had not his so-called "misfortune" sent him to a sedentary occupation and given him opportunity to labor for God among the poor. Possibly John realized this fact in his simple way. A friend observed to him one day, "Ah, Johnny, that was a bad job for you, that fall into the dock." "I see not know that, Lemmon," said John. "I was a lively young chap then; full o' fun, up to every dodge, and who's know but I've been like many another young chap—gay and thoughtless? But they broken bones quieted me a bit. An' I've rubbed on very well, I has, thank the dear Lord!"

THE COBBLER'S SHOP.

a picture of which appears on the first page, was humble enough. It still stands in St. Mary's Street, Portsmouth. There he began the good work which has made his name famous. The upper part of the building is just as it was in his lifetime. The house is little more than six feet wide, and the height from the ground to the top of the wall, covering two stories, is only thirteen feet. The shop is not quite five yards from front to back, and is only about six feet high from floor to ceiling. And in that little place the good old man gathered about him thirty or forty children at a time, made them as happy as he could, and kept them busy at their lessons.

A VISITOR

who had the privilege of seeing the good man at his double work of cobbling and teaching thus describes the spectacle:

"As I stood looking at the old man, through his little open window, at his work cobbling, it was with very mingled feelings. A tallish boy was standing beside him reading, while the old man went on mending his shoe. He looked rough and self-neglected. He had no hat or coat on. His shirt was open at the collar and chest; the sleeves were rolled back above the elbows. There was a repulsive coarseness about his features. His voice was harsh and loud as he spoke to the children. What he said, and his manner of saying it, all would have given me the impression of coarse vulgarity if I had not heard so much good of him. But there was something about him which, the more I looked at him and observed his manner of doing things, impressed me with something superior through all. His head was large and manly. His features were strongly marked, and, with his deeply furrowed countenance, bespoke deep thought and feeling. A large pair of spectacles rested on his broad open forehead. His long arms, though somewhat spare, were muscular and sinewy. His hands were large, and full vigor. When he saw me he called out.

"HERE, LIZZY, COME AND READ for the gentleman." And a nice little girl, with clean, bright face, and neatly dressed, came and climbed up the old man's knee, and put her little arm round his dark, rough neck, and I gave her a kiss, and she looked very happy. The cat came with her, brushing against his leather apron, as if pleased with all that was going on. "Now, Lizzy, here's the sixth chapter of the Gospel according to Matthew; it's what o' Saviour's saying to the multitude as He sits 't the mountain side." And Liz read the chapter through with a clear, pleasant voice, and with scarcely any hesitations, and as if she felt. All the other children were still and listen as if they were interested in what she was reading. "That'll do, Lizzy." And he gave her another kiss. "Now go to puss and the young birds in the corner." And she jumped off her knee merrily, and puss went with her to the basket and the young birds in the farther corner.

"The man seemed to have a deep love for anything that was helpless and needed care. He had a number of birds that he was tending, but his cat was the treasure of which he was most proud. He was fond of talking to the animal, and related with much glee how it had successfully defended the birds from a vicious dog. He said,

"THAT'S MY CAT, SIR.

There's ne'er another cat in all the neighborhood round can come up to my cat. She a-nestling my young birds for me. She takes 'em and brings 'em up as if they's her own kittens. And she's not let any other cat or dog come near 'em. One day a butcher's lad come by, and sees my cat and the birds, and he brins his big bull-dog and sets him on to the little things. I says to him, 'You's not a-going do that 'ere?' 'But I bes though,' he say 'You's best not.' I says, 'I se not be answerable for the consequences.' 'There 'tis,' he says. 'In withy!' An' just as his big bull-dog's a-plunging in all among my poor little things—they's all so frightened, poor things!—my cat springs on dog's back, and begins a-clawing back of his head. Dog bobs down his head again. An' so they goes on, till dog bolts down street with my cat on his back. But it's all the lad's fault. He's not do it again in a hurry."

AN EXCURSION.

John Pounds's great delight was to get a day in the country with some of his scholars. The very little ones could not go, for he often to them some miles before they returned. Before they started he would prepare them a good breakfast, that they might be in a fit condition for a long day's ramble.

"Six o'clock in the morning was the hour of meeting, and breakfast was always ready. I time was lost over the meal. The dirty little street Arabs, cleaned up for the occasion, seldom had so good a meal, and John's provisions were quickly divided. 'Now, are ye all served he said, looking round upon them. 'Yes, M' Pounds!' they all replied. The old man gazed his hand, and all was still. And he said solemnly: 'Bless the Lord for His goodness. After a little pause they began, and all went to work in right good earnest."

A personal friend relates that the provision which they were to take with them for the day he had packed up in several bags, and observed "One bag is always much the largest. This carries himself. And very often in such rambles, when any of the younger ones begin to get tired and can't well keep up with the rest, he takes them up on his back, first one, and then another, and carries them. Whatever interests them interests him, and they can't help seeing that he is interested in it, and that he takes pleasure in telling them all about it. His kindness and patience among those poor children seem inexhaustible. Nothing seems to wear him while he is doing all he can for them."

"His strong hazel stick has a hook at the end

fecting more particularly the property of the Church, a belief arose that the end of the world was at hand. On that occasion Pope Gregory the Great thus expressed himself: "We know of the Word of Almighty God that the end of the present world is now at hand, and that the sign of the saints is about to commence. And now that the end of the world is approaching, many things will take place which have not happened before. For there will be atmospheric changes, terrors from heaven, deranged seasons, wars, famines, pestilences, and earthquakes in divers places." There is not a word about the personality of the Lord Jesus in that speech, and even by "saints" he meant a very different thing from what we do.

At the end of the tenth century there was a severe panic. Then it was not the commencement of the reign of the saints that was spoken of, but the end of it.

THE THOUSAND YEARS

are reckoned from the date of the Nativity, and Christ and His saints had been reigning through the apostles, the fathers, and the Church of Rome. Well, if men could believe that they could believe anything! But it was, nevertheless, the logical result of the Church's attempt to assume that the Christian hope had been realized, and to account for the anomalous position Christians had been taking up—ruling when they should have been witnessing against the World-Power. The Church is still making the same mistake of entangling itself with the World-Power. It is not satisfied with praying to God and petitioning the Legislature for its requirements, but it is constantly

THREATENING ADMINISTRATIONS

with the exercise of a casting vote between parties. Thus "coercion" is still the watchword. Under such a principle Christians become partakers of the deeds of what Christ is coming to destroy.

This coercion is a thing hateful to God. Peter was told to put up his sword. The same admonition then given to Peter is repeated in Rev. 13:10, to the saints in the latter days: "He that kilth with the sword must be killed with the sword—here is the patience and the faith of the saints." The use of the sword is the coarse form of coercion, perhaps, but the use of the suffrage, the effective weapon in the present day, implies the same principle. But if we want to have a clear understanding of corporate, and the principle underlying them, we must examine the epistles to the Churches in Revelation, chapters 2 and 3, which give in symbol the Prophetic History of Christendom, from apostolic times down to the Lord's coming. In the earlier period the Church was commended for hating the deeds of the Nicolaitanes (Rev. 2:6), which the Lord also hates. But when the Church in the time of Constantine began to ride upon the World-Power, she is charged with having within her "them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes," and, as if the more strongly to emphasize His condemnation of that doctrine, He repeats the words "which I hate." Who or what the Nicolaitanes are is a matter of opinion. But the meaning of the word is clear enough. It is derived from nikao, to conquer, and people, and it would thus appear that those who held this doctrine advocated "the subjugation of the peoples," i.e., a general coercion of political adversaries. Verily are the people bent to the will of the Church corporate!

The word "Laodicea," on the other hand, means "the people's rights," being derived from laos, "people," and dike, "right, law." Thus the last stage becomes worse than the first, and the Lord declines to own such a body altogether, casting it from Him in utter disgust (Rev. 3:16). Here the people are not coerced by the Church, as in the Nicolaitan stage, but they are coercing the Church, and the Church itself is perfectly satisfied with such coercion, even to the extent of giving its own voice to that of the people.

The unholy alliance will be continued until the end. We shall yet see the Church seated on the beast and allied with spiritualism and error of all kinds. She will utterly lose her spirituality, and even those who courted her will cast her off. It is the duty of those whom God has chosen to watch always, to keep clear of the World-Power, and to centre their hopes and their love on Him who will soon come to call those who wait for Him out of the world—the bride to meet the Bridegroom.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Philosopher Spinning Tops.—At a recent meeting Mr. Sloan remarked: "A scientific man was once seated in his room with a number of tops spinning around him. A friend came in and found him so engaged, and asked what he meant by this childish play, and he answered: 'I have to enter the kingdom of science, as we have to enter into the kingdom of heaven, as a little child. I have to spin these tops to get at the truth of science.'"

A Triumphant Pleader.—A Christian Worker said: "I knew a woman who made up her mind to pray for twenty persons. Daily she held them up in her faithful intercessions before the Lord, naming each one as she prayed for them; and on Sunday, as they came into the church, she lifted up her heart in prayer to God on their behalf, that they might be led to Christ through the preaching of the Gospel. She lived to see all those twenty persons yield themselves to the Saviour who shed His blood for them."

A Piece of Good News.—The Rev. Mr. Brown remarked: "The other day a friend came to me and said, 'Mr. Brown, I have got a piece of joy for you.' 'What is it?' I asked, 'for I am always glad to hear good news.' 'The other day, when I was in the country, I was called to see a woman who was dying. I asked her if she were trusting Jesus, and a joyful smile lit up her face as she told me how she first came to know and love the Saviour. She said that it was when listening to a sermon from you, in your own church, that she first realized her lost condition, and before you had finished she gave herself to Jesus.' I could not have heard better news."

A Whiskey-Seller's Refusal to Trust an Old Customer.—The value of a glass of spirits led to the poor fellow's conversion, as related by Mr. Jack, who said: "I spoke to a man in our meeting one night, and asked him how it was that he was there instead of at the rum-shop. The man replied: 'On my way home from my work to-night I entered a saloon I was in the habit of frequenting, and asked the keeper to give me a glass of whiskey, and I would pay him when I got my wages; but he surlily replied, 'No, no; come back when you have got your money, and I will give you as much whiskey as you wish.' I turned from the door resolving never to enter it again, though I had spent a lot of money there. I went home very much cast down, and could not take my supper, for I was so filled with the thought of the man refusing me one glass of whiskey, when he had got so much of my hard-earned money. I came out of my house, and eventually entered the Gospel meeting, scarcely knowing what impelled me, for it was not my habit, as you know, and now, blessed be God! I go away with Christ as my Saviour.' The rum-seller will probably never know how much good he has unwittingly done."

Saved From a Watery Grave.—Mr. Morrison related: "I am a living monument of the grace of God, and gladly testify how the Lord saved me. When very young I went to sea. I well remember how my dear mother took me aside and talked to me of the salvation of my soul before I left her. But when on board ship I soon forgot all my mother's early teaching and went fast down in the paths of sin. When we got to Wellington, New Zealand, there was a cry of 'A man overboard! A man overboard!' We got a small boat lowered, and a few of us went down into it, but almost immediately we were all thrown out into the water. Most of the men struggled until they got on board ship, but I was eager to save the man who had fallen overboard, for he was my companion. I swam about trying to find him, but soon found myself being carried away by the tide. I tried to swim against it for some time, but I had to give it up, and let myself be carried out to sea. I thought, 'Now I am going somewhere, but I know not where, into some great unknown future.' A feeling of intense anguish came over me, and I cried: 'O God, save me.' Just then I saw a small boat far out in the water. I shouted as well as I could; my cry was heard, and help came to me just when I was feeling I could hold out no longer. A strong man put out his hand and caught me by the hair, and lifted me into the boat. Every one was eager to see me when I came on board, but no one spoke to me about the salvation of my soul. I became very restless, and unlike myself, and so my mates began to say one to another, 'Did you see Jack! I think he has gone wrong in his mind since he was saved from drowning.' At length, by studying God's Word, I found the simple way of salvation. It is now seventeen years ago, and since then I have had the joy of witnessing for Jesus in various parts of the world."

"Drawn from the Mouth of Hell."—Mr. McKinnon related the following personal testimony: "I was strangely drawn from the mouth of hell and placed upon the Rock of Ages. Like many others, I was always going to turn over a new leaf, but it was always blacker than the former. I often said to myself, 'If I am going to continue in this course of sin I do not know what will become of me, my father and brother both fill drunkards' graves, and it is likely that I will fill one too.' I had the fear of death continually hanging over me; every night as I lay down I was afraid of waking in hell. I stood one evening at the corner of a street, stupefied by drink, and heard a band of Christians singing, 'Nothing but the blood of Jesus.' One of the workers came forward and asked me if I would go with them into the meeting. This at first I refused to do, but after some urging I went, and found myself for the first time in a church. A gentleman spoke to me in the after meeting, and I there and then closed with Christ. It is now eight months since then, and from that time to this God has given me grace to testify of His keeping power. When I feel myself being tempted, I cry, 'Lord, help me,' and He has never once failed to come to the rescue."

Last Entries in a Lady's Diary.—Mr. Sandlands said: "I recently heard of a lady living in the country who became very much concerned about her soul, and as time passed on she grew more and more restless about the settlement of this great matter between herself and God. The gaieties of the world seemed to fascinate her. I cannot give up all these enjoyments, for the world is very pleasant, but something must be done to ease this troubled conscience," she thought. Ah, she did not know then how soon she would be called to give an account of the deeds done in the body. It would have been well with her had she listened to the voice of that gentle Saviour ere it was too late, but, like many others, she preferred the world. Troubled and restless, she retired to rest, and not making her appearance at the usual hour on the following morning they tapped at her door, and getting no response they entered, and found her stretched upon her bed—dead. What were the world and its pleasures to her now? Her diary lay open on the dressing-table, and she had entered two things in it on the previous night. The first ran thus: 'I will give up the world and take Christ this night six months.' And then, as if she had repented of what she had done, she wrote underneath it: 'I will accept Christ as my Saviour this night month.' She did not seem to have realized the truth of these words: 'Behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation.'"

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Sudden Death of the Vice-President, on November 25th, caused a general gloom throughout the land, and in no place so profound as in Indianapolis, where he was best known. Mr. Hendricks was a genial, amiable man, and made friends wherever he was, even with gentlemen opposed to him in politics. When the news of his death was circulated in his own city people would not believe it, and his house and the street in which he lived was crowded with sympathizing friends anxious to be convinced that the report was false. It was only the day before that Mr. Hendricks attended a reception and appeared in his usual health. The next morning he complained of pains in his stomach, but they yielded to medical treatment. In the afternoon he said that he was free from pain, and Mrs. Hendricks and his nephew, who had watched by him during his attack, left him for a few moments. When Mrs. Hendricks returned to the sick room she found her husband dead. His death was caused by paralysis of the heart. He had frequently expressed a wish that he might not die of a long, lingering illness, and his wish was granted. His friends state that he was a man of sterling Christian character. He was in his sixty-seventh year, having been born at Zanesville, O., on September 7th, 1819. He was elected to Congress in 1851, and in 1862 was elected to the United States Senate by the Indiana Legislature. In 1872 he was elected Governor of the State. He was a strong candidate for the Democratic Presidential nomination in 1875, but accepted the second place on the ticket when Mr. Tilden was nominated. After the election he resumed his law practice, from which he was again called last year by his nomination to his old place on the Presidential ticket. As Vice-President, he has presided in the Senate with dignity, but it has been frequently asserted that his views were not in harmony with those of the President on the subject of the appointments.

President Cleveland has been Strongly Urged both by Democrats and Republicans to absent himself from the Vice-President's funeral. The fact of the advice being given directs public attention again to the subject of the succession to the Presidency as it was directed in 1881. It is felt that Mr. Cleveland ought at this time to avoid any unusual risk to his life, even by a railroad journey, and exposing his person in a public procession, where some crank might try to emulate Guiteau. There is the more ground for the apprehension because there is now neither a President pro tem of the Senate nor a Speaker of the House to succeed him if he should die. When the Senate meets it will immediately proceed to the election of a President, but during that interval there will naturally be some anxiety about the President's life. The new President of the Senate will be a Republican, and the nation now sees how culpable was the negligence of the last House in failing to act upon the bill providing for the Presidential succession which passed the Senate.

New Proceedings in the Grant & Ward Failure were commenced on November 23d by the indictment of William S. Warner and J. H. Work by the United States Grand Jury. It will be remembered that during the investigation of the affairs of the defunct firm, and again during the trial of Ferdinand Ward, the names of Warner and Work frequently came up as recipients of large sums of money. Apparently these sums were paid as profits on special partnerships or as interest on loans; but the Grand Jury appears to suspect that there was a guilty knowledge on the part of Warner and Work. The result has been their indictment, which is practically one of conspiracy. It charges Ferdinand Ward with misapplying various sums of money—the funds of the Marine National Bank—for the benefit of Warner, Work, and himself. It is expected that Ward will appear as a witness and testify against the other defendants.

The Exciting Poll in Fulton County, Georgia, on November 25th, terminated in a Prohibition victory. By a majority of 228 in a total vote of over 9000 the county declared for Prohibition. The contest was a very severe one, and both sides worked in earnest. The county has twelve precincts, of which two are in Atlanta. The county precincts were known to be in favor of Prohibition, and the real struggle occurred over the two in the city. Of those North Atlanta gave a Prohibition majority of 11 in a vote of 2500. South Atlanta voted for liquor by a majority of 331 in a vote of 3500. The opponents of Prohibition threaten to carry the case into the courts, where, owing to a technicality in the law, it may be possible to reverse the result of the poll.

The Election of a United States Senator in Ohio is giving rise to some anxiety. The Republicans in the Ohio Legislature have a majority over the Democrats of only three on joint ballot. If, therefore, a combination should be effected by the Democrats which would secure only three votes, the candidate of the combination would be elected. Though Mr. Sherman commands the support of a large majority of the Republicans, there are rumors that a few would not be sorry to see him retired from the Senate. The friends of the Senator are therefore apprehensive. One influential journal, in the course of an article advocating his re-election, is very emphatic. It says: "If any two Republicans vote with the Democrats for Senator they will go down to posterity in more infamy than Booth and Guiteau. In fact, we would not insure their safe exit from this city." As Mr. Sherman has shown great concern about political intimidation in the South, the Southerners have now an opportunity of reciprocating his interest.

The Death of the King of Spain Occurred on Wednesday, November 25th. The king has for some time been in failing health, which was not improved by his anxiety about the dispute with Germany over the Caroline Islands and his recent tour through the cholera-infected districts. He became alarmingly ill on November 23d, and his physicians declared that he was suffering from consumption accelerated by dysentery. He does not appear to have rallied, and a series of spasmodic fits precipitated the end. He was but twenty-eight years of age, and has reigned eleven years. The sudden decline in Spanish securities, which took place when his death was announced, indicates the general apprehension that the immediate future of Spain will be troubled one. The heir to the throne, if a posthumous son is born, is a little girl now on five years old. It is unlikely that the Queen, who is appointed regent, will be able to hold in check the intrigues of the Carlists and Republicans.

The Collapse of the Servian Invasion of Bulgaria was announced last week. There have been so many predictions of King Milan's success that the news occasions some surprise. The reports indicate that the Servian Army was led by incapable officers, and that the King himself committed fatal blunders. Prince Alexander displayed good generalship and personal valor. He led his small, compact body of troops to battle in person, and was always in the hottest of the fight. On November 24th he succeeded in driving the Servian invaders across the frontier, and pursued them. He was, however, stopped in his career of conquest by the threat of Austrian intervention. An armistice has now been arranged. Intimations are made that if the Prince will place himself under Austrian protection Austria will defend him against the machinations of Russia. The unexpected turn matters have taken in the disturbed provinces has not allayed European anxieties.

The Barbarous King of Burmah, again, whom the British have sent an expedition, probably by this time paying the price of his temerity. His subjects regard him with terror and hatred, and are welcoming the British forces. There have been two engagements with the Burmese troops, in which the British won an easy victory in each case. The Burmese fled to the jungle, and were not pursued. General Prendergast, who commands the British expedition, expected to reach Mandalay, the capital of Burmah, on Saturday last.

The British Elections Held Last Week decided the fate of rather less than one half the members of the House of Commons. Under the Act passed by the last Parliament the new House will consist of 670 members. Of these 295 were elected last week. They were 141 Liberals, 135 Conservatives, and 19 Parnellites. This apparently gives the victory to the Liberals; but when the results are analyzed it is evident that they have been practically defeated. The Conservatives have gained 80 seats which were formerly held by Liberals, while the Liberal gain is only 36, which makes a net loss of 44. There are 375 members to be elected this week, and it is chiefly the counties that have to vote. The members already elected are chosen by the towns. The counties hitherto have generally elected Conservatives, but this year the agricultural laborers will vote for the first time and it is possible that in many districts their votes will be sufficient to elect Liberals instead of Conservatives.

Mr. Parnell's Prospects were Decidedly Improved by the elections held last week. Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues expected an overwhelming majority over Conservatives and Parnellites combined. It now appears that if the Liberals have a plurality it will be very small and Mr. Parnell, with seventy or eighty followers, can, by casting a solid vote, decide every question. If that result is achieved the Irish leader may make a bargain for his alliance which will be a measure of Home Rule for Ireland. One remarkable result of the election already held is that, with the exceptions of Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Labouchere, Radicals, and Mr. Bradlaugh, the infidel, the advanced Liberal have been generally defeated at the polls, and such Liberals as have been elected are the moderate men who acknowledge the leadership of the Marquis of Hartington. Various reasons have been assigned for the Liberal reverses, but it is evident that one of the most potent was the order issued by Mr. Parnell for Irishmen everywhere to vote against Liberal candidates. Another cause that has operated is the belief that the Liberals intended to disestablish the English Church. That has doubtless driven many churchmen into the Conservative camp.

Mrs. Baxter is this Week Attending the Convention on Holiness and Divine Healing, at Chicago. The meetings commenced on December 1st. Thence she goes to Detroit, Michigan to take part in the convention to be held in that city. Much interest is being awakened on the subject by these conventions among both Christians and worldlings. It is impossible to close the eyes to facts, which are patent to hundreds of people, who see friends whom they know to be afflicted, and to have been so in some cases for many years, rising from their beds of sickness and going about their business and praising God. We observed from two reports of the Convention held last week in Pittsburg, Pa., which are published in Pittsburg journals, that there is a disposition to attribute these cures to spiritualism. People who do so forget the conclusive argument our Saviour Himself used to such objectors in His day (Matt. 12: 25-28). Mrs. Baxter, in common with a large number of Christians, attributes spiritualism to Satan. We understand that a manifest blessing attended the meetings Mr. Baxter conducted last week at Mount Pleasant, Ohio.

The Advent Mission Commenced in New York last Sunday. Special services are being held every night in twenty-two Protestant Episcopal churches of the city, and a mid-day service is held every day in Trinity Church, at which Rev. W. M. Hay Aitken preaches. The Revs. Francis Pigou, D.D., E. Walpole Warren, R. Bolton Ransford, and James Stephen have come from England to take part in the mission, and will preach at the various churches. Clergymen also have come from Canada, St. Louis, Mo., Philadelphia, Pa., and other cities to assist. A spirit of prayer and an earnest seeking for God's blessing has been awakened among the churches.

Ben Hogan, the Converted Pugilist, has been conducting meetings in Omaha during the past month. The Omaha Daily Bee says that the Buckingham, in which the meetings were held, was filled to overflowing every night. The pastors of the city attended and took part in the meetings. A notable feature of them was the attendance of so many roughs and drinking men. Among these classes Hogan is well-known, and there is much curiosity to see how the change worked in him is affecting him. He tells out with force and candor how he was saved, and his words are listened to with breathless attention. Since Jerry McAuley died no one seems to have the power to reach the lowest depths of society that Ben Hogan has received.

A Special Meeting for Young Men only was held on November 24th, in the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association, of New York. Mr. Ira D. Sankey sang several solos. The meeting was under the auspices of the White Cross Army. The eminent physician, Dr. D. B. St. John Roosa, whose experience in the city qualifies him to speak authoritatively of the prevalence of vice among both sexes of our citizens, made an earnest appeal for the spread of knowledge on the subject that our young people might be warned of the physical consequences of sexual vice. He said that there should not be any false shame about talking to men about personal purity. There was no danger of educating young men into sin by telling them what they ought to avoid. Frankness and sincerity were effective weapons to use against the peculiar vices that were undermining society. In illustrating the far-reaching effects of vice, Mr. Moray Williams said that it was a matter of record that this State had expended more than $1,300,000 to support four generations of the descendants of one fallen woman. The Rev. S. H. Virgin, of Harlem, alluded to the Pall Mall Gazette revelations in London, and said that if a truthful exposé of the extent of vice and licentiousness in New York should be made by some reputable newspaper, a story would be told that would blanch the cheeks and curdle the blood of Christian men and women. Cards bearing the pledges of the White Cross Army were distributed among the audience, and several of them were returned to the platform bearing signatures of persons who desired to be enrolled in the ranks of the Army.

An Accident Occurred on the Brooklyn Bridge on November 23d. A train which left the Brooklyn side about nine o'clock in the morning ran into the train ahead of it, which was stationary at the foot of the first ascent, and wrecked the rear platform and broke the windows. As the cars of both trains were full, it was providential that not more than three people were hurt, two of them being cut by the broken glass. The fault was with the forward train. Only two of its three cars were attached to the cable. It had run easily down the incline, but on arriving at the ascent the dead weight of the car which had missed the cable was thrown on the grip of the cars that had caught it, and the strain was too great. It appears that every car must grasp the cable with its own grip, and this can only be done at one part of the journey, where the cable is momentarily lifted within reach of the apparatus under the car. At that point the grip must be closed, or the car cannot be drawn over the bridge. In several particulars this typifies spiritual experience. The downward path for any man is easy: his own momentum will carry him on; but for the upward path he needs help. This he must grasp for himself; his connection with those who have grasped it cannot serve for him. And it is a solemn fact, not sufficiently realized, that there comes to every man one moment in his life when he must accept the offer of the Gospel or miss it forever (1 Chron. 28: 9).

A Night in the Saltpetre Caverns of Kentucky was inadvertently spent by a young explorer last week. A college student started on November 23d, with a party of ladies and gentlemen, to examine the famous saltpetre cave, which has never been thoroughly explored. They entered the cave about three o'clock, and the student led the way. In some manner the distance between himself and his party increased until they lost track of him, and he found himself alone in the gloomy place, with only two inches of candle left. The party tried to find him, but could not. They shouted, but the cavern walls held their voices like a pocket, and after seeking for over two hours, they were compelled to return without him. The news of the affair spread through the town, where the young man was well known. A crowd gathered, and a party of one hundred volunteers offered to search the cavern for him. The search was long and wearisome, but it was continued for four hours, when the missing man was found, sitting all alone in the dark. He was escorted to his home by a torchlight procession, amid the cheers of the citizens. Would that the same diligence were displayed in seeking for souls lost in the dark caverns of sin and unbelief! (Isa. 6: 8.)

A Reformed Four-Footed Inebriate Resides at Auburn, N. Y. A saloon-keeper in that town owns a handsome jet black dog, who has done duty since puppyhood as watchman of his premises on State Street. One hot summer day, when water could not be obtained about the saloon, the dog drank from a pan which stood under the beer faucet to catch the drippings. Unhappily for him he liked it, and from that time substituted beer as his beverage for the water to which he was accustomed. He grew sleepy, morose, and uncertain in his temper. Several plans were tried to wean the dog from his bad habits, which spoiled him for his business of watching at night, but without success. In one way or other the dog managed to get beer, and his case was considered hopeless. A new dog was bought and employed at night in the saloon with the inebriate. What passed in the latter's canine mind cannot be known, but he showed that he was jealous of the new-comer, and drove him away. A day or two passed, and to the surprise of all who knew him, the dog was seen drinking water, and a pan of beer being purposely left in his way, he avoided it. He redoubled his vigilance in his duties, and for six months has adhered strictly to total abstinence. The reformation has caused much amusement among the frequenters of the saloon. The dog's example may be commended to any who, through liquor or any other sinful indulgence, are unfitting themselves for the performance of duty (1 Thess. 5: 7, 8).

A Suicide's Last Letter, Published Last Week, displays a very perverted understanding, as well as bad morals. The man was a German immigrant, who came to New York two years ago with $800 to commence business. He was unsuccessful, and fell into poverty. A fellow-countryman befriended him, took him to a boarding-house, and arranged to support him until he could find employment. But a situation could not be obtained, and the man grew despondent. Finally, on Thanksgiving Day, he was found dead in his room, with an empty morphine bottle by his side. On the table was a letter addressed to his benefactor, in which he said: "I am taking morphine, which it may be is bitter, but it cures all evil." It was a rash assertion. When he wrote it he had not tested its power. It removed him from the particular evil he was enduring, but it introduced him to evils for which there is no remedy. The only panacea which cures all evil is the one God reveals in the person of His Son (Isa. 53: 4, 5).

A Sermon Led to a Romantic Reunion in South Carolina two weeks ago. Special services were being held at Rock Hill by Bishop Moore, of the African Methodist Episcopal Church. The venerable bishop, who was born in Virginia more than seventy years ago, and in his boyhood was known as Benjamin Clawson, described as an illustration of some point in his sermon how his escape from slavery was effected. On November 21st, a few days after the bishop related the incident, an aged negress called upon him and said that her brother Benjamin was saved in just the way he had described. A comparison of notes convinced them that they were brother and sister. It is sixty-two years since they were separated. They must have often met since the war, but neither of them suspected the relationship until the preaching of this sermon. The circumstances of this case were peculiar, but a similar discovery of wider import is often made in listening to a sermon. A hearer to whom it is blessed is received into the family of God, and through Christ finds he has many brethren (Matt. 23: 8).

A Marriage at a Jail Window was Solemnized in Virginia on November 14th. The moon shone softly just before midnight on the lonely jail of Chatham Hill, Va. A carriage was driven under a certain window in the gloomy pile of buildings. A prisoner was looking out through the bars, and recognized the carriage and its inmates. They were three—a young lady, her brother, and a clergyman. The identity of the prisoner was tested, and then the young lady was assisted to her brother's shoulders, on which she stood, steadying herself by a firm grasp on the bars of the prison window. The lady and the prisoner joined hands, and the minister, standing up in the carriage, asked the usual questions, and pronounced the pair man and wife. The bride's party then drove off, leaving the bridegroom in his solitary cell. The motive for this singular proceeding was to relieve the lady from the pain of having to testify against the prisoner on his trial. A man was lying in hospital at the point of death from injuries inflicted by the prisoner, while avenging an insult offered to the lady, to whom he was engaged. If the injured man dies, as was expected, she will be the only witness whose testimony could convict the murderer, and now, as his wife, she will not be required to give it. All she could do for him was to help him to evade justice. She could not purge him from guilt. The Christian's position is very different. He not only escapes punishment, but is justified, because the penalty he has incurred has been borne by his Saviour (Rom. 8: 33, 34).

THE WAGE AND THE GIFT.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord."
—ROMANS 6: 23.

A Christian Proverb—I. The Wages of Sin—Death its Natural Result—The Awful Moral Death—Sins that Murder—Often Insidious—Paid in Instalments—As Ultimate Wage—Is Earned—Folly to Go on Working for it—Restored by Miracle—II. The Gift—Eternal Life—Imparted by Grace—A Wonderful Gift—Not Mere Existence—Unending—To be Received—Abiding in it—The Dry Bones.

IN the fifth chapter of this Epistle Paul had shown at considerable length our justification from sin through the righteousness of Jesus Christ our Saviour. Our apostle goes on to speak of our sanctification in Christ; that as by the righteousness of Christ we have been delivered from the guilt and penalty of sin, so by the power and life of Christ in us we are delivered from the dominion of sin, so as not to live any longer therein. His object is to show that true servants of God cannot live in sin; that, by reason of our newness of life in Christ, it is not possible that we should continue to yield our members instruments unto iniquity. While he is driving at this argument our apostle incidentally lets fall the text, which may be regarded as a golden sentence, a divine statement of truth worthy to be written across the sky. Here you have both the essence of the Gospel and a statement of that misery from which the Gospel delivers all who believe. "The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord."

I. First, death is

of sin. The apostle has in his mind's eye the figure of a soldier receiving his pay. Sin, the captain, pays his hired soldiers a dreadful wage. The original word signifies "rations," or some translate it "stipend." It means the payment which soldiers receive. Now that which sin, the grim captain, pays to those who are under him, is comprehended in this terrible term "death." It is a word as full as it is short. A legion of terrors are found around this "king of terrors." Death is the rations which sin pays to those who enlist beneath its banner.

To set forth this terrible fact I shall make a few observations. First, death is the natural result of all sin. When man acts according to God's order he lives; but when he breaks his Maker's laws he wrecks himself, and does that which causes death. The Lord warned Adam thus: "In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." Dying does not mean ceasing to exist, for Adam did not cease to exist, nor do those who die. The term "death" conveys to me no such idea as that of ceasing to exist.

A LINGERING DEATH.

The further a man goes in lust and iniquity the more dead he becomes to purity and holiness; he loses the power to appreciate the beauties of virtue, or to be disgusted with the abominations of vice. Our nature at the very outset has lost that delicacy of perception which comes of healthy life; and as men proceed in unchastity, or injustice, or unbelief, or sin of any kind, they enter deeper and deeper into that awful moral death which is the sure wage of sin. You can sin yourself into an utter deadness of conscience, and that is the first wage of your service of sin.

As there is through sin a death to God, so is there a death to all spiritual things. "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." The man doth not perceive and discern spiritual things, for he is dead to them. Talk to him of the sorrows of the spiritual life—he has never felt them, and he despises them as mean cant. Speak to him of the joys of the spiritual life, and you will soon discover that you are casting your pearls before wine: he has never sought such joys; he does not believe in them, and he thinks you a fanatic for talking such nonsense. He is as dead to spiritual realities as a mole is blind to astronomy, or a stone is dead to music.

Inasmuch as in holy and spiritual things dwells the highest happiness of our manhood, this man becomes an unhappy being; at first by deprivation of the joy which spiritual life brings with it, and afterward by suffering the inevitable misery of spiritual death. God has justly appointed that if a man will not be conformed to God he shall not taste of happiness; and if a man will follow after that which is evil, that evil shall of necessity bring with it sorrow and unrest (Rom. 2: 9). Since sin as naturally brings spiritual death upon men as fire brings burning, death is spoken of as the wages of sin.

MURDEROUS SINS.

I would observe, next, that the killing power of some sins is manifest to all observers; for it operates upon the body and the mind as well as upon the spirit. This spiritual death of which I speak may not strike some of you with fear; you may think it a small matter, though to me I do confess that hell, however painted, is never so terrible a thing as the death which fills it. Some sins are murderous to a degree which is clear to all. For instance, if a man takes to drunkenness, or if he indulges in lasciviousness, it is manifest even to the unspiritual that the wages of sin is death. See how by many diseases and deliriums the drunkard destroys himself; he has only to drink hard enough, and his grave will be digged. The horrors which attend upon the filthy lusts of the flesh I will not dare to mention; but many a body rotting above ground shall be my silent witness.

All know, or ought to know, the mischief which is occasioned to men and women by the violation of that law which commands us to be pure. I spoke the other day to an aged brother who feels the result of natural decay, but is in all other respects sound and healthy, and I congratulated him upon retaining so much vigor at such an age. "Yes," he replied, "I owe it to the grace of God that I never abused myself in my younger days, and hence I have a store of strength in my old age." How many, on the contrary, feel the sins of their youth in their bone and in their flesh.

INSIDIOUS POISON.

Now, this tendency is in every case the same—"the wages of sin is death" everywhere to every one. It is so not only where you can see it operating upon the body, but where you cannot see it. I may perhaps startle you when I say that the wages of sin is death even in the man who has eternal life. Sin has the same deadly character to one as to the other, only an antidote is found. You, my Christian brother, cannot fall into sin without its being poison to you, as well as to anybody else; in fact, to you it is more evidently poison than to those hardened to it. If you sin it destroys your joy, your power in prayer, your confidence toward God. If a man takes poison, if it does not absolutely kill him, it injures him, and thus proves its killing tendency. In certain places the air is pestilential, and though a very healthy man may pass through them and seem none the worse, yet this does not disprove the general deadly tendency of the malarious district, nor does it even prove that the healthy person is not secretly but really injured by having been there. Evils caused by sin may be too deep to be at once visible, just as the most serious of diseases have their periods of incubation, during which the person affected has no idea of the ill which is hatching within him. Sin is in itself an unmitigated evil, a root which beareth wormwood. Sin is death.

Now, observe that this death, this wage of sin, is in part received by men now as soldiers receive their rations, day by day. It is a terrible thing that they do so receive it. I would that men here who are not converted would recollect where they now are—they are "dead in trespasses and sins." Oh, men, you are not merely sick, but you are "dead in your sins"! You are already dead to the highest spiritual enjoyments, and can never know them except by passing from death unto life.

But, then, a Roman soldier did not enlist merely for his rations; his chief pay often lay in the share of the booty which he received at the end of the war. He expected to share in his captain's triumph and to be a partaker in the spoil. Death is the ultimate wage of sin. The death which is here intended is the

and wreckage of the soul, the destruction of all about it that is worth having, the drifting of the guilty being forever upon the full tide of those evil tendencies which caused his sin, and were further increased by sin. When all comes to all, this is where sin will drive you; it will perpetuate itself, and so forever kill the soul to God, and goodness, and joy, and hope. You will enter upon a world in which the highest enjoyments which even God Himself can provide for men will be revealed, but they will be hidden from your eyes because you will be utterly incapable of knowing, appreciating, and enjoying them. Till your last moments you chose sin, and through eternity you will still choose it; for this death is the reward of your sin.

As our Saviour taught, that future death includes within itself the fire which never shall be quenched, the worm that never dieth, the outer darkness, the weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth, and the departure into everlasting fire which begins with a curse from the lip of love. Alienation from God is death, and can never be otherwise. The Holy Ghost, speaking of the ungodly, saith, "In flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ: who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of His power." This will be the ultimatum of sin. As surely as rivers run into the sea, so surely must sin run into death; there is no help for it.

IT IS EARNED.

I shall not longer dwell upon it, the subject is so distressing to me, save that I must add a few solemn words. The misery of the misery of sin is that it is earned. Every pang that shall fall upon the ungodly either in this life or in the life to come will have this for its sting—that I was duly earned. The sinner may well say, "I worked for this; I laid myself out to earn this; I now feel the misery of what I willfully did." Death is the result of being out of gear with God. But the sinner puts himself into that condition. The worm which gnaws at the heart of the lost soul is its own willful hate of God and love of evil. Oh, lovers of sin, you are under the power of this death—this worse than death! You are dead to God, and dead to holiness, and dead to love, and dead to true happiness; and you have brought this death upon yourself, every part and particle of it. You have chosen that which has made you a wreck and a ruin, and that in the teeth of many warnings and admonitions. It must be so that "the wages of sin is death," and the terror of that death is that it comes as a wage.

AN APPEAL TO EXPERIENCE.

Note, next—and I speak with the truest compassion—that it will be the folly of follies to go on working for such a wage. Hitherto they that have worked for sin have found no profit in it. What fruit have you had, any of you, in the things whereof you have cause to be ashamed? Has sin ever brought you any real benefit? Come, now, and let us reason together—up till now has doing wrong ever worked for your health or your happiness? Are you the better for hate, or greed, or lust, or drink? Has sin ever developed your inner self into anything worth calling life? You know it has not. It has rather destroyed you than improved you, and you know it. Why, then, will you go further in sin? Have you not learned enough already of the deadly nature of evil? Why will you press further into this barren region, which will become more and more a howling wilderness to you as you advance into it? Why will you go where it will be more and more difficult to return?

One thought more ere I leave this point, and that is, it must certainly be a miracle of miracles if any sinner here does not remain forever beneath the power of sin. Sin has this mischief about it, that it strikes a man with spiritual paralysis; and how can such a palsied one ward off a further blow? It makes the man dead; and to what purpose do we appeal to him that is dead? I have tried to describe what a dreadful thing it is to be dead to God, and purity, and happiness; but the dead man does not know or care for these things. Our preaching may well be called foolishness, since it is addressed to ears that cannot, or, rather, will not, hear. Only one power is capable of affording you the help you need; and that power worketh through the Lord Jesus, who is at this moment mighty to save.

II. And now I am glad to pass into liberty and joy while I speak on the second subject, Eternal life is of God. Note well the change: death is a wage, but life is a gift. Sin brings its natural consequences with it; but eternal life is not the purchase of human merit, but the free gift of the love of God. The abounding goodness of the Most High alone grants life to those who are dead by sin. It is with clear intent to teach us the doctrine of the grace of God that the apostle altered the word here from wages to gift. Naturally he would have said, "The wages of sin is death, but the wages of righteousness is eternal life." But he wished to show us that life comes upon quite a different principle from that upon which death comes. In salvation all is of free gift; in damnation everything is of justice and desert. When a man is lost he has earned it; when a man is saved it is given him.

Let us notice, first, that eternal life is imparted by grace through faith. When it first enters the soul it comes as God's free gift. The dead cannot earn life; the very supposition is absurd. Eternal life enjoyed on earth comes to us as a gift. "What!" saith one, "do you mean to say that eternal life comes into the soul here?" I say yes, here, or else never. Eternal life must be our possession now; for if we die without it it will never be our possession in the world to come, which is not the state of probation, but of fixed and settled reward.

NEW LIFE.

If any man here could have been literally dead, and then could have been made to live, what a wonderful experience his would have been! We should go a long way to hear the story of a man who had been dead and then was made alive again. But I tell you his experience, if he could tell it, would not be any more wonderful than our experience as quickened from death in sin; for we have suffered the pains that come through the entrance of life into the soul, and we know the joys which afterward come of it. We have seen the light that life brings to the spiritual eye; we have felt the emotions that life brings to the quickened heart; we have known the joys which life, and only life, can bring to the entire man. We can tell you something about these things; but if you want to know them to the full you must feel them for yourselves. "Ye must be born again." We bear our witness that eternal life within our spirit is not of our earning, but the gift of God.

Beloved, observe gratefully what a wonderful gift this is—"the gift of God"—the gift which Jesus bestows upon every believer; for "to as many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God, even to as many as believed on His name; which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." How express is our Lord's statement: "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him!" This does not mean mere existence, as some vainly talk. There never was a greater blunder than to confound life with existence, or death with non-existence; these are two totally different and distinct ideas. The life of man means the existence of man as he ought to exist—in union with God, and consequently in holiness, purity, health, and happiness. Man, as God intended him to be, is man enjoying life; man, as sin makes him, is man abiding in death.

DEATHLESS LIFE.

Moreover, we have life eternal, too, never ending. Whatever else may end, this never can. It can neither be killed by temptation, nor destroyed by trial, nor quenched by death, nor worn out by the ages. The gift of the eternal God is eternal life. Those who talk about a man having everlasting life and losing it do not know the force of language. If a man has eternal life it is eternal, and cannot therefore end or be lost. If it be everlasting, it is "everlasting;" to lose it would prove that it was not everlasting. No, if you have eternal life you can never perish; if God has bestowed it upon you it will not be recalled, "for the gifts and calling of God are without repentance." This eternal life is evidently a free gift; for how could any man obtain it in any other way? It is too precious to be bought, too divine to be made by man. If it had to be earned how could you have earned it? It has come to us as a free gift; it could not come in any other way.

Thus I have set forth this doctrine, and I desire to apply it by adding a little more of practical importance. First, let us come at this time, one and all, and receive this divine life as a gift in Christ Jesus. If any of you have been working for it by going about to establish your own righteousness, I beseech you to end the foolish labor by submitting yourselves to the righteousness of God. If you have been trying to feel so much, or to pray so much, or to mourn so much, forbear from thus offering a price, and come and receive life as a free gift from your God. Pull down the idol of your pride, and humbly sue for pardoning grace on the plea of mercy. Believe and live.

CONSECRATED LIFE.

Beloved, have we accepted that free gift of eternal life? Let us abide in it. Let us never be tempted to try the law of merit; let us never attempt to live by our earnings. No doubt eternal life is a reward in one sense, but it is always a reward of grace, not a reward of debt. Finally, are we now abiding in eternal life, trusting in the Son of God, and clinging to his skirts? then let us live to His glory. Do we know that because He lives we shall live also? If so, let us show by our gratitude how greatly we prize this gift. We dwell in a world where death is everywhere manifesting itself in various forms of corruption; therefore let us see from what the Lord has delivered us. Let no man boast in his heart that he is not subject to the vile influences which hold the world in its corruption. Let no pride because of our new life ever cross our spirit. Chase every such thought as that away with detestation. If our life be of grace there is no room for boasting, but much space for soul-humbling.

As for others, let us anxiously ask the question—"Can these dry bones live?" Then let us be obedient to the heavenly vision when the divine Word saith to us, "Son of man, prophesy upon these bones." We must cherish the faith which will enable us to do this. Moreover, a sight of the universal death of unrepented nature should drive us to prayer, so that we cry, "Come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live." This prayer being offered, we should live in hopeful expectancy that the Lord will open the graves of His people and cause them to come forth and live by His Spirit. Oh, for grace to prophesy believingly upon these bones, and say, "O ye dry bones, hear the word of the Lord. Thus saith the Lord God unto these bones, Behold I will cause breath to enter into you, and ye shall live." Beloved, we shall yet see them stand up an exceeding great army, quickened of the Lord our God. "I am the resurrection and the life," saith Jesus; and so He is even at this hour. O God, save this congregation, to the praise of the glory of Thy grace, wherein Thou hast made us to live, and to be accepted in Thy Well-beloved Son. Amen and Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

THE CHRISTIAN LIFE:

a Volume of Sermons by Rev. John De Witt, D.D., Professor of History in Lane Theological Seminary. Thoughtful Christians who are weary of the sermons which are now popular—sermons in which grace of language, poetic expression, and what may be called rhetorical fireworks are employed to conceal the lack of thought—will find in Dr. De Witt's book a mine of treasure. Avoiding, on the one hand, the mistake of writing a moral essay, and using a text out of the Bible as a mere peg to hang it on for pulpit exhibition, and, on the other hand, the puerility of the preacher who finds in his text teaching which its author never intended it to convey, he points out the significance of the text, and shows what inferences the acceptance of its teaching involves. The sermon on "The Completion of Man in Christ" is a specimen of this useful style of preaching. It opens with a description of the condition of the early Christians, whose minds were full of Oriental speculations. To them the doubt would be natural whether Christ was the ultimate revelation of God to man, or merely the latest and loftiest of a series of beings in whom the Spirit of God existed, but who would be superseded by a still higher and clearer manifestation when men were able to bear it. These speculations the Apostle Paul set aside by the authoritative statement, "Ye are complete in Him." Taking this statement as a basis which can neither be proved nor disproved, but is to be accepted by faith like a prophecy, the preacher considers what is a completed man, what is his future state, the perpetuity of his personality, and the harmonizing of his powers, which at present are in conflict with each other. The final and practical inference is that the man who desires to become a completed man, to reach the highest attainable development, finds in Christ the way to that end.

The sermons on Christian Casuistry and Sanctification of the Secular Life present kindred thoughts in special application. The volume contains twenty-seven sermons in all, each of which is full of practical thought, shedding light on the Christian life in its various aspects. The tone of the work is elevated, and in reading it the Christian sees what he ought to be, and how it is possible to reach every day a higher stage in growth—one nearer to the ideal life of which this world has seen but one example in all the centuries of its existence. Christian people who have accepted Christ as a Saviour from eternal punishment as they take out an insurance policy against fire, and are content with safety without having holiness of life, will be dissatisfied with Dr. De Witt's teaching. So will Christians who know so little of themselves, and have so low a standard as to believe that they are already perfect. But those who, like the Apostle Paul, are continually striving to attain, will find in it much to help and encourage them. Pp. 420; price, $2.50. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

RUDDER GRANGE,

by Frank R. Stockton. It is said that Artemus Ward once had the Right Hon. John Bright for an auditor, and that the statesman listened to the American humorist from the beginning to the end of his lecture without a laugh, or even a smile. The statement may be a libel, but if it is true Mr. Bright ought to read "Rudder Grange," and if he gets through that without laughing his case might be considered hopeless. For pure, wholesome fun and genuine humor it has few equals. It relates the adventures of a young man and his wife in search of a summer home. It is the first place selected that gives the name to the book. It was nothing less than a disused canal boat drawn well up on the beach and divided into convenient rooms by a village carpenter. The lady puts down matting, papers the walls, and makes the place so home-like that many a worse abiding-place for the summer can be imagined. As the gentleman must be able to tell his city friends the name of his country residence, it was called Rudder Grange, the boat having an unusually large rudder, which was afterward used as an ironing-board. But Rudder Grange came to grief by a most amusing accident, and another residence had to be found. The original plans devised and the amusing results are described in Frank Stockton's inimitable style, and illustrated with clever pictures. Pp. 322; price, $2. A PREACHING TOUR IN AMERICA.

The Fisherman's Welcome.

By the Rev. M. Baxter.

THE weather up to the present time—nearly the close of November—is unusually mild in Toronto, the thermometer averaging thirty-five degrees. Other years the ground is generally covered with snow at this season.

I had good audiences in the Albert Hall, in Yonge Street, Toronto, which holds several hundred people, and gave six lectures there. A Free-thinker named Watts had the hall filled for a number of Sundays a few months ago, which shows that there are some hundreds of sceptically inclined people in Toronto, although it is sometimes called a city of churches.

The Rev. Dr. Wild, who is the Talmage of Toronto, had his church crowded, as usual, with more than two thousand people, on Sunday night, November 22d, and gave, as previously advertised, a discourse examining the prophetic views set forth by me and embodied in my book, "Forty Coming Wonders," which had been presented to him.

He agreed, in the main, with the broad outlines of those views and with the general interpretation of the Prophetic Image in Daniel 2, but differed as regards the destiny of Great Britain, which he predicts to escape most of the calamities that will befall other nations, and to ride through the coming storm prosperously. He includes the British among the descendants of the lost Ten Tribes of Israel who are to inherit Palestine, and to stand unshaken while other nations are tottering to their fall. This sermon, entitled "Britain and 1893," will be published in January's Prophetic News. Two or three years will probably show whether he is correct in his idea that Britain is not to be included in the confederacy of the ten nations prefigured by the ten horns and ten toes.

It is a pity that Toronto itself does not enjoy more of the security and safety which Dr. Wild predicts for the Anglo-Israelites. The Toronto Mail says there have been twelve highway robberies within a fortnight within its streets after dark, and that the police keep cases secret. This week's Mail gives two more cases, and it seems evident that in Toronto robbers are out every night to waylay any beyond the reach of assistance. In another part of Canada a few days ago there was the highway robbery of a stage-coach.

The Rev. C. H. Mead, a Methodist minister from the Southern States, has been delivering a dozen discourses in Toronto, chiefly Gospel temperance addresses. They are carefully prepared, every word tells, and full of humorous and pathetic passages, something like Gough's lectures.

The Rev. Mr. Savage, an independent and venerable Methodist minister, has been holding revival meetings in the Agnes Street Methodist Church with a band of six evangelists, called Savage's Band, who are a superior style of "Army" evangelists, sustaining a relation to the Methodist Church something like the Church Army does to the Church of England. He has about a dozen bands, each consisting of several evangelists, and they are constantly holding missions of fourteen days each in various Methodist churches.

THE FISHERMAN'S RETURN.

NIGHT in a fishing village. A dark, stormy night. Neither moon nor star shed its light on the sea. The wind howled like a fierce monster, threatening destruction to all in its path. Only a few yards outward from the shore could the eye penetrate, but that was enough to tell any who looked at it what it must be out at sea. The foam was tossed high, and the wind carried it, with the spray, in the faces of the watchers. Gigantic waves rose and fell with a crash, and now and again some huge piece of broken wood was seen rising and falling, tossed about like a straw, and was flung contemptuously on the beach. God pity any caught afloat on such a night.

And there were many afloat whose homes were in that village. Women with pale faces were watching and praying and waiting for them with sinking hearts. Every roar of the tempest pierced their ears like a knife, for the elements seemed ruthless, and in their grasp were lives more precious to the watchers than the world. A few, unable to bear the in-door warmth and comfort while the loved ones were out in the storm, wrapped themselves in cloaks and went out into the darkness.

One woman there was who at another time would have been first among that group, lay stretched on a bed of sickness. Two children lay sleeping peacefully in a cot near to her, while a third only a few hours old nestled by her side. As she heard that awful roaring her heart beat wildly, as if in response to it. But the fisherman's wife had been a fisherman's daughter, and more than once in such a storm as this she had watched all night by the side of a godly mother. She had learned by deep sympathy the passages of God's Word applicable to her case, and as she lay there alone with her sleeping children she said: "The floods have lifted up their voice; the floods lift up their waves. The Lord on high is mightier than the noise of many waters, yea, than the mighty waves of the sea."

That thought quieted her, and she dwelt upon it. It was a glad consciousness that the words were true which filled her heart. "I will hear, I will hear," said the woman aloud, reminding herself that He who is mightier than the waves had promised to hear those who "cry unto the Lord in their trouble, and to bring them out of their distresses" (Ps. 97 : 28). She needed no one to urge her to use the privilege, and all that night she cried unto God and communed with Him.

The morning broke at last, a glad, bright, peaceful morning. The fierce strife of the night was over, and the face of nature shone as calmly as if it had never been disturbed by a ruffle. The two children were up now and were at the window watching for "father." The mother lay still. She could not sleep yet, but she was calm, for she was trusting in the Lord. A joyous cry broke from the lips of the children simultaneously and they darted away. There was no need to ask the cause. "Father" was coming. In a few minutes the stalwart fisherman entered with his merry children. "Then are they glad," said the wife, as she received her husband's kiss, and "so He bringeth them to their desired haven" (Ps. 97 : 30).

THE LORD'S PRAYER AT THE DOOR OF A MOSQUE.

MORE than twelve hundred years ago a man of striking appearance stood up in the great Temple of Mecca and looked around at the prostrate worshippers. He was a man of education, one who had thought and studied much, and was above everything a seeker after truth. There were three hundred and sixty-five idols in that temple, and in the wall of the temple there was and still is the famous black stone said to have been once white, but blackened by the kisses of generations—the stone that was believed to be one of the stones of Paradise. On all these the man turned his back, and in that great congregation cried out: "Lord, if I knew in what way Thou didst will to be adored and served I would obey Thy will; but I know it not." About three years before that day he, with three companions, after a long and earnest study, came to the conclusion that the idols the nation worshipped were powerless for good or evil, were insensate blocks of matter, and all who worshipped them were fools and sinners. But what was truth? The four students resolved to give their lives to the search. Around them, beside the vast majority of Pagans, were Jews, and men who held a debased and corrupted Christianity. Three of the students became Christians. The fourth it was who uttered that pathetic cry in the temple. Of his subsequent history nothing is known, but the fact shows that at that time there was a longing in the minds of thinking men for a revelation of the true God.

Another scene a few years later in the same city. A man of forty years of age, well known as a man of high principle and unimpeachable integrity, whose uncle was the high-priest of that temple of three hundred and sixty-five idols, lay upon the ground, while around him were a group of zealots stoning him. They thought he was dead and left him. After a little time he moved, rose painfully, and crawled away and hid himself in a cave. The crime for which he had been punished was that he had proclaimed that there was but one God, the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, who had granted the world successive revelations of Himself through Adam, Noah, Moses, Jesus of Nazareth, and, lastly and more perfectly, through himself, the speaker, Mahommed, and that no further revelation would be granted until the end of the world, when Jesus would again appear in glory to take vengeance on unbelievers.

The progress of the new religion was, at first, slow. In five years only fifty converts were made, and the preacher was still in continual peril of his life. But in the year 622 Mahommed fled from Mecca to Medina, and there two powerful tribes adopted his creed and made themselves its apostles, propagating it with fire and sword. Now its adherents number one hundred and seventy-five million people, and five times a day at the cry of the Muezzin they prostrate themselves in prayer, declaring that there is no God but their God, and Mahommed is His prophet.

The deep, firm faith of these people is marvelous. One incident related by a Christian missionary who labored in Bombay shows their calm confidence. He relates that on a certain Saturday people were seen crowding into the city. There was to be a great prayer-meeting of Mahommedans in the parade-ground outside the fort. Rain was needed. Almost every hope of saving the crops was gone. The price of rice was steadily rising, and the poor were face to face with starvation. The Hindoos had met, and, having spent large sums on the Brahmins, held a grand service, hoping for a shower, but the rain came not. The Parsees also had held prayer-meetings, large and small, when there really did seem a chance of rain, but none came. The heavens were as brass when the Mahommedans gathered, but of all the fifteen thousand prostrate worshippers there were apparently none who did not feel assured that rain would come. They remained fasting and praying for three days, and on the third day the rain fell in torrents.

The incident depicted in the illustration is related by Mr. Hay in his "Western Barbary," and shows that much of the prejudice against Christianity now existing among Mahommedans is the result of ignorance. He says that while travelling with a companion who could speak Arabic, they found themselves among a crowd of Mahommedans who were coming out of a mosque, and who cursed them as "infidel dogs." Mr. Hay's friend, addressing a venerable man, apparently a priest, said, "Who taught you that we are disbelievers? Hear my daily prayer, and judge for yourselves." He then repeated the Lord's Prayer. All stood amazed and silent, till the priest exclaimed, "May God curse me if ever I curse against those who hold such belief! Nay, more, that prayer shall be my prayer till my hour be come. I pray thee, O Nazarene, repeat the prayer, that it may be remembered and written among us in letters of gold."

THE SILVER LINING.

A SILVER STORY.

Friendless in a Great City.

IN the Tombs of New York, Frank Arnold sat, dazed, bewildered, speechless. In all the great city there was not a single creature he could call his friend. No one to whom he could send for help, no one from whom he could ask advice. Of the evidence against him he knew nothing, and he was conscious that whatever it might be he was but ill-prepared to rebut it. He was utterly unable to account for his movements on the night on which the crime had been committed. That he had taken much liquor early in the evening he knew, and he remembered where he had taken it. Later scenes flitted before his memory in a bewildering procession, blending one into the other in inextricable confusion. There was nothing clear until the moment of his waking up in his own rooms late in the morning, and his interview with the broker.

If at that time his early religious training had come into his mind, he would have called upon God for deliverance. It was strange that he did not do so. Both his father and his mother had told him of God's mercy and longsuffering. In his youth he was accustomed to pray, but long years had passed since he bent his knees in prayer. He was utterly miserable and could not think coherently, and no thought of the unfailing Refuge for the miserable entered his mind. In spite of the terrible charge hanging over him, in spite of impending danger and the necessity for prompt exertion, he could do nothing, think of no plan, make no decision. Giving himself up to his languid mood, he flung himself down and actually went to sleep.

Several hours later he awoke, and struggled to a dread consciousness of his miserable plight. Burying his face in his hands, he tried again to think out his proper course. It was useless, he knew, to hope for justice unless he had the funds to retain a lawyer for his defence. Innocent he most assuredly was. Though he was oblivious of the events of the night, a conflict like that in which Greville had been struck down could not have taken place without leaving some mark on his memory. Besides, even in a drunken frenzy, he would not have attacked the man. He was a scoundrel, Frank thought, but he bore him less ill-will than might have been expected. Indeed, in furnishing him with an excuse for deserting Clare and returning to his old haunts, Greville had unwittingly done him a service. No; he was sure that under no circumstances would he have done him personal violence.

His own conviction of his innocence, as Frank well knew, would, however, count for nothing in court, and it was easy to see from the newspaper, and from the policeman's words, that the case was considered strong against him. Circumstantial evidence has convicted many an innocent man, and as Frank Arnold went over the points of the case as he sat in his gloomy cell, he saw that he was in grave danger. There was the motive for the crime. That was admitted. An alibi he could not prove. He was absent from home when the crime was committed. He was away all night. He returned early in the morning with disordered dress, and doubtless some one had seen him, and noticed his bloodshot eyes and disreputable appearance, and would testify in court. Then he went on board a ship going to sail, and had gone before the time that was necessary, and retired to the seclusion of his room when other passengers were on deck. A clever lawyer such as Greville's friends might retain could make out of this it would be hard to meet. Frank saw in imagination the trial, heard the verdict of "Guilty," and then in that very courtyard that he could see from the window of his cell he must die an ignominious death. He groaned at the spectacle his imagination painted. He must appeal to his father; none else could save him. He signalled for a warden, and explaining his situation, begged that his money might be used in sending a cable message to England. In less than an hour that message, with its terrible weight of woe, was being flashed under the Atlantic to the peaceful English home.

In the hospital, to which Mr. Greville had been carried in the ambulance summoned by the policeman who found him, the injured man lay unconscious. To an ordinary spectator he looked as one dead. The surgeons, however, knew that life was not quite extinct. A fearful injury on the head was the chief source of danger, but there were other wounds that might prove serious. His appearance indicated that he had fought with his assailant, for his clothing was torn, and his left arm was severely bruised, as if it had warded off a blow. The blow on the head had probably been inflicted at the close of the encounter, and it had been delivered with such force as to fracture the skull, a piece of which was still pressing upon the brain. A skillful operator would attempt to raise this, but the operation would be performed later, and was likely to be fatal. Letters found in his pocket gave the clue to his identification, and a message sent to his club resulted in a visit from the lawyer whom he had consulted on that fatal night. The lawyer promptly arrived at the conclusion that Frank Arnold was the guilty man, and with his assistance the police ran the young physician to earth.

Greville, however, was unable to make any statement. He had not spoken a word since he was carried into the hospital, and even if he lived, which was doubtful—"He had about one chance in a thousand," said the young surgeon whom the lawyer consulted—it would be many days before it would be safe to speak to him about the midnight struggle in which he had fallen.

In the hotel where Clare had found a home, a consultation was taking place. There the newspaper accounts of the murderous assault were read and discussed. The proprietor was not a hard man, but he was keenly alive to possibilities affecting his interests. His knowledge of Mr. Greville was slight, but sufficient to satisfy him that there would be no danger of loss on account of any guest he had introduced. That Mrs. Arnold was a lady his experienced eye told him. That she was extremely poor he could also see. He relied upon Mr. Greville to reimburse him if she failed to pay, and was sure that he was safe. This murder, or attempted murder, however, changed the aspect of his security, and rendered his guest a less desirable occupant of his rooms. He consulted with his clerk, and it was decided to get rid of the lady with as much promptitude as was compatible with civility.

The decision could not be otherwise than embarrassing to Mrs. Arnold. She was unable to understand that the plausible excuse, politely conveyed to her, was an excuse only, and she simply regretted that she must leave, without imagining the real reason that caused her disturbance. She paid her small account, and sat still, sadly gazing at the small sum that remained to her. She wished that she could find out the French picture-dealer who had been so kind to her, but she had never asked his address. That, however, she could get from Mr. Greville, and she must do so at once. She wished she could consult him also as to a place of residence, but the sudden demand for her rooms rendered that impossible. She must write to him, of course. In some way, she could not even yet understand why, her visit to his rooms had caused him trouble, and she would never go there again. But there would be no harm in writing. But first of all she must find a refuge, and, dressing herself quickly for her walk, she sallied forth, homeless in the great city.

During the next few hours Clare gained her first experience of the hardness and coldness of the world. She thought, as a matter of course, that she had only to make her choice of the hotels, and was concerned only that she might find one that was quiet and respectable. Her first application, however, surprised her. She had no luggage. Her few personal effects were so few that they were easily carried in her hand, and their character was obvious to the experienced eyes of any hotel clerk. A lady of remarkable beauty, shabbily clad, and carrying her own parcel, was not a desirable guest in a hotel such as that to which Clare applied. The clerk surveyed her from head to foot, and then told her almost rudely that the hotel was full. There was something in the look with which he regarded her that led even so unsuspicious a lady as Clare to comprehend that the man was deceiving her, and she went out with a sense of difficulty and unhappiness in her heart. At other hotels she was treated in a similar manner, and her desolation became painful. How she wished that she could see Mr. Greville and obtain his assistance! No hint of the crime with which the city was ringing had reached her ears, and she looked anxiously before her, hoping that she might see the only friend from whom she might expect kindness in her extremity.

As Clare emerged from an hotel, where she had experienced rudeness more revolting to her, because it was accompanied by undisguised admiration for her beauty, the tears rose to her eyes. She turned into a quiet street, away from the crowded thoroughfare, and wept silently as she went. She was tired and faint, but she knew that she must not give way. Some refuge must be found, and that at once. She was ready to accept almost any place now, if she could only rest. Her tears had been a relief to her overburdened heart, and she quickly retraced her steps to the avenue.

Her eye was attracted by a restaurant, in front of which a sign informed the public that tables were "reserved for ladies." Time and money could ill be spared then, but Clare was fearful lest she should faint in the street. She entered, and took the seat the colored waiter offered her. The man was civil and respectful, and Clare appreciated it after her experience, as she had never appreciated such a manner before. A cup of tea and a light repast revived her, and as the waiter handed her a check she took courage to ask his help in her quest. "No, miss," the man said, "there's no hotels as I know of, but I'll ask the boss."

The boss, who was sitting at the receipt of custom, alternately studying the evening paper and admiring the light emitted by the diamond on his finger, turned around as his waiter explained the lady's difficulty, and cast a sharp glance at the lady in question. He was not a man whose appearance would encourage a lady to seek his advice. A wolfish light shone in his small, deeply-set eyes; his bloated, pimpled visage told of orgies in which he had been an active participant, while the pound-weight of watch-chain and jewelry he carried, intimated that he knew of some good things in politics that are commonly described as "the inside track."

The man rose from his seat and went to Clare's table with an ogreish grin, which on his face, did duty for a smile. A hotel did the lady want? Had she tried the Rossmore, the St. Cloud? Clare did not know. She had been to several that, were full, but she was a stranger in the city, and had not noticed their names.

"A stranger! English, I think," said the man.

Clare admitted the fact.

"I presume you will find all the hotels full just now. How would you like to go to a private boarding-house?"

Clare had no objection. The man's manner was annoying; his words were respectful, but his smile and his bearing were insultingly familiar. But some place must be found for this night, and to-morrow she could write to Mr. Greville and get his advice. Yes, if the man could tell her a boarding-house that was quiet and respectable she would be glad.

He would do so with pleasure. A friend of his own would accommodate her he was sure, if she had room; a most worthy lady. One of his men should take her there. The recommendation was not encouraging, but inexperienced as Clare was, and bewildered and perplexed as she was, she reluctantly agreed. The colored waiter received his direction, and Clare followed him with weary footsteps.

It was growing dusk, but Clare noticed that the street to which the man conducted her was apparently made up of respectable high-stoop houses. There were few pedestrians on the sidewalks, but here and there a colored man leaned against a railing talking to a lady whose dress indicated that she must be the mistress of the establishment. Clare's guide stopped at one of the houses midway between the avenues and rang the bell. It was answered by a stout lady in a morning wrapper, whose not over-clean fingers sparkled with more rings than Clare had ever seen on a human hand before.

The negro explained his business, and was particular to mention that he came at Mr. Esler's order. Clare quailed before the keen look with which the woman turned to her. "Do you want board?" she asked, briefly.

"I am a stranger," Clare timidly answered. "I have been staying at a hotel, but the rooms were needed, and I have not had time to consult my friends about my future movements. I should be glad if you could accommodate me for a day or two."

"Yes, I guess I can do that. Mr. Esler will come around to-night or to-morrow, I guess, and then we can arrange about the board."

"If Mr. Esler is the restaurant-keeper, he can have nothing to do with my arrangements," Clare said, decisively. "He is a perfect stranger to me. I went to his restaurant for a cup of tea this evening, and he was kind enough to tell me of your house, and to send his man to show me the way; but I do not know him."

"Oh! that will be all right," said the woman. "I know him very well, and I guess he will come around. You will like to go to your room at once, won't you? There's company in the parlor," she added, in explanation of a burst of laughter that came ringing from behind the closed door. "You can go, you know," she said to the colored man, who stood still, evidently expecting some tip from Clare, whose inexperience kept her ignorant of his expectation. She gladly followed her hostess upstairs, while her guide slowly took his departure.

"The deah Lord forgive me for my share in that biz," the man said, as he descended the stoop. "Poor thing, I believe she's as innocent as a baby. Eh! but you are a bad un, you are," apostrophizing the lady of the morning wrapper and the rings. "And he's wuss, I do believe. The Lord'll give you your part in the place whar is weepin' and gnashin' o' teeth." And the good fellow went his way, sadly oppressed with the wickedness of the world which he witnessed daily and hourly.

THE SUFFERING SAVIOUR.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 13, Isa. 53. Divine Text, ver. 6. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

A God-Incurring World—The Divine Altruism—What Christ Purchased—The Right of Deliverance—The Cost of the Revelation—A Finished Work—Waiting Acceptance—The Endless Unity—Achieved by Infinite Humiliation—Assured Results—The Glorious Message.

"Who hath believed our report? And to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?" "The arm of the Lord"—surely this is significant of His mighty, almighty power—yet here the picture is of weakness, suffering, shame, contempt; yet that very suffering, weakness, shame, contempt, even death itself bringing to a lost world death out of life, strength out of weakness, glory out of shame and contempt, triumph out of suffering! Yet who hath believed? The world in general is acting just as though the Son of God had never come down into this world and died for our sins; just as though God had nothing to say in the affairs of our nations, churches, families, or our own souls. To the unregenerate eye of man Jesus is "a root out of a dry ground. He hath no form nor comeliness; and when we see Him, there is no beauty that we should desire Him. He was despised, and rejected of men; a Man of sorrows and acquainted with sickness, and as one from whom men hide their face. He was despised, and we esteemed Him not" (Rev. Ver.). There is to the self-principle which governs most human hearts; nothing to make men pleased with themselves; nothing which could make them boast of Him from a human point of view. "All seek their own" (Phil. 2: 21), but Jesus did not; men insist upon having their own way, Jesus came down from heaven not to do His own will, but the will of the Father which had sent Him; men stand upon their rights and assert themselves; Jesus, on the contrary, emptied Himself, and was meek and lowly of heart. The current of His life ran exactly counter to that of man, and condemned it. But man accepts no such condemnation: strong in his self-conceit, he prizes himself, and condemns, despises, rejects his Saviour!

Yet the fact is that, despite all that man is, all that man thinks, the Son of God has suffered for him, and in so doing has revealed the arm of omnipotence as in no other way. "Surely He hath borne our sicknesses (Rev. Ver.) and carried our sorrows. . . . He was wounded for our transgressions. He was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon Him. . . . the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all." The suffering Saviour bent His neck to the stroke and bore all—sickness, sorrow, sin. Our sickness, our sorrow, our sin. And why? That we should be saved from sickness, saved from sorrow, saved from sin. "With His stripes we are healed"—in spirit, in soul, in body—from all the consequences of the fall, which He bore in His own person on the cross. What has the arm of the Lord accomplished?

THE RIGHT OF DELIVERANCE

from all which He bore, the glorious right of salvation for every man, because every man is redeemed by the blood of the Son of God; the glorious right to rise above and be conqueror of every sorrow, because He has borne them all; the glorious right to healing from every sickness, because Himself has borne it. And thus to the believing soul "the arm of the Lord," in His redemption work, keeps Satan at bay. We could never satisfy our consciences that we deserved pardon, but God gives it us "not by works of righteousness that we have done" (Tit. 3: 5), but because He for us "became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross" (Phil. 2: 8); we could never bring ourselves to believe that we were worthy to be healed by the direct intervention of God, but His bearing of our sicknesses makes it a greater presumption on our part to doubt Him and our simple blood-bought privilege to accept as the fruit of His sufferings healing of the body as well as full salvation for the soul.

But in order thus

in redemption, oh, how infinitely did our blessed Lord suffer! "He was oppressed, yet He humbled Himself, and opened not His mouth; as a lamb led to the slaughter, and as a sheep that before her shearers is dumb; yea, He opened not His mouth." He took the place of the guilty who had no answer to give, that He might ever after be the true and faithful Witness at God's right hand that the question of sin, of sorrow, of sickness, was forever settled on the cross. Now His blood "speaketh better things than that of Abel" (Heb. 12: 24). Jesus is witness that the work of our redemption is a finished work, not a work to be finished by something which takes place in us, but finished already on the cross. The work of our salvation is done; it has not to be done, and Jesus our heaven, the risen Jesus, is His own Witness that it is so. Our part is to receive an accomplished salvation, an accomplished healing, already wrought out. The question has become a question between Satan and Jesus, not between Satan and us; sin and all its consequences are now to be referred to Him; He alone can pardon who has purchased the right to do it. He alone can deliver from the power of sin, "for in that He Himself hath suffered being tempted, He is able to succour them that are tempted" (Heb. 2: 18); He alone is given of God as Jehovah our Healer, for He alone has taken our infirmities and borne our sicknesses.

And oh, how touching are the words, "Although He had done no violence, neither was any deceit in His mouth, yet it pleased the Lord to bruise Him. He hath made Him sick" (Rev. Ver.). Before it could please the Lord so to deal with His Son, what incomprehensible love must He have conceived to unworthy man, for whom all this was! But God created man, to be one with Him throughout an endless eternity "That they all may be one; as Thou, Father, art in Me and I in Thee, that they also may be one in us." Man redeemed, sanctified, purified unto Himself, is destined to be the bride of the Lamb. For His bride Jesus was willing thus to suffer; for His bride the Father was pleased to bruise Him, soul and body; for His bride the Father was pleased to make Him sick. Thus suffering, "He poured out His soul unto death," first in Gethsemane, and then upon the cross. "He was numbered with the transgressors" "who knew no sin" (II Cor. 5: 21); He "bare the sins of many" who Himself "had done no violence, neither was any deceit in His mouth." All which was most repellent to the Holy Son of God was laid on Him, for no other way could He be "made sin for us," no other way could He take our infirmities and bear our sicknesses, no other way could He justly deliver us. And now,

WHAT SHALL BE THE RESULT of His sufferings? "When Thou shalt make

His soul an offering for sin, He shall see His seed, He shall prolong His days, and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in His hand." Thank God, although so few believe the report, to so few is the arm of the Lord revealed; yet the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper; Jesus shall have the victory: a people for His name shall be gathered out of the nations. Although the suffering Lord was cut off out of the land of the living; although none can declare His generation; yet He shall see His seed, He shall prolong His days. Death never conquered Jesus: He arose from the dead, and prolongs His days throughout an endless eternity. With no earthly generation, yet Jesus has a resurrection seed, a race of descendants who live out of death in the power of His resurrection. He is the first-fruits, the first-born among many brethren, and every believer in Him who takes the place of death, crucified with Christ, who denies himself and acknowledges, "Nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me"—every such believer is one of the seed of Christ which have come out of His death: Christ must prevail.

"He shall see of the travail of His soul, and shall be satisfied." All the righteous vengeance of God against sin has been satisfied, the holiness of God has been vindicated, there remains no more to be done. Not one particle of propitiation is left owing, not one particle of sickness which Jesus has borne; all is complete, it is finished. But who hath believed it? Who sees the revelation of Almightiness in this redemption work of Jesus? We which have believed do enter into rest. Every soul which believes fully in the work of Jesus for soul and body is at rest about soul and body. Knowing that Jesus has undertaken, and that Jesus has accomplished a full, perfect salvation for his entire being, he revels in the blessed knowledge that God has taken all in hand, that God is true to His Word, and that He cannot fail.

Such are the glorious tidings which we have to tell to a lost world; such is the message which we have for the drunkard and the harlot, the self-righteous professor, or the worldling; such are the glad tidings which we have to carry to the sick bed and to the house of sorrow; such is the word which God gives us for the heathen—Christ a perfect, present, sufficient, and living Saviour; Christ enough, and enough just now, for every need. And this Jesus! Do we need to be told it is

OUR DUTY TO LOVE HIM?

Can we live an hour of our lives without being reminded of Him? Is there a breath of temptation crossing our souls? He has been tempted just there, and is able to succour us just on that point, and our hearts thrill with the tenderness of such love. Does a pain shoot across our brow or make a limb start? Jesus bore that very pain for us, that He might fulfil the Word of God in healing it (Matt. 8: 16, 17). Have we some consciousness of sin revealed by the Holy Ghost where we had least suspected it? Jesus has met that sin upon the cross, has broken its power, overcome, and we may enter into His victory. How can we but love Him!

Yet who believes, who takes for granted that God is glorified in thus fully meeting the needs of His children? Dear reader, do you believe it? If so, tell others what a Saviour you have found; be ready, whenever God opens your way, to speak good of the Lord, and tell all He does for His trusting children. So shall you make the once suffering Saviour to be a rejoicing Saviour over you. "My son, if thine heart be wise, My heart shall rejoice, even Mine" (Prov. 23: 15).

"FOR MY SAKE."

Three little words, but full of tenderest meaning;
Three little words the heart can scarcely hold;
Three little words, but on their import dwelling
What wealth of love do they unfold!

"For my sake" cheer the suffering, help the needy:
On earth this was my work, I give it thee;
If thou wouldst follow thy Master's footsteps,
Take thou my cross, and learn of me.

"For my sake" let the harsh word be unuttered
That trembles on the swift impetuous tongue;
"For my sake" check the quick rebellions feeling Which rises when thy brother does thee wrong.

"For my sake" press thou with patience onward,
Although the race be hard, the battle long;
Within my Father's house are many mansions,
There thou shalt rest, and join the victor's song.

And if in coming days the world revile thee,
If "for my sake" thou suffer pain and loss,
Bear on, faint heart, thy Master went before thee,
They only wear His crown who share His cross.

CHOICE HOLIDAY BOOKS.

There are about 4,000,000 boys in the United States from 10 to 16 years of Age.

Set before these young people a high aim and purpose in life and you develop a healthful ambition to meet and overcome the obstacles with which all young men have to contend.

Among the influences to this end, none are more helpful than good books, which inculcate by force of notable example, the worth of patient industry, strict adherence to integrity, and the adoption of Christian principle as the elements of success.

A book that fully meets these requirements is Poor Boys Who Became Famous.

By MRS. SARAH K. BOLTON.

Handsome Cloth Binding. Fully Illustrated with 24 Portraits. Price, $1.50.
Short biographical sketches of George Peabody, Michael Faraday, Samuel Johnson, Admiral Farragut, Horace Greeley, William Lloyd Garrison, Garibaldi, President Lincoln, and other noted persons who, from humble circumstances, have risen to fame and distinction, and left behind an imperishable record.

"It is seldom that a book passes under our notice which we feel impelled to commend so highly to young readers, and especially to boys."—N. Y. Observer.

"No book within our knowledge is better suited to be adopted in the rapidly growing reading circles of our country."—Journal of Education, Boston.

"Of this class of books we cannot have too many, the more we have the better. This book placed in the hands of our youth will be worth more to them than gold."—Christian Intelligencer, New York.

"Mrs. Bolton's experience as an editor and an author, has taught her to perceive at once the salient features of a character or life, and to portray them with attractive skill."—Congregationalist, Boston.

It is seldom that we have an opportunity to direct attention to anything so really worthy of notice as this Complete Stamping Outfit. While the price is almost ridiculously low for the entire outfit, the number, excellence and variety of the articles furnished almost exceeds belief. Even for a family to do its own stamping the outfit would be of great service; but when it is realized, that by means of the instructions, samples and materials that are included as "Outfits," any lady can easily become skilled in making choice designs, lace of most elegant patterns, and in executing every description of perforated stamping thus making a nice addition to her income in a very easy and pleasant way, it would seem that scarcely anyone would neglect taking advantage of so favorable an opportunity. These stamping outfits are particularly appropriate for holiday presents and, in our opinion, well worthy of attentive consideration. Kindly mention our paper when you order,

LIFE INSURANCE.

THE STEADY GROWTH OF AN OLD AND POPULAR COMPANY.

HOWEVER unsatisfactory may have been the result of last year's operations in mercantile and manufacturing circles, at least one important interest has been saved, and that is the life insurance industry. The leading life insurance companies for 1894 show a gratifying increase of business, and demonstrate the fact that in seasons of financial depression, when values are unsettled and ordinary business ventures are regarded with distrust, life insurance presents a safe and remunerative form of investment which addresses itself with peculiar force to all men of prudence and foresight.

In illustration of this assertion we need only point to the figures shown in the Thirty-Ninth Annual Report of the MANHATTAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, of New York, one of the soundest, most conservative and best managed institutions of the kind in the United States.

The revival services now being held in the Protestant Episcopal churches of New York, in which the distinguished clergyman whose portrait appears on the first page is taking so conspicuous a part, are in some degree a novelty in that communion in America. There have been, it is true, in former years isolated efforts of this kind, but we believe this is the first time that an organized movement on so extended a scale has ever been arranged. The Protestant Episcopal Church here has been distinguished chiefly by the reverential and orderly character of its services and by the simple grandeur of its ritual. Its work, taken as a whole, has not been so aggressive as that of other churches, though large numbers of its clergy have labored earnestly in the cause of evangelical Christianity. It is probable, too, that in its communion there is a larger proportion, than in any other Protestant Church, of members who are resting satisfied with an observance of forms without seeking a living, personal union with the Saviour. A consciousness of this fact, and a deep concern for the large masses of people lying outside all church influence, has long weighed on the hearts of the earnest clergymen of the city, and of this consciousness the present Advent Mission is the outcome.

THE CALL.

issued by the committee of arrangements is a deeply significant document. It indicates close and accurate observation, and a perception of the evils and dangers of our nineteenth-century life, which is the first step toward intelligent action. Assistant Bishop Potter, Dr. Satterlee, Rev. W. R. Rainsford, and other clergymen who have labored for this end are practical men, anxious above all things that men should know Christ as the Saviour from sin and the hope of the world. They have proved this by the succinct list of considerations which they have drawn up, and which, if justification for the special effort they are making were needed, furnishes that justification. As members of other churches also may profitably make these considerations their concern, and be stimulated to labor for the removal of the evils specified, we give the formidable list in full. Of the twenty counts there is not one that is not in operation, nor one that the Christian Church can safely ignore. This is the list, and it is a sad one:

1. A large class of well-to-do and refined people who have ceased to be or never have been church-goers.
2. Formal communicants.
3. The irreligion of the young men of our well-to-do families.
4. The evils in the life of men and women in fashionable society.
5. The feeble recognition on the part of masters and mistresses of the need of church attendance by their servants, resulting largely from a want of care for the spiritual welfare of servants.
6. The evils of class churches.
7. The evils which come from the instability of church connection.
8. The lack of opportunity for private prayer, consequent upon the condition of our tenement and boarding-houses, and the fact that few churches are constantly open.
9. The want of definite, positive instruction in religious duties, and in what practical Christian living consists.
10. The lack of personal spiritual ministry to the rich.
11. The drain upon the minds, souls, and bodies of two classes: (1) Of those who give themselves up to the demands of society life; (2) of those laden down with too much work—unfitting both classes for a healthful Christian life. Among the causes of this drain we specify: (a) Late hours; (b) stores open late Saturday nights; (c) no Saturday half-holidays.

12. The religious deprivation suffered by the large and rapidly increasing portion of the population called to labor at night, in connection with the homeless and the vicious classes abroad under cover of darkness.

13. The wrongs inflicted by employers upon their employes.

14. The lust of wealth, issuing in the manifold evils of unscrupulous competition; overwork, underpay, scamped work and mutual enmity and discontent between employer and employe.

15. The immorality and irreligion caused by the unrighteous denial to a large and increasing class of one day's rest in seven.

16. The prevalence of the sins of intemperance and impurity.

17. The special religious difficulties caused by the constant flow of immigrants.

18. The hindrance to the growth of the Christian life caused by our luxuriousness and selfishness.

19. The ostentatious display by church-goers of all classes.

20. The want of public spirit in its bearing upon both Church and State.

Reflecting on these evils, recognizing the responsibility of individual Christians and Christian churches for their existence, and earnestly desiring their removal, the clergymen are engaging in this effort to arouse the members of their churches to personal consecration and to vigorous effort of an aggressive kind. While engaging strenuously in the work themselves, they have accepted assistance from the English churches, and several clergymen like-minded with themselves, who have done good service across the Atlantic, have come over to render aid. Prominent among these is the eloquent preacher who is now lecturing every day at noon in Old Trinity Church, at the head of Wall Street, to crowded congregations. We are this week enabled to give his portrait and a sketch of his useful life.

William Hay M'Dowall Hunter Aitken was born in 1841. His father, the Rev. Robert Aitken, was an earnest evangelical clergyman, who died in 1873, more than seventy years old. Mr. Aitken, Sr., at the time of his son's birth was the incumbent of St. John's Church, Liverpool, England, but he afterward removed to Cornwall, where for twenty-four years he labored in a district about which, perhaps, the best thing that can be said is, that it never failed to furnish a field for hard and continuous effort.

The duties and responsibilities of a Christian parent were to Mr. Aitken, Sr., no unmeaning form of words. He wanted his boy to become a man of God—a man who should be useful to the world—and that desire he ranked far above worldly distinctions or worldly prosperity. It is the custom in England to send boys intended for the clerical profession to a great public school such as Eton, Harrow, or Rugby preparatory to entering one of the universities. But this Christian minister dreaded the influence of a public school on his son. He was anxious that he should be kept "pure and unspotted from the world," and therefore he decided that, though he might get a better classical and mathematical education at school, yet it would better conduce to his spiritual health and training that he should spend his early years in the old parsonage at his father's side.

On one occasion a friend managed to obtain a presentation for him to Merchant Taylors' School, a thing that most parents would have greatly prized. He put the paper into the fire, and only told his son of it some weeks afterward. But even in the matter of scholarship and secular learning, the boy's being thus thrown somewhat early on his own resources, and being left to acquire knowledge for himself and for its own sake, may not have been wholly disadvantageous to him, for at least it had the compensating value of inspiring habits of industry and self-help, and may have tended to develop and foster a certain independence and originality of thought.

He seems to have been very early impressed by the power of divine truth, and to have begun to evangelize even as a boy. Before he reached his sixteenth year he was engaged in Sunday school teaching and in conducting cottage meetings.

HIS FIRST MISSION.

When he was seventeen he went on a visit to his uncle, the well-known Scotch evangelist, the late Mr. Hay M'Dowall Grant, of Arndilly. He was to deliver addresses in the neighboring town of Elgin, and so great was the interest awakened there that his uncle determined that he should accompany and assist him in a tour which he proposed making in the extreme north of Scotland, as a substitute for Mr. Brownlow North who was unable to fulfil an engagement in that locality.

It was during this tour that Mr. Aitken first discovered that God had permitted him in some degree to inherit the evangelizing gifts of his father. In the town of Thurso, a thousand flocked to the meetings, and on one occasion not less than four thousand persons were addressed by this youthful preacher and his uncle. Unquestionably this early success exercised an important influence upon his subsequent career in more ways than one. It indicated to him the work for which he was most suited, and at the same time stimulated him to prepare himself for it. The memory of this wonderful manifestation of divine power served him in good stead in many a dark hour of intellectual doubt and conflict in his subsequent career.

After reading for a few months with a private tutor, he matriculated at Wadham College, Oxford, at the close of the year 1859. Though he found himself somewhat backward in the elements of a classical education, he surprised his tutors by announcing his intention of reading for classical honors; and owing to his natural aptitude for mental philosophy, and especially for logic, he succeeded in obtaining a second class on the list of classical honors. During the whole of his university course Mr. Aitken continued his evangelizing work, conducting a mission service regularly twice a week in a room in the suburbs of Oxford.

No thoughtful man can pass through Oxford in our day without having the foundations of his faith severely tested, and Mr. Aitken has often referred in his sermons to the severe intellectual conflict through which he passed at this time. One text, he has often said, was in these days of trial—"Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life." This was what he felt his soul demanded, and he could find it nowhere else. He has often since expressed his belief that he was especially prepared by this severe discipline to be the better able to sympathize with and help those who are passing through a similar ordeal.

After taking his college degree in 1865, Mr. Aitken found himself perplexed by the offer of no less than sixteen different curacies, while two or three Oxford professors urgently pressed him to come into residence, and seek to get a fellowship, which he had good prospects of obtaining. The event which finally decided his choice was the visit of the widely-beloved Rev. W. Pennefather, Vicar of St. Jude's, Mildmay Park, London, to Pendeen, to persuade him to become his curate—a step which was recommended also by his father. During his subsequent curacy with Mr. Pennefather

he was in sole charge of the large iron hall in which Mr. Pennefather held his Conferences before the erection of his present Conference Hall. In this Mr. Aitken formed a regular congregation and carried on a continuous mission work.

In the year 1867 he married a young lady (Miss Barnes) who had long been a close and devoted friend of his incumbent, and who had proved in every way a helpmeet worthy of him. Mr. Aitken has often been heard to say that in his parish he considered his wife's work more successful and satisfactory than his own, and certainly her self-denial in surrendering so much of her husband's society for the sake of the Lord's work argues a devotion to that work not inferior to that of her husband. Deep and true was the affection that existed between the Rev. W. Pennefather and his curate, and to his lot it fell, when that saintly man was called to his rest, to commit his remains to their last resting-place.

In the year 1869 the celebrated

TWELVE DAYS' MISSION

took place in London. It proposed to embrace men of all parties, but, as a decidedly High Church tone was given to it by its originators, Mr. Pennefather was censured by some persons for permitting his curate to take part in it. The sequel has, however, more than justified the fondest hopes that Mr. Aitken and other evangelical preachers who took part in the movement entertained, and indeed this mission may almost be looked back upon as the date of a new era in the history of the English Church.

In reference to his curacy with the Rev. W. Pennefather at Mildmay Park, Mr. Aitken has said: "As I look back to the five years during which I was connected with him in the ministry, I regard it as no small privilege that for eighteen months I lived under his roof and saw him, as a personal friend alone could see him, as a man who walked with God."

In 1871, Mr. Aitken was appointed by Messrs. Horsfall Bros. to the charge of Christ Church, Everton, near Liverpool, where he remained for four and a half years. During this period, while endeavoring to be faithful to the home duties of his position, he so mapped out his time as to give a considerable portion of every year to mission work.

MISSION AT LEEDS.

Perhaps the most remarkable blessing that has ever rested on his labors was at the populous manufacturing town of Leeds, in the year 1875. Beginning with small things, his services went on swelling, until at last the great Victoria Town Hall could not contain the thousands that flocked to the services. In the middle of the day the hall would be filled with some three thousand people, and at night anxious souls might be numbered by hundreds. About the same time Mr. Aitken energetically co-operated to whom he continued to act as a sort of lieutenant during his stay in England. Mr. Moody's influence and suggestion, combined with the precarious state of his wife's health, decided Mr. Aitken to leave Liverpool and give himself up entirely to evangelizing work. Indeed, he clearly felt that the double strain of parochial and mission work was wearing him out before his time. He resigned his Liverpool parish in the autumn of 1875, and settled at Holmside, near Derby, where his home still is. During the subsequent two years he conducted meetings, which were very largely attended, in churches in the towns of Huddersfield, Sheffield, Hull, Manchester (cathedral), Blackburn, Nottingham, Hertford, Doncaster, Halifax, Birmingham, Newcastle, Southsea, besides several visits to London.

While Mr. Aitken is very definite in his evangelical views of elementary truth, he has an intense repugnance to party spirit, and has never taken a prominent part in controversy. At the same time, with a sincere desire to be liberal and charitable, Mr. Aitken combines a hearty opposition to all priestly pretension, and, above all, of the tyranny of the confessional. His preaching is characterized by simple statements of Gospel truth, delivered with intense earnestness, genuine pathos, forcible illustration, and a yearning desire to commend the truth to every man's conscience in the sight of God.

INCIDENTS IN GOSPEL WORK.

By Messrs. Mater and Parker.

"HOW A BAD TEMPER WAS CURED."

DURING the special meetings we conducted at Ansonia, Conn., on the Sunday afternoon the minister asked a worker to speak to a young lady who was anxious about her soul. The worker took her into the inquiry room and asked her what was the difficulty. "I'm trying to be saved," she said, "but I have such a bad temper, and when anything goes wrong at home I lose my temper and get angry." "But you can't conquer your temper any more than you can fly. That's the wrong way about it. But Jesus can, if you come to Him." Then looking at her earnestly, he asked, "Have you been converted yet? You know in Matthew it says, 'Verily, I say unto you, except ye be converted ye shall in no wise enter the kingdom of God.'" "No," was the reply, "I haven't been converted yet. I want to be, but father and mother are not Christians, and so there's no one at home to help me," and at that she burst out weeping. After some explanation of the Gospel she at length exclaimed, "Well, I will trust in Jesus!" And at once a happy expression came over her face, and she left the room in a better temper than ever she had been in her life. I saw that young convert several times at the meetings afterward, and she always wore that sweet-tempered expression. The Lord had cured her bad temper.

AN UNEXPECTED SUMMONS.

On the last Friday evening of Mr. Moody's visit to Kingston, N. Y., a young man about twenty-four years of age arrived at Kingston Hotel, took supper, and went to hear Mr. Moody at the Rink. The sermon was a powerful one to men on "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap." He returned at night in good health apparently, and was assigned to room No. 40. He retired, and was not seen again till Sunday morning between eight and nine o'clock in the morning, when he was found dead in his bed. It was thought he was going away early Saturday morning, to return Saturday night, and so when the room was found locked on Saturday it was thought he had taken the key with him. Sunday morning, when the boy made his rounds, it was thought strange, and an investigation was made. By looking through the window over the door it was seen that he was lying in bed, and as they couldn't awaken him they broke open the door. Then it was he was found dead. We don't know whether he was prepared or not, but if he was not he will always look back with deep regret to that night in this world when he might have been saved.

A DRUNKARD DELIVERED.

At the meetings in the Rink, Kingston, N. Y., a drunkard rose for prayer. It seems that he had signed the pledge at the Y. M. C. A., and had kept it for two years. He had made that his religion, and was trusting in it as a good hope of salvation, but at the meetings he was awakened to see that "pledge signing" alone wouldn't save him. He came round to the First Reformed Dutch Church when the meetings were removed there, and came forward again as an inquirer one afternoon, and sobbing like a child he knelt down and gave himself to the Saviour. At once he felt what he had never felt before, even during his reformed days—the peace of God which passeth all understanding. Not many days after he stood up boldly in the testimony meeting to tell what the Lord had done for his soul.

A COMMERCIAL TRAVELLER AND HIS FAMILY CONVERTED.

A commercial traveller came to our meetings and was under deep concern for his soul. I never saw a man under deeper anxiety. He cried and groaned and sighed as if his heart would break. I found it difficult to get him to look away from himself and his feelings to Christ. As soon as he was saved he became anxious about his wife, and wrote me a letter asking me to call and see her. I just had time in the morning of the day we left to run round. His wife came into the sitting-room looking very anxious. We all three knelt down and prayed, and before long she found Christ. Then I found there was the servant in the house also seeking Christ, and I asked her to come in, too, and she was also prayed for; and before I left all three were rejoicing in a new-found Saviour. Christ had come unexpectedly to that household, and had changed it into a Bethany where Jesus delighted to dwell. That is what we want nowadays, to have whole households like that of the Philippian jailer converted to Christ. May God grant it!

AMERICAN SPIRITUALISTS IN INDIA.

WHILE American and English Christians are concerned about the benighted condition of the Asiatic peoples, and to a limited extent are trying to publish to them the glad tidings of the Gospel, missionaries of another kind, as our readers are aware, have gone forth to them from our shores. It is not for us to utter any malediction on Colonel Olcott, Mme. Blavatsky, and their colleagues; we would rather pray that God would show them the error of their ways. But what they are doing in India is certainly similar to the work of some false teachers in bygone days, of whom the inspired apostle wrote (Gal. 1:8): "Though we or an angel from heaven preach any other Gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed." The following extract from a report of one of Colonel Olcott's meetings furnished to the Indian Witness shows the character of the rubbish that teacher is proclaiming:

"The President of the Jabalpur Branch in a short speech informed the audience that Colonel Olcott had saved him from becoming a Christian, and had met his every spiritual want. If I am rightly informed, the gentleman has been successively an orthodox Hindu, a Brahmo, and an Atheist. The President further declared to the audience that Colonel Olcott was a second Christ and the saviour of India, and that blasphemous assertion was allowed to go unrebuked by Colonel Olcott.

"It is impossible to give in detail all that Colonel Olcott said, and I very much question if the majority of his hearers understood what he was driving at in his attempt to explain Hindu philosophy, except that he meant to exalt Hinduism in the name of its philosophy. Some very flattering things were said to the audience about the old Rishis and Munis, which very naturally called for applause. A short epitome of Hindu philosophy was attempted, which showed most clearly, what the lecturer did not deny, that his views on that subject had been chiefly gleaned from English and German writers. A very superficial knowledge of the subject was sufficient to observe this; for had he been more conversant with vernacular writers he would never have made so many assertions of facts which have no existence but in the brain of a spiritualist.

"The lecturer attempted to show that idolatry was not so absurd after all. The idols, he told us, were dedicated by men of pure caste and pure lives—that Hindu philosophy recognizes in man something equivalent to mind which is common to all, and intelligence, or understanding, which belongs only to the spiritually minded and to those who can perceive the benefit of these things. Furthermore, the Pun-dit, when he dedicates an idol, puts into it life and power, and by the force of his buddhi can see a light in the idol which is fully manifest to his spiritual understanding! American spiritualism was here brought into requisition to show that this could be done by men.

"The summing up of his address was perhaps the most ingenious part of it all. Modern science, we were told, had made great strides of late in the material world, and was waiting for some handmaid to develop and interpret its resources and reveal to it the spiritual side. This Hindu philosophy supplies, it was stated, for it contains the potentialities of all knowledge on every subject. It was sad, however, to find that most, yea, nearly all the Pun-dits of modern days had lost this secret teaching; but fortunately a movement had taken place in America which was reviving this spiritual capacity and would bring to mind the teaching of Hindu philosophy on this subject. These two forces were one, and it was their province conjointly to show to modern science how to interpret its own results."

A FAVORED NATION.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached on Thanksgiving Day, November 26, 1885.*

[THE Brooklyn Tabernacle always appears to its best advantage on Thanksgiving morning. Under the broad roof of the church were gathered on Nov. 26th the products of all parts of the country. There was the large corn from the harvest-fields of the far West, palm-trees from South Carolina, silver and copper and gold ore from Colorado, tastefully displayed in baskets around the edges of the platform, corn from New Jersey, sugar from Louisiana, rice from the Southern States, grapes from the Pacific coast, and bananas from Florida. The pastor's reading-desk was one large sheaf of golden grain, and as Dr. Talmage rose behind this to give out the hymn the scene was very picturesque.]

"Thou hast increased the nation, O Lord, thou hast increased the nation."—ISA. 26 : 12.

The Overshadowing Cloud—Reliable Facts—Life from Two Standpoints—A Time to be Happy—Blessings Everywhere—in the City—Good Work Done—More still to Do—in the Nation—Inexhaustible Wealth—The Opening Door—How Wealth may be a Curse—The Improvement in Society—Reminiscences of Old Times—A Memorable Day—The Muster Out—A Thrilling Spectacle.

As sometimes in the summer noon when all the harvest-fields are flooded with light the air is suddenly darkened and you look up to find that it is the wing of hawk or eagle flying over the plain, so these sheaves of Northern wheat and Southern rice gathered in this Thanksgiving service are suddenly shadowed with the black wing of Death. Our beloved Vice-President, Thomas A. Hendricks, has departed. But it would be unwise to make this occasion sombre and funeral, and so I adjourn until my lecture to-morrow night the tribute to my warm personal friend, Thomas A. Hendricks. For surely if the departed Governor, who had by his own proclamation again and again called the people to thanksgiving, were allowed to speak, he would charge the officiating clergy to-day to stir the gladness and joy and gratitude of the people by recital of our national blessings, and in no wise be hindered by personal griefs.

THE REAL FACTS.

The optimists and pessimists and grain merchants and fruit-dealers and dry-goods men and farmers have told us such diverse stories about the real condition of this country that I was in a great fog on the subject, so that last week I appealed to the headquarters at Washington for accurate information, and I have now not the surmises or the guesses to present, but the facts received yesterday by letter from the United States Department of Agriculture, and I hereby publicly acknowledge my indebtedness to those obliging and skillful officials, especially Mr. Nesbit and Mr. Dodge.

As a firm foundation on which to build your thanksgivings to-day observe:

Fact the first: That the wheat crop of the country yields this year 350,000,000 bushels. And add to that the surplus which we had over from last year and you will find that America owns more wheat to-day than ever before since the world stood. All grain this year will make an aggregate of 3,000,000 bushels more than ever.

Fact the second: The corn crop exceeds all its predecessors in absolute quantity. Though not as much per acre, yet more acres have yielded, and so the corn-bin of the nation is better filled to-day than ever before.

Fact the third: Unmanufactured cotton exported this year is valued at $201,962,588, being $5,000,000 more sent to other countries this year than last, the exports of cotton this year 29,000,000 pounds more than last.

Fact the fourth: The tobacco crop is so luxuriant that we exported 27,000,000 pounds more this year than last year. A well-known and popular weed that is good for many things to-bacco is—to kill moths in wardrobes, and tick in sheep, and to strangle all kinds of vermin, and to fumigate pestiferous places—and is death on all other malodors by its own superior power of stench, an article so useful to others that I wish we could export the entire crop.

Fact the fifth: The sugar crop is so large that we have sent abroad this year 176,500,000 pounds more than last. In 1884 we exported 76,000,000 pounds, receiving for it $5,400,000, while this year we sent abroad 252,500,000 pounds, getting for them $16,000,000. I put the $16,000,000 of this year against the $5,000,000 of last year, and the 252,000,000 pounds of this year against the 76,000,000 pounds of last year.

TWO STANDPOINTS.

The so-called bears in the grain-market and all the other markets are such persistent, chronic, and hemispheric liars that the great masses of the people have no idea, until now I tell them, of what God is doing for this country. We had a bad winter, it was said. Yes. We had a bad spring, it was said. Yes. We had a bad summer. Yes. But we had a good God, and notwithstanding all the deluges, and all the droughts, and all the frosts, and all the insects, and all the political excitements, Republican, Democratic, and Mugwumpian, the lap of the nation is filled with blessing.

Shall we then render to-day a jeremiad or a grand march? It will all depend upon the way you look at things. There are two ways of putting things.

Raindrop the first: Always chill and wet, tossed by the wind, devoured by the sea.

Raindrop the second: "Aha! the sun kissed me, the flowers caught me, the fields blessed me."

Brook the first: "Alas, me! struck of the rock, dashed of the mill-wheel."

Brook the second: "I sang the miller to sleep, ground the grist; oh, this gay somersault over the wheel!"

Horse the first: "Pull, pull, pull. This tugging in traces and holding back in the breeching, and standing at a post with a sharp wind hanging icicles from my nostrils."

Horse the second: gives a horse laugh: "Useful life I have been permitted to live. See that corn! I helped break the sod and run out the furrows, and on a starlight night I filled the ravines and mountains with the voices of tinkling bells and the laugh of the sleigh-riding party. Then to have the children throw in an extra quart at my winnowing, and to have Jane pat me on the nose, and say: 'Poor Charlie!' To bound along with arched neck and flaming eye and clattering hoof; what an exhilaration."

Bird the first: "Weary of emigration; no one to pay me for song. Only here to be shot at."

Bird the second: "I have banqueted of a thousand wheat-fields; cup of lily to drink out of, aisle of forest to walk in, Mount Washington under foot and a continent at a glance."

Different ways of putting things.

MAKE ALL HAPPY.

Give us full organ to-day. Pull out all the glad stops, and while we pray and while we sing let us make a joyful noise unto the Rock of our salvation. Gather your families together. Let your children be arrayed in their brightest robes. In the morning let the temples of God ring with hosannas, and in the night let your homes be filled with congratulation, laughter and song. Turn on all the lights, bracket, chandelier, and candelabra. Throw another armful of firewood on the hearth and let the fire blaze out cheerily. When you and I are gone and our children go out and look at the place where we sleep, may they be enabled to say: "There rest the father and mother who knew how to make their children happy on Thanksgiving Day."

On such a time as this shall we not render thanksgiving to God? What a wonderful change! It was not a great while ago when governments forbade religious assemblages; now they invoke them. The father, the husband, and the brother sit now at the end of the pew through custom—a custom established in the dark ages of persecution, when it was necessary for the male members of the family to sit at the head of the church pew, armed for defence of those who could not defend themselves. Now, on Thanksgiving Day we meet in churches at the call of secular authority.

THE CITY.

I find great cause of congratulation in our municipal prospects. Our present Mayor retires from office with the kind wishes of our citizens, and our new Mayor will enter with the moral support of all good people of all parties. Municipal reform is a perpetual work, and every few years there need to be official brooms to sweep clean the city halls. For lack of it you know how about fifteen years ago New York suffered. Never since God corrected the politics of Sodom by burying the city in brimstone were there greater outrages enacted on earth than in these clusters of cities under the disguise of municipal government. Frauds about parks, about pavements, about station-houses, about pipes, about city halls, about aqueducts, about courts, about elections—frauds about everything. Fraudulent men applied for contracts of fraudulent officials, who wrote the contracts upon paper they had stolen, and then went home over pavements every stone of which had been put down in dishonesty, and in carriages every spoke and rivet of which were the evidences of their crime. Fraudulent election inspectors sat around fraudulent ballot-boxes and took fraudulent votes and made fraudulent returns, and sent to our State Legislatures men fit only for the idiot asylum or the penitentiary.

Things went on until the decent people in all our cities were for ten years under sadder depression. The newspapers did not dare speak out for fear they would lose the public printing. The pulpits did not dare to speak out because there were prominent men in the churches who had one hand on the spoils and the other on the throat of the clergy, telling them they had better be prudent and keep quiet. Matters were beyond all human redemption, and no statesmanship, no human skill could ever have met the crisis. But the Lord Almighty rose up and He put it into the hearts of the best men of both parties to band together and lay their hands to the work. The monstrosities were exposed, the vagabonds of fraud were arrested, and the work extended from New York until Brooklyn and Philadelphia and Boston and Chicago and all the cities felt the moral earthquake.

But every few years the work needs to be done over again in all our cities. Our Brooklyn city government costs too much and our taxes are infamous. Do you say that the city has enlarged and therefore it costs more to govern it? Yes, it has mightily enlarged, but the taxable property has also mightily increased, and it ought not to cost as much to govern a city with 600,000 inhabitants as when it held 300,000, because there are more now to bear the burden. There is something wrong in the neighborhood of the City Hall. May the incoming administration discover and extirpate it. For the brightening prospects in all our cities we may this day appropriately lift the Jubilate.

THE NATION.

I have much also to congratulate you upon in the condition and prospects of the nation. We have the most thorough feeling of amity in this country that we have ever had. The hatred between North and South is not only healed, but the scars are gone. The oldest man in this house never saw such brotherhood as to-day. Is it not a pity that the North and South have nothing to quarrel about? What a dismal failure the campaign orators made in the last Presidential election to stir up the old feuds. We were for a great many years before the war and some years after the war under the delusion that we were at peace in this country, but there never has been any peace until within the past ten years.

* Dr. Talmage preached last Sunday morning at Columbus, O., in the First Congregational Church, of which the Rev. Washington Gladden is pastor.

BYGONE TROUBLES.

Even at the time that Brooks was cudgelling umner and chains were stretched around Boston Court House to keep fugitives from escaping from the hands of the Marshal, and all our northern cities were in riot and bloodshed, but the relation of black men to their owners, we were under the delusion that we were at peace. Monstrous absurdity. It was war perpetual. Pennsylvania Hall burned on account of this political agitation in the city of Philadelphia—was that peace? The printing press of the Alton Observer thrown into the river—was that peace? In 1820, when the air was hot with sectional imprecation about the admission of Missouri as a slave State—was that peace? The burning of a college in New Hampshire in 1835 because colored youth were admitted—was that peace? South Carolina nullification—was that peace? Presbyterian and Methodist churches North and South split with a fracture that harked all Christendom on account of political agitation—was that peace? No; all billingsgate and scorn and vituperation and hatred and renege and blasphemy on both sides were exhausted. It was war of tongue, war of pen, war of trade, war of Church, war bitter, furious, consuming, relentless.

Thank God, that time has gone by. We have come to a new state of feeling and brotherhood such as we have never enjoyed, and our Congress, instead of spending nine tenths of its time tasting the public treasury, discussing sectional difficulties as it used, it will give nine tenths of its time to the discussion of the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing, the commercial, the literary, and the moral interests of this nation. We are not to be thankful to God for this state of feeling? He has not dealt so with any other nation. Praise Him all ye people!

COMMERCIAL PROMISE.

I find further cause of congratulation in the development of our national resources. Our wisest men in all departments of merchandise say that business is looking up and that our greatest prosperities are yet to come. It is the inevitable law of nature, which is also the law of God, that the material resources of this country must in the future produce material wealth. We will hear the anvil ring with a surdier low. You will see the furnaces glow with a cracker fire. You will see the wheel-blow strike with a swifter dash. America has not yet been fully discovered. Various Americas have been found, but there are better ones perhaps to come. Columbus found only the shell of this country. Agassiz came along and discovered the siluriferous America. Silliman came and discovered geological America. Longfellow came and discovered poetic America. But there are other Americas yet to be found. Our resources are not all been tested. We have a land capable of supporting three thousand six hundred millions of people!

We have just begun to open the outside door of this great underground vault in which nature holds its treasures, the copper, the zinc, the coal, the iron, the gold, the silver. If you have ever crossed the mountains to California you are had some idea of it. The rail trains have only just begun to bring the harvests of the West down to our seaboard. The American seamen have only just begun to cast their net in the right side of the ship. The dry-docks are just begun to set the keels and clamp the bars of our trading vessels.

What populations, what enterprises, what wealth, what civilization, what an advance from the time when under King Edward a man was set to death for burning coal and from the time when the House of Commons forbade the use of hat was called the noxious fuels, and these days, when the long trains rush down from the mines and fill our coal-bins and gorge the furnaces of our ocean steamers. One hundred and fifty thousand square miles of coal-fields. Two beds of coal, one reaching from Illinois, down through Missouri, into Iowa, and the other from Pennsylvania down into Alabama, while side by side with these great coal-fields are the mines of iron; these two great giants, these two Titans of the earth, iron and coal, insuring perpetual wealth to the nation, standing side by side to help each other, the iron to excavate and pry up the coal, and the coal to smelt and forge and mould the iron—800,000 tons of iron sent forth from the mines in one year in this country; 32,000,000 tons of coal sent out from the mines of this country in a year. And all this only a prophecy of a larger yield when we shall come on with larger trains and more miners and stronger machinery to develop and to gather up, to transfer and to employ all this treasure. Make this calculation for yourselves, if you can make it: If England's coal-field, thirty-two miles long by eight miles wide, can keep, as it does, 17,600,000 spindles at work in that small island, what may we not expect of our national industries when these 160,000 square miles of coal shall unite with 160,000 square miles of iron, both stretching themselves up to full height and strength, two black, world-shaking giants.

SANCTIFIED WEALTH.

Lift up thine eyes, oh nation of God's right hand, at the glorious prospects. Build larger your barns for the harvests. Dig deeper the vats for the spoil of the vineyards, enlarge the warehouses for the merchandise. Multiply galleries of art for the pictures and statues. Advance, oh nation of God's right hand. But remember that national wealth, if unsanctified, is sumptuous waste, is ruin, is debauchery, is magnificent woe, is splendid rottenness, is gilded death. Woe to us for the wine-vats if drunkenness wallows in them. Woe to us for the harvests if greed scatters them. Woe to us for the merchandise if avarice swallows it. Woe to us for the cities if misrule walks there. Woe to the land if God-defying crime debauches it. Our only safety is in more Bibles, more churches, more free schools, more consecrated men, more pure printing-presses, more of the glorious Gospel of the Son of God, that corrects all wrongs and is the source of all blessedness.

IMPROVED MORALS.

I congratulate you also on the fact that the manners and customs of society are improving. This is going to be a better world to live in. Take it all in all, it has vastly improved. I know that there are people who long for the good old times. They say, "Just think of the pride of people at this day!" "Just look at the ladies' hats!" Why, there is nothing in the ladies' hats of to-day to equal the coal-scuttle hats a hundred years ago. They say, "Just look at the way people dress their hair!" Why, the extremest style of to-day will never equal the top-knots which our great-grandmothers rolled up with high combs that we would have thought would have made our great-grandfathers die of laughter. The hair was lifted into a pyramid a foot high. On the top of that tower lay a rosebud. Shoes of bespangled white kid and heels two or three inches high. Grandfather went out to meet her on the floor with coat of sky-blue silk and vest of white satin embroidered with gold lace, lace ruffles around his wrists and his hair falling in a queue. Oh, you modern hair-dressers, stand aghast at the locks of our ancestry!

They say our ministers are all askew, but just think of our clergymen entering the pulpit with their hair fixed up in the shape of one of the ancient bishops. The great George Washington has his horse's hoofs blackened when about to appear on a parade, and writes to Europe ordering sent for the use of himself and family one silver-laced hat, one pair of silver shoe-buckles, a coat made of fashionable silk, one pair of gold sleeve-buttons, six pairs of kid gloves, one dozen most-fashionable cambric handkerchiefs, besides ruffles and tucker.

I once said to my father, an aged man: "Are people so much worse now than they used to be?" He made no answer for a minute, for the old people do not like to confess much to the boys. But after awhile his eye twinkled and he said: "Well, De Witt, the fact is that people were never any better than they ought to be."

ANCIENT DISSIPATIONS.

Talk about dissipations, ye who ever have seen the old-fashioned sideboard. Did not I have an old relative who always, when visitors came, used to go up-stairs and take a drink, through economical habits, not offering anything to the visitors? Many of the fancy drinks of to-day were unknown to them; but their hard cider, mint julep, methuegin, hot toddy and lemonade, in which the lemon was not at all prominent, sometimes made lively work for the broad-brimmed hats and silver knee-buckles. Talk of dissipating parties of to-day and keeping of late hours. Why, did they not have their bees and sausage-stuffings and tea-parties and dances that for heartiness and uproar truly eclipsed all the waltzes, lancers, and redows and breakdowns of the nineteenth century? And they never went home till morning. And as to old-time courtships, oh, my! Washington Irving describes them.

Talk about the dishonesties of to-day! Why, fifty years ago the Governor of New York State had to disband the Legislature because of its utter corruption. Think of Aaron Burr, Vice-President of the United States and coming within one vote of being President. Think of the ministry having in it such men as Dean Swift and Sterne, their genius only equalled by their nastiness. Why, society was so much worse than it now is that I don't see how our fathers and mothers could have been induced to stay in it, although on our account I am glad they consented.

ANCIENT WARS.

"But," say the deprecators of our time, "just think of the awful wars we have in these days, one half of the nation rising up to kill the other half." Why, there has been no war in modern times so ghastly as in the olden. Think of Austerlitz, where 30,000 fell; of Fontenoy, where 100,000 fell; of Chalons, where 300,000 fell; of Marius's fight, in which 200,000 fell, and the tragedy at Herat, where Gengis Khan massacred 1,600,000; of Neishahr, where he slew 1,747,000, and the 18,000,000 this monster had slain in fourteen years as he went forth to do as he declared, to exterminate the entire Chinese nation and make the empire a pasture for cattle. Think of the death-throes of the 5,000,000 men sacrificed in one campaign of Xerxes. Think of the 130,000 that perished in the siege of Ostend, of the 300,000 dead at Acre, of 1,100,000 dead at Jerusalem, of 1,816,000 dead at Troy. What may become of the threatening conflict on the other side the sea I know not, but up until this present time there has been no war compared with the wars of the ancients.

UNLIMITED RESOURCES.

This Thanksgiving morning finds this land above all others in a position to be grateful. What are we coming to in abundance when I tell you that only a part of this continent yields anything? Now that the Northern Pacific Railroad is through, all our resources are to be multiplied infinitely. Mr. Dalrymple, in the Dakota Territory, has a farm of 40,000 acres; in harvest time he has 150 reapers and binders going at the same time. The different divisions of his farm are connected by telephone, thirty steam threshing-machines, men in corps like an army, his farm one year yielding 432,000 bushels of wheat—900 car-loads; the Grandon farm, 25,000 acres; the Case farm, 15,000 acres; the Cheney, 15,000 acres; the Williams farm, 15,000 acres; the product of all these regions only limited by the means of transportation to market. Our land enriched by a vast multitude of foreigners who come here, not the tramps or the tatterdemalions of other lands, but tens of thousands of them their best citizens. Let us this morning thank God for the prospects opening before this nation.

Oh, wheel into the ranks, all ye people, North, South, East, West—all decades, all centuries, all milleniums. Forward, the whole line! Huzza! Huzza!

WHY MR. STEAD IS IN PRISON.

At a large meeting held in Exeter Hall, London, to express sympathy with the editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, whom a wicked Government has incarcerated, a speech was delivered by Mrs. Josephine Butler, whose efforts to reclaim fallen women have been much blessed of God. The following extracts from that speech, which, be it remembered, are the utterance of a Christian lady, may do something toward correcting the misrepresentations still being made in the New York daily papers:

"It will not be thought foreign to the purpose of this meeting if I speak briefly of the events of the last fortnight. That fortnight has seemed to me in some sense the culminating climax of my life-work. For years I have been striving on behalf of the foully oppressed victims of lust. I see two mighty principles warring together in our nation. At present we may well say, 'This is the hour and power of darkness.' Outwardly we have had a great check; the enemy has gained a great victory. For seventeen years past I have been conscious to a great degree of the existence of the very crimes recently revealed, but I and my fellow-workers have found that to action regarding this immorality was general incredulity. The utter incredulity of good Christian people has been a greater hindrance than the wickedness of wicked people. Even now, what is our great obstacle? Incredulity. In all these years I have been asking God that this great barrier might be thrown down. At last the blow was struck. Our friend Mr. Stead, whom I have known for nine years, and known to be a good and true man, was trained by God for this great work; in agony of spirit, and in all the fury of a righteous man, indignant at the vile crimes committed against the weak and innocent, he rose and drew aside, with a rude hand if you like, the curtain from these odious crimes.

"You may believe it or not, as you please, but I think we are living on the top of an inferno, walking about on a volcano which may burst at any moment and destroy us. And it seems to me impossible that God, looking on that hell raging beneath us, can bless us. Mr. Stead tore aside the curtain and revealed the abyss of crime and misery. In doing so he has overstepped the law; our zeal—I say 'our,' for I do not hesitate to admit I have been with him all through—our zeal for law was so great, our pity for the innocents ruined, wronged, betrayed, was greater than we could bear, and, like Jehu, we drove furiously. In so doing we may have done those things we ought not to have done, and left undone those things we ought to have done. But we did not ask your advice, and we do not ask your pardon. I believe it is true that in all times of great reform there have been zealous reformers who have overstepped the bounds of law and prudence. But this very fact has been overruled to bring the whole question into public knowledge.

"There has been a great outcry in the papers. Of course there was a good deal of journalistic jealousy, but the great motive, I believe, has been the determination to silence, to check, to frighten the persons who had dared to draw aside such a curtain and reveal such crimes. It is, of course, extremely inconvenient for many persons to have the light of public knowledge and a public opinion thrown upon their deeds. It does not suit them that anything should be known of these transactions; hence which exists among them to compel silence and to discredit the revelations already made. They waited to take breath, then searched out one little fault, one slip, and down they came with the whole resources of the Treasury behind them. And all this that we may be checked, frightened, silenced, and these things shut up and hidden. Then you know very well what would follow. The vile deeds, now somewhat checked, would go on again. Let us pray God this day that however painful it may be to a certain section of society, the great electric searching light shall fall upon every corner of this inferno. The one whose hand drew aside that curtain is in a prison cell. We have heard the verdict of the jury, but the verdict of the nation has yet to be given. Let us pray that the verdict given in a few weeks' time may be one of stern justice and purity, in accordance with God's will.

"But I ask you to pray not so much for these as for the nation. The nation, especially in the north, is judging the matter on the broad lines of right and wrong. I want to say that I know that 'Minotaur' described in the Pall Mall Gazette—and there are others like him. I do not know if the time may not come when their names will be known; it is not yet, and I will not mention any names. I could give the names of such men who systematically destroy and ravish the children of the poor. I have some in my own Home ruined by this man, turned into a mass of discese, some of them possessed as by fiends. The Government has turned its machinery of police and law against us who exposed these things, not against those who commit them. The new law is being put in force, not by the Government, but by private people. The police know these men as well as we do, but they prosecute those who go forth in the name of God to draw aside the veil and unmask this terrible evil. Let us go to God that He may overrule all things for good."

The evil for the prevention of which Mr. Stead risked his reputation and his life is not an invention of his imagination. Far from exaggerating it, he has not told a tithe of it, as the Secretary of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children has publicly testified. While the English Government spent an enormous sum of money in prosecuting the man who exposed the abomination, it has still done nothing to set the law in motion against the real criminals.

Sympathy with Mr. Stead is general in Christian and virtuous circles. Crowded indignation meetings have been held in London and the provincial towns. At one held in a church at Paddington the Rev. Dr. Clifford spoke of having seen Mr. Stead in Coldbath Fields Prison, and of his cheerfulness and buoyancy of spirit, and a resolution was carried by a large and enthusiastic audience expressing sympathy with Mr. Stead, and "earnestly protesting against the action of the Government in prosecuting him and leaving the real criminals untouched, such as procurers, procuresses, and others, who, according to Lord Dalhousie, "have been at work, to the knowledge of the police, ever since 1875."

At a crowded meeting held in Crispin Hall Street a speaker's declaration that Mr. Stead is a martyr to the sacred cause of social purity was responded to by the crowded audience rising and giving three hearty cheers for Mr. Stead. An indignation meeting was announced, and a petition for a free pardon is to be adopted. The principal and students of the Lancashire Congregational College, Manchester, have expressed their hearty sympathy with Mr. Stead in the painful position in which he is now placed through legal action of which they strongly disapprove. One hundred and seventy-five Oxford Undergraduates have also signed a memorial of sympathy with Mr. Stead, as have also one hundred and forty-eight prominent ladies of Ulster.

Mr. Stead is a member of the Congregational Church at Wimbledon. As the result of this adverse verdict in the trial Mr. Stead deemed it wise to submit to the church his readiness to resign the membership, if so the church wished. Since the verdict was passed an opportunity has been afforded him of addressing the congregation from the pulpit, to which he was invited by the minister. He made a statement concerning his position, of the general work he has undertaken, and particularly the motives by which he had been inspired throughout. A crowded congregation listened most attentively, and in the result it was cordially determined not to entertain the idea of Mr. Stead's withdrawal. Mr. Stead is a Sunday-school teacher in connection with the same church.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

The Decision of Two Young Men.—Mr. Mabon related at a recent meeting: "One night last week two young men, on their way to a luncheon, were attracted by our open-air meetings in Partick. They stood and listened to the singing, and at the close they entered the church, and were spoken to in the after-meeting, when both decided for the Lord. When parting they said, 'God helping us, we will live for Jesus.' Let those who work for the Divine Master take fresh courage from every new illustration of God's power and willingness to save, and go on in their labor of love."

When Christ Becomes Ours.—I was speaking to a young girl in a meeting the other night, whom I found very anxious. She could not understand how she was going to take the gift of God. I opened my Bible and read, 'The gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord.' I then took from my pocket a small book, and said, 'I am going to give you this book; do you believe it?' 'Yes, sir, I do,' she readily answered. I handed her the book, and she took it. 'Now,' I said, 'is the book yours?' 'Yes, sir,' was the reply. 'When did the book become yours?' 'Just when I took it.' 'And that is just when Christ becomes yours, when you take Him.' By God's grace her eyes were opened that night, and she took Jesus just as easily and as really as she had taken the book."

The Princess of Wales and an Irish Match-seller.—"I heard a beautiful and touching story of a poor woman in Dublin. The Prince and Princess of Wales were expected to pass through a certain street in Dublin, when they visited that country lately. All were full of expectancy to see them. This old woman to whom I have referred was standing among the crowd. She was selling matches and a careworn look was upon her face, as if all hope was gone out of her life. As the Prince and Princess drove past, the gentle heart of the latter was moved to pity, and she gave the poor woman a bow and a smile all to herself. In a moment the careworn look vanished from her face, and, full of gratitude she knelt down and prayed, 'May the Lord leave the crown on your head until it is as white as mine, and not take it off until He has placed one of His own making upon you.'"

A Farmer's Error Corrected.—The Rev. Mr. Harding related: "On one occasion a minister was preaching from the text, 'The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin.' After he had returned from the service the son of the farmer with whom he was residing said: 'I do not believe that doctrine you were preaching to-night.' The minister thanked him for his frank statement, and asked him what he did not believe about it, for he thought it was a very remarkable thing. And the young man went on to say that he did not believe we could be kept from all sin, and it was impossible we could be kept from falling. 'Do you believe that the Lord is all-powerful?' asked the minister. 'Yes, I do,' was the immediate reply. 'Well, if the Lord has power to keep us for one minute, surely He has power to keep us for five minutes, and if He has power to keep us for five minutes, surely He is able to keep us for months and for years—just as long as we trust Him.' Mr. Harding says the young man was convinced by the argument, though he could never have seen an example of men being so kept."

An Aged Lady's Dream of Heaven.—Mr. M'Farlane remarked: "I heard of two elderly ladies who lived together in a splendid house. There was a great difference between those two ladies in the manner in which they regarded the things of God, while the other one cared for the things of this life. She went out to the gayeties of the world and would not listen to her pious sister's advice and warnings against it. One night she had a dream. She thought she was in a beautiful palace; she could not bear the sight, for she knew it was no place for her, and crouched into the farther corner of her room, and watched the happy dancers and listened to the sweet music and singing. A pure and spotless one approached her, saying, 'Won't you come and join us in the dance and in the song?' But she crept farther back as he replied, 'I know not the words of the song or the measure of the dance.' In a moment a beautiful figure entered and she knew it was Jesus. He came forward to her and kindly said, 'Why don't you join the others in the song and in the dance?' And she fearfully answered as before. A sad expression came over the countenance of the Saviour as He turned and asked, 'What is this woman doing here? Take her and cast her into everlasting darkness.' She woke and resolved at once to become a Christian. Dear friends, I think this is a true picture of what an unconverted soul would be if admitted into heaven. God is merciful, too merciful to let a soul in its unchanged state enter a place of spotless purity, for it would indeed be an ungrateful place for such. Unless a man be born again, he cannot enter the kingdom of God.'

A Soldier's Courage Among Comrades.—At a recent meeting, at which testimony was invited from those present, a tall, fine young man quietly rose and said: 'I am a soldier in the army of Queen Victoria. It is only a few months since I was led by the Holy Spirit to know my need of Jesus as a Saviour, and became a Christian. As soon as I enlisted under the banner of King Jesus I felt that I ought to testify of my newly-found hope before my comrades. That seemed a very hard thing to do, and it was some time before I could make up my mind to attempt it. But I thought that a soldier of the cross should at least be as brave as a soldier of the Queen, and so with a prayer to God for help I just stood up before my comrades and told them what Christ had done for me. One of the men—a desperately wicked fellow—threw a cribbage-board at me, and others jeered; but God stood by me, and from that time my fear vanished, and God has graciously led me in leading some of my fellow-soldiers to the same precious Saviour whom I had found.'

Unhappy in an Emperor's Palace.—Miss Sismondi said: 'I remember reading about an Emperor of Austria whose life, by some means, was saved by a very humble peasant man. The Emperor was full of gratitude, and at once had the peasant brought into his palace. He was treated with the utmost kindness, and seated at the Emperor's table. But one day he was surprised to hear the peasant say to him, Oh, sire, would you be so kind as to send me back to my own village?' 'Why? What is the matter that you wish to be out of the palace, and go back into that dirty little village?' 'Oh, sire,' the peasant replied, 'the palace is very grand, and very beautiful, and every one has been very kind, and you have been like a father to me, but I am not happy. I was not born to it, sire. There are many things that I cannot understand. They talk of pictures and music, and they speak a language that I know nothing of. Well, I think it was something of that kind that made Jesus say to Nicodemus, 'Ye must be born again.' This peasant's state is precisely the condition of an unconverted person. Friends, do you think those who are not washed in the blood of Jesus would be happy in heaven? No, rather think any place would be a welcome change.'

An Old Soldier's Pipe Put Out.—The Rev. Dr. Wardman related: 'An old soldier in London, who was a perfect slave to strong drink, was one day passing through Regent's Park, and heard an evangelist preaching Christ, with the result that he was led to the Saviour. After this he had a great fear of passing a rum-shop, for the temptation to enter was sometimes very strong upon him. One day light was given him to seek the Lord to take away the love of and dependence on drink. He took the Lord for his Helper, and all love for strong drink passed away from him. But still he was the slave of his pipe. He thought he could not break the chain of this habit, and often argued with himself that smoking was no sin. One day, while walking along the road with his pipe in his mouth, he met a fellow-Christian. The pipe was quickly taken from his mouth, for he was ashamed to be seen smoking in the street, and then the thought occurred to him, 'You are ashamed of a fellow-creature seeing you smoking, and still you do not feel ashamed before God.' Completely humbled, he went to the Lord and confessed his fault, and put the smoking into His hands. He became an earnest preacher for the Lord, and soon afterward the doctor told him that if he did not give up preaching the excitement would kill him, for they said it would prove too much for his weakened body. He came to us in great distress, and told us of this, and concluded by saying, 'Oh, I cannot give up preaching for the Lord.' We asked him to take the Lord as his Healer. He did so, and now he has found Jesus as the Healer of the body as well as his soul. Now he is telling his simple story, and a great many are coming to the Lord through his testimony.'

THE SULTAN'S COMMISSION.

By J. P. Weethee.*

The Problem of Turkey's Existence—Its Relation to British and Russian Policy—The Trustee of Europe—Cannot Fail till Her Mission is Accomplished—Still Formidable—Her Fiduciary Importance—The Balance of Power—Why Turkey is Uplifted.

MUCH has been said and written relative to England and Russia as touching the Empire of Turkey in Europe, and as regards the policy and intent of each of those empires. What will England do for the Ottoman Empire? What are the designs of Russia? Into whose hands will Turkey fall? What is to be done with the Jews? Such problems, with many others of a kindred nature have their solution in the Bible. To its inspired records we must turn.

Since the reign of Peter the Great the ultimate designs of Russia have been apparent. Why she has not fully succeeded may not be so clear. Her want of entire success must be attributed to a power behind her throne. Often, during centuries of struggle, when about to seize her coveted prize, a sudden change, unforeseen and adverse, held her hand and wrested her prey from her grasp. Name this Providence, or chance, or what you may, it has chained Russia to a radius whose length has never extended to the Ottoman seat of empire.

It is often said of distinguished persons, such as Luther, Washington, Columbus, and Napoleon I., that they were immortal till their mission was accomplished. So with empires. God's mission is the sure pledge and limit of their national existence. Beyond their specific work their lives do not extend.

The continued existence of the Ottoman Empire is evidence that Jehovah has not terminated its mission. For reasons apparent to the close student of prophecy, the king of the Slavonian race has been kept north of the belt of empires that have scattered Judah and Israel. The immutable purpose of Jehovah still binds the Russian bear to his empire of the north.

That the Ottoman power, as a nation, is on the decline cannot be seriously questioned. Within a few years Turkey has been shorn of nearly one half of her European territory. Every struggle between the Sultan and Russia results in diminishing his absolute power to oppose the steady encroachments of the great northern autocrat. While, as a nation, the Ottoman Empire is declining, her official and military strength is unimpaired. By many this allegation may be denied. We are free to say, however, that in our opinion the Russian armies would to-day find it as difficult to enter Constantinople as it was three centuries ago. To the close observer the reasons are obvious.

(1) Her physical defences are formidable and are being strengthened. By land and sea the Sultan is fortifying. He is accomplishing all that money and human skill can do. The following item tends to establish this position: 'Herr Krupp is to supply the Porte with a large number of guns. The order is for seven very heavy guns, each similar to the one already mounted at the Dardanelles; twenty-two smaller guns, and four hundred field pieces and mountain guns. Four of the large guns are to defend the Bosphorus, and three the Dardanelles. The others are intended for various fortifications along the coasts, and to bring up the artillery department of the army to a high standard.'

(2) The Ottoman Empire has in itself two elements of great strength. (a) Its position by nature. Constantinople, at the eastern terminus of the 'Great Sea,' is, by its peculiar location, a second Gibraltar, 'the fortified rock of Andalusia.' (b) That empire has the support of the Mohammedan world. These elements are the two strong pillars of her throne.

(3) The chief strength of the Ottoman Empire is fiduciary. Its tenure of office, as custodian of the middle gate of one of the great eastern thoroughfares, is its great element of strength. The land that made the Turkish Empire custodian, in 1453, has held that power in office till 1885, and will hold her there till its mission is accomplished. It is true of nations as of persons, that they are immortal till their work is accomplished. The last four centuries have demonstrated the certainty of this position relative to Turkey.

When the Turk first entered upon the duties of his office as gate-keeper, he had sufficient inherent strength to hold his office and execute its peculiar work. The great Northern despot fully tested this point by centuries of experience. Providence was always in the way, since the Ottoman had been placed there by divine appointment. Nor can that officer be removed by any other authority.

In our opinion, Turkish rule at Constantinople is not dependent upon the extent of her territory. Turkey may be denuded and robbed of her national possessions, and yet be officially invincible. The Ottoman, in her European career, has had a remarkable experience. For many years her power was in itself absolute and invincible. As it began to wane a new element of power began its course in Western Europe called 'balance of power.' The Western nations, France and England, looking eastward, became jealous of Russia. And seeing the results of Russian occupation of Constantinople, resolved to hinder such a dangerous result. Turkey was therefore sustained against her northern foe. This balance of power has made strong the Ottoman weakness, and Russia for two centuries or more has been denied the occupation of the old Greek capital.

If the Ottoman Empire should fall, it would become a Russian province, and the interests of England and of the Jews would be exposed to the attacks of the ancient enemy of God and of His people (Ezek. 38). It is certainly contrary to the purpose of Jehovah to the Jews, that Palestine should now fall into the hands of the Russian autocrat. That land is yet to be occupied by the Jews, and until it is so occupied it must be controlled either by a government friendly to the Jews or by a government itself controlled by another Power which is friendly to God's chosen people. In our opinion, the British Empire cannot afford to have the Ottoman Empire broken down, nor does it appear to be the will of Jehovah that it should yet utterly fall.

The official strength of the Turkish Empire is therefore equal to Jehovah's purpose. No power but that of God can eject him from his office.

These thoughts are suggested by passing events. Let us examine the signs, and read them in the light of prophecy. Let us not look for the fall of the Turkish Empire till its work is accomplished.

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION, $1.50.

A Favor would be conferred on the Manager and office-staff of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD if subscribers whose terms expire at the end of the year would so far oblige them as to remit their renewals at once, instead of waiting for the new year. During the first few weeks of January there is always a very heavy influx of letters, which, in spite of special arrangements to deal with them, involves liability to mistake in making up the new lists. It would therefore be a convenience, facilitating the work and reducing the chances of delay and disappointment, if such of our subscribers as can conveniently do so would send in their subscriptions now. Those who send a new name with their own, as many are doing, are doubly welcome.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Funeral of Vice-President Hendricks on December 1st was a scene such as Indianapolis has never before witnessed. The city was crowded with distinguished guests, who went to testify to the gravity of the national loss. Secretaries Bayard, Whitney, Lamar and Endicott, and Postmaster-General Vilas, represented the national Administration. Senator Edmunds and twelve other Senators attended as a deputation from the Senate, and eleven Congressmen represented the House. Ex-President Hayes and the Governors of Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky and Ohio were also there, with other distinguished men. The crowd on the streets numbered fully one hundred thousand, and it is believed that fully as many joined in the procession to view the remains. In other cities the Federal buildings were draped, guns were fired, bells tolled, the courts adjourned, and the flags were at half mast. Speakers and preachers everywhere, even those opposed to Mr. Hendricks in politics, spoke of the deceased with respect, and honored his personal good qualities.

The Republican Senatorial Caucus Nominated General Logan as its candidate for the Presidency pro tem of the Senate. This was proposed by Senator Edmunds, who based his proposition on the fact that the Republicans of the country had voted for General Logan for the Vice-Presidency. He was then nominated by acclamation. To the surprise of all, however, General Logan declined the honor, as he said the position was not to his taste. This was a curious announcement, when only last year he accepted the candidacy for the Vice-Presidency, which, had he been elected, would have involved the duty of presiding in the Senate. On the following day Senator Sherman was nominated, and accepted the honor. There was an expectation that Senator Edmunds, who was the last President pro tem, would have been chosen again, but the idea was not popular. Mr. Edmunds, it appears, has partially lost the confidence of his party by not supporting the candidacy of Blaine with the proper degree of enthusiasm. A suggestion was made that the Republicans show their magnanimity by choosing a Democratic President pro tem, so that in the event of Mr. Cleveland's death or disability the decision of the people might be respected.

That, however, appears to have been a sacrifice too high for the Senators. But they have decided to pass the Presidential succession bill again, which is less likely now to be opposed in the House.

The Business of the Post Office Department during the past year has resulted, as was expected, in a loss. Mr. Vilas in his report, issued last week, says the deficiency is $8,000,000. This arises from both sides of the account. There has been a decrease of receipts and an increase of expenditure. The loss is mainly due to the reduction in the letter rate from three to two cents. The other reduction of the rate for letters weighing over half an ounce and less than one ounce, which is now two cents, instead of six cents, will also involve a loss, but as the change was not made until after the close of the fiscal year, its effect does not appear in the report now issued. It was never intended that the Post Office should yield a surplus, but it is gratifying to notice that during the last two months of the fiscal year there was a steady recovery in the receipts. The number of Post Offices in the Union now is 51,252. There were 2021 new offices opened during the year, and 886 discontinued.

The Entire Naval Department Needs Reorganization, says Mr. Whitney in his report. He is careful not to make imputations on the character and integrity of the officials now in charge or of their predecessors. It is the system which he believes should be reformed. He specifies numerous cases in which it has worked to the prejudice of the nation, and some of them are astonishing. In the bureau of construction and repair $75,000,000 have been spent since the war, and $70,000,000 of that amount have been substantially thrown away. Mr. Whitney says we have hardly "a single vessel that has either the necessary armor for protection, speed for escape, or weapons for defence." It is a curious fact that in nearly every country in Europe that has a navy similar complaints are made of money wasted in that department.

The Indian Question is Discussed by General J. D. C. Atkins, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in his report, from the same standpoint as that which is now held by the most eminent men of both parties. General Atkins says but one way of solving the problem. He says: "They must abandon tribal relations; they must give up their superstitions; they must forsake their savage habits and learn the arts of civilization; they must learn to labor and must learn to rear their families as white people do, and to know more of their obligations to the Government and to society. In a word, they must learn to work for a living, and they must understand that it is their interest and duty to send their children to school. When the farm and the school have become familiar institutions among the Indians, and reasonable time has intervened for the transition from barbarism or a semi-civilized state to one of civilization, then will the Indian be prepared to take upon himself the higher and more responsible duties and privileges which appertain to American citizenship. There are in the United States, exclusive of Alaska, about 260,000 Indian souls. Of that number there are in the five civilized tribes in the Indian Territory 64,000. There are in New York 4970; in North Carolina 3100; and there are some in Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Wisconsin and Minnesota, and a few in California and the Northwest who are civilized, and still others who can lay some claim to civilization. Exclusive of the five civilized tribes, the Indians have in cultivation 248,241 acres of land, an increase of 18,478 acres over last year."

The British Parliamentary Elections Held last week, so far as the results were declared, settled 331 more seats. Of these 172 were filled by Liberals, 108 by Conservatives, and 51 by Parnellites. This turned the tide of Liberal disaster, and hopes were expressed by Mr. Gladstone and others that at the end of the election there would be more Liberals in the House of Commons than Conservatives and Parnellites combined. There is still a possibility of that result, though the absolute majority, if it should be attained, would be too small to be effective. There were 44 seats still in doubt at the end of the week, of which disinterested observers predict that 18 will go to the Liberals, 12 to the Conservatives, and 14 to the Parnellites. If this estimate is realized the 670 members will consist of 331 Liberals, 255 Conservatives, and 84 Parnellites. This will give the Liberals a plurality over the Conservatives of 76, but against the combined vote they will be in a minority of 8. In that event the Marquis of Salisbury would hold his office at the pleasure of Mr. Parnell, who might at any moment drive him out by casting the Irish vote for Mr. Gladstone.

Political Animosity has been Intensified among Mr. Gladstone's followers by the events of the week. The Marquis of Hartington and Mr. Chamberlain appear to dislike each other more than either of them does the Conservatives. The speeches both have delivered indicate that it will be difficult, if not impossible, for them to act together again in the same cabinet. Under these circumstances the suggestion is made by the Moderate Conservatives for a rearrangement of parties. Lord Randolph Churchill has openly invited the aristocratic Whig leader and his followers to join the Conservatives, with whom they have more in common than with "the Birmingham screw-maker" and his friends. The test question will evidently be that of Irish Home-rule. Should Mr. Gladstone propose, when Parliament meets, a measure that would satisfy Mr. Parnell, he will be carried once more into power by the Irish vote, and he would drive the Marquis of Hartington and other Whig leaders into the Conservative camp. One result of the elections last week, which we notice with regret, is that Sir Wilfrid Lawson, the able Prohibition leader, was defeated. The temperance cause in England will suffer by his exclusion from the House of Commons.

The Bulgarian Complication still Hangs Like an ominous cloud over Europe. It is probable that if left to themselves Bulgaria and Serbia would conclude a peace, but as each power is acting under the tutelage of a greater power hostilities are continued. The European correspondent of the New York Times expresses his conviction that the darkness is now "denser than ever, and distinct flashes of lightning betoken an imminent storm." A week ago Europe hoped that the dawn of peace might follow the existing blackness, but apparently no one now cherishes that confidence. Russia and Austria are confessedly nearer war than at any previous time. The diplomats of both countries, who to the last moment talked platitudes about imperial concord, have suddenly lapsed into a significant silence. An important development of the crisis is the intense desire exhibited by the Russian people for war and the support thus given to the military and aristocratic classes. This was shown by the enthusiasm aroused at a public meeting held last Thursday in St. Petersburg, by General Ignatieff's declaration that Russia was ready to sacrifice everything in an onslaught on Austria. Turkey also is preparing to assist in the coming struggle if it should take place.

The Expulsion of Poles from Germany which has caused much distress and in some cases absolute ruin to the exiles, was defended by Prince Bismarck in the Reichstag on December 1st in a characteristic speech. He said he deemed the expulsion of strangers from Germany a wise measure. The empire was powerless to interfere with the rights of the different federal States comprising the German Empire to expel Poles, but the edict of expulsion complained of was issued by Prussia in the exercise of her rights as one of the federal States. After the Chancellor's statement a proposed interpellation in regard to the expulsion of the Poles was abandoned. There is therefore reason to fear that the example of Prussia will be followed by other German States.

Subscriptions to the Fund for Supplying Colored ministers in the South with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $9: From Lynn, Mass., $1; Denbyh, Ont., Canada, $2; Cincinnati, $1; a Thanksgiving offering from Norwood, Ia., $5.

Mrs. Baxter is this Week Conducting Meetings at Oberlin, O. Thence she will go to Freeport, Ill., for a series of services to be held next week. The Conference on Holiness and Divine Healing at Chicago was largely attended, and much interest was aroused on the subject in the city. The testimonies given were singularly clear and convincing, and the questions sent to the platform in response to Mrs. Baxter's invitation, and which she answered, showed that an intelligent interest was being taken in the teaching. The Chicago journals gave full reports of the proceedings, extracts from which we hope to publish next week.

Mr. Noble's Gospel Temperance Meetings at Louisville, Ky., are crowded nightly. An afternoon meeting was held on Sunday, November 29th, in the new Grand Theatre, which was filled in every part, large numbers standing, and a still larger number unable to gain admission. Among those who gave testimony at the conclusion of Mr. Noble's address were three reformed men, two of whom had been tramps and one a thief who had served a term in the penitentiary. At the close of the meeting a large number signed the pledge of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Mr. Noble was speaking every night last week in Trinity Methodist Church, corner of Third and Guthrie streets. Every day at noon he led the prayer-meeting at the Holcombe Mission.

The New York Young Women's Christian Association is now erecting a new building on the site of its old quarters, which have become too strait for its operations. Its Bible-class numbers nine hundred members, and last year in its educational classes there were upward of six hundred receiving instruction. A valuable sphere of its operations is the finding employment for young women. Last year no less than twelve hundred and twenty-five found situations through its efforts, and in its industrial department $1800 were paid out in wages for needlework. While doing so much valuable work want of space was a serious inconvenience. A new building is therefore to be erected, which will be an imposing edifice in the Queen Anne style of architecture, and will cost $125,000. The corner-stone was laid with appropriate ceremonies on December 1st; the Rev. Drs. O. H. Tiffany, Roderick Terry, John Hall, W. M. Taylor, and the Rev. E. Winchester Donald took part in the proceedings.

The Evils of Roller-Skating Rinks Have Become so serious at Providence, R. I., that the Mayor and Board of Aldermen have decided to discontinue all the licenses. A sudden and remarkable increase of the immorality of the city during the past few months excited attention, and the Mayor commenced an investigation in the hope of detecting the cause. Officers in citizens' clothes were sent to the skating rinks, and it was owing to their reports that the licenses are not to be renewed. Some sad revelations have been made affecting the character of young girls belonging to respectable families. Other cities will do well to be on their guard.

Major George A. Hilton, the Well-Known evangelist of Washington, D. C., has been laboring during the past three weeks around Newtown, Pa. He preached on Sundays in the Presbyterian church in the morning, and the Methodist Episcopal church at night. Evangelistic temperance meetings were held every evening at Newtown, Quakertown, or New Hope. He succeeded during his visit in organizing seven new unions of the W. C. T. U. The Newtown Enterprise closes its enthusiastic account of his visit by saying: "The Major is hard working and unsparing of himself where ever there is an opening to do good, and is withal a thorough Christian gentleman, alike at home in the pulpit and on the platform. The ladies of the W. C. T. U. of Bucks County did a good work in the cause when they brought him among us. May he be spared to visit us again at some future day."

The Illness of Pastor C. H. Spurgeon is Announced in a cable message from England. In previous years Mr. Spurgeon has found it necessary to take refuge in the South of France from the trying English climate during the most severe weeks of the winter. This year his old enemy, rheumatic gout, did not attack him, and he, believing that his adoption of vegetarianism had vanquished it, prepared for a winter of vigorous work at home. The hope is disappointed. Mr. Spurgeon is again prostrated, as he has been in every former year of late in which he has tried to continue preaching in London through the winter. He asks the prayers of all readers of his sermons.

The Cure for Hydrophobia Discovered by M. Pasteur is to be tested by six children of Newark, N. J., who were bitten by a mad dog on December 2d. The physician who attended them, immediately after they were bitten, apprehends danger from the bite, and strongly urged that they be sent to France at once for treatment by M. Pasteur. He states in a published card that hydrophobia does not usually show itself under two months after the bite, and in two weeks the children may be under the care of the great French chemist. A subscription was promptly raised to pay the expenses of any of the children whose parents were unable to pay, and they are being sent under the care of a New York physician who is anxious to witness the experiment. M. Pasteur has cabled his consent to treat them. The result will be awaited with great public interest. It is to be wished that some physician in this country knew the method of treatment, that it might be applied at once; but the next best thing is that being done, of sending the children without loss of time to the only man in the world who is believed to be able to save them. Men do not act so wisely when the poison of sin is raging within them, though the Saviour stands ready to receive and heal them (John 3:14, 15).

A Ship Steered Without a Helmsman is the latest triumph of American ingenuity. While repairs on the old Government yacht, the Talapoosa, have been in progress, Mr. C. H. Washburn has been fitting to her an apparatus which is intended to enable her to steer herself. Tiller ropes are attached to the end of a piston rod that works in a long cylinder placed athwartships. To operate the tiller compressed air is let into one end or the other of the cylinder, thus throwing the piston from side to side. The valve which allows the compressed air to enter the cylinder is controlled by other valves connected with an electric needle fixed vertically over the compass card. Two movable platinum plates, one on each side of the needle's point, can be placed on the card, so that if the ship deviates from her course on either side one of the plates is brought in contact with the needle, and an electric current is produced which by operating on the compressed-air valves moves the rudder in the required direction. At any time the electrical arrangement can be cut off, and the control of the compressed-air valves transferred to a wheel moved by a helmsman. That change will always be necessary near a coast when a straight course cannot be taken. There are many with weak will power who wish their lives could be so automatically guided. They know the right course and wish to follow it, but are drawn aside by temptation and afterward endure remorse. To all such God offers His almighty help (Ps. 32:8).

A Dreary Night in the Woods was Passed Recently by two business men of New York. They travelled by rail to Suffern, N. Y., whence they set out over the mountains west of that place for a day's hunting, intending to return in time to take the evening train back to the metropolis. Game being rather scarce in the immediate vicinity, they kept going further away, evidently without calculating the distance they travelled, until they found themselves in a very wild region, which they say they believe was "never before traversed by man." Here they succeeded in bringing down a few birds and a couple of squirrels by dusk, and then made a start to the station. They continued to grope through the trees and over rocks until nearly midnight, when they were so fatigued that they could proceed no further. The moon, although partially obscured by clouds, gave light enough to enable them to see how they were situated. They each took turns sleeping an hour at a time, until broad daylight, when they were surprised, as well as pleased, to be found by an old farmer, whose house was not more than a quarter of a mile away, and where they could have taken shelter for the night had they known it. They returned to their homes with little game but much experience. That, however, was worth the annoyance it cost, if it led them to reflect that life is often spent in just that way. Men go off on a quest for wealth, or fame, or some other of the world's prizes, lose their way, and are overtaken by the night of sin and sorrow. For them, too, there is a refuge near at hand, as some discover when they are found and led to it (Ps. 107:4-7).

A Thrilling Scene in a Texas Court was Witnessed on December 3d. An aged preacher named Newton Chance was on trial for a murder committed twenty-two years ago. He was charged with having killed the editor of a local journal, published at Sherman, Tex. The murder caused much excitement at the time, but the culprit could not be found. A man named Young was suspected, and was arrested on suspicion, but, there being no direct evidence against him, he was released without trial. The preacher Chance disappeared about the time of the murder, and suspicion was diverted to him. It was not until this Fall that he was found and placed on trial. The case appeared to be going against him when Young was called to give his testimony. He said: "I killed him because of a statement he published in his paper." The old preacher was acquitted amid demonstrations of joy, and he wept like a child, as the people crowded around to congratulate him. He was saved from execution by the substitution of the guilty man. At the last great trial his position will be reversed. Then he, the guilty one, will be saved from eternal death by the substitution of the Innocent One who has suffered for him (Rom. 5:8, 9).

A Man Suspended Over a Precipice by His Coat was rescued by a young lady last week. On Tuesday, December 1st, a gentleman from Newark, N. J., accompanied by his niece, undertook the ascent of the High Tor, a precipitous mountain, seven hundred feet high, near Haverstraw, N. Y. They ascended safely, but in descending they found that the ground, which was frozen hard when they ascended, was soft and slippery. They therefore diverged a little from the path, not knowing that in doing so they were perilously near the edge of a dangerous precipice. Suddenly the gentleman, who was little ahead, uttered a cry and disappeared. His niece peered over, and was horror-stricken at the depth of the ravine and the sharp rocks below. Her uncle, however, had not fallen clear down. His coat had caught on a stumpy tree, and for the moment it held him suspended. The young lady knew that the coat or the tree might give way, and she set herself to rescue him. Tearing her cloak and dress into strips, she rapidly twisted them into a rope, one end of which she tied securely to a tree, and the other end she flung to him. He grasped it firmly, and drew himself up. Afterward more care was exercised, and the two descended in safety. The lady does not appear to have had any difficulty in persuading the imperilled man to seize the rope. He realized his danger, and saw his only means of escape. Would that impenitent sinners, whose peril is far more terrible, and who have a surer way of escape provided, were as wise! (Heb. 2:3.)

HAGAR AT THE FOUNTAIN.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And she called the name of the Lord that spake unto her, Thou God seest me: for she said, Have I also here looked after Him that seeth me? Wherefore the well was called Beer-lahai-roi."—GENESIS 16:13, 14.

The Wrong and Its Fruit—Sorrow the Invariable Result of a Believer's Sin—Hagar's Flight—Who it was that Found Her—I. Her Remarkable Experience—Self-Outlawed—Found by the Angel—Significant Salutation—Directed to Return—II. Her Acknowledgment—A Son's Conviction in a Theatre—An Assignment Abandoned—IV. Her Worship—V. The Suggestive Memorial.

You know the story of Hagar. I am not going to deal with the allegorical meaning of it; that would be apart from our subject this morning. I shall speak of the incident simply as it stands, and even then I shall not use it strictly as a case of sure conversion, for I am not certain that it was such. God had promised to Abram that he should have a son, and that thus he should be the father of nations; that blessing did not appear likely to come to him, for there were no children born to Sarai, nor did there seem to be the possibility of any. Husband and wife were both old and well stricken in years. No special mention had been made of Sarai in the promise as it then stood; and therefore it was not clear to Abram but what some other might be the mother of the expected seed; and when, in her unbelief, Sarai proposed that her maid should become his secondary wife, Abram hearkened to her. According to the custom of the times, and of Oriental nations, this act was right enough; but as it was not really right in itself, and showed littleness of faith on Abram's part, sorrow soon came of it. Hagar began to behave herself proudly toward her mistress, and her mistress finding herself despised, complained to Abram, and began also to behave harshly toward her.

THE WRONG ELEMENT

would not work in Abram's family; it might do very well for the Canaanites around him; but in a house where God was feared, it was an evil principle, and could not work for peace or holiness. Hagar's high Egyptian spirit, finding herself likely to be famous in the house, would not brook the rule of her mistress, nor could Sarai, the quiet, but queenly matron, put up with the insults of her slave. The mistress became hard and harsh to her handmaid. Wrought into a frenzy, Hagar flies from the tent, and makes the best of her way on the road to Egypt, whence she originally came. But what could a lone woman do in her condition, all alone in the wilderness?

Wearied with her journey, she spies a fountain, and she sits there. It was the likeliest place for any passing traveller to find her, and she sits her down there in her proud despair. Perhaps they will send for her; Abram may repent his yielding to Sarai, and send for her; she will wait there and if nothing comes to her help, she will die rather than return. Do you not see her crouching at the fountain, half mad with pride and vexation, and at the same time stricken with a sullen despair? She knows not what she is to do, neither does any way of hope open before her. Alas, poor Hagar!

SORROW'S VOICE.

But although there was no prayer of hers for God to hear, another voice spake in His ear. The angel who suddenly appeared to her said, "The Lord hath heard thy affliction." That is a very beautiful sentence. Though sorrow and woe ought to be attended with prayer, yet even when supplication is not offered, the heart of God is moved by misery itself. In Hagar's case, the Lord heard her affliction; He looked forth from His glory upon that lone Egyptian woman who was in the deepest distress in which a woman could well be placed, and He came speedily to her help.

We have not much difficulty in deciding who the angel was that appeared to her. We are sure that this Angel of the Lord was that great messenger of the covenant who was afterward to appear in actual flesh and blood, but who many a time before he was born at Bethlehem anticipated His descent to earth, and visited it in human form. His delights were ever with the sons of men; and so when there was a message to be brought to men, that blessed One, the Second Person of the divine Unity condescended to be the bearer of it.

THE OUTLAW.

I. In speaking of Hagar, I shall first dwell for a little upon her remarkable experience. I pray that to some daughter of sorrow the like experience may come. May your case be mirrored in that of Hagar, as when one seeth his face in a looking-glass. Observe that Hagar had outlawed herself. No doubt she had much to put up with; but she had been insolent and provoking to her mistress, and at last she had in her impatience deliberately quitted the house of Abraham, and left the abode of the chosen family. Whatever that house may have been, it was the best place then upon the earth; it was almost the only spot under heaven where the Lord God was known. Whatever faults she may have perceived there, whatever errors she may have suffered from, she could not but have noticed that there was a great difference between Abraham's tent and the abodes of Egypt. Now she quits her place of privilege, she renounces the high hopes which surrounded her, and in her fierce passion she rushes she cares not whither. The untamable spirit which afterward showed itself in her son Ishmael raged in her bosom.

So, too, have we met with those who have deliberately left the ways of God and the people of God, and all semblance of goodness, because they have thought themselves badly used. They have happened to suffer somewhat, and in the bitterness of their spirit they have resolved to stand no more of it. They vow that they will have nothing to do with God, or with His people; they will turn their backs upon everything that is religious, and they will mix with the world in its most ungodly form. Now their hand is against every man, and every man's hand is against them, and in their high spirit they are prepared to defy the universe to subdue them.

While she was there, in the moment of her desperation, she was found by the angel. His first act was to awaken conviction within her. He said to her, "Hagar, Sarai's maid, whence camest thou? and whither wilt thou go?" This language is singularly

LIKE THE LORD JESUS

Christ's mode of address. The name of the person is mentioned. This forcibly brings to my mind the speech of Our Lord when He said unto the woman, "Mary," and she turned herself, and said unto Him, "Rabboni." He says, "Hagar, Sarai's maid;" His word is a personal word, and she cannot mistake it. Is not this the Lord's way in other cases? Has He not said, "I have called thee by thy name?" He adds her description, and reminds her that whatever else she might be, she was "Sarai's maid." How surprised she must have been!

Then, further to bring her to her right senses, the angel asks her, with touching pathos of tone, "Whence camest thou?" What hast thou left behind thee? What hast thou given up? All thy hopes lie in Abraham's tent, and thou hast left the place. For thee there is a high destiny, and thou art flying from it. Thou art, after all, a favored woman, and thou knowest it not; thou art flying away from that which will be thy blessedness! This is the question of the Holy Spirit to every runaway rebel. O wandering sinner, what art thou quitting? In fleeing from goodness, and God, and hope, and grace, dost thou know what thou art leaving?

Again, He asks her, "Whither wilt thou go?" Her crouching form is before Him; she lifts up her eyes, all red with tears, and she weeps anew as he says, "And whither wilt thou go?" "Wilt thou go into the wilderness further, and die there of thirst and hunger? Wilt thou go down into Egypt, back to all the cruelties of that benighted land? Whither wilt thou go?" It is thus the Lord meets runaway sinners that are bent upon their own destruction, and He calls to them by name, and says, "Whence camest thou? And whither wilt thou go? What can be the end of such a life as thine? Whither can it carry thee but to destruction?" Some of us heard the warning voice long years ago, and we can never forget it; the call rings in the chambers of our memory even now.

THE HARD DUTY.

When he had wrought conviction in her, the angel who had found Hagar next gave her an exhortation. He said to her, "Return unto thy mistress, and submit thyself under her hands." A hard message, as it seemed to her in her pride, no doubt. "Return," however hard the way; "submit thyself," however humiliating the deed. Hagar is not spared; the angel puts his words very plainly. If it were kindness to say "Return," it is still greater kindness to say severely, but truthfully, "Return to thy mistress." He says also, "Submit thyself under her hands," to show that the submission must be entire and absolute. Put thyself back into thy right place, and then grace can deal with thee. When the covenant Angel deals with any man or woman among us, He will say, "Return, return, return. Repent, and be converted. Turn ye; turn ye, why will ye die?" The Gospel does not spare the sinner the pangs of repentance. You must go back to the place from whence you came, and you must submit yourself, or nothing will go right with you.

THE REWARD.

When the angel of the Lord had thus spoken with Hagar, calling her by her name, and working conviction in her heart, and pointing out her duty, he then added rich promises—promises which to her mind must have been very unexpected and consoling. She was a runaway slave girl, but he says to her, "I will multiply thy seed exceedingly, that it shall not be numbered for multitude, and thou shalt bear a son, and shalt call his name Ishmael." That name signifies, "God heareth me," because the Lord had heard her affliction. The angel went on to tell her what this child should be who would be the joy of her heart. Little does a sinner know what blessings are in store for him, if he repents and submits to the Lord's will.

So you see, Hagar's experience was a very remarkable one, although by no means peculiar to herself. Blessed be God, it has happened to tens of thousands, that where sin abounded, grace did much more abound. When they have run away, and outlawed themselves, grace has followed them, grace has convicted them, grace has admonished them, and grace has made large promises to them.

II. Now, I want you to notice

HER DEVOUT ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

When that which we have described happened to her, she acknowledged the living God. My text says, "She called the name of the Lord that spake unto her, Thou God seest me." She spake to Him that spake to her; after this fashion do we all begin our communion with God. Oh, when God speaks to you, you will soon find a tongue to speak to Him.

What did she say? She acknowledged Him to be God. "She called the name of the Lord that spake to her, Thou God seest me." It is one thing to believe there is a God, but it is quite another thing to know it by coming into personal contact with Him. They give you books to prove that there is a God—all well and good; be convinced by them. They tell you to walk abroad and see God in His works. Do so. You cannot better employ yourselves; for God is everywhere. His breath perfumes the flowers, and His pencil paints them. But you will not learn God in this fashion, if you use this method by itself. To go from nature up to nature's God is a long step for broken legs; we are so mangled by our fall that we never take that step without divine help. But, oh, if the Lord meets with you! If He reveals His own self to your heart! What assurance! What certainty!

Observe, dear friends, that she acknowledged His observant love. You that only know God as one who made the heavens and earth, do not indeed know Him at all. He must be personally a God to you, or He will not be your God at all. To us the true God is the God who seeth us. Doth not His law begin, "I am the Lord thy God, which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage"? His special care is the mark by which we know Him. It was so in Hagar's case; God's watchful care toward her made Him real to her. She knew that He must be God; she could not doubt it, for she had been so strangely found out by Him.

In the presence of that God she felt overpowered and ready to yield. She was so overwhelmed, that no rebellion remained within her. She girds her garments about her, and she makes the best of her way home to the tent of Sarai. That is what I want to happen to many a poor soul this morning in a still fuller and more spiritual sense. Pray, you people of God, that it may be so. If you are here this morning, Mistress Sarah, let me put in a gentle word for your poor maid. If she does come back to you, do not treat her harshly again; do not drive her away again; but receive the runaway and make the best of her. Let the past be buried. Say, "If an angel has appeared to thee, and taught thee to know the Lord, I will gladly receive thee, and show the kindness of God unto thee."

HER AMAZEMENT.

III. Let me now call to your notice the manifest amazement of this woman; for in her glad surprise she uttered a sentence which runs as follows: "Have I also here looked after Him that seeth me?" This is a sentence very hard to be understood; not because it is hard to make out a meaning, but because it is so full of meaning. It reads like an oracle. Expositors will tell you that as many senses may be given to this sentence as there are words in it; and each one of these senses will bear a measure of decent defence. I shall not go into them all, but I think I see clearly that she was amazed that God should care for her. "Thou God seest me. Have I also here looked after Him that seeth me?" Does He see me? Do I see Him? If I had loved God when I was in Sarai's tent, I could have understood His following me here. Brethren, it is a great wonder to me this day that ever my God should think of me. Brothers, sisters, do you not share that feeling, each one for yourself? Do you not say, "Why me, my Lord? Why me?" Sit still in holy wonder, and adore and bless the Lord.

A CALL IN A THEATRE.

An old man in the country was a gracious father, and brought up his children in the fear of the Lord; but his son while yet a youth must needs see life in London, and therefore he came to the great city, and plunged into all sorts of sin. He cared nothing for the Sabbath, but even felt glad to escape from the weariness of the meeting-house to which he had been taken from his infancy. It was no design of his ever to find God, but God found him in the most unlikely of all the places in the world—namely, in a low play-house. A scene occurred in which a mutinous sailor was to be banged, and asking for a glass of spirits he was represented as drinking his own health in the words—"Here's to my immortal soul." "Immortal soul," thought the foolish youth, "Immortal soul." He had almost forgotten that he had an immortal soul. It was a shot fired at the centre of the target; it struck him home; he was ready to drop; he sought the open air and a place wherein to weep. The next Sabbath morning found the young scapegrace at a prayer-meeting, seeking his father's God, and before long he found peace through the blood of Jesus, and began preaching the Gospel which he had so grievously abused. God knows how to get at the heart of sinners.

Remember Colonel Gardiner about to commit a foul offence; he made an assignation, and reached the spot an hour too soon, and while he waited he saw, or thought he saw, his Saviour, and heard a voice accusing him of ingratitude. He fled the place of his temptations, sought for pardon, and became eminent as a saint. What a surprise it must be to rebels to be thus seized in the arms of grace and transformed into friends of the King! I ask God that such a surprise may await some who are here to-day. May you also inquire in amazement, "Have I here also looked after Him that seeth me?"

IV. My time has fled, or I should have asked you to notice

HER HUMBLE WORSHIP.

Her humble worship was expressed by her using an expressive name for the angel of the Lord. She worshipped God heartily and intelligently, according to her knowledge. She did not use the first word that came to hand, but she spake fitly, thoughtfully, and well. She knew that the Lord was the seeing God, for He had seen her; and so she worshipped Him under that title, "Thou God seest me." We cannot worship "The Unknown God;" at least, such worship lacks eyes and light, and is fitter for owls and bats than for man.

Her worship was wonderfully personal. It is not "God sees," but "Thou God seest me;" and it is not, "Has God looked after His creature?" but "Have I here also looked after Him that seeth me?" True religion is always personal, but it becomes wonderfully so when a man is specially arrested by sovereign grace; for then he adores as if he were the only man in the universe, and beholds God as if no other eye throughout all the ages had ever beheld him. Oh, it is wonderful to feel alone with the Lord, while the Lord is searching you through and through.

Remark again, that her worship proved itself deeply true, for it was followed by immediate practical obedience to the command of the Lord. Obedience is the best of worship. She returned unto her mistress, and was subject unto her. Oh for grace this morning, if God meets with us, not to tarry a single minute in rebellion, but to return at once to subjection to the Lord! Oh, to cry with Thomas, "My Lord and my God;" and then to live henceforth as in His sight!

V. We will conclude by glancing for an instant at the well which became of this special manifestation and singular experience. That well—we do not know what it had been called before—but that Beer, or well, was henceforth called Beer-lahai-roi, or the well of Him that liveth and seeth. Will we not all at this time drink of that well? It was a very happy thought to attach a holy name to a well, so that every traveller might learn of God as he refreshed himself.

Come and drink at this well. The waters are cool and clear. Drink, and live. Did I hear you cry out in anguish, "Nobody cares for me"? Do you say, "Nobody knows me in this terrible city. Here I am in this great London as much deserted as Robinson Crusoe on his lone island"? I know what you mean. London is worse than a wilderness to many; a man may lay himself down and die in these streets, and nobody will care for him. The millions will pass him by; not for want of kindness, but from want of thought. There is no such horrible wilderness as a wilderness of men. Yet, take comfort; the living God sees thee! He seeth not as man seeth, with a mere gaze of cold notice; but His heart goes with His eye.

You have not prayed yet, but He hears your affliction. Oh, begin to pray, and He will speedily deliver! Spread your case before Him, and He will regard your petition. I would encourage you to get alone, if you are in sorrow and sin, and tell it all out before God, and see if He does not deliver you. Some of us have gone to Him in plights as terrible as yours, and we have ordered our cases before Him, and He has answered us. We can truly say, "He hath delivered us;" and therefore we encourage you to seek His face in like manner. May the Lord bring you to seek Him at once, for His great love's sake, and then to Him shall be glory forever and ever. Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

WONDERS OF ART

and Archæology is the title of a series of highly interesting and instructive books, of which a new volume has just been issued. The department with which it is concerned is that of Glass-making in all ages. A moment's thought will enable us to realize how important is the part glass plays in adding to human comfort and knowledge. Not only does it enable us to enjoy light without the cold winds, not only does it supply us with material for ornamenting our homes and making useful articles, but when it is placed in our hands in the telescope and the microscope it enables us to gain a knowledge of the perfection of God's works in creation which we could never have gained without its aid. The history of glass-making is therefore a matter in which every reader will be interested. M. Sauzay, the author of the book, has taken extraordinary pains to collect all the facts accessible on the subject. How wide a field there is for investigation may be inferred from the fact that the discovery of glass is attributed by some to Tubal-Cain, the eighth from Adam; by others to the children of Israel during their sojourn in the desert, and again by Pliny, and others to the ancient Phœnician merchants. The last is the generally accepted account, but M. Sauzay expresses his doubts of its correctness. It is, however, certain that fifteen hundred years before Christ glass-making had attained a wonderful degree of perfection. Articles of glass have been discovered among the ruins of Thebes bearing hieroglyphic inscriptions which prove uncontestedly that they were made before that date. There are also paintings on the ancient tombs from which it is clear that in those early days men were employed in glass-making and glass-blowing, and that they used tools very similar to those now employed in the manufacture. Of some of the ancient articles discovered M. Sauzay gives drawings. He traces the history of the art through succeeding ages in its various forms of window-glass, mirrors, bottles and vases, goblets and drinking-glasses, and optical glasses. The work contains numerous illustrations of some of the triumphs of Venetian art which are very beautiful. Pp. 325; price, $1. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

BEYOND THE GRAVE

is the title of a small work by Dr. Hermann Cremer, Professor of Theology in the University of Greifswald, which is translated by the Rev. Samuel T. Lowrie, D.D., and prefaced by an introductory chapter from the pen of the learned Dr. A. A. Hodge, of Princeton. Christian ministers, parents, and Sunday-school teachers have often realized, when talking with a bereaved child, how little they know about the condition of the departed soul. It is the custom to speak glibly of the pious dead being in heaven, and, though it is seldom bluntly stated, there is a general impression among Christian people that the impenitent are in hell soon after the bodily eyes close in death. The belief is also general, though not so general as it was half a century ago, that throughout the countless ages of eternity the dead remain in the condition into which they enter immediately after quitting this world, save that they are again clothed with a body at the resurrection, and have to undergo a judgment which indorses and confirms the separation and destiny fixed at death. But when some unbeliever challenges these beliefs, or some inquirer seeks to examine the grounds for them, the Christian is often surprised to find how little of direct statement on the subject the Bible contains. It is rather by inference that we have arrived at the belief we hold. The Apostle Paul expressed his own conviction that after death he would be "at home with the Lord" (11 Cor. 5 : 8). Jesus assured the dying thief that on that day he would be with Him in Paradise (Luke 23 : 43). Beside these two statements there are others in which the same idea is implied, but how much is still left to the imagination! We do not know where heaven is, nor what are its conditions, nor whether the infant of a few days is there with the saint of eighty years old, nor whether, when the soul of Jesus went there while His body lay in the sepulchre, a change was worked on all the disembodied spirits then living there. We have our own ideas about those things, but of actual knowledge we have none. Lazarus, dead four days, comes back at Christ's command, and so far as we know reveals nothing. The son of the widow of Nain is silent. The Bible was not intended to satisfy our curiosity. If we follow its teachings we may say with confidence when we die, "Into thy hands I commit my spirit," and be confident that we have eternal life, and there is no need that we should know more, for we trust God. Yet who can have stood by the side of an open grave and watched a loved form laid there without wishing that he knew where that loved one was at that moment?

The erudite German professor gives us in this book the conclusion at which he has arrived on this subject, and the reasons on which he bases it. Dr. Lowrie, who translates it, gives us his views, which are in some respects different from those of Professor Cremer. Again, Dr. Hodge differs from both, and yet all three recognize the supreme authority of the Bible, and have no knowledge of the subject outside of the Word of God. All are evidently sincere seekers after truth, they search the same quarry, and they arrive at different results. The subject is intensely fascinating, especially to those whose loved ones have but recently crossed the river. To all such this book will be welcome, and while readers whose views are in accord with those of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will doubtless agree on one or two points with Dr. Hodge rather than with Dr. Cremer, they will find much in the arguments of the latter that will tend to their comfort and edification. BURMAH AND ITS PEOPLE.

THE country of Burmah, which has attracted public attention lately owing to the British invasion of it, lies between British India and China. Its area is about 170,000 square miles, or three fourths the size of Texas. It contains valuable mines of gold, silver, copper, tin, lead and iron. Its chief export is rice. The population is about four millions, but as the outlying sections of the country are semi-independent this estimate of area and population is little more than nominal. At times the King of Burmah asserts his sway over these outlying sections by making a fierce onslaught on the people, orders a hideous massacre, and retires until another occasion arises to relieve his passion. There is no semblance of government anywhere, save that the will or caprice of the king is supreme. The people are of the Malay race; they profess to be Buddhists, but their religion and morals are of the lowest type. Polygamy and slavery flourish among their institutions.

On Saturday, November 28th, General Prendergast entered the city at the head of fourteen thousand men. The opposition they had encountered on the way had been easily overcome. Several skirmishes had taken place, in which it was evident that the Burmese did not lack personal bravery, though, being badly armed and without discipline, they were unable to oppose trained troops. King Theebaw displayed the cowardice that bullies generally show when confronted with superior power. He professed his readiness to do anything if his life would be spared. He would abdicate, would live in a house designated by the British, and make any other concession required of him. He was sent to Calcutta to talk to Lord Dufferin. The people who were held in terror by the brutal king gave a cordial welcome to the British, whom they regarded as their deliverers.

The illustrations represent two Burmese courtiers in their court dress. One is a Secretary of State. The costume they have to wear at court appears ridiculous to us, but, in fact, it is not more absurd than the blue and silver livery which the British Premier and his colleagues have to wear when they attend the Queen's court. The centre picture represents a company of the Burmese troops. The elephant is for the accommodation of the colonel. Inferior officers ride on ponies, the soldiers clad in ordinary coats and trousers march alongside, while twenty or thirty bare-legged runners carry the officers' muskets and private luggage. The pictures are taken from sketches made by a European traveller who recently made a visit to King Theebaw's court.

A TALK WITH A SMOKER.

"A DREADFUL accident that was yesterday," said a portly clergyman, seated in a railroad car, as he produced a package of tracts and handed one to each of his fellow-passengers.

"It was that," said the man opposite to him. "I should say it will cost the company a hundred thousand dollars in compensations and damages. They ought to pay well—it will make them more careful. Five thousand dollars is a pretty small sum for a woman and children to get for the loss of the bread-winner."

"Yes, small enough," assented the clergyman, "and that does not benefit the man killed, who is perhaps the greatest loser. He certainly is if he is cut off before he has made his peace with God, for he loses his soul."

"Ah! that's your business, to persuade folks to invest in something they won't get till they are dead. For my part, I mean to enjoy my life here, and if there's another life after this that may take care of itself."

"There are two ways of enjoying life," said the clergyman. "I have seen men set out to enjoy life by drinking and going to theatres and balls and getting all the vicious and licentious pleasure within their reach, but they don't succeed. No man enjoys life in that way. More than one half his time he is miserable. Now, my idea of enjoying life is to spend it in a way that makes you happy all the time, and that way does not prevent your having happiness after you are dead too. There's no man that knows true peace and comfort and freedom from worry and anxiety like the Christian. He has a never-failing remedy for care, which is the greatest foe to happiness.

"So I have an unfailing remedy. Look here; I call this 'old never-fail.'" And the man put his hand in his pocket and brought out a short, finely-colored meerschaum pipe. "When I'm dull and worried I fill this with real Virginia, and before I have had many whiffs I'm as happy as a king. I don't care whether school keeps or not."

"That's a poor way of meeting trouble, to let things slide and not to care. It is like the ostrich burying its head in the sand so that it shall not see the hunters. It does not save the bird, and your smoke doesn't save you. The trouble has to be met just the same when you lay your pipe down. Now, when I am in trouble I just put it all in the Lord's hands and do my best. I know it will all come out right."

"I guess you haven't had many troubles. Life's been pretty smooth with you or you would not carry so much fat."

"If you knew my history you would not say that," said the clergyman, joining in the laugh raised by this reference to his sleek appearance.

"I have had more troubles than the majority of men. But they have not hurt me. I have found religion a good thing for this life, and I know it will be a good thing for the life to come. I speak from experience when I recommend it. You cannot say as much for your 'never-fail.'"

"All I say for it is that it suits me. I don't believe in psalm-singing and prayer-meetings and doleful faces. I believe in enjoying life."

"So do I," said the clergyman. "And taking it in the long run, I say that a religious man enjoys it more than the irreligious man. He has to give up some things, but every one that he gives up is an injurious thing any way. Apart from religion he is better without them. You cannot name one pleasure that is denied me that does a man good. You know that a man who spends his night in dissipation is miserable next day. He is not so good a man of business in the morning as he would have been if he had gone to bed sober and at a decent hour. He is poorer in pocket, poorer in health, and poorer in reputation. If you have two men working for you of equal capacity you know that the religious man is more reliable and more trustworthy than the irreligious man. He has more rational enjoyment, does not disgrace his family, and is altogether a better man every way. If there were no life beyond the grave he would be a wiser man than the one who damages his health, wastes his money, and is a nuisance in the world. Besides that, as there is a life beyond the grave, he is prepared for that, too. Come, now, you are a man of forty years, I should say. Suppose a lad comes to you and says, 'I want to make the best of my life; what would you advise me from your experience to do?' Would you advise him to drink and smoke and spend his evenings at the theatre, and with vicious men and women, gambling and rioting?"

"No, I wouldn't if I cared for him."

"No, because it would be a foolish thing for him, whether there is a heaven and hell or not,

"I call this Pipe Old Never-Fail."

And if there is, why, it would be a fatally bad thing for him. A purely selfish man, concerned only for his own interest, ought to be a religious man, if he has any sense. Taken on higher grounds, religion is equally strong. The wicked man is a fool, look at it how you will."

"Well, that's a strong way of putting it, but I think you're right. But here's my station. Good-by. I've heard the best sermon I ever heard, and I'll think it over."

THE SILVER LINING.

A SERIAL STORY.

Faithful Friends.

THE days pass slowly and gloomily with the prisoner. It is a monotonous life, dreary and depressing to the last degree. There is no news from the hospital where the injured man lies hovering between life and death. Frank Arnold asks anxiously every day, and learns that Greville is still living, but is not expected to recover. From hints casually dropped, Frank knows that his record is being traced. Efforts are being made to find his wife, and suggestions are made to him that he might furnish a clue. These he disregards, having himself no knowledge of her abode. The warders think him sullen, and form the worst opinions of his guilt. Their suspicion is not unnatural, for Frank is resentful and his answers are surly. They are not fit associates for him, and it seems to him that they are impertinent in trying to force their conversation upon him. So he is unpopular in the prison and at last he is left to himself, and probably misses some little attentions that would have tended to his comfort.

There is one rift, however, in the cloud that hangs over him. His cable message had been answered, and he learned that his father was coming to his aid. In ten days he might be expected, and then at any rate he would not be friendless in his trouble. He knows well at how great a sacrifice his appeal is being met. His father's practice sees himself as a boy winning distinction at school. He kneels again at his mother's knee and listens to her as she tells him of Jesus, and urges him to make God the guide of his youth. He sees himself leaving home for his studies in London, and feels the grip of his father's hand as with words of wise counsel he warns him against worldliness and sin. Life was bright in these days, but how soon did it become clouded! Prayer neglected, the Bible unread, the church abandoned, spiritual life at a standstill. Then came his yearning for money. He remembers now as he lies in the gloomy prison the first movement of that desire for wealth which had finally taken possession of him. It was not the natural and honorable desire for a well-earned fortune, but the wish that in some easy way he might realize it without the dull plodding labor that his father had given through long years. Then he had heard of Clare and the fortune she might be expected to inherit, and he had hastened to make himself master of it. Fool that he had been! But for that haste to be rich he might now have been happy and untroubled in his native land. He had flung his life away, and he bemoaned his folly.

It is not repentance that the miserable man feels as he lies awake through the long hours. It is only chagrin, disappointment, vexation that he should have so blundered. Repentance might have led to humiliation before God and realization of divine forgiveness through Christ. It is the blunders and the consequences of them that trouble him. That he is a sinner he forgets, and he offers no prayer for pardon. No wonder that light does not break in on his darkness while he dwells on his own sufferings and laments the seed from which they have sprung only because it has brought suffering, and so because it was a sin against God.

These nights grow at last intolerable, a thing to be dreaded, bringing no rest, physical or mental, nothing but torture that seers like to drive him mad. The craving for exercise and must be neglected, and the discomforts of a voyage endured in responding to his request. No greater proof of his love could such a man as Dr. Arnold give. But Frank needed no proof; he knew that before. Glad as he was of his coming, he did not look forward to it with unalloyed delight. Even to his father he shrank from acknowledging his misdeeds. Perhaps more to his father than to any one else would it be painful to own that he had fallen into dissipation, and yet the confession would have to be made, for how else could he account for his oblivion on the fatal night? He could see in imagination the look of grief that would come over Dr. Arnold's face when he heard the disgraceful story. He could feel in anticipation the pang of humiliation which he would suffer in telling it.

The nights are the most horrible experience Frank has to undergo. In the day there are occurrences to divert his attention. In the night, when all is still, he lies awake dwelling on the events of his life, and tossing restlessly on his cot. Then memory tortures him ruthlessly. If for liquor, to which during the past few weeks he had become accustomed, drives sleep away, and life becomes a burden that he is every day less able to bear. With great difficulty he succeeded one day in procuring some morphine powders, and then for the first time since the beginning of his imprisonment he gets some sleep. After that his mind is occupied with that one problem, how by stealth and stratagem he can get the drug that will check the maddening activity of his brain. That effort supercedes all thought of his danger, of his trial, and of any steps to secure a delence. It is sleep—oblivion that he craves, and for this he schemes.

It is a wreck of a man, pale, haggard, and leaden-eyed that comes out of his cell to meet Dr. Arnold when that gentleman is ushered into the prison by a warder.

"Father, this is like you," Frank said, as he grasped the doctor's hand. "You are the best father a man ever had."

"My son, my son," was all the father could say, as he looked at the changed face and sunken form of the son he had once regarded with honest pride.

"How is my mother?" Frank asked.

"She is well, but very anxious. She would not be left behind. Both she and Kate are in New York, and they will come to see you to-morrow. They would have come with me now, but I begged them to let me pay this first visit alone. I want you to tell me all the particulars of your case so that I may know how to act. Valuable time is passing, and I gather from your message that nothing has been done yet."

Then Frank told the history of his sojourn in New York. His futile efforts to gain a livelihood by his profession, his loneliness, the uncongeniality of Clare's disposition, his acquaintance with Greville, and finally his wife's departure and the scene in Greville's rooms. The fact of his having fallen under the power of liquor he concealed, but admitted that on that night, excited and reckless, he had resorted to the glass to drown his sorrow.

Dr. Arnold listened attentively. He did not once interrupt the narrative until its conclusion, when he put a few questions to enable him to get a clear perception of the events of the night on which the attack on Greville had been made so far as Frank was able to describe them. It was remarkable that the father never asked his son whether he was guilty of the crime. That he was innocent he appeared to assume, and his confidence affected the prisoner almost to tears.

"Good-by, Frank," he said, "I will stand by you. We will have justice for you, my boy. Do not despond. This mystery will be cleared up, and all will be well."

Frank shook his father's hand convulsively, and then put the request that had not been absent from his mind during all the interview.

"Father, could you not get me some morphia? They will let you bring it to me if you tell them you are a physician."

A quick, penetrating look from the father's eyes rested on the son, and Frank's gaze fell before it. "Be careful, my boy," Dr. Arnold said, "you know what an insidious foe that drug is. It becomes a tyrant before you feel its chains. Well, well, at a time like this perhaps it may be necessary, but be on your guard; it is a good servant, but a bad master. You ought never to exceed a quarter of a grain at a dose. I will get you a couple of grains, and that will last you until I come to-morrow. By the way, too, you would like a little money; I suppose you could use it here?"

"Thanks, father, I should," and Frank eagerly held out his hand for the bills Dr. Arnold was fingering. The two grains of morphia promised by the doctor would be a mere tantalizing of his craving, but with the money he could procure more. A quarter of a grain dose! Why, Frank was taking two grains at a time already, and even that was becoming too little to produce the required quiescence. In a short time Dr. Arnold returned with the promised supply, and gave it to Frank with another warning. Before his father was a hundred yards from the prison Frank had taken the whole, and had arranged with a warder to procure more. The interview had agitated him, and the prospect of meeting his mother and sister on the next day—of meeting them in a prison—he, of whom they had both been proud, who was to have been so distinguished, he, the promising young physician, to be receiving them in the Tombs; the thought was maddening. Alone in the darkness he dwelt upon it until he was almost beside himself with shame and mortification, and he wished that he was dead. Could he but have realized the intense yearning that filled both their hearts he would have had no dread of the meeting. Pride and selfishness blinded him, as they blind every one who allows them to hold sway in the heart. To be respected, admired, depended upon, was his idea of happiness. To be pitied was hateful to him, and he shrank from it as from insult.

Dr. Arnold made his way to the hotel where his wife and daughter were anxiously awaiting him. As yet they knew nothing of the circumstances which had brought Frank into his deplorable situation. They loved him with tender, passionate love. They longed to be at his side comforting and encouraging him, and it was that they might do this that they had pleaded with tears and with an earnestness that could not be denied to accompany the doctor across the Atlantic. He was reluctant to permit them to make the journey, but while the question was pending a letter arrived from Helen which decided it.

At last she was coming home, but it was under circumstances that portended a permanent separation. The suspicion engendered by her former letter was confirmed. Leslie Raymond, the nephew of the lady whose sorrows Helen had relieved during her outward voyage, and whose gratitude and love for her were unbounded, had asked her to become his wife, and it was clear from Helen's letter that she loved him. By his aunt's desire, and at his own wish, he was coming with Helen to plead his suit with her parents in person, and as an aged lady of their acquaintance was making the journey also, the three would travel in company. It was necessary, however, for business reasons, that Leslie should visit several important agents of the house in America, and they would consequently sail for San Francisco, cross the continent by rail, and resume their sea voyage at New York. This was an additional reason why Kate's desire should be granted, and accordingly the doctor held out no longer, and Kate and her mother were now in New York on their double mission of befriending Frank and welcoming Helen and her suitor. It would be nearly a month before the Australian party could arrive, and in the meantime Frank was the first concern.

"Oh, papa, do come in," said Kate, as she opened the door of their room when the doctor's well-known step was heard on the corridor of the hotel. "We are so anxious to know about poor Frank."

Mrs. Arnold's loving eyes, however, were fixed with an anxious earnestness on her husband's face, on which she read the signs of weariness and exhaustion. "Do not be impatient, Kate," she said. "You are very tired, Ralph, dear. We will hear your story when you have rested and had some tea."

"I think I should be glad to postpone it for half an hour, my love, and then I shall need all your attention, and Kate will have an opportunity of exercising those talents that she boasts of possessing. I must turn myself into a detective for the nonce, and all suggestions will be welcome. Perhaps some may be useful."

"Now, then, for the cabinet council," said Kate, after the doctor, rested and refreshed by his tea, turned his chair from the table. "Have you seen Frank? How does he look? Is he in danger through this horrid charge?"

"Gently, my dear; let me tell the story in my own way, and answer questions afterward." Then the doctor related the narrative to which he had listened in the prison, and ended by expressing his intention to obtain legal advice on the morrow, and to engage a private detective. "I see nothing else that we can do at present," he said, with a sad, weary sigh.

"Do you not think it would be well for you to see this Mr. Greville, papa?" Kate asked. "If he is able to speak you might learn more from him than any one. Perhaps he is not so bad a man as Frank thinks, and in any case he would not wish an innocent man punished. Of course Frank is innocent. You are quite sure of that, are you not, papa?"

"Yes, I have no doubt of that. And I think your suggestion is good, Kate. I wonder it did not occur to me before. I will go to the hospital the first thing in the morning. I have introductions to two physicians in the city who will doubtless help me to get an interview with him. That is the first thing, and after that we will see about a lawyer and a detective. Now we will ask God's guidance and help, and then try to get a good night's rest."

It would have surprised an unbeliever to listen to the doctor's prayer that night. The calm confidence with which he committed his perplexities into the hands of God, his heartfelt assurance that all things were being arranged and controlled by Him, revealed the rock on which he stood. The nervous worry, the anxious suspense, the uncontrollable restlessness that ordinary men similarly placed would have displayed, had no place in the heart of the man whose trust was stayed on God. He was experiencing the perfect peace promised to all who put their trust in Him. While conscious that he must use the reasoning faculties which God had given him, he knew that he would be wisely led, and was at rest. Heaven is not all to come after death. Some of it is in the peace which reigns there fills the believer's breast and keeps him undisturbed amid the storms of life.

Early the next morning, armed with references given by his friends, Dr. Arnold presented himself at the hospital and begged for a word with the patient.

"As a physician, Dr. Arnold," said the official who received him, "you appreciate the danger of agitating him. His life hangs by a thread. We have refused even to allow him to make a statement to the law officers. I will go with you to his bedside, and, if it is prudent, you shall ask him one question in the interest of justice. At present not a word has been spoken to him about his attack."

It was an anxious moment that Dr. Arnold lived while the hospital surgeon made his examination. "I think you might speak to him, Doctor, if you will be careful," said the surgeon. Dr. Arnold bent down over the sick man's form and said, in the quiet tone of one who was accustomed to the sensitive nerves of the suffering, "Are you able to tell us who it was that struck you? I am Dr. Arnold, the father of your friend, who is suspected."

The injured man was scarcely able to utter a whisper, but he made a strong effort. "Arnold," he said, "no, it was not Arnold. It was a common thief. I saw him clearly, and held him till I lost consciousness. No, it was not Arnold."

"Thank God!" said the father, reverently, and in obedience to a warning touch from the surgeon's hand he drew back from the bed.

"I heard," said the surgeon, "and I will testify if it becomes necessary. But nothing more must be said to him now."

Dr. Arnold was in a hack the next minute, hurrying to the Tombs as rapidly as the driver, impelled by a handsome present from the doctor, could take him. The joyful news he carried seemed too good to be contained in silence, and the glad father was out of the hack and running up the steps of the prison before the vehicle had quite stopped.

"This is a sad business, sir," said the man who had admitted him the night before, and who recognized him immediately.

"Oh, no, not at all," said Dr. Arnold. "My son will be set at liberty almost immediately. I have conclusive evidence that he is innocent."

"Ah! you don't know yet, I see. We sent a message to your hotel half an hour ago. The prisoner is dead. We found him dead this morning, and sent to you at once. The surgeon says he poisoned himself with opium or something of that kind. It's a pity he was in such a hurry. He should have waited to hear your good news."

Dr. Arnold sank into a seat, covered his face with his hands, and prayed to God for strength for himself and those loved ones on whom the blow would fall so heavily.

THE GRACIOUS INVITATION.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 20, Isa. 55. Golden Text, ver. 1. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

To Every One in Need—The Only Condition—The Closed Account—A Futile Effort—The Quest of the Restless—Unsatisfactory Remedies—Vain Struggles after Holiness—The Difficulties of Life—Christ as a Leader—The Obsession of Human Thought—The Source of Life-Power.

"Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money; come ye, buy, and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money, and without price." "Every one that thirsteth," every one who has a need, the sinful, the sad, the sick, the oppressed, the burdened, the perplexed, the weary, the weak. The need is the only claim, and is to come empty. No money, no wisdom, no strength, no character, no reputation, no self-confidence are admitted here; but bankruptcy, despair, foolishness, weakness, nothingness find a welcome. Here is a trade in which the profits are all on the side of the buyer, and he needs no capital whatever. Oh, if every burdened, perplexed soul, sorrowful spirit, oppressed body did but believe this and act upon it, then sin, sickness, sorrow, oppression, would be swept away from the wide world! But He who makes this gracious invitation stands among us and we know Him not; He sounds His wondrous call of grace, and love, and power, and is to us as though He never had spoken such words. There are some, and they number thousands, who have accepted this invitation on some ground or other, and have come into the precious experience of what grace is. "To him that worketh is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt. But to him that worketh not, but believeth on Him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness" (Rom. 4: 4, 5).

Most touchingly the Lord puts the question to our reason. "Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread? and your labor for that which satisfieth not?" Here is a question which calls for an answer. There is an immense outlay of time, money, strength, on what men call religion; the ritual of Rome and of the Anglican Church, the lifeless services of many of the Nonconformists, the splendid buildings raised in the name of certain churches and sects; then there is the zeal of the Mohammedan and of the followers of Brahma or Buddha; yet what does all this outlay bring in? It is simply substituting something which God cannot accept for the incalculable outlay which He has made in the death of His Son. The price for the world's salvation has been paid, and any attempt on the part of man to pay a fraction of it is but to dishonor and discount God's unspeakable gift. The account is closed, "it is finished."

But the natural heart of man is very independent, and all throughout the world there are men, women, and children, thirsty enough and needy enough, attempting to slake their own thirst and to satisfy their own need. We have not to look far for anxious faces; they crowd the thoroughfares, they fill the shops, pursuing with eagerness "that which is not bread" to an immortal soul, and that which their own countenances witness "satisfieth not." There is but one way out of the difficulty, and that is for them to come where bread is to be found, and where alone a heart can be satisfied. Doctors prescribe travelling and change of scene for these sad hearts and worn-out nerves; it may distract, but this is not bread, and the weary, hungry look of some of these seekers after rest shows that it

SATISFIETH NOT.

The human heart was created for God, and nothing less than God can fill it; everything else is and has all the misery of a misfit.

But believers in Christ are surely not doing the same thing? Perhaps none are doing it more than they. How many believers there are who thirst to be holy, but instead of coming to Him who alone can make them holy by taking full possession and dwelling in them as their Sanctification, they strain every nerve and make every effort to do for themselves what God only can do for them. They will appoint themselves days of fasting and nights of prayer, they will school themselves to self-denial, they will choose that which is contrary to their tastes that the flesh may be mortified, and after all it is not bread, after all it "satisfieth not" either God or themselves. It leads to a bitter disappointment that God should not reward such earnestness and fill them with His Spirit, and the heart, instead of being satisfied, is more dissatisfied than ever. No wonder when God's child steps into His place and attempts to do His work.

What, then, is God's remedy? "Hearken diligently unto Me." Instead of puzzling out things for yourselves, hearken unto Me. Job spent time, arguments, and no small amount of warmth of feeling in his desperate effort to prove to God, to his friends, and to himself the holiness and uprightness of his heart and of his purposes. But it was only when he came to silence and said, "Behold, Lord, I am vile, what shall I answer Thee? I will lay my hand upon my mouth," that God was free to step in and act. Then He showed Job where his mistake had been, at once healed him, accepted him, exalted him above his criticising friends, and gave him double what he had before. Things are never right between God and man until man becomes the listener, God the speaker, man the receiver, God the Giver. "Hearken diligently unto Me, . . . incline your ear and come unto Me, hear, and your soul shall live." This is the first true step of blessing. A soul is never saved while continuing to cry and struggle and plead; salvation comes from hearing and believing what God has to say. A soul is never sanctified while straining every nerve to become holy, but when listening to and taking in what God says about it, while receiving what He says for true, and resting in God's working in him he sees how completely the work is God's, and he ceases from his own works as God did from His.

One who is in perplexity of circumstances does not get deliverance by his own desperate efforts to extricate himself; the relief which comes from one quarter is balanced by a worse difficulty on another side, because the object for which God permitted the trial has not been accomplished, and God will not let him off until it is done. But let him drop the whole into the hands of God and count Him faithful, submitting his whole will to Him, and he will find the promise sure. "Hearken diligently unto Me, and eat ye that which is good, and let your soul delight itself in fatness; . . . your soul shall live, and I will make with you an everlasting covenant." God loves to see His children happy, but this can never be while Jesus does not hold His true place as "the first and the last" in their lives. "Behold," God says, "I have given Him for a Witness to the people, a Leader and Commander to the people." God's David, His beloved Son, is to lead and to command; none of us are deputed to this work. Therefore "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and let him return unto the Lord, and He will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for He will abundantly pardon. For My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways My ways, saith the Lord. For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are My ways higher than your ways, and My thoughts than your thoughts."

If this is true how almost insolent it is on our part to obtrude

OUR WAYS AND OUR THOUGHTS

upon God. Naaman thought how Elisha was going to heal him, but he had to renounce his thoughts in favor of God's thoughts before his healing could be effected. The Pharisee stood and gave utterance to his thoughts about himself and called it prayer, but he went down to his house unheard and unblest, because he had not given place to the thoughts of God. "I hate thoughts" (Ps. 110: 113), said the Psalmist, "but Thy law do I love." He had found out that the thoughts of God were higher than his. Man's ways are always to do something which can satisfy his own pride, and recommend him to God. God's ways are to break man down by His wondrous, unspeakable grace, and shame self into nothingness by His love to the unthankful and the unworthy. Man's ways are to mend the old man and bring something good out of our fallen nature. God's ways are to declare that we are crucified with Christ, that we are dead, and that Christ is our life; instead of mending the human, God supersedes it with the divine. Man's thought of sin is always comparative; he compares himself to others to his own advantage, and finds he is not so very bad after all. God's thoughts of sin are always positive; He is "of purer eyes than to behold evil, and cannot look on iniquity" (Hab. 1: 13); and He says, "The soul that sinneth it shall die" (Ezek. 18: 4). Sin and death are inseparably connected in God's plan. Sinful man must die, not be improved. Sinful man is no more to be reckoned on; he must fall back before God, and let God take possession of him and live His own life in him. Such a God's thoughts, such is the message of God's Word. "For as the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven and melteth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower and bread to the eater; so shall My Word be that cometh forth out of My mouth: it shall not return unto Me void; but it shall accomplish that which I please; and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it." There is in the Word of God; "it shall accomplish." God spake light into being, and life, and order. God speaks salvation into souls, and they are turned from death unto life. He speaks holiness into believers, and they are turned from a restless, struggling life of conflict into one of rest in the present power of God dwelling in them. He speaks health into the sick ones, and reason into the insane. But this can only be when, turning from all else, we come to God alone, leaving all money behind, all idea of buying or meriting, all idea of knowing anything, and are ready to listen to our God. Then He keeps His Word, and it creates the fulfilment of the promise. "For ye shall go out with joy, and be led forth with peace; the mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing, and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands." Joy, peace, and then fertility. "Instead of the thorn (the sharp, unkind word) shall come up the fir-tree, and instead of the brier (the captious, criticising spirit) shall come up the myrtle-tree; and it shall be to the Lord for a name for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off."

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 68 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

AT JESUS' FEET.

Lord Jesus, life is hard, as thou dost know,
And hours of peace and rest are very rare;
But it is sweet, after the toil is o'er,
To nestle close to thee with thoughts of prayer.
If thou wilt lay thy hand upon my head,
I shall arise refreshed and comforted.

Dear Master, I am tiring at thy feet;
I would not miss a look or loose a word;
The hour is very holy when we meet:
I faint would see and in no time but the Lord;
I long to lay a life, grief, and fear,
And only know and feel that thou art near.

The world's discordant noises ever more
Clang round about my ears and weary me;
There were rough hands, ungentle hearts before
That troubled me; but now I come to thee,
O Jesus! quiet me with tender speech
While up to thee my wistful arms I reach.

In life's bewildering strife and eager rush
To reach the goal of my sweet gentleness;
But in the peace and solace of this hush
Strengthen and soothe me with thy blessedness;
Give to me what thou wilt: here at thy feet,
Where'er it be, I shall be satisfied.

The Late Hon. THOMAS A. HENDRICKS, Vice-President of the United States. Died Nov. 24, 1885.

The Significant Unanimity of Regret—Its Cause—Character more Powerful than Genius—Early Life—A Typical Career—At Hanover College—Enters the Legal Profession—Marriage—In the Legislature—The Constitutional Convention—In Congress—Loses his Seat—Appointment by President Pierce—Candidates for the Governorship—Elected to the U. S. Senate—Elected Governor—On the Tilden Ticket—Elected to the Vice-Presidency—His Death.

The nation was startled throughout its length and breadth on the morning of Thanksgiving Day by the announcement that on the night before the Vice-President of the United States had been suddenly struck down by the last enemy. Only a day or two before men were talking about the probability of his receiving the nomination for the Presidency in 1888, and it is little more than a year ago that the Democratic party, considering the advisability of nominating Mr. Tilden, and feeling a doubt lest the aged statesman might not live to complete his term, fortified itself by the reflection that in Mr. Hendricks it would have a Vice-President safe for a long life, and qualified to succeed Mr. Tilden in the Presidential chair. Now the venerable and infirm statesman is alive, and his strong, vigorous colleague lies in the grave. The first reflection called up by the event is that one which every day teaches us—the uncertainty of life.

Other lessons, however, the sad national bereavement is fitted to inculcate. One of the most prominent is suggested by the unanimous expression of regret which came from all sections and all parties when the death of Mr. Hendricks was reported. His political principles were abhorrent to about half the nation, and they were not cordially approved by the whole of the other half. To the Republicans he was an antagonist peculiarly offensive as a thorough representative of Democratic ideas—a man who held and gloried in the doctrines of Jackson and Marcy. To the Democrats of the new school—the school to which President Cleveland belongs—he was an uncongenial colleague, a man who believed in the spoils, a strong advocate of the spoils system, eager to reward party workers with office, and without an atom of sympathy for Civil Service Reform. A large majority of the nation, therefore, was in vigorous opposition to him, yet from all the States, from newspapers of every shade of politics, from public men of every affiliation, there was a chorus of eulogy and lamentation. The secret was in his personal character. He was an honest man. Honest not only in money matters, but in his convictions—a sincere, genuine, upright, conscientious man, who spoke out the thing that was in him whether it was popular or not. He was a man who could be trusted, and such a man is honored whether the world agrees with him or not. Brilliant genius may dazzle the world, may compel its admiration, but its confidence and love can be won only by character. Let young men ambitious to climb to the highest positions on the social ladder consider this fact and be wise.

Another noteworthy fact is that the late Vice-President was a godly man. From his own pastor, and from Dr. Talmage and other clergymen, who knew him well, comes the testimony that throughout his public career, in spite of its absorbing occupations, in spite of its fierce temptations, Mr. Hendricks was an earnest and consistent Christian. Young Christians are often tauntingly warned that religion is a hindrance to worldly advancement, and, moreover, that men capable of rising in the world are superior to it, and that it is fit only for women and incapable men. The career of Mr. Hendricks and the eulogiums with which the world has laid him in his grave disprove the assertion. A godly man can so serve his day and generation without compromising his Christian character that, when he is called away to his reward, his contemporaries mourn his loss, and speak of his departure as a national misfortune. The fact is significant; it is patent to every observer, and it is a conclusive answer worth a score of arguments to the allegations of scoffers.

EARLY LIFE.

The life just closed was a typical American career. Thomas Andrews Hendricks was not reared in the lap of luxury, as the majority of European statesmen are. The man who was to hold the second highest place in a nation of fifty millions of people spent his boyhood in alternation between the school, which he attended through the winter, and the farm, on which he worked through the summer, handling the rake and the shovel, and following the plough. He was born at Zanesville, Ohio, on September 7th, 1819, and he was therefore but little more than sixty-six years old when he died. He was of Scotch-Irish extraction, as so many of those who have attained distinction in America have been. His father, John Hendricks, was a native of Pennsylvania, a man of sterling Christian character, and an active member of the Presbyterian Church. It was to the careful religious training received from his father that the future Vice-President owed, under God, the formation of his strong Christian principles. Several members of the family had attained distinction. Mr. Hendricks's father was surveyor of his State; his grandfather was for a long time a member of the Pennsylvania Legislature, and his uncle, William Hendricks, was the second Governor of Indiana, and afterward a United States Senator.

In 1820, when the future Vice-President was six months old, the family removed to Indiana and settled at Madison, on the Ohio River. Three years later another move was made to Shelbyville, where the father built a substantial brick house, in which, amid such refinements as could be enjoyed in those days, he reared his family. He was a man of considerable education, and his house was the meeting-place for the Presbyterian clergymen of central Indiana. He was the founder of the Presbyterian Church in Indianapolis, and Thomas was brought up in the faith of that Church. He was sent to the village school, at which he gained sufficient learning to qualify himself for admission to Hanover College, which he entered in 1837 at the age of eighteen. He did not complete his course at Hanover College, leaving at the end of his junior year with the reputation of only "an average student," but with that of an excellent debater, and the foremost man in the college in general information. He chose the profession of the law and attended the law school in Chambersburg, Pa., the president of which was his mother's brother, ex-Judge Alexander Thompson. In 1843 he was admitted to the bar at Shelbyville, where he opened an office.

Clients came slowly, because, as he said, the people of Shelbyville could not understand how one of their "boys" was to be trusted with law cases. He showed ability and perseverance, however, and soon was well established. At the expiration of two years he had so far succeeded as to justify him in taking a wife, and accordingly, on September 25th, 1845, he married Eliza C. Morgan, a lady of superior capacity and of many charms. It was in great part due to her influence and encouragement that Mr. Hendricks entered political life and made so marked a success. Only one son blessed their union, and he died in 1851 at the age of three years.

ENTERS POLITICAL LIFE.

In 1848, Mr. Hendricks, though not twenty-eight years old, was elected to the Indiana Legislature, where, as he said later, he did not feel at all at home. He did not seek a re-election at the end of his term in 1850, but was elected to a State Constitutional Convention called for that year. In the Convention with him was William S. Holman, Schuyler Colfax, and Robert Dale Owen. Mr. Hendricks took a stand in favor of a system of State banks, supporting each other in credit, yet independent in their business transactions. His arguments prevailed, and banks were started in the principal towns of Indiana, with a central bank in Indianapolis. Private banks of issue were started later, however, and, as Mr. Hendricks had feared, were too weak to stand the strain of a financial storm. They fell in the panic of 1857, and the disaster which he had accurately predicted impressed his fellow-citizens with his foresight and statesmanlike ability.

ELECTED TO CONGRESS.

In 1850 Mr. Hendricks received the nomination of his party for the representation of the Fifth District of Indiana in Congress. The contest was severe, but at the polls Mr. Hendricks was elected by a majority of four thousand over his Whig opponent, Colonel Rush. He was re-elected, but during his second term his conduct brought him into collision with his constituents. He had been elected under a pledge that he would oppose any agitation of the slavery question, and resist any attempts to change the existing settlement of the difficulty. The subject, however, was in stronger hands than his, and during his second term Mr. Douglas proposed the repeal of the Missouri compromise in the famous Kansas-Nebraska bill. It is asserted, and apparently with good grounds, that Mr. Hendricks was opposed to the bill, and that he used what influence he possessed as a young member to prevent its passage. What were the arguments which finally overcame his opposition is not known, but it is certain that it was overcome, for Mr. Hendricks was one of the comparatively few Northern Democrats who voted for the bill. That vote sealed his fate in Congress. His popularity in his district sank like a stone. His explanations and defence were treated with scorn, and though he earnestly sought a renomination, it was refused him. He had the mortification of seeing his successful rival elected in his stead by a large majority.

OFFICIAL LIFE.

His term expired in March, 1855, and a few weeks afterward President Pierce made him Commissioner of the General Land Office. It was alleged at the time, and the charge has been revived at various times since, that the appointment was a payment for his vote on the Kansas-Nebraska bill. That it was so in a corrupt sense is doubtless untrue. The whole course of Mr. Hendricks's life is inconsistent with the idea. But it may be, and very likely was, so that the President felt himself under an obligation to make some provision for a Northern Democrat whose support of the Administration had cost him his seat. However that may have been, the nation had a most industrious and painstaking servant in Mr. Hendricks. Every day and every hour of the day during his official career he was at his desk. It is stated that during the four years in which he held office he signed no less than 400,000 land warrants, and settled more than 20,000 disputed land cases, and in very few of those cases was his decision overruled. How difficult was this business may be inferred from the fact that one of the cases—that known as the Hot Springs case—which he decided has been appealed again and again, and is in litigation to this day.

NOMINATED FOR GOVERNOR.

Through the influence of Senator Douglas, Mr. Hendricks continued to hold office under President Buchanan, but when the President and the Senator came to issue on the question of the Kansas Le Compton Constitution his position became one of extreme delicacy, and he finally resigned it in 1859 and returned to his law practice at Shelbyville. The following year he accepted the unanimous nomination of his party for the Governorship. His opponent was Henry S. Lane, whose colleague as Lieutenant-Governor on the Republican ticket was Oliver Morton, who was destined to become the formidable rival Mr. Hendricks had for supremacy in the politics of Indiana. It was the year of Lincoln's election, and in Indiana the rivalry of Douglas and Breckinridge was felt with severe effect. Lane was elected by a majority of 975, and Hendricks resumed his law practice, which he transferred to Indianapolis.

IN THE SENATE.

Mr. Hendricks was a strong party man throughout the war. He was ardently in favor of some compromise which would end the terrible struggle, and he did not conceal his disapproval of the policy of the Administration. His attitude on the all-absorbing question of the day soon brought him into prominence. Lane, his successful rival in the election for the Governorship, was now in the Senate, and had been succeeded in the Governor's chair by Morton. The Legislature was, however, Democratic, and it sent a Democrat to the United States Senate as a colleague for Lane. But the man elected was expelled from that body, and a new election was ordered. Then the Indiana Legislature brought them of the defeated candidate of 1860, and Mr. Hendricks was elected for the term 1863-69. He became virtually the leader of the small band of Democratic Senators, and his tact and urbanity not only kept them united, but won for them some measure of respect. His position was a difficult one, for he had to moderate the zeal of his party and to conciliate the Republican majority while opposing them. It is a slight evidence of his personal suavity and discretion that in spite of his opposition he was personally popular in the Senate. He served on the committees on judiciary, naval affairs, claims, and public lands. He opposed most of the Republican acts of reconstruction, but in 1864, when the Civil War was hottest, he spoke and voted for large appropriations to bring the conflict to a close, and advocated an increase of fifty per cent in the pay of the soldiers because of the depreciation of the currency. He took a prominent part in the debates at the impeachment of President Johnson, being one of the most active champions of the President.

While he was still in the Senate the National Democratic Convention of 1868 was held in New York. The situation was peculiar, for the Western vote was divided between Mr. Hendricks and Mr. George H. Pendleton. It looked at the time as if Pendleton would be the nominee, but he was believed to be a soft-money man, and that fact would naturally injure his candidacy in the East. Mr. Tilden, who was chairman of the New York delegation, accordingly advised the vote of New York for Hendricks, and after that Pendleton lost his place in the race. But there was no break for Hendricks, and in the next ballot Mr. Tilden again gave the New York vote to Sanford E. Church. On the twenty-second ballot Horatio Seymour was nominated, and Mr. Hendricks never afterward came so near a Presidential nomination.

GOVERNOR OF INDIANA.

At the conclusion of his term as Senator, Mr. Hendricks again received the nomination of his party for the Governorship, but after a severe contest he was defeated by about eight hundred votes. He returned to Indianapolis and resumed his law business, but he was not allowed to remain long in retirement. In 1872 he was again nominated for Governor, and at the polls carried the State by over a thousand majority. That this success was a personal one was proved by the fact that he ran far ahead of his ticket, and was almost the only Democrat elected. A month later General Grant carried the State by 22,924. The administration of Governor Hendricks was a successful one, and to the last, even when he was Vice-President of the United States, he was always affectionately spoken of in the State as "the Governor."

The exciting campaign of 1876 still remains a rare subject with both the political parties. Mr. Hendricks accepted the second place on the ticket, and took a deep interest in the struggle. In common with his party, he was firmly convinced of the success of the Democratic ticket, but acquiesced, though with extreme reluctance, in Mr. Tilden's decision to yield the place in submission to the Electoral Commission. In the course of a graceful speech delivered in March, 1877, he declared that it was the judgment of the people that Hayes had not been elected, but, he said, "For all the purposes of the office he is President of the United States, and you and I will give to his Administration for the good of our country that support which is due to any officer de facto." After a brief tour in Europe Mr. Hendricks returned to Indianapolis and resumed his law business, which became very lucrative. His name, however, was again before the National Convention of 1880. This time a divided State was fatal to his chances, and General Hancock was nominated. Mr. Hendricks opened the campaign in behalf of Hancock and English in Marion, Ind., on August 12th, 1880, and worked actively for them during the rest of the campaign.

In 1884 the Democratic National Convention met in Chicago, Mr. Hendricks for the first time attending it as a delegate. He placed the name of Senator McDonald before the Convention as a candidate for the Presidency, but on the second ballot received himself the votes of all the Indiana delegates except his own. Governor Cleveland, however, had more supporters in the Convention than Mr. Hendricks, and received the nomination for President. When the Convention was ready to receive nominations for the Vice-Presidency Mr. Wallace, of Pennsylvania, arose and presented Mr. Hendricks's name. Governor Waller, of Connecticut, Governor Hubbard, of Texas, and other prominent delegates supported the nomination, and upon the roll call every vote of every delegation was cast for him. The enthusiasm of the Convention passed all bounds, and finally all present joined in singing "Old Hundred" as the only means of giving it expression. Mr. Hendricks was notified of his nomination at Saratoga on the 30th of July, and accepted it graciously.

On the 4th of last March Vice-President Hendricks was sworn into office. He occupied his chair as President of the Senate during the session of that body called to take action on President Cleveland's nominations. As is well known, his relations with the President were not cordial. He considered Mr. Cleveland remiss in his duty in not making changes more rapidly in the offices, and personally urged him with some vigor to wholesale dismissals. In this course he was supported by a large and influential section of his party, whose dissatisfaction with President Cleveland is not concealed, and is likely to increase. In talking of the 1888 campaign it has been no uncommon thing to hear of Mr. Hendricks as the future head of the ticket.

DEATH.

Vice-President Hendricks was preparing during the month of November to return to Washington to resume his duties. He had arranged his law and private business and was ready for the journey, when he was attacked by an illness which at first appeared slight. No alarm was felt, and on Wednesday, November 25th, it was expected that he would be well enough to preside at the opening session of the Senate. What occurred that evening was described by Mrs. Hendricks to a personal friend. She said that he was so much better at four o'clock, remarking that he was free from pain, that she left him to see some friends awaiting her in the parlor below. She descended quietly. After conversation, which lasted several moments, she went back, entering the room noiselessly and glancing at him. She was overjoyed at the apparent indications that he was peacefully sleeping. Fearing to awaken him, she moved cautiously about the room, putting various articles in their proper places, occasionally looking at her husband, and still assuring herself that he was gathering rest and strength in sleep. Several moments were thus occupied, and she says now that he was surely dead all that time. Finally she approached the bedside and looked in his face. It struck her then that the expression was a remarkably quiet one. She lowered her ear to his face to detect his breathing, if any. Not the slightest indication could she discover. She then put her hand upon his forehead, and it was cold. She then realized death. When asked if the shock was not overwhelming, she answered quietly: "No; it must have been the almighty power of God that sustained me. Why I was not stricken down I cannot tell." The Vice-President was buried at Indianapolis on December 1st amid general expressions of public sorrow in which men of all political affiliations participated.

FAITH WORK IN CHINA.

MR. C. H. JUDD, of the China Inland Mission, sends to Thy Herald the following account of two remarkable incidents which recently occurred in his work:

"Suicide by opium is a common occurrence in China. The experience of a brother missionary in Nankin is to the effect that five or six persons would come to him daily for medicine as an antidote to opium poisoning. At Nankin a man called upon me for some medicine to counteract an attempted suicide. I went to the house, and saw the man apparently in the jaws of death. He knew the Gospel, but had never believed it. I said, 'Shall I pray for you?' He nodded assent. I knelt, and asked the Lord to heal him. In less than two hours he was out in the streets, quite well and strong.

"I knew a case where God's hand of judgment fell severely upon one who had been healed, but who had turned from following the Lord. He was a Chinaman who met with great opposition from his wife, who did all in her power to turn him from the faith. One night, after persecuting him worse than usual, she fell down, apparently dead. We met in prayer for her, and received from the Lord the assurance that she should not die. She recovered; but, although she professed faith in the Lord, neither she nor her husband ever came fully out on the Lord's side. By and by she denied the faith altogether. Since then her husband's shop has been burned down three times, and when I spoke to him on the last occasion, he said, 'I ought to have come out before this; it is God's hand of judgment upon me.'"

MRS. SPURGEON'S BULLFINCH AND ONYX RING.

DURING an illness of Mrs. Spurgeon, before the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon left her room for a journey he was contemplating, she remarked that she hoped he would not be annoyed with her for telling what had been passing through her mind. She made him, however, promise that he would not try to procure the objects for which she had been longing. She then told him that she had been wishing for a bullfinch and an onyx ring. Of course Mr. Spurgeon expressed his willingness to get both, but she held him to his promise. He had to make a sick call on his way to the station as well as a call at the Metropolitan Tabernacle. Shortly after reaching the sick person's house the mother of the patient asked Mr. Spurgeon if Mrs. Spurgeon would like a bullfinch, that they had one, but that its music was trying to the invalid, and they would gladly part with it to one who would care for it.

He then made his call at the Tabernacle, and after reading a voluminous correspondence, came at last to a letter and a parcel underlying the other letters. The letter was from a lady unknown to him, who had received benefit from the services in the Tabernacle, and as a slight token of her appreciation of these services asked his acceptance of the inclosed onyx ring, necklace and bracelets, for which she had no further use. This intensified his surprise, and he hastened home with what had been so strangely sent, went up to his wife's sick-room, and placed the objects she had longed for before her. She met him with a look of pained reproach, as if he had allowed his regard for her to override his promise; but when he detailed the true circumstances of the case she was filled with tearful surprise, and asked Mr. Spurgeon what he thought of it? His reply was characteristic: "I think you are one of your heavenly Father's spoiled children, and He just gives you whatever you ask for."

UNRECOGNIZED HEROES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached in the Jefferson Avenue Presbyterian Church, Detroit, Mich., Last Sunday Morning, Dec. 13, 1885.

"Thou therefore endure hardness."—ii. TIM. 2: 3.

Not Lauded in History—I. Heroes of the Sick-Room—Sickness a Test of Character—II. Heroes of Toil—The Sewing Women—The Army of Laborers—III. Heroes of the Home—Complaining Wives—Neglected Wives—The Drunkard's Wife—Fifty Years' Martyrdom—IV. Heroes of Christian Charity—Privations of Missionaries in the West—Heroes whom God Knows—A Tombstone at Melrose Abbey—The Death of a Scottish Carrier—Excitement in Heaven—Certain Provision for the Believer.

HISTORIANS are not slow to acknowledge the merits of great military chieftains. We have the full-length portraits of the Napoleons, the Cromwells, and the Marshal Neys of the world. History is not written in black ink, but with red ink of human blood. The gods of human ambition did not drink from bowls made out of silver, or gold, or precious stones, but out of the bleached skulls of the fallen. But I am to-day to unroll before you a scroll of heroes that the world has never acknowledged; they who faced no guns, blew no bugle-blast, conquered no cities, chained no captives to their chariot-wheels, and yet, in the great day of eternity, will stand higher than those whose names startled the nations; and seraph and rapt spirit and archangel will tell their deeds to a listening universe. I mean the heroes of common, everyday life.

I. In this roll, in the first place, I find all the HEROES OF THE SICK-ROOM.

When Satan had failed to overcome Job, he said to God, "Put forth Thy hand and touch his bone and his flesh, and he will curse Thee to Thy face." Satan had found out what we have all found out, that sickness is the greatest test of character. A man who can stand that can stand anything; to be shut in a room as fast as though it were a Bastille; to be so nervous you cannot endure the tap of a child's foot; to have luxuriant fruit which tempts the appetite of the robust and the healthy, excite our loathing and disgust when it first appears on the platter; to have the rapier of pain strike through the side or across the temples like a razor, or to put the foot into a vice, or to throw the whole body into the blaze of a fever. Yet there have been men and women, but more women than men, who have cheerfully endured this hardness. Through years of exhaustion, rheumatisms, and excruciating neuralgias they have gone, and through bodily distresses that rasped the nerves, and tore the muscles, and paled the cheeks, and stooped the shoulders. By the dim light of the sick-room taper they saw on their wall the picture of that land where the people are never sick. Through the dead silence of the night they heard the chorus of the angels.

Those who suffered on the battle-field, amid shot and shell, were not so much heroes and heroines as those who in the field-hospital and in the asylum had fevers which no ice could cool and no surgery could cure. No shout of comrade to cheer them, but numbness and aching and homesickness—yet willing to suffer, confident in God, hopeful of heaven. Heroes of rheumatism; heroes of neuralgia; heroes of spinal complaint; heroes of sick headache; heroes of life-long invalidism; heroes and heroines; they shall reign forever and forever. Hark! I catch just one note of the eternal anthem: "There shall be no more pain." Bless God for that.

II. In this roll I also find the

who do their work uncomplainingly. It is comparatively easy to lead a regiment into battle when you know that the whole nation will applaud the victory; it is comparatively easy to doctor the sick when you know that your skill will be appreciated by a large company of friends and relatives; it is comparatively easy to address an audience when in the gleaming eyes and the flushed cheeks you know that your sentiments are adopted; but to do sewing where you expect that the employer will come and thrust his thumb through the work to show how imperfect it is, or to have the whole garment thrown back on you to be done over again; to build a wall and know there will be no one to say you did it well, but only a swearing employer howling across the scaffold; to work until your eyes are dim, and your back aches, and your heart faints, and to know that if you stop before night your children will starve—that is heroism.

SLAIN BY THE NEEDLE.

Ah, the sword has not slain so many as the needle! The great battle-fields of our last war were not Gettysburg and Shiloh and South Mountain. The great battle-fields of the last war were in the arsenals and the shops and the attics, where women made army jackets for a sixpence. They toiled on until they died. They had no funeral eulogium, but in the name of my God, this morning, I enroll their names among those of whom the world was not worthy—heroes of the needle; heroes of the sewing-machine; heroes of the attic; heroes of the cellar; heroes and heroines.

HEROES OF THE HOME.

III. In this roll I also find the heroes who have uncomplainingly endured domestic injustices. There are men who for their toil and anxiety have no sympathy in their homes. Exhausting application to business gets them a livelihood, but an ungrateful wife scatters it. The husband is fretted at from the moment he enters the door until he comes out of it—the exasperations of business life augmented by the exasperations of domestic life. Such men are laughed at, but they have a heart-breaking trouble, and they would have long ago gone into appalling dissipations but for the grace of God. Society to-day is strewn with the wrecks of men who under the north-east storm of domestic infelicity have been driven on the rocks. There are tens of thousands of drunkards in this country to-day made such by their wives. That is not poetry; that is prose!

But the wrong is generally in the opposite direction. You would not have to go far to find a wife whose life is a perpetual martyrdom—something heavier than a stroke of the fist, unkind words, staggerings home at night, and constant maltreatment, which have left her only a wreck of what she was on that day when in the midst of a brilliant assemblage the vows were taken and full organ played the wedding-march, and the carriage rolled away with the benediction of the people.

What was the burning of Latimer and Ridley at the stake compared with this? Those men soon became unconscious in the fire, but here is a fifty years' putting to death, yet uncomplaining. No bitter words when rollicking companions at two o'clock in the morning pitch the husband dead drunk on the stoop; no bitter words when wiping from the swollen brow the blood struck out in a midnight carousal, or bending over the battered and bruised form of him who, when he took her from her father's home, promised love and kindness and protection; nothing but sympathy and prayers and forgiveness before it is asked for. No bitter words when the family Bible goes for rum, and the pawnbroker's shop gets the last decent dress.

Some day, desiring to evoke the story of her sorrows, you say, "Well, how are you getting along now?" And rallying her trembling voice, and quieting her quivering lip, she says, "Pretty well, I thank you; pretty well." She never will tell you. In the delirium of her last sickness she may tell all the secrets of her life-time, but she will not tell that. Not until the books of eternity are opened on the thrones of judgment will ever be known what she has suffered.

Oh, ye who are twisting a garland for the victor, put it on that pale brow! When she is dead the neighbors will beg linen to make her a shroud, and she will be carried out in a plain box, with no silver plate to tell her years, for she has lived a thousand years of trial and anguish. The gamblers and the swindlers who destroyed her husband will not come to the funeral. One carriage will be enough for that funeral—one carriage to carry the orphans and the two Christian women who presided over the obsequies. But there is a flash, and a clank of a celestial door, and a shout, "Lift up your head, ye everlasting gates, and let her come in!" And Christ will step forth and say, "Come in! ye suffered with Me on earth, be glorified with Me in heaven." What is the highest throne in heaven? You say, "The Throne of the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb." No doubt about it. What is the next highest throne in heaven? While I speak it seems to me that it will be the throne of the drunkard's wife, if she, with cheerful patience, endured all her earthly torture. Heroes and heroines!

IV. I find also in this roll the HEROES OF CHRISTIAN CHARITY.

We all admire the George Peabodys and the James Lenoxes of the earth, who give tens and hundreds of thousands of dollars to good objects. But I am speaking this morning of those who, out of their pinched poverty, help others—of such men as those Christian missionaries at the West, who are living on two hundred and fifty dollars a year, that they may proclaim Christ to the people, one of them, writing to the secretary in New York, saying, "I thank you for that twenty-five dollars. Until yesterday we have had no meat in our house for three months. We have suffered terribly. My children have no shoes this winter." And of those people who have only a half loaf of bread, but give a piece of it to others who are more hungry; and of those who have only a scuttle of coal, but help others to fuel; and of those who have only a dollar in their pocket, and give twenty-five cents to somebody else; and of that father who wears a shabby coat, and of that mother who wears a faded dress, that their children may be well apparelled.

You call them paupers, or ragamuffins, or tatterdemalions. I call them heroes and heroines. You and I may not know where they live, or what their name is.

GOD KNOWS;

and they have more angels hovering over them than you and I have, and they will have a higher seat in heaven. They may have only a cup of cold water to give a poor traveller, or may have only picked a splinter from under the nail of a child's finger, or have put only two mites into the treasury, but the Lord knows them. Considering what they had, they did more than we have ever done, and their faded dress will be come a white robe, and the small room will be an eternal mansion, and the old hat will be a coronet of victory, and all the applause of earth and all the shouting of heaven will be drowned out when God rises up to give His reward to those humble workers in His kingdom, and to say to them, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

You have all seen or heard of the ruin of Melrose Abbey. I suppose in some respects it is the most exquisite ruin on earth. And yet, looking at it, I was not so impressed—you may set it down to bad taste—but I was not so deeply stirred as I was at a tombstone at the foot of that abbey—the tombstone planted by Walter Scott over the grave of an old man who had served him for a good many years in his house—the inscription most significant, and defy any man to stand there and read it without tears coming into his eyes—the epitaph, "Well done, good and faithful servant." Oh, how our work is over, will it be found that because of anything we have done for God, or the Church, or suffering humanity, that such an inscription is appropriate for us? God grant it!

Who are those who were bravest and deserved the greatest monument—Lord Claverhouse and his soldiers, or John Brown, the Edinburgh carrier, and his wife? Mr. Atkins, the persecuted minister of Jesus Christ in Scotland, was secreted by John Brown and his wife, and Claverhouse ode up one day with his armed men and shouted in front of the house. John Brown's little girl came out. He said to her, "Well, miss, is Mr. Atkins here?" She made no answer, for she could not betray the minister of the gospel. "Ha!" Claverhouse said, "then you are a chip of the old block, are you? I have something in my pocket for you. It is a nosegay. Some people call it a thumbscrew, but I call it a nosegay." And he got off his horse, and he put it on the little girl's hand, and began to turn it until he bones cracked, and she cried.

A LORD AND A MARTYR.

And they heard the child's cry, and the father and mother came out, and Claverhouse said, "Ha! it seems that you three have laid your holy heads together, determined to die, like all the rest of your hypocritical, canting, snivelling crew; rather than give up good Mr. Atkins, pious Mr. Atkins, you would die. I have a telescope with me that will improve your vision," and he pulled out a pistol. "Now," he said, "you old pragmatist fellow, for the honor and the safety of the king, to say nothing of the glory of God and the good of our souls, I will proceed to blow your brains out."

John Brown fell upon his knees and began to pray. "Ah!" said Claverhouse, "look out, if you are going to pray; steer clear of the king, the council, and Richard Cameron." "O Lord," said John Brown, "since it seems to be thy will that I should leave this world for a world where I can love Thee better and serve Thee more, I put this poor widow woman and these helpless, fatherless children into thy hands. We have been together in peace a good while, but now we must look forth to a better meeting in heaven; and as for these poor creatures, blindfolded and infatuated, that stand before me, convert them before it be too late, and may they who have sat in judgment, in this only place on this blessed morning, upon me, a poor, defenceless fellow-creature—may they, in the last judgment, find that mercy which they have refused to me. Thy most unworthy but faithful servant. Amen."

A BRAVE WIFE.

He rose, and said, "Isabel, the hour has come of which I spoke to you on the morning when I proposed hand and heart to you; and are you willing now, for the love of God, to let me die?" He put her arms around him, and said, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away. Blessed be the name of the Lord!" "Stop that snivelling!" said Claverhouse; "I have had enough of it! Soldiers, do your work! Take him! Fire!" And the head of John Brown was scattered on the ground. While the wife was gathering up in her apron the fragments of her husband's head—gathering them up for burial—Claverhouse looked into her face, and said: "Now, my good woman, how do you feel now about your bonnie nian?" "Oh," she said, "I always thought well of him; he has been very good to me; I had no reason for hinking anything but weel of him, and I think better of him now!"

Oh, what a grand thing it will be in the last day to see God pick out His heroes and heroines! Who are those paupers of eternity trudging off from the gate of heaven? Who are they? The Lord Claverhouses and the Herods and the Lord Jeffreyes of the earth. They had sceptres, and they had crowns, and they had hrones, and they lived for their own aggrandizement, and they broke the heart of nations. Heroes of earth, but paupers in eternity. I beat the drums of their eternal despair. Woe! woe! But there is great EXCITEMENT IN HEAVEN.

Why those long processions? Why the booming of that great bell in the tower? It is coronation day in heaven. Who are those rising on the thrones, with crowns of eternal royalty. They must have been great people on earth, world-renowned people. No. They taught in a ragged school. Taught in a ragged school! Is that all? That is all. Who are those souls waving sceptres of eternal dominion? Why, they were little children who waited on invalid mothers. That all? That is all. She was called "Little Mary" on earth. She is an empress now.

Who are that great multitude on the highest thrones of heaven? Who are they? Why, they fed the hungry, they clothed the naked, they healed the sick, they comforted the heart-broken. They never found any rest until they put their head down on the pillow of the sepulchre. God watched them. God laughed defiance at the enemies who put their heels hard down on these His dear children; and one day the Lord struck His hand so hard on His thigh that the omnipotent sword rattled on the buckle, as He said: "I am their God, and no weapon formed against them shall prosper." What harm can the world do you when the Lord Almighty with unsheathed sword fights for you?

I preach this sermon this morning for your comfort. Go home to the place just where God has put you, to and heroine. Do not envy any man his money, or his applause, or his social position. Do not envy any woman her wardrobe or her exquisite appearance. Be the hero or the heroine. If there be no flour in the house, and you do not know where your children are to get bread, listen, and you will hear something tapping against the window-pane. Go to the window, and you will find it is the beak of a raven; and open the window, and there will fly in the messenger that fed Elijah.

Do you think that the God who grows the cotton of the South will let you freeze for lack of clothes? Do you think that the God who allowed the disciples on Sunday morning to go into the grain-field, and then take the grain and rub it in their hands and eat—do you think God will let you starve? Did you ever hear the experience of that old man: "I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread?" Get up out of your discouragement, O troubled soul, O sewing woman, O nian kicked and cuffed by unjust employers, O ye who are hard bested in the battle of life and know not which way to turn, O you bereft one, O you sick one with complaints you have told to no one! Come and get the comfort of this subject. Listen to our great Captain's cheer: "To him that overcoming will I give to eat of the fruit of the tree of life which is in the midst of the paradise of God."

AN IDOL TEMPLE IN NEW YORK.

A GRAPHIC description of an idolatrous ceremony, which took place in New York, on December 4th, at midnight, has been furnished to the Sun, by Wong Chinfoo. It is an account of the opening of a new idol temple to the Chinese god, Joss; the temple heretofore in use having become too small for the worshippers. From this report it appears that it is two years since the former temple was dedicated. The Chinese declare that they have clear evidence that their prayers to Joss have been heard and answered; and the prosperity of the worshippers has increased. The experiment of worship has, in a word, been a success, and they have now manifested their gratitude by acquiring a new temple, at a cost of $2000, and consecrated it to his service. This ceremony took place two weeks ago, in a Christian city!

The duty of selecting a site for the new temple was confided to a committee, which was charged to find a suitable building for a genuine Chinese temple in which to erect a regular altar for sacrificial offerings; all the furniture and ornaments for the temple were to be imported from China. Leon Zoo, an ex-Tauist priest, who some years ago gave up the robes, was made temporary priest. The Tauist creed is the oldest of all Chinese religions. It dates back to Yu Hui Ceen, the famous deist who flourished about three thousand years B.C. The creed is now less popular in China than formerly. Buddhism is now the fashionable faith.

The committee selected the building at 202 Chatham Street, Chatham Square. The entire third floor of that large building was rented, and Chinese carpenters and painters set to work to build a house for Joss. On Friday, December 4th the place was ready to receive its venerated inmate. The Chinese merchants, restaurant-keepers, and laundrymen vied with one another in making offerings to Joss, in the shape of decorations and eatables. The hour fixed for the transfer of the god was half-past twelve midnight. The old temple on Mott Street was thronged. About twelve o'clock the Chinese Consul, in company with Le Fong Gwing, the new Chairman of the Chinese Municipality, entered the crowded sanctuary, followed by twenty Chinese merchants in long silken robes. The room was suffocating with the odor of burning incense and sandal-wood. Flaming red candles, were burning dimly under the gaslights. The priest and people knelt, and asked permission to remove Joss from his old to his new place. The prayer translated in English was as follows:

"O merciful Joss, we, thy servants, have humbly this day prepared a new sanctuary, where thou and thine may eat and drink in peace, and where thy presence will not be profaned by the vile language of foreign devils. We invite thee even now to turn thy steps thither, accompanied by thy humble servants."

Incense and Joss sticks were burned and rice wine was spilled before Joss to refresh him a little before he started out on his journey. At the same time six Chinese musicians inflicted characteristic music upon the neighborhood. Expensive red flannels were then laid upon the floor, thence down-stairs, and down to the sidewalk. Joss was raised by two Chinese merchants acting as temporary priests. The Chinese Consul was the guide of the grand march through Chinatown to the new temple on Chatham Square. Fifty or sixty devotees followed in long strings in the rear, all in long silken robes. After these came the bearers of candles, lanterns, flowers, roasted pigs, fruits, candies, cakes, and endless varieties of Oriental luxuries. The Chinese band of eight pieces brought up the rear. When they got to Chatham Square many passers-by stopped to look at the procession in wild wonderment. When the procession arrived at the door of the temple the process of spreading red flannel upon the staircases began once more. While this was being done the majority of the procession went ahead of Joss and his escorts to be in the rooms ready to receive him. Upon the arrival of their god they knelt in two rows at the entrance of the temple, while Leon Zoo, in a loud voice, cried:

"Welcome, O thou great Spirit who controllest the destiny of all men. Welcome into the house newly-prepared by the hands of thy humble servants. We bow to thee, we bow to thee."

These last words were repeated by all the kneeling Chinamen. Wong Ta Yin, the Consul, still led the way until he reached the very throne, a rather low, dial-shaped seat, when he gravely stood aside to give Joss room. The moment this was done the entire assembly knelt while the priest chanted the regular prayer of the Tau in a musical sing-song sort of a way for nearly thirty minutes. Candles of huge size were lit, and the sacrifices began. The first salutation to Joss upon his new throne was made by the Chinese Consul, who lighted three immense sized Joss sticks of sandal-wood and perfumed compounds which made the room fairly thick with a peculiar Oriental odor. He bowed himself three times before Joss. The priest began his offerings of meats and fruits. At least fifteen roasted pigs, one of which must have weighed more than one hundred and sixty pounds, were offered. Beside these were piles of roasted chickens and lambs, etc.

The ceremonies did not conclude until nearly seven o'clock on Saturday morning. The feasting in honor of the occasion was enjoyed by all the Chinamen of New York.

THE EASTERN QUESTION AND PROPHECY.

By the Rev. H. Grattan Guinness.

Its Sudden Reopening—Failure of the Berlin Conference—The Period of Moslem Supremacy—Its Duration Revealed to Daniel—The Termination in 1889—Found by a Key Already Tested—Eight Bases for the Theory—Palestine to be Trodden Down for a Definite Period—Began in 637—The Measurement of the Prophetic Years—When the 1260 years Ended—The Year 1860 a Momentous One.

THE present sudden re-opening of the Eastern Question, supposed by many to have been settled for a generation at least at the Berlin Conference seven years ago, may be a surprise to those who think that sovereigns and statesmen are the makers of history, but not to those who recognize that the Most High ruleth in the kingdoms of men.

Twenty-five centuries ago God made known to Daniel the period during which Moslem power was to endure, and that period, reckoned from the Mohammedan capture of Jerusalem, closes in four years from the present date. Western Europe may band itself together to uphold the independence of the Ottoman Porte as much as it will; it may conclude treaty after treaty with that end in view, but all its attempts are as well be in vain; for the purposes of God must stand, and inspired prophecy assures us that His purpose is that in Palestine shall cease, and that, if our interpretation be correct, before the close of this decade.

Is this a rash, presumptuous statement? For three centuries before the end of the temporal power of the Papacy students of prophecy had understood from Scripture, and stated in their expository works, that it would terminate between A.D. 1866 and 1870, as it actually did. The same system of interpretation that led them to the anticipation thus verified by history leads now to the conclusion above stated, that the end of Mohammedan power in Syria is close at hand. The present reopening of the Eastern Question may be, and probably is, the beginning of the end, the commencement of the last stage of the long struggle. A further brief postponement of the inevitable may possibly happen, but if it does, the reprieve will be even shorter than that secured by the Berlin Treaty; for there is little room to doubt that A.D. 1889 will witness the complete collapse of Mohammedan power, at any rate in Syria. A statement of the grounds on which this conclusion is based will doubtless prove interesting at this crisis. I will endeavor to give as brief a one as I can, divested of extraneous matter, however strongly corroborative.

BASES OF INTERPRETATION.

And first I must be allowed to recall a few unquestioned Biblical, historic and astronomic facts.

(1) The final restoration of God's ancient people, the Jews, is as largely predicted as is their present dispersion in countless passages of Scripture, such as "He that scattered Israel will gather him" (see also Isa. 11: 11, 12).

(2) Connected with the restoration of the people of Israel is a promise of deliverance of their land from Gentile oppression, and of Jerusalem itself and the temple site from subjection to aliens.

(3) Since the time of its destruction by Titus, Jerusalem has been desolated and Palestine oppressed by two great Gentile Powers, and by two only, the Roman and the Mohammedan. The latter has trodden down Jerusalem in its two successive forms, Saracenic and Ottoman, or Turkish. Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans in A.D. 70, conquered by the Saracens in A.D. 637, and is trodden down by the Turks to this day.

(4) In Dan. 12: 7-11 chronological limits are assigned to the desolations of Jerusalem. Their duration is fixed by the expression "1290 days."

(5) Nature measures years of different lengths, and the proportion of the solar year to the lunar year is such that 1260 lunar are 1222½ solar; while 1290 lunar years are 125½ solar.

(6) The original destruction of Solomon's Temple, and the overthrow of Jerusalem in the reign of Zedekiah, took place in the nineteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar, B.C. 587, after a series of victorious attacks on the city, and deportations of Jews to Babylon, extending over the twenty previous years, during the first of which Daniel himself was carried captive.

(7) The Saracenic conquest of Jerusalem, in A.D. 637, was the closing incident of a series of most remarkable campaigns, extending over four years, in the course of which the whole of Northern Syria and Palestine proper fell before the fanatical Moslem hordes, under the leadership of Calad, who was called

"THE SWORD OF GOD."

Damascus fell first, and a great victory was gained over the imperial army of the Eastern Empire at the battle of Aiz-Nadin, July, A.D. 633. From the conquest of Damascus the Saracens advanced on that of Baalbec and Emesa. The subjugation of the plain and vale of Syria occupied two years, A.D. 634-5; the battle of Yermuk, near the Springs of Hermon, in which the Saracens overthrew the great army sent to defend his Syrian Province by Heraclius, the Eastern Roman Emperor, took place in A.D. 636; and then, in the following year, the Siege of Jerusalem commenced, and lasted four months. It yielded at length to the besiegers, and the Caliph Omar, who founded the mosque which bears his name, and still occupies the site of Solomon's Temple, entered the city after having signed the capitulation.

The four years of Mohammedan conquest in Syria, 633 to 637, correspond in duration and character with the four years of the Roman war, which ended with Titus's capture of Jerusalem A.D. 66 to 70. By the Romans the daily sacrifice was taken away; by the Mohammedans the desolation of Jerusalem was completed. The years 633 to 637 witnessed the full establishment in Palestine and in Jerusalem of the final desolating power, the power which still treads down the city of the Great King.

(8) The year A.D. 1860 was a remarkable year in the history of the Jews and of their country. It was the year of the horrible Druze massacre of the Christians in the Lebanon and at Damascus. That massacre was connived at, if not planned, by the Turkish Government. The remonstrances of the European Consuls in the country were treated with neglect and contempt. The Christians were disarmed by the authorities, and left like defenceless sheep to be butchered by their bloodthirsty enemies the Druzes. Thousands of innocent lives and millions of property were sacrificed, and the total apathy and the incompetence of the Turkish Government to maintain order was such that the Great Powers of Europe intervened. Syria was occupied by French troops, and an English fleet anchored at Beyrout. The result was the conclusion of the treaty by which Northern Syria was placed under a Christian governor, and the welfare of its inhabitants secured by insisted upon by European compulsion. The year, in short, witnessed a marked though partial deliverance of the Holy Land from Mohammedan oppression; it witnessed the turn of the tide. The condition of Palestine and Syria has ever since been improving, and the contrast of what they are to-day and what they were twenty-five years ago is remarkable.

The year 1860 also witnessed the foundation of "The Universal Israelite Alliance," an organization which has now reached its twenty-fifth anniversary, and has reconstituted the Jews, scattered throughout the world, into an organized body, for the first time since their dispersion in the days of Titus. It is a patriotic association for the help and protection of the Jewish people, its aim being to secure in every country Jewish emancipation and liberty, and the intellectual and moral regeneration of the people. It is an alliance which now has branches not only in every nation, but almost in every city and town in which Jews are resident; and it has given to the scattered people a sense of unity and mutual help to which for long centuries they had been strangers.

It has connected with it numerous schools and educational establishments, especially an agricultural school in Palestine itself, founded under a conviction that only by inducing them to turn their attention to agriculture could the Jews in Palestine be benefited. In 1870 it obtained an imperial firman, by which the Porte leased to it, for an indefinite period, a splendid piece of land in the neighborhood of Jaffa, where an agricultural establishment was founded. Twenty-five thousand vine-trees were planted, and gardens, farm buildings, orange, lemon, and pomegranate plantations have sprung up around this school of practical agriculture, which trains Jewish youth for productive industry in the land of their fathers.

The importance of the Universal Israelite Alliance to the fortunes of the Jewish people cannot well be over-estimated. Its headquarters are in Paris, but its influence is felt and its beneficial action on behalf of the Jews exerted everywhere, from Persia to Morocco. The twenty-five years of its existence have been especially a period of renaissance to the seed of Abraham, who are once more possessed, by its means, of what the French call "solidarité."

(To be concluded.)

BESSY HILDRETH'S CROSS.

It was but a small thing, the repeating of a single verse among a score of others, but to shy Bessy Hildreth it was a real cross. This was the verse: "It is appointed unto men, once to die, but after this the judgment." Heb. 9: 27. She had just come out on the Lord's side, and only the fear of denying her Master could have given her courage to open her lips, in the little Sunday evening prayer meeting. Frightened at her own trembling tones, she shrank closer into the dark corner where she sat, and wished, oh, so fervently, that she had not attempted to speak at all.

Had she not been trying to still the wild beating of her own heart, she would have noticed the startled look that came into a pair of dark eyes just opposite her. Ah, poor little timid Bessy; could you have known that it was this very tremor in your voice that fastened the attention of careless Duncan Forbes on the solemn words you uttered, you would not have longed to recall them or to have vainly wished them unsaid.

Poor light-hearted Duncan had been familiar with the text since childhood, and had it not been for the quivering lips that repeated the words to-night, it would have been unheeded, as were the thirty other verses that had been spoken in his hearing. Hymns were sung, and fervent prayers ascended to heaven, before the meeting closed; but Duncan heard nothing, except the terrifying words, "After this the judgment." In the silence of his own chamber, the voice still rang in his ears, and when he courted sleep, visions of the great white throne passed vividly before him. The morning light brought no sweet peace, neither did the business of the day dispel the gloom that had settled upon his spirits. He read his Bible, and tried to pray, but twenty-one years of sin and folly passed in solemn review before him, appalling him with their magnitude, and utterly choking the petitions already formed in his heart.

Almost in despair he slipped quietly into the prayer-meeting the next Sunday evening, and before its close he startled the little praying band by requesting them to intercede for him at the throne of grace. He stated what had caused his awakening, and humbly asked for aid and direction. Before the close of that memorable meeting he had found rest to his soul. With the love of Jesus fresh in his heart he persuaded others, his dear companions and friends, to seek the one thing needful. Soon souls were anxiously inquiring the way heavenward, and a revival, such as the village of Melville had never enjoyed, followed, and, in the end, more than sixty new converts dated their new life to Bessy Hildreth's faithful performance of duty. "In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand, for thou knowest not whether shall prosper."

THE CHICAGO CONFERENCE

ON HOLINESS AND DIVINE HEALING.

THE accounts published daily by the Chicago Tribune and the Times of the proceedings of the Conference, show that a very deep interest was manifested by the Christian people of the city in the teaching brought before them by the Conference. The meetings were held in the First Methodist Episcopal Church, which was filled by hundreds of attentive listeners. Mrs. Baxter, Miss Carrie F. Judd, Dr. John Cookman, Rev. A. B. Simpson, and other well-known believers took part in the proceedings. The second day of the Conference was the one in which the interest centred, as there was an anointing service, and the doctrines promulgated were submitted to practical test.

The Rev. A. B. Simpson opened the session and explained at some length what divine healing is and what it is not. He showed that it had no connection in any way with spiritualism or "the mind cure," nor did any analogy exist between them. His object, apparently, was to convince that body of believers, which is increasing in number, who admit that the sick are healed, but believe that their healing is the result of an ecstatic condition of mind which operates on the body, and who point as proof of their theory to the very large proportion which the cures of spinal disease hold to the whole number. That is to say, that a sufferer may be healed whose organs are intact, but are sluggish or inert, refusing to perform their proper functions; but that sufferers cannot be cured whose organs are diseased or their substance injured. Mr. Simpson mentioned that, although he had a family of five children, and sickness was not uncommon among them, he never called in a physician or used medicine.

A SERIES OF QUESTIONS

in response to an invitation were written on paper by members of the audience, and passed up to the platform, and Mrs. Baxter read and answered them. Some appeared to be frivolous, but the majority indicated a genuine desire for information. Among them were the following:

Q. If God did not intend men to be healed by medicine and doctors, why did He place so many healing herbs and minerals within the reach of all? A. God has sent these things for sinners, as He did not intend to deprive them of all comfort and hope of relief.

Q. Does all sickness come from Satan? A. It does, and it is to be traced directly or indirectly to sin, not always in the sufferer, however.

Q. Can unbelievers claim healing from the Lord? A. They cannot.

Q. Is not medicine a blessing from God? A. Yes, for unbelievers. Not for believers who have the Great Physician.

Q. Should a sick one dismiss his physician and throw away all medicine? A. I would deal with God honestly, not pretend to rely upon Him while relying on some one else.

Q. Is the Old Testament wholly inspired as well as the New? A. Certainly it is.

Q. Why was not Paul's thorn in the flesh removed? A. How do you know it was not? Paul had no ailing of the flesh. The thorn in the flesh was a messenger from Satan.

Q. Have the eyes of the blind ever been opened by faith? A. I don't know, but I do know that they have been opened by Jesus.

Q. Is it necessary that a person should be anointed with oil in order to be healed? A. It is God's own prescription, and, though some have been healed without oil, it is best to do His way.

Q. Why are people not healed instantaneously, as they were in the time of Christ?

A. There are several reasons. They can not now come into contact with Christ, but have to depend upon the growth of their faith, or upon some one's prayers.

Q. Should a person who has been cured by faith always rely upon God afterward in all cases of illness; as, for instance, in a case of simple cold, should they deny themselves the usual lump of sugar to soften the cough, or take the sugar and call on the Lord only in emergencies? The answer to this was lengthy. God had taken the pains to count the hair of our heads. He knew more about our tonsils than we, and that we must depend upon Him in all things. He is our Great Physician.

Q. Can the insane be healed by the prayers of one person? A. They can. I have known one hundred and fifty persons to be cured of insanity by prayer.

PERSONAL TESTIMONY

was then invited. A large number responded, among whom were the Rev. John Cookman, D.D., and Mrs. Naylor, of New York, Miss Carrie F. Judd, of Buffalo, and others, whose testimony has already been published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The following were some of the most striking cases:

Mr. Rollin H. Trumbull, of No. 164 Lake Street, Treasurer of the Marinette Iron Company, stated that four years ago he found his strength leaving him. He had great pains about the heart. His family physician treated him for heart disease, and he was also treated by Dr. Davis. Shortly after that he was thrown out of a buggy, and for two years was upon crutches. Fifteen physicians treated him, but did not help him. Two years ago next January he took his case to the Great Physician. It was then that God had sent Mrs. Smith all the way from England to Evanston, where he resided. About this time he had become interested in the subject of anointing the sick. He asked Mrs. Smith to anoint him. They knelt in prayer, and she poured some oil upon his head. He felt the peace of God within him, and he arose and walked through the house without his crutches. He had never touched his crutches since, and they were still standing in the corner where he left them. On the Thursday following, the Marinette Iron Company, of which he was an officer, held its annual meeting at Marinette, Wis. Some of his brother officers came up to Evanston, Tuesday, to see him about the meeting. They told him they supposed it would be his last meeting. On Wednesday evening he went to Marinette without his crutches, and carrying his satchel in his hand, to the very great astonishment of all his friends. His ankle was then still a little stiff, but in a few days it had resumed its normal functions, and, although he was a large man, his ankle had never been weak since.

Mr. J. R. Webb, of Oak Park, said that two years ago last month he was with a friend at Waukesha. His friend had asked him what he thought of the faith-cure, which Mrs. Smith, of England, was advocating at Waukesha. He replied that he believed that the day of miracles had long been gone. He was suffering with nervous prostration, and had made all necessary ante-mortem preparations. He went to one of Mrs. Smith's readings of the Bible, and then realized for the first time the truth of the Lord's care of the body as well as the soul. He became better, and took a trip South. He became much worse there, and came home. One day he went to a faith-meeting with a number of ladies, and there he was anointed, but at that time he was not cured; he had not enough faith. He had several struggles, and finally he was healed while in his room.

Mrs. Rounds, of Chicago, said that eight years ago she suffered from a complication of diseases, which no physician was able to cure. She finally sought one of her friends and asked her to pray for her. They prayed together in church. After the prayer she felt no better, but walked home in great pain, believing she was cured, because God had promised it in the Bible. She continued to suffer pain, but continued to work for a week, and was completely healed at the end of the week.

Miss Adeline Goodrich, of Freeport, Ill., a young lady who had been a pupil at the State Normal School, said that while at that institution in 1873 she fell down-stairs and severely injured her spine. The physician who attended her was a good Christian, and, after trying all remedies, he began to talk of appealing to God. She had been sick in the Institution for three years, when she asked to be removed to her home. In order to move her in her invalid chair it was necessary to change the angle at which she reclined just two inches. Several attempts were made, but the pain was so excruciating that the idea was abandoned for some days. Again the doctor spoke of praying God to give her the strength to endure the change, but concluded to pray for her entire cure instead. They finally prayed together. On February 22d, 1877, after being confined to her bed nearly four years, she was reading the story of the palsied one, and as she read the words "Arise, take up thy bed and walk," she felt that her cure had begun. Upon April 5th, 1877, she felt that the Lord had laid His hands upon her. Her physician believed with her. The next day she arose from her bed, and she had not been upon a sick-bed for a day since.

At the request of Mr. Simpson, all those in the audience who had been cured by Divine Power, gave testimony by rising, and one hundred and eighty-five were counted, of whom twenty claimed to have been cured of organic diseases.

AT THE ANOINTING SERVICE

about one hundred and thirty persons presented themselves, some on crutches, some in invalid chairs, and others with their arms in slings. Mr. Simpson addressed them on the solemn character of the ceremony, and the state of mind in which it should be entered upon. He questioned them as to their faith, and answers were given by raising the hand. Then about twenty-five went forward to the altar-rail, the ladies with uncovered heads. They knelt there, and Mr. Simpson prayed that God would accept the consecration thus made of their bodies. He then poured a little oil into the palm of his hand, and with it anointed the forehead of each person kneeling. Behind the row of suppliants stood a number of believers, each having a hand resting on the head of one of the sufferers in front, and praying as the oil was put upon the forehead. A few moments of prayer followed, and the sufferers gave place to another set, and the ceremony was repeated until all the hundred and thirty had been anointed.

The evening session was opened with prayer by the Rev. M. Baxter. An address followed by Rev. A. B. Simpson, after which several evangelists related interesting incidents in their experience. Among the speakers were Mr. Best, of Little Washington, Pa.; Mr. Hutchinson, who has been laboring in Texas; Mr. Kirkland, who has charge of the Canal Street Mission; and Dr. Kittredge, of the Adelphi Theatre Mission. In the course of the evening a remarkable experience was related by Mrs. Baxter. She said: "The Lord sent me to Germany, and yet I could not speak a word of German, and I told the Lord so. He said: 'Will you go and preach in a certain village to-night?' I said: 'Lord, in what language?' He said: 'In German.' Well, I went, and the Lord went, too, and I got a Bible with English on one side and German on the other, and I tried to read the translation to them. Well, they understood me, although, you know, German has such curious twists about it. The funny thing was that when I went into a shop the people could not understand my German, and yet the people to whom I preached could."

Regular weekly services for divine healing are now being held in Chicago, every Saturday, at eleven in the morning, at 15 Washington Street.

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION, $1.50.

A Favor would be conferred on the Manager and office-staff of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD if subscribers whose terms expire at the end of the year would so far oblige them as to remit their renewals at once, instead of waiting for the new year. During the first few weeks of January there is always a very heavy influx of letters, which, in spite of special arrangements to deal with them, involves liability to mistake in making up the new lists. It would therefore be a convenience, facilitating the work and reducing the chances of delay and disappointment, if such of our subscribers as can conveniently do so would send in their subscriptions now. Those who send a new name with their own, as many are doing, are doubly welcome.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Both Houses of Congress Adjourned on Monday, Dec. 7, as a mark of respect for the memory of Vice-President Hendricks. Before doing so the Senate elected Mr. John Sherman its President pro tempore, and the House re-elected Mr. Carlisle Speaker. The Senate chamber was appropriately draped in mourning. It is gratifying to observe that the Senators appeared inclined to get to work on useful legislation, and it may be hoped that this early developed energy will not soon wear itself out. Mr. Hoar introduced his bill regulating the succession in case of a vacancy in the office of President and in that of Vice-President, a measure urgently needed. He also brought in the Bankruptcy Bill, also very important. Mr. Edmunds introduced his bill regulating the counting of the Electoral votes, and an International Copyright Bill. Mr. Blair also introduced a good bill requiring the study in the common schools of physiology, with reference particularly to the effect of "intoxicants and narcotics." All parents and teachers are aware of the urgent need of such teaching.

The President's Message, sent to Congress on December 8th, is encyclopædic in character and bulk. Mr. Cleveland appears to have taken the reports of each department, examined them minutely, formed his own conclusions on each, and embodied information and advice systematically under the various heads in his communication. If there is nothing very original in the document, there is satisfaction in the inference that our national affairs are in such a condition that the executive, who has opportunity for knowing them intimately, has no radical and startling changes to suggest. It is deserving of notice, too, that although it is twenty-five years since a message to Congress has been prepared by a Democratic President, there is so little in it reflecting on Republican administration. The remarks it contains to which a Republican statesman would demur form an inconsiderable part of the whole, and the fact must be consolatory to a large number of people, who feared that the advent to power of a Democrat would seriously reverse our national progress. It would appear from this message that the executive policy under President Cleveland differs in a much less degree than was expected from the policy of his Republican predecessors. In many instances his recommendations are identical with those of President Arthur. Private citizens will do well to consider this fact, and when they hear either political party denounced by the other to reflect that at heart members of both are patriotic, and neither are so bad as they are represented.

Our Relations with Foreign Countries Are cordial, and the President congratulates Congress on there being no questions of difficulty pending with any government. He referred to the rejection of Mr. Keiley by the Austrian court, and said that he had left the place of minister to Vienna vacant. If he has not a more statesmanlike man than Mr. Keiley to put in it, the President cannot do better than leave it vacant. The commercial treaty with Spain, the convention on the Congo country, and the Nicaragua Canal treaty Mr. Cleveland courteously but firmly condemns; but the Mexican treaty negotiated by General Grant has his approval. He recommends the organization of a commission to settle the fishery disputes with Great Britain, and an extension of the clauses of the extradition treaty with that Power. He is also in favor of International Copyright, and recommends to Congress the examination of the plan suggested on this subject by the Berne Conference. The country is to be congratulated on the fact of such matters being the most prominent in a survey of its foreign relations.

On Home Affairs the President is Explicit. He recommends relief of the burden of the people, believing that they are now unnecessarily heavy. The direction which this relief should take is, he thinks, a reduction of the customs duties on "the imported necessities of life." Here, more clearly than in any other part of the message, he antagonizes the Republican policy. He advises the suspension of the coinage of silver dollars, and declares that the hoarding of gold has already commenced, in view of the crisis inevitable if the coinage be continued. An emphatic passage is the one dealing with Civil Service Reform. The President believes that the Government could not long have borne the strain of a system "which, upon every change of Administration, inspires an immense army of claimants for office to lay siege to the patronage of Government, engrossing the time of public officers with their importunities, spreading abroad the contagion of their disappointment, and filling the air with the tumult of their discontent." And he expresses his conviction that the law now in operation was enacted "none too soon to check the progress of demoralization." The Mormon Question is dealt with in a passage unlike any other in the message, and is evidently the work of another hand, which is easily recognized. Though the language is doubtless not his own, we trust that it embodies his own ideas and resolutions. He says: "There should be no relaxation in the firm but just execution of the law now in operation, and I should be glad to approve such further discreet legislation as will rid the country of this blot upon its fair fame." The President also recommends the enactment of a law prohibiting the importation of Mormons.

A Notable Name in the Obituary of the Week is that of Mr. William H. Vanderbilt, who died December 8th. It is believed that he was the richest man in the world, his real and personal estate being worth $200,000,000. He was sixty-four years of age, and was apparently in good health. While talking with a business friend who called upon him, his utterance became indistinct, he suddenly fell forward, and when lifted up he was dead. The cause of death was cerebral apoplexy. Among the sums bequeathed by him in his will are amounts aggregating a million dollars distributed among religious and philanthropic institutions, as follows: To the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, $100,000 for foreign; and $100,000 for domestic missionary purposes; $100,000 each to St. Luke's Hospital, the Young Men's Christian Association of the city of New York, the City Mission of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, and the Moravian Church on Staten Island; $50,000 each is left to the General Theological Seminary of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, to the New York Bible and Common Prayer-Book Society, to the Home for Incurables, to the Protestant-Episcopal Church Missionary Society for Seamen, and to the New York Christian Home for Intemperate men. One half the estate is divided equally between his eldest two sons, and the other half among his widow and his other six children, and a few legacies are left to friends.

The Last of the British Parliamentary Elections has now taken place, and the Liberals claim that they lack only one vote of half the whole number of members elected. They assert that the new House will consist of 334 Liberals and 336 Conservatives and Parnellites combined. The official figures have not been cabled probably, because in the existing relations of parties it is difficult to decide whether some of the members will act with the Liberals or the Conservatives. On Irish questions there would be a marked uncertainty. Many now classed as Mr. Gladstone's supporters would desert him, and vote with the Conservatives if he should propose such a concession for Ireland as Mr. Parnell would approve. The House, at its assembling, will present a novel appearance. Of the 670 members, 332 are new men, who have never sat in Parliament before. Three are native born Americans. Some of the new men sent by Irish constituencies are objectionable to the aristocratic members of the House. They include 2 drapers, 3 tavern-keepers, 4 farmers, 2 grocers, 1 carpenter, 1 blacksmith, 1 florist, 1 watchmaker, 1 tailor, 1 dancing saloon-owner, and 1 manager of a dancing-school. Some of the English towns have sent representatives whom the aristocrats dislike quite as much. Among them are a mason, a glassblower, a tailor, a bootmaker, and a laborer. One political organ expresses its fears that such men will not prove "capable to reproduce the ancient glories of Parliament." That is possible; but if they have the power and the courage to tell the legislators what the poor people of the country need, and to insist on their grievances being redressed, the ancient glories may be allowed to rest without reproduction for a time.

Sanguine Expectations are Entertained by Irishmen of the legislative separation of Ireland from Great Britain. Reports cabled to this country by Egan and other Nationalists speak of it as certain. Ten years ago no event seemed more unlikely, but before that time the Rev. M. Baxter and other students of prophecy arrived at the conclusion that the separation must take place before the formation of the ten-kingdomed confederacy. It is evident that never before in this generation have the prospects of Irish autonomy been so hopeful as they now are. That Mr. Gladstone is eager to return to office is proved by several of his recent utterances. It is also proved by figures that he might return immediately if he can devise a compromise which would command the support of his own followers, on the one hand, and Mr. Parnell on the other. It is a significant fact, disproving the assertions English journals have been making for many years, that all Ireland is practically unanimous in desiring separation. We have been told repeatedly that the province of Ulster wholly, and the other three provinces largely, were in favor of the maintenance of the union. At this election about 350,000 votes have been cast in Ireland, of which nearly 250,000 were given to men sworn to obey Parnell. Not more than fifteen members have been elected in all Ireland opposed to him. In view of this fact, Mr. Herbert Gladstone, a son of the ex-Premier, writes to a prominent journal: "Nothing could induce me to countenance a separation; but if five sixths of the Irish people wish to have a Parliament in Dublin for the management of their own local affairs, I say, in the name of justice and wisdom, let them have it." On political matters Mr. Gladstone and his son are generally in accord.

Hostilities in the Balkans were Resumed on December 10th, when the armistice expired. Proposals for peace were sent during the brief respite by Servia to Bulgaria, but were rejected. Counter proposals sent by the Bulgarians were rejected by Servia. Both governments were apparently encouraged to renew the conflict by promises of aid. Rumors were circulated that Austrian officers were volunteering for service in the Servian army, and were followed by a report that Bulgaria had come to an understanding with Russia, and had received assurances of support. On Saturday last the Servian army moved in force against the Bulgarian position, and a long and sanguinary engagement ensued. The Servians claimed a victory.

American Citizens Born in Germany Have for some years been subjected to penalties in visiting their native country, and some of them been compelled to join the army. Efforts have been made at various times to arrive at an agreement between the governments of Washington and Berlin on the question of naturalization, but without success. The subject was mentioned in the President's message last week. In commenting upon it, a Berlin journal uses language which indicates a hostile spirit. It says: "The German Government treats alike, regardless of where naturalized, all Germans who emigrate in order to escape military service and then return to Germany. The Government will not tolerate American or Danish colonies within its territory." The arrangement of this difficulty was one of Mr. Pendleton's most important duties.

Mr. C. H. Spurgeon's Health Has Been Sufficiently restored to permit of his leaving England. A brief cable dispatch states that on Friday he set out for Mentone. As the climate of that place is usually beneficial to him, we may hope to hear soon of his convalescence. The prayers of his American friends are earnestly desired for God's blessing on the means used for his recovery.

Mrs. Baxter is Conducting Meetings in conjunction with Mrs. Stroud Smith at Freeport, Ill. On Sunday, December 6th, Mrs. Baxter preached at Cleveland, O., whence she went to Oberlin, O., to take part in the Conference on Holiness and Divine Healing held in that city last week. The Conference occupied four days, and there was a very marked manifestation of God's blessing. At the last session many persons testified to the spiritual good derived at the meetings.

Messrs. Mateer & Parker, Mr. Spurgeon's evangelists, concluded their mission at Onondaga, N. Y., last week. The manifest blessing of God led to the meetings being continued over three weeks. During their work there upward of three hundred persons professed saving faith in Christ, as the result of God's blessing on the services. The evangelists are now laboring at Mount Vernon, O.

Mr. W. Noble's Gospel Temperance Mission at Louisville, Ky., has been a remarkable success. He spoke twice each day, and besides visited the prison, hospital, and schools, on the invitation of the authorities, and gave Gospel temperance addresses. He also addressed the students in the Baptist College. Last week Mr. Noble conducted a series of meetings in Cadiz, O. The Grand Opera House, in which they were held, was filled to overflowing, and much good was done. This week Mr. Noble is speaking at Dayton, O. Letters and telegrams may be sent to him there until Monday, December 21st.

The Remarkable Appearance of Wall Street last week was described by all the daily journals of New York. At noon on each day it was almost deserted. Usually, at that hour, it is thronged with busy, earnest men, apparently without a moment to lose, hurrying in and out of the Stock Exchange, intent on the buying and selling of shares. Last week the sidewalks and the offices looked as if business was suspended. The visitor had only to walk up the street to Trinity Church, which stands at its head, to learn the cause. Every day, for nearly two hours, the vast building was crowded in every part by bankers and brokers, listening intently and reverently to the preaching of the Rev. W. Hay Aitken, the English mission preacher, whose portrait and life appeared in this journal last week. Mr. Aitken used very plain words, and presented home truths in a manner that must have surprised the business men. Yet they came again and again, and there is reason to hope that much good was done.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey were Engaged last week in one of the most beneficent works in the sphere of the Christian Church. They held meetings, as announced some weeks ago in these columns, in the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association, Brooklyn, N. Y., for men only. The large lecture hall was crowded every night, and at the after meetings many decided for Christ. A very hopeful characteristic of the meetings was the large number of young men who eagerly applied for tickets of admission, and attended each meeting. How sorely some of them need to hear the warnings Mr. Moody addressed to them on the subject of social purity every Christian knows who has been brought in contact with young men of this day.

The Passengers on Two Railroad Trains had a hairbreadth escape from death on December 10th. A despatch from St. John's, New Brunswick, says that while the east-bound train on the New Brunswick Railway was passing over the bridge across the north branch of the Oromocto River on Thursday, the bridge gave way, and the engine fell into the river. Providentially the couplings broke, and the cars remained on the track, one hanging over the gap. The engineer escaped with slight injuries, but the fireman is missing, and is supposed to have been drowned. The night express from Boston soon afterward passed over the south branch bridge, and the engineer, learning of the disaster, at once took back his train to Fredericton Junction. All trains west have been cancelled on account of the accident. That is a prudent action, and we can but wish that in the more important matter of the journey of life similar caution were exercised. The broad road on which eternal disaster is inevitable, and on which so many have already fallen, is still crowded with travellers (Matt. 7:13).

A New Police Signal has been Patented by two officers connected with the police department of New Haven, Conn. It is intended to bring a policeman on a beat at a long distance from headquarters into communication with the superintendent. In the central office is a large map of the city, with a number of raised buttons corresponding with the various points where the beats intersect. On pressing a button an electric current passes to a lamp-post at the place in the city indicated on the map. The current releases a balance weight in the lamp-post, which, as it runs down, draws up a small red glass globe just large enough to enclose the gas-flame, and within the lantern. It is the duty of the policeman on the beat who sees the flame so enclosed to go to the nearest police telephone and take the superintendent's instructions. The usefulness of the invention will evidently depend on the alacrity of the policeman in attending to the intimation it is designed to give, that special service is required of them. Such special service is sometimes required of the servants of God, but they fail to recognize the intimation, or, like Jonah, they do not respond to the call, and are guilty of unfaithfulness displeasing to God (Prov. 1:24-26).

The Gift of an Emperor to an American child is described in the Montgomery (N. Y.) Advertiser. A little lady, six years old, whose parents reside in that town, was travelling with them last summer in Austria. On August 18th they happened to be at a famous Alpine resort, at which the Emperor of Austria was also staying. That day was the American child's birthday, and as it was also the birthday of the Emperor it was deemed appropriate that she should send him a gift. Accordingly a note of congratulation was despatched, stating that it was from a little American girl on her sixth birthday to the Emperor on his fifty-fourth, and it was signed simply "Charlotte." The note was accompanied by a small bunch of flowers. Nothing was heard of the modest tribute of regard until eight days afterward, when the Emperor's master of ceremonies called, and in the name of his sovereign presented the child with a beautiful piece of jewelry. It was a four-leaf clover in gold, with a diamond pendant, and on its back was an inscription recording the names of the receiver and the imperial giver. The official told the lady that when the Emperor came across the simple note and bunch of flowers in the files of presents he was so struck with its simplicity that he shed tears, and directed that the child's full name be obtained and herself sought out, in order that his thanks might be returned along with a memento of his esteem. Doubtless she will treasure the gift as long as she lives. It may serve to remind her that He who is King of kings may be approached by a child, and that she can make Him an offering that He will not despise (Ps. 51:17).

Three Ingenious Swindlers were Captured in Chicago on December 10th. It appears that a firm of butterine manufacturers have been puzzled by an anomaly in their business. They held a contract by which another firm supplied them with lard regularly in lots of ten thousand pounds each. The lard did not yield so much as the butterine manufacturers knew that it ought to yield. They therefore ordered their carter to take his load, after it had been weighed out to him, to their own weighers, and have it weighed there before delivering it. They gained no light from this check, for the weight was about correct. They therefore watched the carter, and the swindle was detected. After receiving the load the carter drove to a butcher, and there about three hundred pounds of lard was scooped out, and the butcher and a confederate crawled into the cavity thus made, and the wagon was driven to the weigher's to be weighed a second time. The weight of the men made up for the lard abstracted, and as the wagon went to the butterine factory the men crawled out and walked away. Had they remained and lost their lives in the process of turning the lard into butterine they would have been a fit type of the fate of all swindlers. Every nian who makes dishonest gains gives his soul in exchange (Jer. 17:11).

An Almost Miraculous Escape from Drowning occurred on Lake Michigan on December 4th, during the memorable storm which raged all through that day and the next. Captain Sterling, of the ship Mercury, which arrived at Chicago on December 9th, states that about midnight on Friday, while the vessel was laboring heavily in mid-lake, a heavy sea swept the decks, and carried overboard a sailor named John Anderson. It was impossible in such a storm to heave-to, and his shipmates gave him up for lost. A few minutes later the captain, who was at the wheel, was amazed to see the man clinging to the rail. The men ran to him and lifted him on board. Anderson said that the sea which washed him overboard carried him about fifty feet from the vessel in the direction in which she was sailing. When he came upon the crest of the wave he could see the vessel's lights shining faintly through the driving storm, and struck out to get as near them as possible. At this moment another wave swept over him, and as he came to the surface his head struck the side of the schooner. He retained his presence of mind, and began reaching for the fender-ropes, which he knew were hanging over the side. Fortunately he succeeded in grasping the last one on the port side, and having clambered up was helped on board more dead than alive. The truly marvellous escape, uncommon as such a thing is at sea, is very like the Christian's experience in the storms of life. The wave of trouble that sometimes sweeps him away from his Saviour for the moment carries him in the onward direction, and, if he is looking for the light, another trial drives him back to safety (Hosea 5:15).

BUT A STEP.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"There is but a step between me and death."—

1 SAMUEL 20 : 3.

David's Danger—Saved by His Knowledge of it—His Assertion—I. True of Every Man—Life is Short—Uncertain—A Death in a Pulpit—Dr. Gill's Providential Journey—Timothy East's Foolish Hearer—II. Especially True of Some—A Scotch Minister's Indifference—III. Suppose It is Not So—A Converted Seaman in a New York Pulpit—A Dying Bricklayer's Answer—IV. Suppose it is So—A Husband's Farewell—A Lady's Death in Church.

THIS was David's description of his own condition. King Saul was seeking to destroy him. The bitter malice of that king would not be satisfied with anything short of the blood of his rival. Jonathan did not know this. He could not believe so badly of his father as that he could wish to kill the champion of Israel, the brave, true-hearted young David, and so he assured David that it could not be so—that he had not heard of any plots against him. But David, who knew better, said, "It is certainly so. Your father seeks my blood, and there is but a step between me and death."

Now, it was by knowing his danger that David escaped. Had he remained as ignorant of his own peril as his friend Jonathan had been, he would have walked into the lion's mouth, and he would have fallen by the hand of Saul. But to be forewarned is to be forearmed; he was therefore able to save his life because he perceived his danger. It is rather of things, is it not, for David to be conscious of danger, and to be telling his friend Jonathan that he is in danger? I do not often meet with the case now. If I am the Jonathan, I have to keep on warning David of his danger, and I find it very difficult to wake up my friend to a sense of that danger. I should like to live to see the day in which David would come to Jonathan—I mean in which men in danger would come to me—and say, "There is but a step between me and death." We love to see care for the soul, and concern about a future state. Whenever God's Holy Spirit is at work we do see it; sinners begin to be aware of their condition, and they come and tell us of their danger, and inquire for the way of escape.

It is the simplest thing in the world to tell the awakened sinner how he may find peace; the difficulty lies in awakening the sinner. To cheer those who are alarmed is such good work that we would sit up all night at it. We can never have too much of it. To bind up the broken in heart when the Master gives us His Gospel, is the most pleasant duty out of heaven. The worst of it is, that we cannot persuade them that they need to be broken in heart, or lead them to feel that they are in peril, but still shutting their eyes to all the truth that will go wildly on, determined not to know. Too many act as if it were folly to look a few days ahead, as if it were a work of supererogation to foresee the evil, a needless sorrow to think of eternity.

I. First, then, there is a sense in which this text is no doubt literally

TRUE OF EVERY MAN.

"There is but a step between me and death"; for life is so short that it is no exaggeration to compare it to a step. Suppose that we should live to threescore years and ten, or even fourscore years, or to be, as some few of our friends are here to-night, even past their fourscore years, yet life will occupy a very short time. Life is long to look forward to; but I appeal to every aged person whether it is not very short to look back upon. I confess to my own experience that a week is now a hardly appreciable space of time to me. There seems to be very little breathing room between one Sunday and another. One has scarcely preached before one has to prepare again some other word with which to address you. As we grow older time very sensibly quickens its pace. I know that this is an exceedingly trite observation, but I mention it all the more earnestly because the certainty of it should force it home with power upon our minds. You young people look to a month as being quite a period of time, but when you are getting forty, or fifty, or sixty, you will look upon a whole year as no more than a brief interval.

But, in another sense, there is but a step between us and death, namely, that life is so uncertain. How unexpectedly it ends! Strong and hearty men, if I might make a judgment from observation, seem to be among the first to fall. How often have I seen the invalid, who might almost long for death, draw out a long existence of continuous pain; while the man who shook your hand with a powerful grip, and stood erect like a column of iron, is laid low of a sudden and is gone! No man can reckon upon the full term of life; not one among us can be sure of reaching threescore and ten. We cannot be sure that we shall see old age. A bubble is more solid than human life, and a spider's web is as a cable compared with the thread of our existence. There is but a step between us and death.

A PLACE OF MANY GATES.

And this is all the more true when we consider that there are so many gates to the grave. We can die anywhere, at any time, by any means. Not alone abroad are we in danger, but at home in security we are still in peril. I am in my pulpit now, but I am not secure in this citadel from all-besieging death. I remember a dear servant of God in a country town, on a certain Sabbath morning, stood up and repeated as the first hymn of the morning, the sacred song which I gave out just now:

"Father, I long, I faint to see

The place of thine abode;

I'd leave thine earthly courts and flee

Up to thy seat, my God;"

and he fell back and was gone. His wish was granted. He saw the place of God's abode, I do not doubt. There is no safety from death in the pulpit, nor in your own house. Dr. Gill, who was noted for always being in his study, said one day to a friend, "Well, at least, if a man is in his study he is safe." Some one had been killed in the street through a falling chimney-pot or tile, and this gave emphasis to the doctor's pleasantry. But it so happened that, soon after the doctor went to visit a member of his church, and while he was away a stormy wind blew, and blew down a stack of chimneys into his study, into the very place where he would have been sitting if he had not been called away. So he said to his friend, "Verily, I see I must not boast of being safe in my study, for we are secure nowhere." In times of battle men may shelter behind trees or walls, and so escape rifle-shot; but where can you get to escape from the arrows of death? Wherever you be, not alone in the crowded, thronging streets, but up there in your own chamber, or on the edge of your bed, you may slip, you may fall, and suffer fatal injury. At your table you may eat and drink and die. Wherever you are, you may well feel, "There is but a step between me and death."

"Dangers stand thick through all our path

To push us to the tomb;

And fever diseases wait around

To hurry mortals home."

Therefore, I would say, as I leave this point, let nobody here reckon upon life. Let him never postpone what ought to be done at once to some future time.

I do not know whether any brother here recollects old Mr. Timothy East. I knew him well in his old age. He was a man of careful observation and retentive memory, and in his later days he was full of stories which had happened in his pastoral experience; and he used to tell this one: A certain woman was very much attached to his ministry, but still a very foolish woman. She used to sit regularly on the pulpit stairs, and she did so for many years while Timothy East preached the Gospel. One thing seemed to shut her heart against all his appeals. She told a neighbor that if she had five minutes before she died, she so understood the way of salvation that she would get all right in her time. She told that minister that, and Timothy said to her, "Oh, that will never do. You may not have that five minutes in which to set things right. Be right at once." Singularly enough, one day, as Mr. East went down the street, a child came to him, and said, "Please, sir, come and see grandmother. Come and see grandmother." He turned in, and there was grandmother struck for death. She looked at him with an entreating glance, and said, "I am lost! I am lost!" She died there and then, ere Mr. East could say a word to her about her salvation. Dear friend, I do beseech you not to imitate her folly, but rather say to yourself, "There is but a step between me and death."

SPECIALLY TRUE.

II. But, dear friends, I now turn to further remark that to some this is specially true. Will you bear with me when I remark that to persons who have reached a ripe old age this is most certainly true? "There is but a step between me and death"? It is inevitable in the order of nature that you should not live long. Now, do not object to think about it and talk about it. It is only foolish persons who will not mention death. If you are all right with God, it can be no trouble to you to remember that as your years multiply, there must be so many the fewer in which you are to abide here below.

Those also have but a step between them and death who are touched with some incurable disorder. Some are warned that they have a heart complaint. If that be the case I may fairly say, "There is but a step between you and death." If you are consumptive, and are gradually melting away, you are in like case. What a blessing it is that this form of death gives us notice of its approach, and does not impair the mind, so that a person may calmly seek and find eternal life if that disease has marked him for its own! But there is only a step between the consumptive and death. Those who follow dangerous trades are in a similar condition. The traveller across the deep, the fisherman, the soldier, the miner, and others are frequently at death's door. I need not go into the details of all those various processes by which men earn their bread, which have so much danger about them that there is but a step between those who follow them and death.

Beside this, there are some—and probably some in this congregation—who, whether it be by disease or not, will die in the course of a few weeks. The probabilities, if they are calculated, will show that out of six or seven thousand persons gathered here, there are certainly some, beyond all guesswork, who will never pass into the next year. There is but a step between such and death.

GRAND INDIFFERENCE.

I should like you to be able to think about death. If you do not like to think about it at all, my dear friends, I think that there is something wrong in you, and you ought to take warning from your own dislike. He that is afraid of solemn things has probably solemn reason to be afraid of them. It is greatly wise to talk with our last hours. A man who is going to a certain place should think about the place to which he is going, and make some preparation for it. If he be a wise man he will do so. I should like you to attain to such a state that you could feel as Dr. Watts did. He said to a friend when he was an old man, "I go to my bed each night with perfect indifference as to whether I shall wake up in this world or the next." That is a beautiful state of mind to be in. Or, as the old Scotch minister said when some one asked him, "Is this disease of yours fatal?" and he replied, "I do not know, and I do not wish to know, for I do not think that it can make much difference to me; for if I go to heaven I shall be with God, and if I stop here God will be with me." Oh! is not that a sweet way of putting it? There is not so much difference, after all, between being with God and God's being with us.

III. I am to close by saying first, SUPPOSE IT IS NOT SO.

Young friends, you that are here, suppose it is not true that there is only a step between you and death. Suppose it is not so. There may be some here that will live to a very great age. I may be addressing some persons who will rival Sir Moses Montefiore. Possibly you may. Well, what then? If so, I should recommend you to follow the scriptural advice, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and His righteousness." The first thing should come first; the best things should have the best of our thoughts. A prince who had been warned of assassination, gaily exclaimed, "Serious things to-morrow"; but before to-morrow he was slain. Yet had he not been slain, his speech would have been an unwise one; for, however long we live, we ought not to push serious matters into a corner. If we are to live, let us live to noble purpose. It would be a great pity to lose a single year, much less a long life. If you are going to live a hundred years, begin them with God. If you are going to have long life, why not spend it for Him?

A CAPTAIN'S ADVICE.

There was a storm at sea once, and there was a young man on board who was not used to storms, and he fell into a great state of mind. He was not of much use on board the ship through his fears. He crept into a corner and knelt down to pray; but the captain, on coming along, could not stand that. He shouted, "Get up, you coward, say your prayers in fine weather." He did get up, saying to himself, "I only hope that I shall see fine weather to say my prayers in." When he landed, the words the captain said remained in his mind. He said, "That is quite correct, I will say my prayers in fine weather." I would say to you who hope to live a hundred years, say your prayers in fine weather. The young man was so impressed with those words that he went to hear the Gospel, was converted, and became a minister of Christ. One Sunday morning, while he was preaching in one of the most notable pulpits in New York, that captain came into the chapel, and the preacher looked him in the face and said, "Say your prayers in fine weather." The captain was astonished, as he perceived that the very man whom he had addressed as a coward was now preaching from the pulpit, and giving out at the commencement of his sermon the advice which he had given him. I trust the captain took his own medicine. I want to give that advice to all who do not think that they are going to die yet. Say your prayers in fine weather. Begin with God now.

Suppose that it is not true that there is but a step between you and death; nevertheless, while death is at a distance, health and strength furnish the best time for coming to Christ. Do not imagine that when you are ill and near to die, it will be the best time to turn. I remember the striking words of Philip Henry, the father of the famous Matthew Henry. When he was dying, his friends stood round about his bed, and he said, "What a blessing it is, Matthew, that I have not to make my peace with God now! My body is full of pain, and my mind is greatly disturbed by reason of it. Oh!" said he, "if that were undone and had now to be done, how could it be done?" What a mercy when that great transaction is complete!

That having to make our peace with God when we die is a poor business. I do not like the expression. I like far better the language of a poor bricklayer who fell from a scaffold, and was so injured that he was ready to die. The clergyman of the parish came, and said, "My dear man, I am afraid you will die. You had better make your peace with God." To the joy of the clergyman the man said, "Make my peace with God, sir? That was made for me upon Calvary's cross eighteen hundred years ago; and I know it." Ah! that is it—to have a peace that was made by the blood of Christ all those years ago—a peace that never can be broken.

IV. But now

SUPPOSE THAT IT IS SO.

Suppose that it is so, and suppose, as yet, that you have no good hope. Dear friend, there is a word that I would like to drop into your ear. If there is but a step between you and death, yet there is only a step between you and Jesus. There is only a step between you and salvation. God help you to take that step now. You know the description of the way to heaven: "Take the first on the right by the cross, and keep straight on." May you take that step to-night! It is not a step even; it is only a look.

"There is life in a look at the Crucified One."

Why delay it? Since faith in Christ will put you beyond danger, and will put you beyond the dominion of sin, so that you will live a godly life which shall continue to the end, why not believe in Jesus now?

Suppose that it is so, that you are soon to die; then set your house in order. Get everything ready with regard to your temporal affairs. Mind that. A world of sorrow comes through people not having made their wills. Have everything in order. Time the ship when a storm is expected. Be ready, for you are about to die. Now sit loose by all earthly things. You must assuredly part with them soon; do not hold them tightly. Set not your affection upon things on earth, or you will weep when you lose your idols. If you harbor any anger in your heart, turn it out directly, for you are going to die. If there is any quarrel between you and anybody else, go home and settle it. Whether you are going to live or die, I advise you to do that. Hold no ill-will to any one, for you are so soon to die.

A WIFE'S REMORSE.

I remember well the story of a husband who had grieved his wife. I do not know what had happened—some little awkward word or deed. He went out of the house. He had to fell timber that day, and he turned back and said, "Wife, I am very sorry. Let us part good friends. Give me a kiss." Alas, she turned away! All day long she sorrowed, for she loved him well, and she grieved to think that he was gone without that kiss of love. He never came back again alive. Four men brought him home a corpse. She would have given a thousand worlds if they had not parted so. Now, do not part with anybody that you love with any kind of tiffs or quarrellings. End all that, for death is near. If there is but a step between you and death—if the Judge is at the door—go and wind up your little difficulties. You that have family quarrels, wipe them out. You that have got any malice in your heart, turn it out.

Oh, if it is only a step between us and death, then you that are unprepared, it is only a step between you and hell! Escape, I pray you, by the living God. As you love your souls, flee for your lives, and lay hold on Christ.

A DEATH IN CHURCH.

But if you are in Christ, it is only a step between you and heaven. You may well desire that you might take that step right speedily. I shall never forget one summer afternoon, when I was preaching in a village chapel about the joys of heaven, that an elderly lady sitting on my right kept looking to me with intense delight. Some people's eyes greatly help the preacher. A telegraph goes on between us. She seemed to say to me, "Bless God for that. How I am enjoying it!" She kept drinking in the truth, and I poured out more and more precious things about the eternal kingdom and the sight of the Well-beloved, till I saw what I thought was a strange light pass over her face. I went on, and those eyes were still fixed on me. She sat still as a marble figure; and I stopped and said, "Friends, I think that you sister over there is dead." They said that it was even so, and they bore her away. She had gone. While I was telling of heaven, she had gone there; and I remember saying that I wished that it had been my case as well as hers. It was better not, perhaps, for many reasons; but oh, I did envy her!

I am always looking for the day when I shall see her again. I shall know those eyes, I am sure I shall. I shall recollect that face, if in heaven she is anything like what she was here, or bears any marks of identification. I shall not forget that inward fellowship which existed between a soul that stood with wings outspread for glory, and the poor preacher who was trying to talk of that which he knew but little of compared with her. Well, well, it will soon be my turn. Good-night, poor world! It will soon be your turn, and then you shall say, "Good-night." Let us meet in glory. Let us meet in glory, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

THE BOOK BUYER

has been doing a useful work during the year in keeping the public informed about the new books issued from month to month, and the current criticism of them. By its means people in the country with little leisure for visits to the city have been able to ascertain not only what books are being published, but what is the character of them, and what the great critics think of them. The Christmas number is now published, and it is a worthy consummation of the year's numbers, which is saying a great deal, as many of our readers know. It is profusely illustrated, and contains an excellent portrait of Frank R. Stockton, the author of "Rudder Grange" and other stories. One of the most interesting articles is from the pen of Lieutenant Greely, who graphically describes the first Christmas the explorers spent in the Arctic. With this article are a full-page picture of the settlement of Fort Conger, a picture of Lieutenant Greely's corner in the Fort, and portraits of two queer-looking four-footed pets of the party. Beside this there are articles by Julian Hawthorne, Hamilton Mabie, R. H. Stoddard, Eugene Schuyler, and others, and many engravings of great merit. Pp. 110; price, 10 cents. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

The bound volume of this excellent periodical, in which the children of thousands of homes in this country and England have found amusement and instruction every week of the year, is now issued. It contains all the numbers from November 4th, 1884, to October 27th, 1885, and makes an imposing volume. Parents who are concerned for the mental and moral well-being of their children find the necessity for increased vigilance every year in the matter of the literary food which the publishers provide for the young folks. A great deal of it is poison of the worst kind, giving false views of life, and instilling into the child's mind ideas which are certain to bear evil fruit in the life. Crimes are made to wear an attractive guise, and men are held up to admiration who, if such depraved creatures could ever exist ought to fall a prey to the hangman. Boys and girls who read such books are being tutored in the devil's school, and the temptations of life find them ready to fall easy victims. Yet children want books specially prepared for them, and there is a lack of books that will interest them while raising the moral tone. To any parent in search of such a book as a Christmas present to his child this volume may be recommended with confidence. Good, pure stories are there in abundance, scraps of historical information specially interesting to children, directions for the amateur carpenter, advice about keeping live pets, puzzles for the ingenious, excellent poetry, a Post Office Box in which children's letters are received and answered, and, above all, seven hundred excellent illustrations. The reading world is indebted to the publishers for many valuable productions of their press, but for none so useful or so beneficial in far-reaching influence as this powerful antidote to the pernicious publications which are sapping the morals of the rising generation. Pp. 832; price, $3.50. Published by Harper & Brothers.

MOUNTAIN ADVENTURES

in various parts of the world, selected from the narratives of celebrated travellers; with an introduction and additions by J. T. Headley. There is a fascination, which every one feels more or less, about achievements attended by danger to life and limb, and scarcely any are so thrilling as those of mountain-climbing. Every year, in spite of the numerous accidents that occur, parties are organized to ascend the very mountains on which others have lost their lives. Saussure, who was the first to climb to the summit of Mont Blanc, says that his eyes never rested upon the mountain without his feeling a painful impression. The desire to reach its summit became a mania with him which did not abate until his desire was accomplished. People who have no opportunity for indulging this love of mountain adventure, and people who are too timid to undertake it, will enjoy this collection of narratives. They are told with force and vividness. One shudders in reading such relations as that of Tyndall's of a Rescue from a Crevasse and Clarence King's Climbing a Precipice in the Sierra Nevada. A more pleasant story is that of the climbing of Mount Sinai, and that and the ascents of Lebanon and Ararat are deeply interesting to the Bible student. Mr. Headley's collection covers, as his title indicates, the mountains of both hemispheres, and he has ransacked the libraries of the world for his incidents. Pp. 356; price, $1. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

IMMORTALITY:

a Clerical Symposium on What are the Foundations of the Belief in the Immortality of Man. Like the symposium on Inspiration noticed some months ago in these columns, this is a series of papers which appeared originally in the Homiletic Magazine. They are contributed by some of the ablest theologians of the day, some of whom are noted as experts on this subject. Among them are the great preacher, Canon Knox-Little, of the Protestant Episcopal Church; Rev. Edward White, of the Congregational Church, the most prominent advocate of the doctrine of Conditional Immortality; the eminent Jewish Rabbi, Hermann Adler, Principal John Cairns, and Professor Stokes. It is probable that at some time or other every man who has looked upon the face of a dead friend has asked himself the old question propounded by the patriarch, "If a man die shall he live again?" We believe that he will; we know from the Bible that he will, and our inner consciousness affirms that he will; but at times doubts will arise that it is hard to satisfy. All who have ever felt them should read this book. It is remarkable how men differing so widely from each other, starting from different standpoints, and moving on different lines of thought, arrive at the same conclusion. Pp. 259; price, $1.50. Published by Thomas Whittaker, 2 Bible House, New York.

PRAYER TOPICS.

The International Committee of Young Men's Christian Associations has recently issued a little book entitled "Prayer Meeting Topics for 1886," containing over three hundred subjects, with appropriate Scripture references. These topic books have been issued regularly every year since 1877, and have proved very helpful and suggestive to the associations, as well as to many pastors and other Christian workers. The books are sold at cost price—five cents per copy—and they can be obtained by addressing the International Committee, Twenty-third Street and Fourth Avenue, New York City.

KING MILAN OF SERBIA.

MILAN OBRENOVITCH, King of Serbia, was born August 10th, 1854, and is therefore now thirty-one years of age. He succeeded to the throne, in 1868, on the death of his predecessor, Michael Obrenovitch, who was assassinated by the Karageorgevitchs, or descendants of Black George, who are the hereditary pretenders to the throne. When Milan was called to the supreme rule Serbia was only a principality, and he was proclaimed as Prince Milan IV. He was then only fourteen years old, and was being educated in Paris. He at once proceeded to Serbia, where a regency composed of three leading statesmen was appointed to govern during his minority. On August 22d, 1872, he was crowned Prince in the Cathedral of Belgrade, at the age of eighteen. He was then under the suzerainty of Turkey, but in 1876 he joined arms with Bosnia and Herzegovina in an effort to throw off the Turkish yoke. Russia, at first secretly, and afterward openly, took part in the struggle, which finally ended in the defeat of Turkey. The English Government under Lord Beaconsfield interfered to prevent the collapse of Turkey, and at the Congress of Berlin a treaty was framed which, among other settlements, declared the independence of Serbia, and defined its boundaries. Prince Milan during the conflict anticipated this result, and had himself proclaimed King. He was crowned on March 3d, 1882, by the title of King Milan I.

The King of Serbia is about five feet eleven in height, and very strongly built; he has black hair and eyes and a swarthy complexion; his face is broad, and when his features are at rest he is rather a handsome man. His Majesty appears ill at ease in public, and his eyes dart furtively, like those of an animal expecting the approach of a hunter. This is doubtless due to the fact that his predecessor was assassinated, and that he himself has had one narrow escape from the same death. It was on October 23d, 1882, when, leaving the Cathedral of Belgrade with the Queen, that a lady in the crowd of spectators fired a pistol at him, but missed him. She was a widow, her husband having been executed for taking part in a conspiracy.

King Milan was married on the 17th of October, 1875, to the Princess Natalie, daughter of a Russian colonel. She is the most beautiful of all the royal ladies of Europe; she is above the middle height, with an elegantly moulded form, black eyes and hair, a brunette complexion, almost faultless features, and a manner that wins its way at once to the hearts of all whom Her Majesty endeavors to please. Dressed in a long trailing robe of black velvet, the Queen of Serbia would grace the proudest court in Christendom. Two children have been born to their Majesties; the eldest, born August 14th, 1876, was named Alexander, after the Emperor Alexander II. of Russia, who was godfather to the young Prince; the younger, born two years later, only lived a few days after his birth.

THE SERBIAN INVASION.

The attack of Serbia on Bulgaria last month was one of the most unjustifiable outrages on record. The union achieved between Bulgaria and Roumelia was no injury to Serbia, but immediately it was consummated Serbia became restive. A fit of jealousy at the increased power of its neighbor was fomented by Austria, who had purposes of her own to serve, and had no objection to acting the part of the monkey who used the cat's paw to pick the chestnuts out of the fire. Prince Alexander of Bulgaria endeavored to disarm the hostility of Serbia, and sent an envoy with friendly assurances to Belgrade. The king, however, refused to receive him, and declared war.

The illustration on page 812 depicts the setting out, on November 14th, of the advanced column of the Serbian army on its fratricidal mission. King Milan evidently supposed that, with such an army as he had under his command, he could easily overcome the Bulgarians and secure such a slice of territory as would counter-balance the accession Bulgaria had gained in Roumelia. The event proved that he was mistaken, and that not only he, but all the military critics of Europe had underestimated the prowess of the Bulgarians. Ten days after the Serbian army had set foot in Bulgaria it returned ingloriously with Prince Alexander behind it in hot pursuit. Austria interfered for the protection of her protégé, and the Bulgarian victor was obliged to hold his hand while King Milan gathered his troops together to protect himself and his capital from the storm he had provoked.

THE WORN-OUT TAP.

"I WISH I'd got all the good stuff that has run through that," said Caleb Smith to his friend Wilford, holding out as he spoke a tap somewhat the worse for wear, which had been sent to him for repairs.

"You would not have much, then," said Wilford, who had made a snug little fortune in business, and was now making it larger by farming. He was a strong temperance man, though in his younger days he had been a hard drinker. A sharp illness, not unlike delirium tremens, which prostrated him before he was twenty-five, worked his cure, and when he rose from his bed it was with a fixed resolve, from which he never wavered, to taste liquor no more. He was a good-humored man, and when he came into his old business haunts a joke about his total abstinence principles was always in order.

"Not have much!" repeated Smith; "I guess I should. Just look how the metal is eaten away. It took many a hundred dollars worth to do that. You cold-water fellows don't know the cost of it."

"You said you wished you had all the good stuff that had run through it, my lad," said Wilford. "No good stuff ever went through that, unless they ran water through it sometimes to wash it, and that would not make you richer."

There was a laugh in the shop at Caleb's expense when the retort was made, but he was not silenced by that.

"I say it was good stuff," he said; "it sells for good money, and it was genuine, as you can see by the tap. It was brandy did that. Here, smell it; it'll do you good to have a whiff, as you never get a taste."

"And you wish you'd got the stuff, do you? Well, if you had it, and drank it, it's odd to me if your stomach didn't become as porous as that tap. Stuff that'll eat away metal like that will make short work of the coats of the stomach, you may depend."

"Oh, that's your prohibition nonsense! You know as well as I do that lots of men drink it every day, and live to be old men."

"Not in the way you are talking of. A few live in spite of it, but it's a slow poison all the same. Why, Sir William Gull, one of the best physicians across the water, gave his solemn testimony, not long ago, that people are dying every day poisoned by the stuff who don't know it. They die from disease, he says, but it's the liquor that kills them. If they had not drunk that they would recover from the disease. But you don't need a doctor's opinion when you have got that tap in your hand. Then you add on to that the money it costs, and the money you lose while you're drinking, and the loss of character by the foolish things you do and the wicked things you will do some time or other when you're drunk, and you'll find the bill a big one to foot."

"I don't want a temperance lecture," said Smith. "I was a fool to start you on your hobby."

"No, I guess you don't. You don't like to be shown that you are doing a silly thing. But I don't want to make you angry. What you do is no business of mine; but if I were in your place I'd take that porous valve home and hang it up on the wall where I could see it, and every time I felt like having some rum I would look at it. You know what it would say to you if it could speak."

THE SILVER LINING.

A SERIAL STORY.

A Difficult Quest.

IT was difficult for Dr. Arnold and his wife to see a silver lining to the dark cloud which was stretched across their sky by the tragic death of their son. In their inmost hearts they knew that for some wise purpose God had permitted the trial to come upon them, but in the early days of their sorrow they could only trust that it was so. To the eye of sense the calamity was without one mitigating feature. It was possible—and they clung convulsively to the thought—that Frank had not committed suicide. In using the drug medicinally he might have taken more than he knew, and possibly in his mental distraction might have forgotten his fatal potency. But even if that were so they could have no hope, knowing well that except a man be born again he cannot enter the kingdom of God. Unhappily, Frank had given too many evidences that he had not undergone that change for them to cherish delusive hopes, and they mourned for him as David mourned for Absalom.

On Kate Arnold, too, the blow fell heavily, and for a time she also was prostrated by her grief. But she recovered more easily than her parents, and her first thoughts were practical ones. For Frank himself nothing more could be done; but with an intense yearning she longed to do something for his unhappy wife. A vivid recollection was with her of that day at home when she had promised Clare to be a sister to her, and she had an instinctive perception that she must now be in urgent need of sisterly love. The first thing to be done was to find her, and that she alone was unable to accomplish. It was necessary to enlist her father's help, and she had the less reluctance in doing this, because she was convinced that he needed occupation. At home his patients would have diverted his mind from his trouble, but in New York he had nothing to do but sit and brood over it. After several efforts Kate succeeded in arousing him to an interest in his daughter-in-law. He discussed with her the best ways of finding her, and at length he agreed to visit the police headquarters and obtain the help of the department in the quest.

Dr. Arnold was courteously received by the Superintendent of Police, who listened attentively while he explained the object of his visit.

"Have you a picture of the lady?" was his first question.

"We have not one with us, and I have searched carefully through my son's effects, but cannot find one. I suppose he must have destroyed any that he had when the unpleasantness occurred."

"Then the next best thing is to give us the clearest description you can of her, and we will see what can be done. It is possible that some of our men may have track of her. I know that a search was made, because she was wanted to give evidence at your son's trial, but the search would be dropped when he died. It may be, however, that some clues were obtained that it is not too late to follow up. I will have your description of her taken down, and if you will come in again to-morrow, I will let you know what has been done. In the mean time perhaps you may obtain some clue yourself that may help us to her track. This is a large city for a blind hunt."

Dr. Arnold described Clare as well as he was able, but as he well knew there must be many ladies in the city to whom his description would apply as closely as to Clare. He went back to his hotel with a sad heart, realizing how little prospect there was of the search on which Kate had set her heart terminating in success.

"Well, papa," said that young lady as he entered, "has your official friend been able to help us?"

"He is not sanguine, my dear. But he will make inquiries, and I shall see him again to-morrow. The clues we can give him are so very slight. The fact is, that when I was asked to describe the unhappy woman I could not distinctly recall her to my mind. I have a vague idea that she was beautiful, that she had hair very closely resembling your own, and in that other respects she was much like you."

"And that was how you described her? It seems not unlikely that if I should go out without your escort I may receive inconvenient attention from some zealous policeman. You should have taken me with you, papa, as I wanted you to do. I could have given a clearer description of her than that."

"I wished that you had been there, Kate, when I was answering the questions, or, rather, confessing that I could not answer them. If you are still willing to go, you shall accompany me to-morrow."

"Certainly I am, papa. I am anxious to go. The New York police are not ogres, that one need be nervous at meeting them."

"I do not think you will find it a pleasant experience, Kate," said her mother, who had been silently listening. Her face was very sad, and there were new lines across her forehead and a strained look about her eyes which showed how deeply her son's tragic death had wounded her.

"Do you still think it wise to persist in the search? Frank's wife has been indirectly the cause of all this trouble. Had she been true to him he might have been living now."

"We do not know that she was untrue, dear mother. I firmly believe that she was faithful. I have no grounds for the belief, but I have that impression, and until it is proved otherwise, should we not believe her innocent?"

"I cannot believe any wife innocent who leaves her husband's home and remains away from him in his trouble," said Mrs. Arnold.

"Especially when poor Frank was the husband."

"Papa has spoiled you for exercising the wisdom and impartiality of a judge, mother. Frank and papa were very different. I would be the last to say a word against the poor fellow, but even you must admit that at times he could say things that were very exasperating. You know, too, that in his letter to us he admitted that he had used expressions that his wife had understood as implying that she was a burden to him."

"I know, my dear, I know. Poor Frank had many faults; and he often said that he did not mean. His wife should have borne with him as she promised to do at the altar. Nothing that he could say would justify her in leaving him. I am afraid that if you find her at all, you will see that she has been living a vicious life since she left him. She struck me as being exceedingly shallow, and with little principle or womanly delicacy."

"Even so, mother, I am anxious to find her. If she is lost to virtue she is worth saving. There is the more need to seek diligently in that case; but I saw more of her than you did, and I am persuaded that she is a better woman than you think her. Dear mother, I promised her solemnly that I would be a sister to her. I would keep my promise to the uttermost. If she has become depraved I would try to redeem her."

"Bless you, my dear, and may God prosper you in your compassion. Do not think I am hard because I love my daughter, and would spare her trial and unpleasantness in what, I fear, is a vain undertaking."

"There, Kate," said her father, "now you have your commission signed and may proceed to business. It is your own undertaking. I am of your mother's opinion, that it will end in disappointment; but you shall have all my help. I do not know that I should agree if we were at liberty to return home, but as we have to wait for Helen and this young vagabond who wants to climb over my household-fence and steal one of my lambs, we cannot do better than spend our time in looking for the poor wanderer. You are in command, Kate, and I shall act as your lieutenant. That is an arrangement you have always longed for, I think, as many self-satisfied young ladies do."

"I am thankful for your help, papa. I could do nothing without you. I will forgive you your implied reflection on my humility, and you shall share my glory if we succeed, which is more than many lieutenants are allowed to do."

"Then to-morrow morning we will hold a council of war, and then interview our friend the Chief of Police, and arrange a regular plan of the campaign. Now we will ask God's guidance, and beg Him who sees the end from the beginning, and knows just where the erring woman now is, to bless our effort."

Perhaps at no time is the help of God so earnestly sought and human dependence upon Him so sincerely acknowledged as when in absolute darkness, without any indications to follow, a man enters upon some undertaking of moment. When human sight and reason are at fault we instinctively turn to Him who is omniscient and all-wise. Dr. Arnold had been accustomed all his life to do this, and it was with a faith strengthened by long experience that he turned to God for help. No man could have more contempt than he for the attitude which waits for a voice from heaven, nor for the practice of using the Bible as a charm, to be opened at random, and the first passage that strikes the eye accepted as a special guidance in a particular emergency; but he had a strong faith in prayer and Providence. He held that God endowed men with reason that they might use it, and believed that if they chose to lay it aside and act unreasonably, they were dishonoring their Maker by not using the gifts He had imparted. But that God would lead him through those gifts he did believe, and that night he prayed earnestly that in their effort to seek and save the lost one they might act wisely and be led to use the right means.

"Now, General," he said, playfully, to his daughter, as they met the next morning, "what are the orders for the day?"

"Do you think the hospital doctors would allow us to see Mr. Greville, papa? It is possible we might get some light from him if he is able to talk. The more information we can give to the police the better are our chances of success."

"Wisely said," replied Dr. Arnold, with a mock-military salute. "We will visit the hospital before we wait upon the official. Mamma is suffering from a headache, and will remain in her room until we return to dinner. I will make friends for her with the chambermaid, and then we will rally forth."

Kate was delighted with her father's energetic and cheerful manner, and congratulated herself that already the secondary object which she had in undertaking this search was achieved. She had hoped that in enlisting her father's sympathies and occupying his mind with the difficult problem his sorrow over Frank's untimely end might be relieved. It was far better for him that, even if the search ended in failure, it should be made, rather than, having no occupation, and no patients to visit, he should brood over the sorrow, and suffer useless misery. With Mrs. Arnold nothing could be done directly. Her sorrow was too bitter, and her energies were paralyzed; but if Dr. Arnold's cheerfulness could be restored, his wife could not long resist his influence. It was therefore with encouragement that Kate noticed a resumption in some slight degree of her father's playful badinage with herself.

At the hospital the visitors were cordially received, and were informed that Mr. Greville had so far recovered that an interview of moderate proportions might be had without danger to him.

"I am glad to meet you," the sick man said, as Dr. Arnold and his daughter were taken to his bedside and introduced to him. "I understand you have been to see me before, Dr. Arnold, but I have no recollection of your visit. I must have been too ill to be conscious of it."

"I thank God, Mr. Greville," said the doctor, "that you were not too ill to relieve my terrible anxiety."

"Yes, I have heard of that. Would to God I had been able to do it earlier, it might have saved your son's life. That was truly sad; indeed, it has been a sad affair from the beginning. I have thought much of it since I have been lying here. If I ever get up from this bed I think my life will be a very different one. That very night when I was struck down I was meditating upon it, and I think I saw it in a new light. It has been an idle, useless life hitherto, but by God's help it shall be something better in future. But I am running on about myself when, perhaps, I might be doing something to serve you. The doctors muzzle me still, and I must not waste my words on my own affairs when they may be needed for a better use. Can I do anything for you, Dr. Arnold?"

"You are very good; it is possible you may be able to help us. My daughter here has set her heart on finding her sister-in-law. We knew but little of her, for the only time that we saw her was during a brief visit that she paid us with my unhappy son before they sailed for America. But Miss Arnold was drawn to her, and now that she is probably in trouble, she would help her if possible, but we cannot find her."

Dr. Arnold, of course, was acquainted with Frank's belief respecting Mr. Greville's perfidy. He had listened to the story in the Tombs, and every word was graven on his mind, but looking down on that frank, open face, he could not bring himself to believe that he was talking to a vicious man. Whether guilty or innocent, however, Greville probably held in his hand the clue to the mystery, and it was prudent to speak to him without implying his guilt.

"I fear I can do little to aid you and your generous daughter, Dr. Arnold," Mr. Greville said. "I do not know where Mrs. Arnold is. I have tried to have her traced since I have been able to think and talk, but she seems to have disappeared completely. A friend of mine, who is very capable in such matters, has done his utmost on my behalf to discover her, and I am told that the police sought her on other grounds, but did not succeed. I would spare neither labor nor money to find her."

"In the event of your having been successful, Mr. Greville, what would you have done? I do not wish to exercise a curiosity which would be impertinent, but you will understand me when I say that my son informed me of the circumstances in which he last saw Mrs. Arnold."

"I understand you perfectly, Dr. Arnold. Your son made a deplorable mistake. I will tell you all the circumstances some day. I suppose I am a blunderer. At any rate, I blundered in that matter most abominably. Though even now, with my later knowledge, I do not see how I could have acted more wisely than I did. I cannot tell you all now, but I will ask you to take my word for the present that I acted honorably toward your son and his wife, and that when he thought I was injuring him I was really doing my utmost, in a clumsy fashion, to promote his happiness."

"Just one word more, Mr. Greville," said Dr. Arnold, "for I am on my honor as a physician not to overtax your strength, and I see I am approaching the limit. Do you wish me to understand that your relations with my son's unhappy wife were those of an honorable gentleman?"

"Most assuredly, Dr. Arnold," said the sick man, with much emphasis. "Your son wholly misunderstood me, as I think he misunderstood his wife. She was a faithful wife I am sure, and though, perhaps, not very wise, she was innocent of wrong toward him. I can comprehend his doubts, and can excuse him for suspecting evil in circumstances which certainly looked compromising; but, Dr. Arnold, on my honor as a gentleman, he was mistaken. If I can help you to find her I shall be glad. Why, the friend of whom I spoke, who is seeking her on my behalf, is a clergyman."

"Thank you for that assurance, Mr. Greville. You have relieved my mind of a great load. I place the fullest confidence in your statement. My daughter, too, has her own reasons for being obliged to you. She is a self-opinionated young lady, and as she was in a minority of one in the family conclave as a champion of Mrs. Arnold's innocence, you have come to her support in a way that, I am afraid, will tend to increase her self-esteem."

"I do thank you very much, Mr. Greville," said Kate, smiling. "I felt sure I was right, but until now I had more doubts than I confessed."

"I am glad to be able to confirm your faith in your sex, Miss Arnold," said Mr. Greville, "and I wish I could assist you in your search. I can, however, give you the address of the clergyman who has been making inquiries, and he will be able to help you far better than I could."

Dr. Arnold made a note of the address, and then insisted that not another word should be spoken to the sufferer. Promising that he should be kept acquainted with the progress of their quest, the father and daughter went their way with renewed hope and courage.

At that very moment, in a house not many blocks distant, she whom they sought was lying faint and panting, her limbs bruised, and her hair dishevelled, putting forth all her remaining strength to keep from her lips the drugged liquor which a degraded woman, a traitress to her sex, was forcing upon her.

POWER BELONGETH UNTO GOD.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 27, Ps. 62, 5-11. Golden Text, ver. 11. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Power a Universal Want—Various Kinds of Power—The Christian's Power Outside of Him—The Connection of the Power and Feebleness—The Imparting of the Power—The Power of a Loom—Power for Family Difficulties—For the Use of Spiritual Gifts—For Service—How Power Comes.

"POWER BELONGETH UNTO GOD." If every man believed this the universal cry for power which goes up from the more active, earnest-hearted of the children of God would be turned into songs of thanksgiving, because to them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ [is] "the Power of God and the Wisdom of God." The natural heart of man loves power. Look at the eager politician, the grasping money-maker, the earnest student, the eloquent preacher, even the vain, worldly beauty—that which they all value is power. But the child of God, whose life is divine, is strangely divided from all these from the very fact that their power is resident in them, it is something which they can feel, dispose of, and master, while the power of the Christian's life is not resident in them, and is not at their disposal or subject to their will. Called to a supernatural life, the life of God manifest in the flesh, the Christian seeks in vain to produce it from human resources, "power belongeth unto God." Before a man can deny or ignore himself, before he can love, not simply tolerate his enemies, before he can learn to "resist not evil," a power greater than his natural instincts must be at work; not a power which he possesses, but

him. And this exceeding greatness of God's power is now, at the present moment, "to usward who believe, according to the working of His mighty power, which He wrought in Christ when He raised Him from the dead."

But the question for each of us is, How shall the connection be established between God's power and our feebleness? When Jesus ascended into heaven and directed His apostles to tarry at Jerusalem until they were endued with power from on high, and assured them, "Ye shall receive power after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you" (Luke 24: 49; Acts 1: 8). He never meant that they were to become masters of the Holy Ghost, to use Him how they would. When on the day of Pentecost the power came, they did not command the power, but the power commanded them; they spake as the Spirit gave them utterance, and with one sweep of the sickle three thousand souls were harvested. They only yielded up themselves without reserve, and then the Holy Ghost used them as instruments. Did they feel strong? Paul says, "When I am weak then am I strong." . . . I glory in my infirmities [weaknesses]

THAT THE POWER OF CHRIST

may rest upon me" (11 Cor. 12: 9, 10). I once went into a cotton factory, and did so admire the wonderful way in which the looms worked, the pattern growing moment by moment, as though by magic, there seemed to be such cleverness in those looms and such power. But the weaver strung a little band from one wheel on to another, and the loom stood powerless, the work was stopped. Why? Because the connection with the motive power was cut off. Our strength lies in our connection with the living God by simple faith. And faith itself is nothing we feel, or produce, or manufacture; it is simple letting go all into the hands of Almighty. "My soul, wait thou only upon God; for my expectation is from Him." If any power to overcome sin, any power to pray, any power to win souls, were resident in us, we would not say to our souls, "Wait thou only upon Him," for our expectation would be in part from ourselves.

Many of us are not prominent workers, and yet how we feel our need of power!

FAMILY DIFFICULTIES

arise; the wife seems possessed by a spirit of contrariness, and no explanation or reasoning will make her see things as they are. Who is to overcome her? God. The power to overcome an obstinate spirit dwells in Him. Then, dear husband, don't be vexed, don't pity yourself, but commit your cause into the safe, faithful hands of the living God, and all will be well. Or is it the husband who has become reckless, and who through speculation is rushing on like a gambler to ruin, and is the Christian wife urging, entreating, arguing, and all in vain? Sister, be still: the power to overcome that man belongeth unto God, not unto you. Put the whole matter into His hands, and He will find means to honor your faith. Only cease to look upon the trial as being between you and your husband, retire from the scene, and by faith let it be a matter between God and your husband, your case abandoned to Him in whom is all power, both in heaven and in earth. Cease to expect anything from your husband, and expect all from God; wait only upon Him, and if you catch yourself thinking how hard the trial is for you, and a wounded feeling toward your husband springs up in your heart, take that again to Jesus, and let Him deal with it. He permitted the trial, and He makes all things work together for good to them that love God; it can't be good and evil at the same time, so look up through your tears and praise Him. While the least feeling of resentment remains, you are taking up your own cause, and so keeping it out of the hands of God. There is for you more tenderly than you care for yourself and self-pity cuts you off, while it lasts, from the inflow of God's compassion; He cannot mix yours with His, the selfish with the pure. His way of deliverance may be all unexpected, but He leadeth by "a right way." And then He knows how to replace bitterness with love, and make your heart one well-spring of love to the one who injures you. And it is thus in all relations of life between parent and child, brother and brother, sister and sister, master and pupil, mistress and servant, etc.; power, the power to set all the wrong things right, "belongeth unto God."

And thus it is also in the exercise of spiritual gifts; the power to use them is not with the individual. Speaking of the gifts of prophecy, healing, faith, miracles, Paul says: "But all these worketh that one and the selfsame Spirit" (1 Cor. 12: 11). The Worker of these gifts is the Holy Ghost. No man can prophesy except the Holy Ghost makes use of him; no man can heal another except as God the Spirit makes use of him; no man can teach to any purpose except as the Spirit teaches through him; no man can pray to any purpose except as he prays "in the Holy Ghost" (Jude 20). "Power belongeth unto God." If any man possessed healing power in himself apart from the Holy Ghost, and were to heal any of the Lord's sick ones, he might do them the greatest injury, for the body might be healed at the expense of the soul, as the children of Israel were fed with flesh in the wilderness—"He gave them their request, but sent leanness into their soul" (Ps. 106: 15).

But oh, how many there are who cry to God continually for

and who imagine that a wonderful feeling of power will come upon them which will compel sinners to bow before them, and to feel the might of the words they utter. But were this idea realized it would be that power belongeth unto them. God loves souls a thousand times more than we do; He does not want to have a regiment of self-conscious, self-satisfied workers, who rejoice in their own zeal and in the to despise those who are not equal to them. No, He wants empty vessels who can rejoice that He "so loved the world," that He goes out to seek the lost; such as never leave the impression of themselves behind them, but always the impression of Jesus; such as, when they leave the room, make people feel as though somehow there were less of God in the room.

A great deal of the cry for power is from a desire to satisfy ourselves as to our earnestness. "I want to feel that I have the same love for souls as I see you have," said a Christian to one of the Lord's evangelists. "Love for souls," was the answer, "I don't know anything about my love for souls. I know Jesus loved them to the death, and I know if they would let Him, He would save them all." What made the power of the Apostle Paul? Let him answer: "To me to live is Christ." "Not I, but Christ liveth in me." "Christ, the Power of God, and the Wisdom of God." What made Joseph a power in Potiphar's house and in the prison? "The Lord was with Joseph" (Gen. 39: 2, 21). What made Moses bold to stand before Pharaoh? "Certainly I will be with thee" (Ex. 3: 12). What made the timid Gideon a mighty man of valor? "Surely I will be with thee" (Judges 6: 16). What made Elijah bold to ask for the resurrection of the dead and that fire should come down from heaven? "The Lord God of Israel before whom I stand" (1 Kings 17: 1). God gives us no provision of power to hold in ourselves, but He unites our feebleness to His Almightyness and counts both one—"I in them and Thou in Me."

HOW POWER COMES.

But if power, unlimited power, belongeth unto God, and God is "not ashamed to be called our God" (Heb. 11: 16), how can we be cast down about anything? How is it that we are not always praising our glorious God? Surely because we are not occupied with Him but with ourselves. If we were steady in our faith, what might we not claim of blessing for the heathen and for the masses of sinners in our own Christian lands? But God would have us "faithful in that which is least" that we may learn to be faithful in much. If we learn to count on the power of God day by day in every little thing, the Lord will enlarge our horizon and unite us with Him in His purposes of blessing to thousands of souls. Elijah had to claim God's power and rest upon it to feed him by the brook-side; he had to trust the Lord in the widow's house, there alone and unseen to claim and witness the power of the living God, and there was made the instrument of that power before all Israel, and in giving the first deadly blow to the worship of Baal. The Lord bring us into the right relation to His mighty power!

MY CROSS.

It is not heavy, agonizing woe,
Bearing me down with hopeless, crushing weight,
No ray of comfort in the gathering gloom,
A heart bereaved, a low-souled desolate.

It is not sickness, with her withering hand,
Keeping me low upon my knees in pain;
Longing each morning for the weary night,
At night, for weary day to come again.

It is not poverty, with chilling blast,
The spoken eye, the hunger-wasted form;
The dour ones' pelting for lack of bread,
With no safe shelter from the winter's storm.

It is not slander, with her evil tongue;
'Tis not "presumptuous sin" against my God;
Not reputation lost, or friends betrayed;
That such is not my cross I thank thee, Lord.

Mine is a daily cross of petty cares,
Of little duties pressing on my heart,
Of little troubles hard to reconcile,
Of inward struggles, overcome in part.

My feet are weary in their daily rounds,
My heart is weary of its daily care,
My soul is weary of its daily rebel;
I pray for grace my daily cross to bear.

It is not heavy, Lord, yet oft I pine;
It is not heavy, but 'tis ever here;
By day and night each hour my cross I bear,
I dare not lay it down: Thou laidst it there.

I would not lay it down. I only ask That, taking up my daily cross, I may Follow my Master, humbly, step by step,
Through clouds and darkness, unto perfect day.

DR. ADONIRAM JUDSON—GEN. PRENDERGAST—Scene in Burmah.

THE REV. ADONIRAM JUDSON, D.D.

Birth and Early Characteristics—Becomes an Unbeliever—Alarming Death of an Infidel Friend—Joins Andover Seminary—Conversion—Resolution to be a Missionary—Early Difficulties—Capture and Imprisonment in France—Appointment to India or Burmah—Marriage—Arrival at Calcutta—Settlement at Rangoon—Labors and Successes—Long Imprisonment at Ava—Mrs. Judson's Devotion—His Release and Her Death—Translation of the Bible—Visit to America—Return to Burmah—Illness and Death.

The name of Burmah, now prominent in the newspapers by reason of the British expedition to that country, has associations very dear to the heart of an American Christian. It was the scene of one of the grandest and noblest lives of self-sacrifice on record in the Christian Church—the land in which Adoniram Judson lived and labored and died.

Adoniram Judson was born on the 9th of August, 1788, at Malden, Mass., where his father was pastor of a Congregational church. He was taught to read by his mother when only three years old, and learned with such facility that he was able to read a chapter of the Bible to his father before the latter was aware that he knew the alphabet. Like a great many able and eminent men whose lives have been devoted to one grand purpose, Adoniram, as a boy, was jovial and excitable, full of spirits, and a leader in fun. When he was fourteen years old he was prostrated for more than a twelvemonth by a serious attack of illness, and on his recovery his thoughts began to be occupied with extravagant schemes of distinguishing himself in the world. In what line he should so distinguish himself he could not then decide.

EARLY SCEPTICISM.

Adoniram entered college at the age of sixteen, and applied himself very closely to his studies, seldom giving himself any respite, even during the holidays. He was ambitious to excel, and a classmate says of him that he has no recollection of his ever failing or even hesitating in recitation. He had a powerful rival in his friend, John Bailey, who was afterward member of Congress from Massachusetts, and that probably added zest to his ambition. It was at the period we are now writing of that French infidelity invaded the New England States and swept over the land like a flood. To doubt every orthodox doctrine, and to examine every belief from a hostile standpoint was then considered by the students the duty of a man of spirit. Young Judson was fascinated by the boldness of the sceptics, and soon began to question the verities of religion. His guide and most intimate friend at this time was young E—, a student in the class above him, a young man of brilliant talents, considerable learning, and ready wit. Under his tutelage Judson made rapid progress in his departure from the faith, and by the end of his college course was a confirmed unbeliever.

After a brief sojourn at home, where his atheistical opinions distressed his godly father, he started out for an excursion. In the course of his travels he found himself one night, as darkness was closing in, in a village in the western part of New York State. He entered the village inn and engaged a bed. The inn was a poor frame structure, and the partitions were thin. Judson was kept awake nearly all night by the groans and cries of a dying man in the next room. At last they ceased, and Judson fell asleep. In the morning he asked after the sufferer. "He is dead," said the hotel-keeper. "Poor fellow, he was a fine young man, just graduated at Providence College." "What was his name?" "Mr. E—," said the hotel-keeper. Judson rushed up-stairs to the room, and there, lying pallid and cold in death, was his own admired college friend. He was horror-stricken, and high above his doubts his conscience cried, "Lost! Lost!"

A FIERCE CONFLICT.

Several weeks of fierce spiritual conflict ensued. His perverted reason told the young man that the Bible and Christianity were false. His spiritual perception and his conscience told him that they were true, and warned him that he would reject them at his peril. He resolved to give himself wholly to the settlement of this momentous question, and, that he might get the strongest light available upon it, he went to Andover Theological Seminary and sought the help of the learned professors there. His mental doubts were satisfied, and on December 2d he publicly avowed himself a believer, and on December 28th, 1808, he was received into his father's church.

It was not in the nature of the man to be idle after such an experience. The power that was in him dominated all his being and claimed every power—physical, mental and spiritual—for God. With apostolic fervor the consecration was made, and from that time forward Adoniram Judson lived for one object only, and, holding not his life dear to him, gave himself without reserve to the service of Christ. It is of such ardent natures that heroes are made. What sphere they are in depends on the power that possesses them. Sometimes, like Joan of Arc, they fight in the battle-field to deliver their country, sometimes in political life, like Wilberforce, they fight the battle of the oppressed, sometimes in the Church, like Luther and Wycliffe, they contend for spiritual emancipation; but always they are alike in dedicating themselves, their possessions, their time, and all their powers to the cause they espouse. Adoniram Judson was a soldier of the Cross, and the service most likely to attract him was that of some forlorn hope in which there would be for himself danger and self-sacrifice, and for his Lord all the glory. Such a service Judson recognized in the foreign mission field. Efforts were made to dissuade him. A brilliant position was offered him in the co-pastorate with Dr. Griffin of the largest church in Boston. But all without avail. He would preach the Gospel to the heathen—the pleasant and honorable duties at home were not for such as he.

A MISSIONARY.

In 1810 the path of the aspirant for service in heathen lands was more difficult than it is now. There was no Foreign Mission Board in this country, and in England the cause was in its infancy. Judson and a few other young men, whom his zeal had stirred up, presented themselves at the conference of Congregational ministers then in session at Bradford, Mass., and asked to be sent out on the Lord's service. A committee was appointed to see what could be done toward raising funds, and Judson was deputed to go to England and ascertain whether, if the American fund failed, the London Missionary Society would render aid. He set sail for England without delay, and on his voyage was initiated into the perils of the career he had chosen.

The packet in which he sailed for England was captured by a French privateer, and after severe hardships and wearying delays, including a protracted detention in France, he was allowed to proceed to England in May, 1811. Somebody has described his personal appearance at that time: "He was small and exceedingly delicate in figure, with a round, rosy face which gave him the appearance of extreme youthfulness. His hair and eyes were of a dark shade of brown, in his French passport described as chestnut. His voice, however, usually took his listeners by surprise."

Mr. Judson received a promise of support from the London Society in case of failure from the American Board, and returned home in August. But before long it was discovered that foreign aid was not required, for the first difficulties were safely overcome, and the American Board appointed Mr. Judson and his colleagues to labor in some Asiatic field—

INDIA OR BURMAH—

as the Holy Spirit might be pleased to direct. Before setting out Mr. Judson married. "You had better be a dog," some one has said who spoke from experience, "than the wife of a literary man;" but what must it be to be the wife of a missionary! Nevertheless the spirit of self-sacrifice is not confined to the male sex. A noble, devoted, Christian lady—Miss Ann Haseltine—to whom Judson offered himself, joyfully consented to share the hardships and privations of his life, and they were married. Right faithfully did she fulfill her engagement, and in doing so paid the penalty of death.

The facilities of travel were then few, and delays unavoidable. It was not until June 17th, 1812, two years after the memorable meeting at Bradford, that the devoted missionary and his wife landed in Calcutta. During the voyage to India Mr. and Mrs. Judson changed their views about baptism, and they were re-baptized in Calcutta in the September following their arrival. That severed their connection with the Congregational Board, and threw them, for the means of support, on the Baptist churches at home. The latter responded promptly and generously to the appeal.

The missionaries were warmly welcomed at Calcutta, or rather at the adjoining Dutch settlement of Serampore, by the venerable Dr. Carey, who had gone out to India from England in 1793. So discouraging were the reports from Burmah that they decided to labor in India, but they were peremptorily forbidden to do so by the agent of the East India Company, who then was in supreme control. Thus deprived of choice in the matter, they went on board a rickety old vessel bound for Rangoon, a seaport of Burmah, where they arrived on the 13th of July, 1813, after a tedious and distressing passage which nearly cost Mrs. Judson her life. Thus God fixed the destination of His chosen servant by circumstances over which the latter had no control.

Burmah was at that time all ruled by a native king, who had his capital at Ava. A mission had been already set on foot there by the London Missionary Society, but it had made little progress. Mr. Carey, a son of Dr. Carey, of Serampore, was the only missionary in the country when Mr. Judson arrived. The religion of the country was Buddhism, and no native had yet embraced Christianity. A translation of the Gospel of Matthew and an elementary grammar, prepared by Mr. Carey, were the only helps to the study of the language. There existed no dictionary, and there was no interpreter who could do more than pronounce in Burmese the names of objects that were pointed to. Under these discouraging conditions Mr. Judson, supported by his God and by his devoted wife, settled down steadfastly to acquire the language, as the first means of making known the Gospel to the people of Burmah. The history of the next forms one of the most thrilling stories in the record of Christian labor, too full of heroic effort even for summary. Dr. Judson held daily conferences with Burmans of different classes who came to visit him, some of whom were partially convicted of sin, but were deterred by the fear of the king's anger from openly confessing Christ. He proceeded assiduously with the tremendous work of translating the Bible. His heart was gladdened by the arrival of new missionaries. He made a journey to Ava to present his cause before the king, and was received by his majesty with a gorgeous display of barbaric splendor, but was repulsed when he requested the king's favorable hearing of the Christian doctrine. On the 27th of June, 1819, after six years of unrequited labor, Dr. Judson had the joy of baptizing and the number increased slowly to ten, including one woman and a man of distinguished learning. The latter made a very satisfactory confession of Christ, after a long and severe struggle with self-righteousness and with the wish to keep up his reputation as a teacher before his countrymen.

THE FIRST BURMAN CONVERT.

In 1824, when Dr. and Mrs. Judson were in Ava, endeavoring to start a branch mission there, the first war broke out between Burmah and England, and Dr. Judson was made a prisoner on the suspicion of being a spy. Then follows the never-to-be-forgotten story of his twenty-one months' imprisonment in a wretched hovel, his ankles chained closely together with one, three, or five pairs of fetters, according to the mood of his jailers, and a bamboo passed between his legs and made fast to the wall, so that his feet were immovable, and he lay stretched out on the floor. He was starved, stripped, insulted, exposed to the noonday heat and the cold night chills, and left without help or comfort when attacks of fever racked his frame.

But for the greater part of all that time his wife devoted herself to the mitigation of his sufferings with a fortitude which has not often been surpassed. As often as she was repulsed by the brutal jail guards she returned and contrived, by persistence, by entreaty, and by such presents as her small means enabled her to give, to obtain access to her husband and minister to his wants.

A PRICELESS PILLOW.

One interesting incident of that imprisonment was the concealment of the manuscript translation of part of the Bible, upon which Dr. Judson had spent ten years' labor. When the doctor was arrested the native police searched his house and helped themselves to whatever of his and his wife's property they pleased. Every scrap of paper was especially regarded with suspicion, and Mrs. Judson, therefore, took pains to hide the invaluable manuscript, which she at length effectually did by sewing it up in a hard and dirty pillow, which would not excite the cupidity of the guards, and giving that to her husband to put under his head.

Mrs. Judson's care saved her husband's life, but it was at the cost of her own; for when the war came to an end in 1826, and Dr. Judson was released, he found his wife lying on a bed, reduced almost to a skeleton, and unable to stand. She rallied under the joy of seeing him free, and after some days they went down the river to Rangoon; but she died the same year at a place called Amherst, a new settlement that the British had formed.

Dr. Judson left other missionaries at Rangoon and established himself in the neighboring town of Maulmain, where he was absorbed in the

and lived a retired and thoughtful life. He used often to live alone for days in a little cottage far in the woods, spending the time in fasting and prayer, and seeing only those who came to him for religious instruction. He baptized more than a hundred converts, many of whom loved him with ardent devotion. He extended his operations to Promé, and to the wild Karen tribes. He brought to completion the Burmese Bible, a stupendous work, that puts this gifted man of God on a level with Jerome, Wycliffe, Luther, and two or three other men who have single-handedly undertaken and finished the translation of the entire Holy Scriptures from one language into another. He also took in hand the preparation of a Burmese dictionary, which would make easy for all his successors the acquisition of the language which had been such an indescribable task to himself.

After eight years of solitary labor, shut out from Christian companionship, Dr. Judson made the acquaintance of Mrs. Sarah H. Boardman, a widowed lady of eminent piety and remarkable mental gifts. She consented to share the lot of the devoted missionary, and in 1834 they were married. For eleven years she was the joy of his life, cheering him in his hours of weakness and helping him in his work. She rapidly learned the language, and under her supervision a volume of hymns in the Burman tongue was prepared, of which the larger part were her original composition, and the others her translation from the English. But such comfort was not to last long. Her health broke down in 1845, and in the hope of saving her valuable life Dr. Judson set out with her for a visit to his native land. He had not set foot on American soil for thirty-three years, and the need of rest, the longing for the preservation of Mrs. Judson's life, and the desire to have three of his children educated in America determined him to return for a brief period. One of his objects was frustrated before his arrival, for Mrs. Judson died on the voyage, and was buried on the island of St. Helena.

Dr. Judson remained only nine months in America, and in November, 1846, he was again at his post in Burmah. He resumed his labor on his dictionary, preaching and teaching with all his former vigor, though he was now nearly sixty years old. But though the spiritual force was unabated, the body was feeling the effects of the prodigious strain to which it had been subjected. In 1850 he caught a severe cold which developed into fever, against which his enfeebled constitution could not contend. The crisis passed, but the succeeding weakness alarmed his friends. The possibility of a sea voyage being beneficial was considered, and finally he was put on board a vessel bound for Mauritius. During the first days of the voyage he revived as the cooling breezes fanned his brow, but he sank again, and on Friday, April 12th, 1850, he died. His body was committed to the deep, but his spirit lives on, and the glory of his name will never die.

GENERAL PRENDERGAST.

The distinguished officer to whom was given the command of the expedition which the British Government despatched against the King of Burmah is Major-General Harry North Dalmrype Prendergast, V.C. His portrait appears on the right of the first page. He is an experienced general in Eastern warfare. He first attained prominence in 1857 while serving with the Madras Sappers and Miners in Persia. He wears the Victoria Cross, which is the coveted decoration of every man in the British army, as it is the only decoration not reserved for the aristocrats, but may be worn by the private soldier. It is given only for some specified act of valor. General Prendergast won it by saving the life of Lieutenant Dew, at the risk of his own, by attempting to cut down a Velaitee who had covered that officer with his piece from only a few paces to the rear. Prendergast was wounded by the discharge of the piece. He served also in the Abyssinian War, and was present at the action before Magdala. When the ultimatum was despatched at the beginning of last month to King Theebaw, and it was seen that war with Upper Burmah was inevitable, he was at once appointed to the command of the expeditionary force, and lost no time in despatching his troops to the frontier. On the King's refusal of the British terms being received General Prendergast issued a proclamation to the Burmese, informing them that the expedition was directed against the king, and not against the people; that the king had been false to his obligations and had broken solemn treaties, and assuring the people that no man need quit his farm or his business, but might proceed with either without fear of molestation. This proclamation had its effect on the people, for no attempt was made to defend the capital of the country against the British.

The only stand made by the Burmese was at a place called Minihla, where a fort was erected. It was easily captured after three hours' fighting, and the Burmese troops fled to the jungle. When, on November 26th, the British forces arrived at a distance of thirty miles from Mandalay, King Theebaw found that further resistance was hopeless, and that he could not rely on his army. He therefore despatched a vessel escorted by barges to General Prendergast's headquarters with a flag of truce. (See illustration on first page.) The natives appeared utterly careless, and congregated on the jetty to see the boats set out as if it was a holiday spectacle.

Prendergast simply demanded the surrender of the king, and that his army should surrender their arms. This the king agreed to, and he and his queen and a few courtiers were sent to Calcutta, while the British representative took temporary control of the government. No opposition was made by the people. On the contrary, they manifested satisfaction that they were to be governed according to law, and no longer to be at the mercy of the caprices of a monarch whose fits of drunken fury were frequent and always fatal to some one, and often to many.

A curious feature to Western eyes of the expedition was the artillery department. It was carried by elephants. Every battery consists of four guns, each of which was carried on the back of an elephant, while eighteen other elephants carried ammunition, gun-carriages and tools. The illustration on the first page depicts a scene at a drill of an elephant battery, a very dangerous performance, in which lives are often lost, owing to the uncertainty of the tempers of the huge beasts. It is no uncommon thing for the animals, when they leave the water, to start off for the forest and to persist in their flight until by tact and coaxing they are induced to return.

INCIDENTS IN MR. NOBLE'S WORK.

A Toll-Gate Keeper's Warning.—A Man whom I knew as a reckless, drunken fellow was driving with a friend along Eltham Road before the toll-gate was removed. Both were partially intoxicated, and they made offensive remarks to people whom they met. When they came to the toll-gate they asked the man, "Are we on the right road for Eltham?" "Yes," said the man, "and to hell, too." The driver responded with a curse, and drove on. After a time he said to his friend, "I am annoyed by that fellow's insolence; I am going back to ask him what he meant by it." The horse's head was turned round, and they drove back. "What did you mean by what you said just now, my man?" the driver asked. "What I said," replied the man. "You keep on drinking and going on as you do, and you'll get to hell just as sure as you'll get to Eltham if you travel this road." "You are an impertinent fellow," said the driver, with a curse, and he turned round and pursued his journey. He continued grumbling all the way and fuming about the toll-gate keeper's insolence; but he could not forget it, and it stuck to him. It ultimately led to his conversion. I know him well. He is now one of the most successful evangelists in England.

"A Child Shall Lead Them."—A Godless man, a hard drinker, who used to work hard on Sunday than on any other day in the week, had a bright-eyed little son about nine years old, who used to go to Sunday-school. One day the child was seized with illness—fell down in the street, fainting from heart-disease. He lay ill for some time, and the physicians gave no hope of his recovery. When the boy knew that he must die, he called his father to his bedside and pleaded with him to give up the drink for his sake. The broken-hearted father promised, and went right down-stairs and smashed every bottle in the house, and let the contents run into the common sewer. A few days later, when death was evidently near, and the weeping parents were watching their dying child, the little one raised himself in bed and said, "Father, when I am dead won't you take mother to church?" The father promised, and the boy seemed pleased. He fell back on his pillow, and they thought he was dead; but in a few moments he opened his eyes again and said, "They are come." "Who are come?" asked the father. "The angels," said the boy, and he never spoke again. The parents came to the Hoxton Hall the very next Sunday and signed the pledge, and came regularly afterward. They have both been converted, and when the father testified he related this narrative.

WINTER AND HOW TO MEET IT.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, December 20, 1885.

Pray ye that your flight be not in the winter."
—MATT. 21: 20.

A Time of Trial for the Morals—The Crash of Moral Shipwrecks—Winter Temptations—The Devil's Harvest Time—Fatal Parties—Temptations to Drink—Fair Tempters—The Pawnbroker's Spoils—Noble Altruism—The Brand on the Barrel—Public Amusements—Unattractive Homes—Despondent Parents—A Picture of the Devil—The Path Down—A River that Never Freezes.

THE inhabitants of the old cities were here told that they would have to fly for their lives. Such flight would be painful, even in the flush of spring-time, but superlatively aggravating if in cold weather; therefore they were told to pray that their flight be not in the winter.

A TIME OF TRIAL.

There is something in the winter season that not only tests our physical endurance, but, especially in the city, tries our moral character. It is the winter months that ruin morally and forever many of our young men. We sit in the house on a winter's night, and hear the storm raging on the outside, and imagine the helpless crafts driven on the coast; but, if our ears were only good enough, we could on any winter night hear the crash of a hundred moral shipwrecks. Many who came last September to town by the first of March will have been blasted. It only takes one winter to ruin a young man. When the long winter evenings have come many of our young men will improve them in forming a more intimate acquaintance with books, contracting higher social friendships, and strengthening and ennobling characters. But not so with all. I will show you before I get through that at this season of the year temptations are especially rampant, and my counsel is, Look out how you spend your winter nights!

THE DEVIL'S HARVEST TIME.

I remark, first, that there is no season of the year in which vicious allurements are so active. In warm weather places of dissipation win their timest triumphs. People do not feel like going, in the hot nights of summer, among the blazing gas-lights, or breathing the fetid air of assemblages. The receipts of most grog-shops in a December night are three times what they are in any night in July or August. I doubt not there are larger audiences in the casinos in winter than in the summer weather. Iniquity plies a more profitable trade. December, January and February are harvest months for the devil. The play-bills of the low entertainments then are more charming, the acting is more exquisite, the enthusiasm of the spectators more bewitching. Many a young man who makes out to keep right the rest of the year capsizes now. When he came to town in the autumn his eye was bright, his cheek rosy, his step elastic; but before spring, as you pass him you will say to your friend: "What is the matter with that young man?" The fact is, that one winter of dissipation has done the work of ruin.

FATAL PARTIES.

This is the season for parties, and if they are of the right kind our social nature is improved and our spirits are cheered up. But many of them are not of the right kind, and our young people, night after night, are kept in the whirl of unhealthy excitement, until their strength fails, and their spirits are broken down, and their taste for ordinary life corrupted; and by the time the spring weather comes they are in the doctor's hands or sleeping in the cemetery. The certificate of their death is made out, and the physician, out of regard for the family, calls the disease by some Latin name, when the truth is that they died of too many parties.

Away with these wine-drinking convivialities! How dare you, the father of a household, trifle with the appetites of our young people? Perhaps out of regard for the minister, or some other weak temperance man, you have the decanter in a side-room, where, after refreshments, only a select few are invited; and you come back with a glare in your eye and a stench in your breath that show that you have been out serving the devil. The excuse which Christian men often give for this, is that it is necessary, after such late eating, by some sort of stimulant to help digestion. My plain opinion is that, if a man have no more control over his appetite than to stuff himself until his digestive organs refuse to do their office, he ought not to call himself a man, but rather to class himself among the beasts that perish. I take the words of the Lord Almighty, and cry: "Woe to him that putteth the bottle to his neighbor's lips!"

THE LIQUOR FIEND.

Young man, take it as the counsel of a friend when I bid you be cautious where you spend your winter evenings. Thank God that you have lived to see the glad winter days in which your childhood was made cheerful by the faces of fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters, some of whom, alas! will never again wish you a "Happy New Year" or "A Merry Christmas." Let no one tempt you out of your sobriety. I have seen respectable young men of the best families drunk on New Year's Day. The excuse they gave for the inebriation was that the ladies insisted on their taking it. There have been instances where the delicate hand of woman hath kindled a young man's taste for strong drink, who after many years, when the attractions of that holiday scene were all forgotten, crouched, in her rages and her desolation and her woe, under the uplifted hand of the drunken monster who, on that New Year's morning so long ago, took the glass from her hand. And so the woman stands on the abutment of the bridge on the moonlit night, wondering if down under the water there is not some quiet place for a broken heart. She takes one wild leap—and all is over!

THE PAWNROKER'S SPOILS.

Oh, mingle not with the harmless beverage of your festive scene this poison of adders! Mix not with the white sugar of the cup the snow of this awful leprosy! Mar not the clatter of cutlery at the holiday feast with the clink of a madman's chain! Stop and look into the window of that pawnbroker's shop. Elegant furs. Elegant watches. Elegant scarfs. Elegant flutes. People stand with a pleased look gazing at these things; but I look with a shudder, as though I had seen into a window of hell. Whose elegant watch was that? It was a drunkard's. Whose furs? They belonged to a drunkard's wife. Whose flute? Whose scarfs? Whose scarf? They belonged to a drunkard's child. If I could I would take the three brazen balls hanging at the doorway and clang them together until they tolled the awful knell of the drunkard's soul. The pawnbroker's shop is only one eddy of the great stream of municipal drunkenness.

NOBLE ALTRUISM.

Stand back, young man! Take not the first step in the path that leads there. Let not the flame of strong drink ever scorch your tongue. You may tamper with these things and escape, but your influence will be wrong. Can you not make a sacrifice for the good of others? When the good ship London went down the captain was told that there was a way of escape in one of the life-boats. He said: "No, I will go down with the passengers." All the world acknowledged that heroism.

THE BRAND ON THE BARREL.

Can you not deny yourself insignificant indulgences for the good of others? Be not allured by the fact that you drink only the moderate beverages. You take only ale, and a man has to drink a large amount of it to become intoxicated. Yes; but there's not in all the city to-day an inebriate that did not begin with ale. "XXX"—what does that mark mean? "XXX" on the beer barrels; "XXX" on the brewer's dray; "XXX" on the door of the gin shop; "XXX" on the side of the bottle. Not being able to find any one who could tell me what this mark means, I have had to guess that the whole thing was an allegory: "XXX"— that is, thirty heart-breaks, thirty agonies, thirty desolated homes, thirty chances for a drunkard's grave, thirty ways to perdition. "XXX!" If I were to write a story, the first chapter would be "XXX," the last the pawnbroker's shop. Be watchful! At this season all the allurements to dissipation will be especially busy. Let not your flight to hell be in the winter.

PUBLIC AMUSEMENTS.

I also remark that the winter evenings, through their very length, allow great swing for indulgences. Few young men would have the taste to go to their rooms at seven o'clock and sit until eleven reading Motley's "Dutch Republic" or John Foster's "Essays." The young men who have been confined to the store all day want fresh air and sight-seeing, and they must go somewhere. The most of them have of a winter's evening three or four hours of leisure. After the evening repast the young man puts on his hat and coat and goes out. "Come in here," cries one foam of allurement. "Come in here," cries another. "Go," says Satan; "you ought to see for yourself." "Why don't you go?" says a comrade; "it is a shame for a young man to be as green as you are. By this time you ought to have seen everything."

Especially is temptation strong when business is dull. I have noticed that men spend more money when they have little to spend. The tremendous question to be settled by our great populace, day by day, is how to get a livelihood. Many of our young men just starting for themselves are very much discouraged. They had hoped before this to have set up a household of their own. But their gains have been slow, their discouragements many. The young man can hardly take care of himself. How can he take care of another? And, to the curse of modern society, before a young man is able to set up a home of his own, he is expected to have enough to support in idleness somebody else, when God intended that they should begin together and jointly earn a livelihood. So many of our young men are utterly discouraged and utterly unfit to resist temptation. The time when the pirate bore down upon the ship was when its sails were down and it was making no headway. People wish they had more time to think. The trouble is, in dull times, that people have too much time to think. Give to many of our commercial men the four hours of these winter nights, with nothing to divert them, and before spring they will have lodgings in an insane asylum.

UNATTRACTIVE HOMES.

I remark, further, that the winter is especially trying to the moral character of our young men, because some of their homes in winter are especially unattractive. In summer they can sit on the steps or have a bouquet in the vase on the mantel, and the evenings are so short that soon after gas-light they feel like retiring. Parents do not take enough pains to make these long winter nights attractive. It is strange that old people know so little about young people.

Many of you have the means—why do you not buy them a violin or a picture? or have your daughter cultured in music until she can help to make home attractive? There are ten thousand ways of lighting up the domestic circle. It requires no large income, no big house, no rich wardrobe, no chased silver, no gorgeous upholstery, but a parental heart awake to its duty. Have a doleful home and your children will not stay in it, though you block up the door with Bibles, and tie fast to them a million catechisms. I said to a man: "This is a beautiful tree in front of your house." He answered, with a whine: "Yes, but it will fade." I said to him: "You have a beautiful garden." He replied: "Yes, but it will perish." I found out afterward that his son was a vagabond, and I was not surprised at it. You cannot groan men into decency, but you can groan them out of it.

A PICTURE OF THE DEVIL.

"Pray ye that your flight be not in the winter." Arm yourself against the especial temptations of this season. Poets and painters have represented Satan as horned and hoofed. If I were a poet I should describe him with manners polished to the last perfection; hair flowing in graceful ringlets; eye a little bloodshot, but floating in bewitching languor; hands soft and diamonded; step light and artistic; voice mellow as a flute; boot elegantly shaped; conversation facile, carefully toned, and Frenchy; breath perfumed until it would seem that nothing had ever touched his lips save balm and myrrh. But his heart I would encase with the scales of a monster, then fill with pride, with beastliness of desire, with recklessness, with hypocrisy, with death. Then I would have him touched with some rod of disenchantment until his two eyes would become the cold orbs of the adder; and on his lip would come the foam of raging intoxication; and to his feet the spring of the panther; and his soft hand would become the clammy hand of a wasted skeleton; while suddenly from his heart would burst in crackling and all-devouring fury the unquenchable flame; and in the affected lisp of his tongue would come the kiss of the worm that never dies. But, until disenchanting, nothing but myrrh and balm and ringlet and diamond and flute-like voice and conversation aromatic, facile, and Frenchy.

Oh, it is beautiful to see a young man living a life of purity, standing upright where thousands of other young men fall! You will move in honorable circles all your days, and some old friend of your father will meet you and say: "My son, how glad I am to see you look so well. Just like your father, for all the world. I thought you would turn out well when I used to hold you on my knee."

THE PATH DOWN.

But here is a young man who takes the other route. The voices of sin charm him away. He reads bad books, lives in vicious circles, loses the glow from his cheek, the sparkle from his eye, and the purity from his soul. The good shun him. Down he goes, little by little. They who knew him when he came to town, while yet lingering on his head was a pure mother's blessing, and on his lip the dew of a pure sister's kiss, now pass him and say: "What an awful wreck!" His eyes bleared with frequent carousals, his cheek bruised in the grog-shop fight, his lip swollen with evil indulgences. Look out what you say to him: for a trifle he will take your life. Lower down and lower down; until, outcast of God and man, he lies in the almshouse a blotch of loathsomeness.

Sometimes he calls out for God, and then for more drink. Now he prays, now curses, now laughs as fiends laugh, then bites his nails to the quick, then runs both hands through the slock of hair that hangs about his head like the mane of a wild beast, then shivers until the cot shakes with unutterable terror; then, with uplifted fist, fights back the devils or clutches the serpents that seem winding him in their coil; then asks for water, which is instantly consumed by his cracked lips. Going his round some morning, the surgeon finds him dead. Straighten the limbs. You need not try to comb out or shove back the matted locks. Wrap him in a sheet. Put him in a box. Two men will carry it down to the wagon at the door. With chalk write on the top of the box the name of the destroyed. Do you know who it is? That is you, O man, if, yielding to the temptations to a dissipated life, you go out and perish. There is a way that seemeth bright and fair, but the end thereof is death.

Devote these December, January and February evenings to high pursuits, innocent amusements, intelligent socialities, and Christian attainments. Do not waste this winter. We shall soon have seen the last snow-shower, and have passed up into the companionship of Him whose raiment is exceeding white as snow—as no fuller on earth can whiten it. To the right-hearted the winter nights of earth will soon end in the June morning of heaven.

The River of God, from under the Throne never freezes over. The foliage of Life's fair tree is never frost-bitten. The festivals and hilarities and family gatherings of Christmas times on earth will give way to the larger reunions and the brighter lights and the gladder scenes and the sweeter garlands and the richer feasts of the great holiday of heaven.

THE TROUBLE IN MONKTON HOUSE.

THERE was trouble in Monkton House, the home of the richest man in Fairmont, and, some said, the richest man in the county, if not in the whole State. Mr. Monkton was not at home, but Mrs. Wilder, his mother-in-law, was, and she ruled in his absence. Some people said she ruled when Mr. Monkton was at home, and perhaps she did, for he was an easy, mild-tempered man, who would sacrifice his own wishes and convenience readily for the convenience of anybody else. There were times, however, when he would not give way, when, as Mrs. Wilder said, he was "obstinate as a mule," and she could never tell when that would be; but when those times came he was master in his own house, and even Mrs. Wilder had to bow to his authority.

Mr. Monkton was a widower. Two years ago Mrs. Monkton died, leaving three children, and as "poor Mr. Monkton" knew nothing about managing a house, and there were "dear Angelica's three little angels" to be looked after, Mrs. Wilder, "dear Angelica's" mother, had volunteered to stay for a time and see to things. Mr. Monkton tacitly consented, though he did not seem as grateful as Mrs. Wilder thought he ought to have been, and she stayed on all the two years.

The trouble at Monkton House was about the children's governess, Miss Rachel Bruce. Mrs. Wilder summoned her into her own room, put certain questions to her about her former life, and, having received frank answers from the young lady, ordered her to quit the house without delay.

"Let me have a month's notice, Mrs. Wilder, if I must leave," Miss Bruce said. "You know I have done my duty here, and"—this with a sob—"my mother is a widow, and she has very little to live on but the money I send her. Give me a month, that I may get another situation before I leave this."

"Not a week, not a day," was Mrs. Wilder's reply. "I am horror-struck to think of the mischief those dear little angels may have suffered already. To think that I should have been so imposed upon! Why did you not tell me you had been on the stage?"

"You asked me nothing about those times. You asked me about my last situation, and I told you the truth. I gave up the theatre three years before. When I became a Christian I knew it was no place for me, and I became a governess at less than half the money I could earn on the stage. That is why my mother is so poor. We shall not have bread to eat if you turn me out to-day."

"I cannot help that; those dear children shall not run the risk of pollution an hour longer. Heaven knows how much mischief has been done already. Get your packing done, and then come to me for your money."

There was the greater reason for prompt action because Mr. Monkton was coming home that day, and he might be tempted to veto the discharge if it should not be consummated before he arrived. He was soft-hearted, and might be moved by Miss Bruce's tears and this story about the widowed mother depending upon her. And besides, Mr. Monkton had himself engaged Miss Bruce from among the applicants in reply to his advertisement. Mrs. Wilder did not wish him to advertise at all, as a friend of her own, an elderly maiden lady now engaged in evangelistic work, had kindly offered to devote a portion of her time to the training of the poor motherless children. But Mr. Monkton had shown himself stubborn, and insisted on selecting a governess himself. Now he would see how he had blundered, and would be more willing to be guided by herself in future. But it would be well for

Miss Bruce to have no opportunity of talking to him. So Mrs. Wilder hurried out to hasten matters, and even undertook to have Miss Bruce's trunk expressed to her, lest in waiting for a conveyance she might be found still in the house when Mr. Monkton returned.

So good-bys were said, and Miss Bruce set out, carrying her hand-bag and satchel, for her twomile walk to the station, and the remainder of her modest belongings were to be sent after her by express at Mrs. Wilder's expense.

It was a narrow escape, for in less than a quarter of an hour afterward Mrs. Wilder, looking from an upper window, saw Mr. Monkton ride up to the door. She waited to smarten up a little, and then descended to meet him with her sweetest smile, knowing that he must be propitiated before he heard about Miss Bruce's dismissal. She went from room to room, but could not find him. "Where is Mr. Monkton?" she asked one of the servants.

"I do not know, madam," was the answer. "When he came in he asked whose box that was in the hall. I said Miss Bruce's, and that she was gone. And he asked how long, and I told him; and then he just got on his horse again and rode away without a word."

By that time Miss Bruce was half way to the station. She was plodding wearily on, when she heard a horse's hoofs behind her, and without turning to see who it was riding so hard, she moved to the edge of the path to allow room for the rider to pass. But the horse was checked close to her, and she heard her own name pronounced. Looking up she saw her employer.

"What is the meaning of this nonsense?" he asked, tersely.

"Mrs. Wilder has discharged me, and she wished me to leave immediately."

"What have you been doing to bring that about?"

Then Miss Bruce explained that Mrs. Wilder had learned in some way that she had been on the stage, and that it was true; but that she had abandoned the profession a long time, and there had been no other cause of complaint.

"Give me that satchel," said Mr. Monkton, holding out his hand. "I can carry that, and you turn round and go right back to the house."

He took the satchel, and mounting, his horse, rode back home. On his arrival Mrs. Wilder, knowing nothing of what had occurred, opened her budget. Mr. Monkton listened quietly while she told the whole story, ending with, "I felt that I could not sleep another night in the house while she remained."

"Then, madam, it will be necessary for you to lose no time in packing, for Miss Bruce is going to remain. I have seen her, and have arranged with her to return."

Mrs. Wilder looked at him in amazement. "But the dear children," she said. "Think of the contamination!"

"Yes, I have thought of that. I have known about this stage matter for some time. About three months ago, having watched Miss Bruce narrowly since she has been here, and admired her sterling Christian character, I was at some pains to look up her record, with the intention, if I found it pure, of asking her to become my wife. I did find it pure, and I found that she had made great sacrifices for conscience, and that, in spite of temptation, she was blameless. Now I shall win her if I can."

"And you are going to put her in the place of my sainted Angelica?" And Mrs. Wilder raised her eyes to Angelica's portrait on the wall. "She to be a mother to Angelica's children! Then I had better go."

"Yes, madam, that is my opinion."

Mrs. Wilder did go, and there were no tears shed at her departure. Rachel Bruce changed her name, and Mrs. Wilder's fears of contamination proved unfounded. Neither her husband, nor the children, nor the servants suffered in the least. On the contrary, they seem to be drawn toward a religion that they see in active operation in the life of the kind and sympathizing lady who now reigns in Monkton House.

FOUR GREAT SIGNS

TO OCCUR NINE, EIGHT, SEVEN, AND SIX YEARS BEFORE THE END OF THIS AGE AND THE BEGINNING OF THE MILLENNIUM.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

The Sign Refused to the Jews—Four Revealed in the Apocalypse—I. The Metamorphosis of the States of the Roman Empire—Twenty-three Reduced to Ten—The Two Halves of the Empire—The Countries of the Western Half—The Make-up of the Eastern Half—II. The Rise of a Napoleon—III. His Covenant with the Jews—The End of the Age in Seven Years Afterward—IV. The Offering of Sacrifices in Jerusalem—The Literal and the Year Day Reckoning.

THE Jews asked Christ for a visible and notable sign in relation to His First Advent, but He refused it, saying, "There shall no sign be given you but the sign of Jonas the Prophet." What He refused to them He has granted to us, for He has foretold to us in Daniel and Revelation four great signs of His Second Advent, to occur respectively about nine, eight, seven, and six years before the End of this Age, and therefore by 1888, 1889, 1890, and 1891, if the End of this Age is to be in 1896 or 1897. The following points are all enlarged upon much more fully in the author's book, called "Forty Coming Wonders."

I. The first great sign will be the metamorphosis of the TWENTY-THREE States or Kingdoms now existing within the territories of Caesar's original Roman Empire into exactly TEN, as prefigured by the Ten Horns of Daniel's Wild Beast and the Ten Toes of Nebuchadnezzar's Prophetic Image (Dan. 7: 24; 2: 43, 44). There must be five of those ten kingdoms in each half of Caesar's Roman Empire, according to the emblem of five toes upon each foot of that Prophetic Image, as the two iron limbs are universally admitted to denote the eastern and western halves of Caesar's Roman Empire.

History informs us very clearly as to what were the countries and territories of Caesar's empire. Therefore we know that the necessities of geography and ethnology require that the FIVE KINGDOMS IN THE WESTERN HALF shall be: 1. Britain, separated from Ireland and its colonies at least to the extent of their having separate legislatures of their own. 2. France, extended to its ancient boundary, the river Rhine, and consequently annexing to itself Belgium, Luxembourg, Rhenish Prussia, Switzerland, and part of Holland. This can only result from either a great socialist revolution in Germany, or a French conquest of Germany. 3. Spain, with Portugal added to it. 4. Italy, with perhaps Tripoli annexed to it. 5. Austria, losing Bohemia and its provinces north of the Danube, and Eastern Hungary, but extended to Belgrade and gaining Bosnia, Herzegovina, and part of Servia, and whatever of Southern Bavaria, Baden, and Wurtemberg that is not added to France. And

THE FIVE KINGDOMS IN THE EASTERN HALF shall be: 6. Greece, with Macedonia, Thessaly, and Albania added to it. 7. Egypt. 8. Syria, separated from Turkey. 9. Turkey, losing Syria. 10. Bulgaria and Roumania, and part of Servia and Eastern Hungary.

These alterations will necessitate a new map of Europe, and it is difficult to see what event can lead to these ten kingdoms becoming allied together in a confederacy (as foreseen by the ten horns and ten toes, each on one corporate body), except their mutual combination to resist some common foe, which can only be North Germany, or Russia, or both.

II. The second great sign will be the rise of a Napoleon (after the Ten Horns or kings shall all have become confederated in an alliance) as an eleventh little sovereign in or near Syria, as predicted in Dan. 7: 24 and 8: 8. He will presently become King of Syria, "King of the North," as foretold in Dan. 11: 21, 40, and will wax exceeding great toward the south and east and pleasant land, and will in the early period of his career "pluck up" or "subdue" three of the ten-horn kingdoms, probably Syria, Turkey, and Greece.

III. A third great sign will be the making of A SEVEN YEARS' COVENANT between this Napoleon and many of the Jews for a term of seven years, as predicted in Dan. 9: 27—"He shall confirm a covenant with many for one week (seven years), and in the midst of the week he shall cause their sacrifices to cease, even until the Consummation." In the opinion of more than two hundred expositors this prophecy shows that, at the distance of seven years before the Consummation, or End, of this Age, there will be a seven years' covenant made between many of the Jews and this Little Horn, "the Prince that shall come," mentioned in the previous verse, and who, according to this prophecy, is to show himself as the great Antichrist in the midst of the seven years, and persecute the Jews until his destruction at Christ's descent on the earth, soon after the seven years.

Hence, the making of this covenant will show us when we have arrived within about seven years of the End of this Age. But as the Little Horn must have arisen as a Horn, or Sovereign, at least several months or a year before he makes this covenant, therefore his first rise as a Sovereign Horn must be not later than about eight years before the End of this Age. And still further, as he is distinctly foretold in Dan. 7: 24, to arise AFTER the Ten Horns, therefore the Ten Horns will probably be distinctly manifested several months or a year before this Napoleonic Little Horn's rise to sovereign power, and therefore about nine years before the End of this Age.

IV. A fourth great sign will be the restoration of the sacrifices in a Jewish temple in Jerusalem about eight months and ten days after the date of the covenant. This is foretold in Dan. 8: 14, where it is stated that the period of 2300 literal days is to elapse from the restoration of the daily sacrifices until the cleansing of the sanctuary, which latter event is, according to Dan. 12: 11, to be 1290 days after the midst of the seven years. Hence, the 2300 days must begin about 250 days—that is to say, eight months and ten days—after the commencement of the covenant seven years, in order to terminate 1290 days after the middle of the seven years.*

There is much reason for believing that a fifth great sign may be given on the self-same day that the 2300 days commence with the restoration of the Jewish sacrifices—namely, by a decree going forth to restore and build Jerusalem. If so, it will be the ultimate literal fulfilment of the prophecy in Dan. 9: 25: "From the going forth of the decree to restore and build Jerusalem unto Messiah the Prince shall be seven weeks and threescore and two weeks—i.e., literally, 483 days. And in such case it will show that the Second Advent of Messiah the Prince to raise to life the deceased saints, and to translate to heaven the 144,000 watchful Christians, will be about 483 days after the date of the going forth of that decree.

The 483 days are stated in Dan. 9: 24 to be "determined," or cut off, from the 2300 days mentioned in the vision in the previous eighth chapter, and consequently commence at the same time as the 2300 days, both in the future literal day as well as in the past year-day fulfilment, in which latter fulfilment they both commenced about 449 B.C., and the 483 year-days ended about A.D. 34 ("unto Messiah the Prince"), and the 2300 year-days ended about A.D. 1851, leaving only 45 year-days to elapse until the End of this Age, about A.D. 1896-97; for 45 is the prolongation of the 1335 beyond the 1290 in Dan. 12: 11, 12: "Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the end of the 1335 years"—in 1896-97. (Dan. 12: 12.)

The above-mentioned Napoleon will only be King of Syria until the third year of the seven

* The reason for this is simply because, by the Jewish reckoning of 360 days to a year, the seven years amount to 2520 days, and at the same time 250 added to 2300 equal 1250 (half 2500 years) added to 1290. Both these periods of 2300 and 1290 days simultaneously with the cleansing of the sanctuary.

years of the covenant week, but by the midst of the seven years he will be elected by the Ten Kingdoms (then become Communistic and Red Republican) to be Democratic Emperor of their Ten Red Republican rulers; and then during that latter three and a half years he will be practically monarch of the world, and will put to death millions of Christians, who will refuse to worship him, or his image, or to receive his mark, as fully described in Rev. 13. But Christ will descend and destroy that Antichristian Man of Sin at the battle of Armageddon, and will afterward reign over the converted nations of this earth during the Millennium of 1000 years, as fully described in Rev. 20.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Prayer in Its Relation to the Purse.—At a recent meeting Mr. White related: "At a time of great depression in trade there was a father who at family worship always prayed for his starving neighbors. One night, after rising from their knees, his little boy went to him and said, 'Father, if you will give me your purse I will answer some of your prayers.' And how many are there, like this father, will pray for things but do not try to help in any other way."

A Pocket-Knife Refused by Nineteen Boys.—"I was at one time trying to explain to a class of twenty boys what faith is, and I drew from my pocket a knife, and going to the first boy I held out the knife and asked him to take it, but he drew back and would not take it, not believing that I meant it for him. I passed down to the next boy, and he also refused it. I went down the class until I came to the last boy, and the little fellow put out his hand and took the knife, and the other nineteen went away thinking what fools they had been not to take the knife when they could have got it just for the taking. How many will there be in the last day who will think what fools they were to miss the kingdom of heaven, when they could have had it simply for the taking."

A Question in the Midnight.—Mr. Ford, an evangelist who has been doing much successful work in Scotland, related: "About eighteen years ago I was travelling between two country districts in the North. It was nearly midnight, and all at once I stopped on the road and asked myself the question, 'What am I doing? Whither is my soul going?' These were serious thoughts, and they troubled me much. At the first opportunity I went to the minister under whom I sat and told him my condition, saying that I had a great many things against me. He went to his church book where the list of members was inserted, and looking up my name, he said: 'There is nothing written against you here; you are all right.' Disappointed, I turned from the house, for I saw he had misunderstood me. I next went to the house of a Christian friend whom I thought would sympathize and help me, and after I had told him my troubles he gave me the very best advice. He said, 'Go home and read your Bible and pray alone.' I went home, and throwing myself in the very dust before the Lord, I cried: 'O God, show me myself.' I then besought the Lord to have mercy upon me. Shortly after this I went to an evangelistic meeting, and at the close the speaker said, 'Who will decide for Christ to-night?' Rising to my feet, I cried: 'Praise the Lord, I will accept Christ to-night.' There, for the first time, I realized God's presence. God said to me, 'I will never leave thee nor forsake thee,' and He never has, although I have often left Him."

A Song Among Savages.—"The Rev. E. P. Scott, while laboring as a missionary in India, saw in the street one of the strangest-looking heathen his eyes had ever lit upon. On inquiry, he found that he was a representative of the inland tribes that lived in the mountain districts, and which came down once a year to trade. Upon further investigation he found that the Gospel had never been preached to them, and that it was hazardous to venture among them because of their murderous propensities. He went to his lodging-place, and pleaded for divine direction. Arising from his knees he packed his handbag, took his violin, with which he was accustomed to sing, and started in the direction of the tribe. As he bade his fellow-missionaries farewell, they said, 'We shall never see you again. It is madness for you to go.' But he said, 'I must preach Jesus to them.' For two days he travelled without scarcely meeting a human being, until at last he found himself in the mountains and suddenly surrounded by a crowd of savages. Every spear was instantly pointed at his heart. He expected that every moment would be his last. Not knowing of any other resource he tried the power of singing the name of Jesus to them. Drawing forth his violin, he began with closed eyes to sing and pray,

All hail the power of Jesus' name!

Let angels prostrate fall;

Bringing forth the royal diadem,

And crown Him Lord of all.

On commencing the third verse he opened his eyes to see what they were going to do, when lo! the spears were all lowered and every man was listening intently. They afterward invited him to their homes. He spent two and a half years among them. His labors were so richly rewarded that when he was compelled to leave them because of impaired health to return home, they followed him for thirty miles. 'Oh, missionary,' they said, 'come back to us again!' After visiting America, he went back again to continue his labors till he sank into the grave among them. Who would face such dangers but a soldier of the cross? The love of Christ constraineth them."

MR. MOODY'S TALKS.

BELIEF IN A FIRE.

"A MAN came to me one day and said: 'Moody, I cannot believe your doctrine.' I said: 'Why can't you?' 'Why,' said he, 'how is a man going to be affected by believing?' 'You cannot?' I returned; 'I can prove to you in three minutes what effect believing has on you. If a man should come in here and say that this place was on fire and you believed him you would get up and get out, wouldn't you?' He replied that he would. And now, my friends, drop that word 'try,' and look, look, believe, and be saved. Believe—now will you believe? If you were drowning and I threw you a rope you would grasp it and let me save you. Now I throw the rope of salvation out to you; grasp it and be saved. Let the cry go out to heaven.

EXCUSES ACCEPTED.

"I have chosen three men," said Mr. Moody, after reading Luke 14: 16-20, "and I think I can find those three men here to-night. The first had a poor excuse, the second one as bad as the first, and the third one the worst of the lot, for he had to hide behind his new wife. She would not run away from him. They made excuses, but they were dated away back to Adam's sin. You laugh at them, but if I should go to any one of you and ask why you are not a Christian, you would not have half as good an excuse. A better excuse was never offered. A good many men hide behind the Bible because there are so many hidden and mysterious things there, but when these men get before the throne at God they will be dumb, and will not be able to open their mouths. I tell you what it is, my friends, the Bible is a good book, and this world would be mighty dark without it. It is easy to talk about the Bible, but when you get before God you can't have that for an excuse. You cannot tell the Eternal God that you were not at the feast on account of the mysteries of the Bible. God says, 'Whosoever will.' Accept God and He will open the door. A man says it is hard to be a Christian. It is hard to do this before you are born of God, but when you are born of God the yoke is easy to bear. Lord Jesus Christ is not a hard Master, but the Lord of this world is a hard master. Ask the drunkard, the harlot, or the libertine, when their hearts beat up to their throats, if their road is easy and their master the same. Oh, my friends, how awful hard it is! These excuses will not be given before the tribunal of God, because Jesus Christ has said, 'Follow Me.' My friends, you can be excused if you want to. Love will excuse you; but, my friends, for the love of Christ do not ask to be excused, for if you do your life will be a most awful dark one. God wants you and invites you there to-night. He gave His all for us—His only-begotten Son. Will you accept an invitation to be present at God's wedding-feast? Who of you will be there at the supper of the Lamb?

SATAN AT CHURCH.

"Some men say that they are Christians because they attend church and read Scriptures. Let me tell you that Satan is in church just as much as any one; he is there every Sunday. So you must not think that you are a Christian because you are here, for Satan will try and get a word in between you and me. He is not always down in these brothels. No! he has those men down there, and yet he is not satisfied. He wants to get you all. When a man's heart is right his hand is right and his head is right. If I strike a man in anger here to-night my hand will not be to blame, it will be my heart. Make the heart all right and the rest of your body will be good. A good many men are trying to make themselves better by throwing off one and another bad habit, while they still have bad hearts. They become no better. God must change their heart. They must let God create new hearts in them. Man must throw off his old Adam form and get a new one. It does no good to patch up Adam's nature, you must begin afresh.

I have the best of all reasons to be sure that I will go to heaven, for I read the Bible. You may have the same reason, my friends, if you will only read the Bible. You want to get God's nature in your body. If you do you will make yourself a child of God, and can go out in the world doing good. Young men, what are you going to do? Are you going to let sin get the best of you, or are you going to overcome sin? Are you going to be adopted into God's family and be happy? You cannot get the best of old Satan in any other way. He has been about for six thousand years, and is altogether too cunning for you. No man can ever become a Christian if he only says he will try. Drop the word 'try' and believe Him.

A BOAT TIED UP.

"There are three ways that keep men from God: Sin, our wills, and our thoughts. Man cannot get into heaven if he carries any sin. Men think that it is an intellectual difficulty. They don't like to admit they are bound by a sin, but they must admit it or they cannot get into heaven. There would be a great rush into the kingdom of God if a man could carry his sins with him. Bear in mind, friends, it is impossible for you to carry sin into heaven. A man must give up all sin or else he must give up heaven. You may laugh at the story of the drunken men who tried to row across the river when their boat was tied, but it is just this, and it relates to you—they had some sin holding them, and so have you. Probably some of you are now thinking of some gambling dive or harlot's home where you may be going to-morrow night, and even if I get your thoughts for the next twenty minutes, I believe you will say: 'I would like to be a Christian, but I hate to give up that sin.'

A FRIGHTFUL SIGHT.

"Why, if the sins of this whole assemblage were to be written on these walls—I don't believe the walls would be large enough—you would see the biggest stampede you ever saw in your life here. My friends, there are only two things to do, and those are to walk toward God or walk away from Him. You must give up your bad companions and bad habits, and if you will you will find it easy enough to walk right into the kingdom of God. Mind you, fear is not repentance, but repentance is what you need to get into heaven. If I held a pistol at a man's head and told him he must be a Christian, he of course would say, 'I will, I will,' but as soon as I take the pistol away he would be the same man. It was fear which caused him to say that he would be a Christian. He did not repent. Repentance is turning from evil and toward God. If you do that you will do what is right. Education will not save a man. Why, I was told not long ago in a certain Young Men's Christian Association that they had had thirty graduates of Cambridge and Oxford—those two big colleges—there as tramps. Sin had caused their fall.

A GOOD-FOR-NOTHING.

"It is a good thing to get a man to think, and, my dear friends, that is just what I want to get you to do. That is probably what brought the prodigal son back to his father's house from the far-off country. He loved his father and his father loved him, and probably prayed oftener for him than he did for his other son at home. Ask the servants in that house or ask the older son about the young man who is away. They will tell you that he is wayward and a good-for-nothing. Ask the old man the same question and see what he will say. His story will be much different. May there be joy in heaven to-night from this meeting. God loves you all, no matter whether you are good or bad. He hates the sin, but loves you. You may think His commandments rigid, but He has made them so for your good. Do not, my friends, get a false view of God.

GRADUAL REFORMATION.

"Some men think that they have got to repent for so long a time—that they must do this and that for so long a time. My friends, there is nothing of the kind necessary. Now, suppose a man goes to one of these modern philosophers and tells him he wants to be converted. He will want to know what is your trouble. You have stolen from your employer. He will advise you to steal one half as much the next year, one half as much the next, and in four or five years you will not steal any at all from him. If your employer catches you, tell him you are being converted in the new way. My friends, that is not the way to get converted. You must do as the Bible says. You must stop stealing at once. The same way this modern philosopher will tell the drunkard to drink one half as much, and beat his wife one half as many times a year, and he will in time become a Christian. That is not the way; my friends, you must stop at once.

SUDDEN CONVERSION.

"A man cannot have a clean soul if he has any sin in it, and before he can get a clean soul he must confess his sins. Now, to whom are you going to confess them? If you do a man a wrong or an injury of any kind you should confess to him. If you sin against God, who under the sun else should you go and confess to? Look at the confession of the thief on the cross, who made such a grand confession to the Son of God when His disciples had all forsaken Him. Was not that glorious? Was it not a grand confession? and how good it must have felt to the ears of the Son of God, as He suffered on the Cross! Now, if he confessed—and his was a sudden confession, you will admit—why cannot you confess Christ the same way? How was it that this thief confessed Christ? Why, he had faith in Him. Look at his prayer: 'Lord, remember me when I Thy kingdom.' He saw the Lord in the distance, and his faith was firm. He got more than he asked for. He only asked to be remembered, but instead he was taken right into that kingdom. Now, my friends, why can't you pray the same as that thief did, and ask God to remember you? If you want God to save you, just ask Him to do so. You know that prayer is the wish and desire of the heart, and if it is your wish to be saved, pray to God that He will save you to-night. He will do it, and He will do it at once."

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Pension for the Widow of General Grant was appropriately among the first measures taken up by the new Congress. On Friday last both Houses agreed almost unanimously in voting her a pension of five thousand dollars a year. It was contained in the first report of the Pension Committee of the Senate, and at the suggestion of the chairman the bill was put upon its passage at once, without going into the calendar. There was no vote in the negative. Although there was no committee in the House to consider the bill, it was immediately taken up by unanimous consent, and passed with only one dissenting vote. Nothing is needed except the signature of the President to entitle Mrs. Grant to receive the pension, and it is not doubted that this will be given promptly.

The Tendency to Increased Expenditure, which is in part rendered necessary by the rapid growth of the nation, is manifested in Secretary Manning's estimates for the expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1887. They make an aggregate of $339,589,552, which is $15,678,158 more than the sum called for in the estimates submitted last year, and $50,826,710 more than the aggregate of appropriations for the present fiscal year. Of the excess, $15,830,000 is for pensions, for which a total of $75,830,200 is asked—over $9,000,000 for the navy, and $18,000,000 for public works including new post-offices in several leading cities, $250,000 for a new Naval Observatory, and $2,000,000 for the armament of fortifications.

A Temperance Debate in the Senate diversified the proceedings of that body on December 15th, though without practical result. Some significant statements were made, however, which deserve notice. In the course of the debate it appeared that, in spite of the Senate rules forbidding the sale of liquor, the keeper of the restaurant, who comes from Maine and was selected by Senator Frye, openly prints a list of wines on his bill of fare. It was proposed to repeal the rule which provides that no spirituous or malt liquors should be offered for sale, exhibited, or kept within the Capitol, or any room or building connected therewith, or on the adjacent public grounds. The rule makes it the duty of the Sergeants-at-Arms of the two Houses to enforce the prohibition, and dismissal was to follow its violation in any manner by any officer or employé of either House. The proposed repeal was opposed by Mr. Saulsbury, of Delaware, who declared that liquor selling in the Capitol was a disgrace to the nation, and Senators should not suffer the Capitol to become a grog-shop. Then Mr. Crockrell, of Missouri, caused a sensation by asserting that he had never seen one half as much drunkenness among the Senate employes as among Senators on the floor, and he reminded them that on certain occasions the condition of some Senators had been such that other Senators found it wise to stop trying to transact business and adjourn. He said he could name Senators who had been drunk on the floor. Nobody asked him to do so. Mr. Frye offered what consolation and encouragement he could by declaring that matters were not so bad as they used to be.

A Distressing Mining Disaster Occurred at Nanticoke, near Wilkesbarre, Pa., on December 18th. While the men in Slope No. 1 of the Susquehanna Coal Company were at work the roof of the mine caved in. A large pond was over the part that subsided, and the water poured in on the sand and rubbish, which fell into the workings. One party of miners ran for their lives, but before they reached the shaft they were up to the neck in water. They were hauled up almost dead from exhaustion. Twenty-six other miners were unable to get to the shaft, and they are cut off from rescue by a huge rock and nearly forty feet of quicksand. Relays of workmen were immediately set at work digging for them, but only slight hopes are entertained of their being rescued alive.

The Death of General Robert Toombs on Tuesday, December 15th, removes a figure very conspicuous some years ago in national affairs. Three months ago he was stricken with paralysis, and since then his mind was somewhat clouded, but it was not until four days before his death that he became wholly unconscious. He was seventy-five years of age, having been born in 1810 at Washington, Ga., a town founded by his father. He was elected to the United States Senate in 1853, having previously served eight years in the House of Representatives. He was one of the foremost leaders in the Secession movement, and while still in the Senate gave expression to extreme Secession views. He was expelled on March 14th, 1861. For a short time he held the office of Secretary of State in Jefferson Davis's Cabinet, but soon resigned to accept a position in the field. After the war Robert Toombs persistently refused to take the oath of allegiance to the United States Government under the terms of the amnesty proclamation. He therefore was the only native-born white man in the country except Jefferson Davis who was debarred from the rights of citizenship for having been in rebellion.

The Question of Irish Home Rule was the paramount topic of public discussion in Great Britain last week. It appears to be realized by the politicians of both parties that in some form and with some restrictions self-government must be granted to Ireland. To such a pass has the astute generalship of Mr. Parnell reduced the British statesmen. It is true that Conservatives and Liberals by combining their forces could set the Irish leader at defiance; but party feeling and mutual jealousy stand in the way of such a combination. Mr. Parnell, by helping the weaker party in England, has brought the two so nearly to an equality that his casting vote can turn the scale in any contest. Each party is apparently desirous of securing his support if it can be purchased at a price that will not involve the loss of public confidence in England. Mr. Parnell has judiciously withdrawn himself from the public gaze, is holding no communication with the chiefs of the rival parties, and, like a victorious general, is waiting to receive any offer that may be made. It appears to be expected that the most liberal offer will come from Mr. Gladstone. A scheme of Irish self-government was put forward in his name last week, but after it was discussed Mr. Gladstone repudiated its authorship. It served, however, to test public feeling, which was probably the purpose for which it was promulgated. The meeting of Parliament in February is awaited with intense anxiety.

The Attitude of the Irish Patriots is Defined in a conciliatory editorial from the pen of Mr. Dwyer Gray, M.P., a close friend of Mr. Parnell. In the course of it he observes: "We would impress the fact that a compromise in a matter of this kind may be necessary. That to hold out for everything to which we may consider ourselves entitled might risk all. That it would be better for the two countries to have a settlement now, even of a less complete character, than a complete settlement after a year or two, and so avoid a contest which no man can contemplate without misgiving. Eighty-six Irish representatives are a great power in Parliament, but 584 English representatives are a greater power. We cannot accept a settlement which will leave any vital question open and thus endanger its permanence. We cannot accept a settlement which will be based upon any false principle. We cannot accept a principle which will leave this country so impoverished as to render it impossible to raise her up from the condition of social and material misery in which she is now plunged. Short of this we are prepared to accept any settlement giving Irishmen the right to legislate for themselves."

A New President of the French Republic is to be elected next Monday. The duty of choosing M. Grévy's successor devolves on the Senate and Chamber of Deputies. It is remarkable that the election causes but little excitement, though the office to be filled is the most honorable and important in the nation. The political prophets predict the re-election of M. Grévy. Their reasons are significant. His strength as a candidate, they say, consists in his moderation and lack of ambition. A more brilliant man, or one of more commanding mental power, would be distrusted. The people and their leaders agree in placing confidence in a man content to be the servant of the nation, to do his duty, and to seek no personal glory. There is hope of the permanence of the Republic if the French people have really come to prefer a man of character to a man of genius.

The War in the Balkan Provinces had no new development last week. No confirmation arrived of the rumors of a Servian victory, said to have been gained on December 12th, and the report is now discredited. An Austrian journal states that King Milan has admitted that his invasion of Bulgaria was a blunder. He marched his troops into the hostile country with a force that was inadequate to the demand upon them. The King had expected to deal only with Bulgarians, and not to have an encounter with the troops of Bulgaria and Roumelia combined. Louis Kossuth, the Hungarian patriot, is reported to have said that Austria ought to promote the growth of independent States in the Balkans, and ought to cede Bosnia and Herzegovina to Servia, so that Servia might have no cause for jealousy of Bulgaria. He believes that a war between Russia and Austria will inevitably result from the present complications.

An Attempt to Blackmail the Prince of Wales resulted in the arrest of the plotters on December 18th. The Prince some time ago received notice that his assassination had been ordered by a secret society. It came in the form of a letter from a man who said that he had been deputed to execute the sentence of the society. He averred that he was reluctant to obey the mandate, but could not avoid doing so unless he could fly from the power of the society. If the Prince would give him $3750 he would go to America, and forswear secret societies forever. No notice was taken of the letter, and others were received of similar purport. They were handed over to the police, who, by a ruse, caught the writer; his wife, who was assisting him, was also arrested. The police are now trying to ascertain if it was a mere vulgar attempt at blackmail, or if there is any basis for the secret society story.

Contributions to the Amount of Thirteen dollars were received last week to the fund for supplying colored ministers in the South with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. They were as follows: From Readfield, Me., $1; Leeds, Me., $1; Brooklyn, N. Y., $1; Latimore, Pa., $9; Water Mill, N. Y., 50 cents; New Haven, Conn., 50 cents. The fund is now considerably larger than in any previous year. One of our subscribers has at various times sent no less than $43 to it. Any of our readers who wish to consecrate to the Lord's service as a New Year's offering some portion of their income would do well to remember this fund. Every dollar contributed to it has a wide influence. The preacher, whose library is in many cases very limited, receives the paper every week for a year. If he reads nothing in it but the hundred and four sermons thus placed in his hands, his congregation cannot fail to benefit by the new thoughts suggested to him.

Mrs. M. Baxter and Mrs. Stroud Smith, of Douglas, Isle of Man, held a series of meetings in the First Baptist Church, Freeport, Ill., from Sunday, December 13th to Sunday, December 20th, inclusive. The meetings were held afternoon and evening. It pleased God to lead souls to Himself, and many believers into that glorious liberty wherewith Christ sets His people free. Many said they found a breadth, and depth, and reality in the Word of God which they never knew before, and not a few learned to cast all their care on Him who careth for them. Mrs. Stroud Smith will hold meetings during the afternoons of the Week of Prayer at Oak Park, Cook County, Ill. Mrs. M. Baxter will speak there, also, on Sunday, December 27th, and on the 28th will commence a series of meetings at Kalamazoo, Mich. She will speak in Toronto, Canada, Sunday, January 3d, and take part in Dr. Cullis's Convention, Newark, N. J., commencing January 17th.

Mr. Moody's Work at the Brooklyn Young Men's Christian Association is being actively carried forward by Mr. Wilkie, the indefatigable secretary of the Association, and a band of earnest workers. They took the addresses of the young men who evinced interest in the work and gave evidence that the Holy Spirit had applied the preaching of the evangelist to their hearts. On Friday last invitations were mailed to them to attend meetings to be held in the Association rooms on that evening and on Sunday. A very large number responded, and we are thankful to learn that the warm interest manifested by the workers in their welfare has made a deep impression on the young men which will, we pray, lead to blessed results.

Mr. Charles Herald, the Well-Known Singer whose services in Mr. Moody's Chicago church have been much blessed, has been called to Yankton, Dak., to engage in evangelistic labor with Rev. C. F. Clapp, pastor of the Congregational church at Yankton. Mr. Herald's many friends in Chicago will be sorry to part with him, but the Yankton people are to be congratulated. He begins his work January 15th.

The Central Union Mission in Washington D. C., is doing an excellent and much valued work in the city. Reports reach us continually of its beneficial influence, not only on residents, but visitors from other States to the national capital. During the past few weeks there have been over ninety conversions in the regular meetings. Of these many were drunkards, thieves, and other classes of criminals. It is expected that the services next week will be led by Major George A. Hilton, who has been conducting meetings in Indianapolis and Brazil, Ind.

A Conference on Medical Missions was held in Association Hall, New York, on December 13th. The Rev. Dr. Happer, of Canton, China, said there are now eighteen hospitals and twenty-four dispensaries in China which have been founded by medical missionaries, the oldest of which was established in Canton in 1835. He spoke of the great importance of the work done by missionary physicians which had opened the way for Christian teaching with the happiest results. The Rev. Dr. Arthur Mitchell, Secretary of the Presbyterian Board, spoke of this work as being directly in the line of that of the Saviour, who went about healing the sick, ministering to the relief of the bodies as well as the souls of men. Mr. Studd, of London, Captain of the Cambridge University Eleven of 1883, who has been visiting the colleges of this country, gave an account of the remarkable religious movement among university students in England which followed Mr. Moody's labors, and told how his own brother, brother-in-law and five other graduates of the universities had given themselves for missionary work in China.

A Complaint About the Church Weather-vane was sent to the rector of Grace Church, New York, last week, by the guests of the St. Denis Hotel, on the opposite side of Broadway. The guests in a polite note called Dr. Huntington's attention to the fact that the vane had been indicating a south-westerly wind for several months, though during that period the wind had often been in the north and east. People who knew that the vane did not move were not deceived, but transient guests were liable to place confidence in it and go out on cold days without their wraps. Dr. Huntington, in his reply, courteously promised that the vane should be made to tell the truth in future, and apologized for its past faults by saying that he had been so busy that he had omitted to notice which way the wind was blowing. He also invited the attention of the friends who were keeping so keen an eye on the externals of the church to the work going on inside. It may be hoped that they will comply, and will pay as much attention to the preacher as they have done to the weather-vane. But they will do well to avoid the common mistake of expecting him to be a spiritual weather-vane, changing his teachings in compliance with the changing currents of modern thought (Eph. 4: 14, 15).

How a Young School-mistress Checked a prairie fire is told by the Tribune of Bismarck, Dak. It states that Miss Belle Franklin, a school-teacher in McHenry County, was recently awakened by the crackling noise of the prairie fire. Looking out across the plain, she saw the dancing flames skimming across the prairie. The brave girl knew that her neighbors were away from home, and the fire would soon envelop the house, barn, hay and grain. Jumping from her bed, she hurried away to the low log barn in which the farmer's extra team was tied. Harnessing the animals, she rushed them out to the plough, and before the fire had reached the premises she had turned several furrows and formed a fire-break which saved the property. "Miss Franklin," the journal says, "is now the heroine of the Missouri Slope." She could not put out the fire, but by destroying that on which it could feed she placed a barrier between it and the property. Her method may be commended to parents who dread, with good reason, the fierce fire of temptation to which their children will be exposed in the world. They cannot extinguish the fire, but they may do much by careful training to eradicate evil habits and propensities, through which it most frequently reaches its victims (Prov. 22: 6).

A Plan to Make Judges Sympathetic has been elaborated by an Assemblyman-elect of New York State. He and an Alderman elect appeared in Judge Duffy's court on Friday last to ask for the release of two young men who were serving out a term of ten days in default of payment of a ten-dollar fine which the judge had inflicted upon them for disturbing a Salvation Army meeting. They sent a note up to the bench, as the court was crowded and they could not get near. The little judge had the note read, and answered them openly before all the people. He said he owed it to the Salvation Army to keep the men in prison for the full term. The applicants could not afford to fail so soon after their election, so they paid the fines out of their own pockets. The Assemblyman said that when he got to Albany he would introduce a bill to have the judges elected every year, which would insure their being men in sympathy with the people. If he secured the enactment of such a bill, it is doubtful whether it would have the effect he contemplates. Law-abiding citizens are aware that sympathy is not the only qualification needed for a good judge. Some of our modern preachers, who are anxious to get rid of the doctrine of eternal punishment, do not realize that fact, or they would tell their people that God is just, as well as that He is merciful (Rom. 11: 22).

A Triple Wedding Ring is Worn by a Lady in Richmond, Va. It was placed on her finger by her husband recently, on the celebration of their golden wedding. The pair were married in 1835, and the lady then wore an ordinary wedding ring. In 1860, when the silver wedding was approaching, the husband took off the ring and had a second ring welded to it, which he placed on her finger on the anniversary. This year the golden wedding was to be celebrated, and the double ring was removed and sent to a jeweller to have a third gold circlet attached. This the husband placed on his wife's finger the other day, and she now wears it proudly as a mark of her husband's love. She is not any more his wife now than she was when she wore the single hoop, but it is easy to understand the old lady's delight in the renewal of the pledge which each added circlet symbolizes. It is so with the believer; he enters at one step into union with his Lord, but as the years pass he is continually receiving new proofs of his Saviour's love (Hosea 2: 19, 20).

An Actress Expressed her Opinion of Theatre preaching in forcible terms recently in Chicago. It appears that the popular French actress, Mme. Judic, while in that city requested her company to attend the theatre on Sunday morning for rehearsal. Punctually at ten o'clock she drove up to the stage door, but finding it closed she went to the front of the house, where she saw people going in in large numbers to hear Dr. Thomas preach. Then she hurried to her manager's quarters for an explanation. He informed her that on Sunday mornings the theatre was engaged by the Rev. Dr. Thomas, of the People's Church. "What for?" asked the astonished comedienne. "To preach in," replied the manager. Mme. Judic uttered a little shriek, and exclaimed: "Well, this is the greatest farce I ever knew in my life—preaching in a theatre!" The word was not well chosen, though doubtless Mme. Judic is an authority on the merits of a farce. If she had attended the service she would have found it much too serious to be so described. It is nevertheless a sad truth that to many who listen to the Gospel it seems foolishness, and it has no more effect on their lives than has a theatrical performance (1 Cor. 1: 18).

The Value of an Eyelash is the Subject of a curious item of intelligence published by the Washington Hatchet. That journal states that a well-known financier was working, one evening recently after business hours, on an intricate set of accounts. The balance was wrong in some way, and he could not find out where. His books called for $900 more than his cash. The addition was gone over again and again without detecting any error. The total came out persistently $990, when it should have been $6090. There was no way of detecting the error but by checking each item separately. In doing this he found that an item of $1000 had been reckoned at $1900, owing to an eyelash having fallen while the ink was still wet on the second figure, thus giving the cipher the appearance of the figure nine. Something like this often happens in estimating human values. Men are over-estimated because some title or distinction has fallen upon them, and their utterances and influence have a weight in the world to which they are not entitled. Young people especially, in these days, often speak slightly of the Bible, and quote some scientific man of great name as their authority. At the day of final account, when worldly titles fall off, it will be found that they have often given a false value to their wearers (John 9: 39).

THE ARAB'S DREAM.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And when Gideon was come, behold, there was a man that told a dream unto his fellow, and said, Behold, I dreamed a dream, and, lo, a cake of barley bread tumbled into the host of Midian," etc.—JUDGES 7: 13, 14.

Israel under a Cloud—The Deliverer Prepared—A Man of Faith—His Craving for Signs—Modern Gideonites—The Listeners in Camp—A Dream and its Interpretation—I. The Striking Providence—II. The Comfortable Trifle—III. The Cheering Discovery—Weakness of Bad Men—The Rationalists' Dread of Mr. Moody—IV. The Dream Itself—Mistakes about God's Way—The Cry of the Christian the Midnight Cry.

THE Midianites were devastating the land of Israel. These wandering tribes purposely kept away during the times of ploughing and sowing, and allowed the helpless inhabitants to dream that they would be able to gather in a harvest; but no sooner did there come to be anything eatable by man or beast than these Bedouin hordes came up like locusts, and devoured everything. Imagine a country like Israel, which had at one time been powerful, so greatly reduced as to be unable to keep off these desert rangers; brought so low that the cities and villages were empty, and the inhabitants were hidden in the hill-sides, in the water-courses, and in the huge caverns of the rocks.

In her extremity the guilty nation began to cry to Jehovah her God, and the answer was not long delayed. An angel came to Gideon and announced to him that the Lord had delivered Midian into his hand, and that he should smite them as one man. Gideon was a man of great faith; his name shines among the heroes of great faith in the eleventh chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews; and you and I will do well if we attain to the same rank in the peerage of faith as he did. But, for all that, the best of men are men at the best; and men of strong faith are often men of strong conflicts; and so it was with Gideon.

MODERN GIDEONITES.

This man's great faith and great weakness of faith both showed themselves in a desire for signs. Once assure him that God is with him, and Gideon has no fear, but hastens to the battle, bravest of the brave. With a handful of men, he is quite prepared to go against a host of adversaries; but he pines for a sign. Again and again he asks it. The anxious question seems to be constantly recurring to him, "Is the Lord with us?" I have known many persons like this son of Josiah: they say, "Let me but know that God is with me, and my fear is gone;" but their repeated question is, "Is the Lord with me? Is Jesus mine, and am I His? Let me but know that I am a true believer, and I am sure that I shall not perish, for God will not forsake His own; but, then, am I a believer? Have I the marks and evidences of a child of God?" Hence the practice of severe self-examination, and hence also the weakening habit of craving for tokens and feelings. How many are crying, "We see not our signs," when they ought to say, "But we see Jesus!"

So it happened unto Gideon that the Lord, knowing his hunger for signs and yet knowing the sincerity of his faith, bade him, on the night of the great battle which was to rout Midian, go down as a spy into the camp with his servant, and there he should receive a token for good, which would effectually quiet all his fears.

I picture Gideon and his attendant creeping down the hill in the stillness of the night, when the camp was steeped in slumber. It was about the end of the first watch, when they were soon to change sentinels. The two brave men, with stealthy footsteps, drew near the pickets, and even passed them. From long habit they had learned to make no more sound with their footsteps than if they had been cats. As they move along they come near to a couple of men who are talking together, and they listen to their conversation. One of them told his fellow that he had dreamed a dream, and he began the telling of it. Then the other ventured an interpretation, and Gideon must have been awestricken when he heard his own name mentioned, and his own success foretold. His assurance overflows, and motioning to his servant, they steal away through the shadows, and quietly ascend the hill to the place where the little band of three hundred lay in hiding.

They look down upon the sleeping camp, and Gideon cries, "The Lord hath delivered into your hands the hosts of Midian." Obedient to their leader, they descend with their trumpets, and with torches covered over with pitchers. At a signal they break the pitchers, display the lights, sound the trumpets, and shout, "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon." Imagining that a vast army is upon them, the tribes of the desert run for their lives, and in the darkness fall foul of one another. Midian is scattered: Israel is free.

I. The first thing that I shall bring under your observation is which must have greatly refreshed Gideon. Just as he and Phurah stealthily stole up to the tent the Midianite was telling a dream, bearing an interpretation so appropriate to Gideon. It may appear to be a little thing; but an occurrence is none the less wonderful because it appears to be insignificant. The microscope reveals a world of marvels quite as surprising as that which is brought before us by the telescope. God is as divine in the small as in the stupendous, as glorious in the dream of a soldier as in the flight of a seraph. Now observe, first, the providence of God that this man should have dreamed just then, and that he should have dreamed that particular dream. Dreamland is chaos, but the hand of the God of order is here. What strange romantic things our dreams are!—fragments of this, and broken pieces of the other, strangely joined together in absurd fashion.

"How many monstrous forms in sleep we see."

That neither were, nor are, nor e'er can be!"

Yet observe that God holds the brain of this sleeping Arab in His hand, and impresses it as He pleases. The man must dream, must dream then and there, and dream that dream which should convey confidence and courage to Gideon. Oh, believe it, God is not asleep when we are asleep!

I think if I had been Gideon I should have said to myself, "I do not so much rejoice in what this dreamer saith as I do in the fact that he has told his dream at the moment when I was lurking near him; I see the hand of the Lord in this, and I am strengthened by the sight. Verily, I perceive that the Lord worketh all things with unfailling wisdom, and faitheth not in His designs. He that has ordered this matter can order all things else." Oh, child of God, when you are troubled it is because you fancy that you are alone; but you are not alone; the Eternal Worker is with you. Oh, for a little heavenly eye-salve to touch our eyes that we may perceive the presence of the Lord in all things!

II. But now, secondly, I want to say something to you about which Gideon had thus met with. It was a dream, and therefore a trifle, or a nothing, and yet he took comfort from it. He was soled by a dream, a gipsy's dream, and a poor dream at that. He took heart from an odd story of a barley bannock which overturned a tent. It is a very curious thing that some of God's servants do draw a very great deal of consolation from comparatively trivial things. We are all the creatures of sentiment as well as of reason, and hence we are often strongly affected by little things. But what a pity it is that we should need such little bits of things to cheer us up, when we have matters of far surer import to make us glad! Gideon had already received, by God's own angel, the word, "Surely I will be with thee, and thou shalt smite the Midianites as one man." Was not this enough for him? Whence is it that a boy's dream comforts him more than God's own Word. Oh, child of God, how you degrade yourself and your Master's Word, when you set so much store by a small token! The Lord's promise—is that little in thine eyes? What surer pledge of love dost thou desire than the blood of Jesus spilt for thee?

III. I have been brief upon that point, because I want you to notice, thirdly,

THE CHEERING DISCOVERY.

Gideon had noticed a striking providence, he had received a comfortable trifle, but he also made a very cheering discovery; which discovery was, that the enemy dreamed of disaster. You and I sometimes think about the hosts of evil, and we fear we shall never overcome them, because they are so strong and so secure. Harken; we over-estimate them. The powers of darkness are not so strong as they seem to be. The subtlest infidels and heretics are only men. What is more, they are bad men; and bad men at bottom are weak men.

You fret because in this war you are not angels; be comforted to think that the adversaries of the truth are men also. You sometimes grow doubtful, and so do they. You half despair of victory; and so do they. You are at times hard put to it; so are they. You sometimes dream of disaster; so do they. It is natural to men to fear, and doubly natural to bad men. Behold the host of doubters, and heretics, and revilers, who, at the present time, have come up into the inheritance of Israel, hungry from their deserts of rationalism and atheism! They are eating up all the corn of the land. They cast a doubt upon all the verities of our faith. But we need not fear them; for if we heard their secret counsels we should perceive that they are afraid of us. Their loud blustering and their constant sneers are the index of real fear. Those who preach the cross of our Lord Jesus are the terror of modern thinkers. In their heart of hearts they dread the preaching of the old-fashioned Gospel, and they hate what they dread. On their beds they dream of the coming of some evangelist into their neighborhood. What the name of Richard was to the Saracens, that is to these boastful intellects. They wish they could stop those Calvinistic fellows and those evangelical old fogies. Brethren, so long as the plain Gospel is preached in England there will always be hope that these brigands will yet be scattered, and the Church be rid of their intrusion. Rationalism Socinianism, Ritualism, and Universalism will soon take to their legs if the clear, decided cry of "the Sword of the Lord and of Gideon" be once more heard.

Those who follow after falsehood have a secret monitor within, which tells them that theirs is a weak cause, and that truth must and will prevail over them. Let them alone; the beating of their own hearts will scare them. The Lord liveth, and while He liveth let no man that trusteth in His Word suffer his heart to fail him; for the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed, but the word of the Lord endureth forever. Our adversaries are neither so wise, nor so brave, nor so influential as we think them to be. Only have courage, and rely upon God, and you will overcome them.

IV. Lastly, and most important of all, let us think for a little of

and of its interpretation. The Midianite in his dream saw a barley cake. Barley cakes were not much valued as food in those days, any more than now. People ate barley when they could not get wheat; but they would need to be driven to such food by poverty or famine. Barley-meal was rather food for dogs or cattle than for men; and therefore the barley cake would be the emblem of a thing despised. A barley cake was generally made upon the hearth. A hole was made in the ground, and paved with stones; in this a fire was made, and when the stones were hot a thin layer of barley-meal was laid upon them, covered over with the ashes, and thus quickly and roughly baked. The cake itself was a mere biscuit. You must not interpret the dream as having in it a large quarter loaf of barley bread, tumbling down the hill and smashing up the tent with its own weight. No, it was only a cake—that is to say, a biscuit, of much the same form and thinness as we see in the Passover cakes of the Jews. It may have been a long piece of thin crust, and it was seen in the dream moving onward and waving in the air something like a sword. It came rolling and waving down the hill till it came crash against the pavilion of the prince of Midian, and turned the tent completely over, so that it lay in ruins.

GOD'S MEANS.

Now, what we have to learn from it is just this: God can work by any means. He can never be short of instruments. For his battles he can find weapons on the hearth, weapons in the kneading-trough, weapons in the poor man's basket. Omnipotence has servants everywhere. For the defence of His cause God can enlist all the forces of nature, all the elements of society, all the powers that be. His kingdom cannot fail, since the Lord can defend it even by the cakes which are baking upon the coals. Gideon, who threshes corn to-day, will thresh the Lord's enemies to-morrow. Preachers of the Word are being trained everywhere. The point is to get beyond the instruments, to the God who uses the instruments. I think I have heard that a tallow candle fired from a rifle will go through a door; the penetrating power is not in the candle, but in the force impelling it. So, in this case, it was not the barley-biscuit, but the almighty impulse which urged it forward, and made it upset the pavilion. We are nothing; but God with us is everything. "He giveth power to the faint; and to them that have no might he increaseth strength."

Now I know how it is to-day; I men think that if the world is to be converted it must be done by learned men, men of noble family, or at least of eminent talent. But is this the Lord's usual way? Is there anything in the Acts of the Apostles, or in the life of Christ, that should lead us to look to human wisdom, or talent, or prestige? Does not everything look in the contrary direction? The lake of Galilee was Christ's apostolic college. Has not God always acted upon His own declaration that He hath hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hath revealed them unto babes?

UNEXPECTED.

Note, next, God uses unexpected means. If I wanted to upset a tent I certainly should not try to overturn it by a barley cake. If I had to cannonade an encampment I should not bombard it with biscuits. Yet how wonderfully God hath wrought by the very persons whom we should have passed over without a thought! O Paganism, thy gigantic force and energy, with Cæsar at thy head, shall be vanquished by fishermen from the sea of Galilee! God willed it so, and so it was done. Rome Papal met as signal a downfall from reformers rude of speech and poor in estate. Expect the unexpected. For souls to be saved is in itself remarkable; but for them to be saved by some simple child-like evangelist who can scarcely speak grammatically, this is the talk of the town.

But the dream hath more in it than this: God useth despised means. God loves to take men whom others despise, and use them for His glorious ends. "He is a fool," they say, "an uneducated man, one of the very lowest class of minds. He has no taste, no culture, no thought. He is not a person of the advanced school." My dear brother, I hope no one among you will be influenced by this kind of silly talk. The "mashers" in our churches talk in this fashion; but who cares for their proud nonsense? It is time that men who despise others should be themselves despised, and be made to know that they are so.

But, then, God ever uses effectual means. This cake of barley-bread came unto a tent and smote it, that it fell, and overturned it, that the tent lay along. The Lord never does His work by halves. Even if He works by barley-cakes, he makes a clean overthrow of His enemy. A cannon-ball could not have done its work better than did this barley-cake. Friend, if the Lord uses thee for His own purpose, He will do His work by thee as effectually and surely as if He had selected the best possible worker. He lifts our weakness out of itself, and elevates it to a level of power and efficacy little dreamed of by us. Wherefore, be not afraid, ye servants of God, but commit yourselves into the hands of Him who, out of weakness, can bring forth strength.

STILL SUFFICIENT.

I have done when I have made an application of all this to certain practical purposes. Brethren, do you not think that this smiting of the tent of Midian by the barley cake, and afterward the actual overthrow of the Midianite hordes by the breaking of the pitchers, the blazing of the torches, and the blowing of the trumpets, all tends to comfort us as to those powers of evil which now cover the world? I am appalled sometimes as I think of the power of the enemy, both in the matter of impurity and falsehood. At this present moment you seem as if you could do nothing; you cannot get in to strike a blow. Sin and error have so much the upper hand that we know not how to strike them. Two great parties in England, the Puritan and the Cavalier, take turn about, and just now the Cavalier rules most powerfully. At one time sound doctrine and holy practice had sway; but in these days loose teaching and loose living are to the fore. But our duty clearly lies in sticking to the word of the Lord and the Gospel of our fathers.

God forbid that we should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. By this sign we shall conquer yet. Our weapon is the torch of the old Gospel, flaming forth through the breaking of our earthen vessels. To this we add the trumpet sound of an earnest voice. Ours is the midnight cry, "Behold he cometh!" We cannot get victory by any might or skill of ours, and yet in the end the foe shall be defeated, and the Lord alone shall be exalted. Were things worse than they are, we would still cry, "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon," and stand each man in his place till the Lord appeared in strength.

THE CAKE OF FAITH.

Another lesson would I draw from the text as to our inward conflicts. Dear friend, you are feeling in your heart the great power of sin. The Midianites are encamped in your soul; in the little valley of Esdralon which lies within your bosom there are countless evils, and these, like the locusts, eat up every growing thing, and cause comfort, and strength, and joy to cease from your experience. You sigh because of these invaders. I counsel you to try what faith can do. Your own earnest efforts appear to make you worse; try faith. Neither tears, nor prayers, nor vows, nor self-denials have dislodged the foe; try the barley cake of faith. Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ.

Once again, still in the same vein: let us, dear friends, try continually the power of prayer for the success of the Gospel, and the winning of men's souls. Prayer will do anything—it will do everything. It fills the valleys and levels the mountains. By its power men are raised from the door of hell to the gate of heaven. What is to become of London? What is to become of heathen nations? I listen to a number of schemes very visionary, and very hard to work out. But I put these aside. Let each man stand with the flaming torch of truth in his hand, and the trumpet of the Gospel at his lips, and so let us compass the army of the aliens. This is our war-cry—Christ and Him crucified! God forbid that we should know anything else among men but the death, the blood, the resurrection, the reign, the coming, the glory of Christ. Let us not lose faith in our calling nor in our God; but rest assured that the Lord reigneth and His cause must triumph. Where sin abounded grace doth much abound. We shall see better and brighter days than these. God grant it, O Lord, for Thy Son's sake. Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

"THE SUN."

by Aimée Guillemin. Translated from the French by A. L. Phipson. During the past decade the sun has become, more than ever before, the chief centre of astronomical interest. The new volume of wonders opened to astronomers by the spectroscope has had something to do with this, but only so far as that it enabled them to gain light on problems which previously defied all attempts at solution. Though the world is dependent on the vast luminary for its life as well as its light, it is remarkable that so little is surely known about it, and that even at this date, with all our perfection of instrumental apparatus, we are obliged to speak of the "theory" of the sun-spots and of the sun's corona. Unscientific persons who want to know exactly what has been discovered about the sun, and what theories about what is unknown have been constructed on the basis of what is known, should read this volume of the series of Wonders of Science. M. Guillemin does not write for astronomers or philosophers, who, as he modestly says, know as much as he does on the subject, but for the common people of ordinary education. He explains how the sun is measured, how it is weighed, and how the intensity of its light is gauged. He then describes its rotation and its place and course among the stars. But the chapters which will be most interesting to the ordinary reader are those on its storms and tempests and spots. His explanations are rendered easy of comprehension by a large number of illustrations. Pp. 297; price, $1. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

"RING AROUND A ROSY."

a volume of pictures and verses, by Mary A. Lathbury, is a treasure for the very little folks, to whom bright-colored pictures are the greatest charm a book can offer. The artist whose pencil has prepared this treat for the nursery has evidently been a close observer of little children, for the attitudes in which they appear on these pages are wonderfully natural. A dozen little girls in a variety of tasteful costumes are artistically grouped in the first picture, which represents them playing on a grassy knoll. A series of accidents all too common in infantile experience gradually reduces the ring through the series of thirteen full-page pictures, until at last one little girl sleeping sweetly in her bed is all that is left, save that her eleven companions in shadowed miniature flit around her in her dreams. The rhymes in which the events of the day's play are described are musical, and many a little one will doubtless gain credit not strictly due by reading them off by memory as she turns the pictures. Price, $2. Published by R. Worthington, New York.

"BRIC-A-BRAC STORIES."

by Mrs. Burton Harrison, are old friends in a new dress. That is to say, each one is an old friend to some readers, but there is no reader, we should say, who can claim an acquaintance with them all. Mrs. Harrison has studied the folk-lore of many countries to gather materials for her book, and in the graceful style for which, as a writer for children, she has no rival, she has translated, re-written, condensed, or modified, as her taste and design suggested. The stories by an ingenious arrangement are grouped according to their nationality. The articles of bric-a-brac in the drawing-room of a Fifth Avenue mansion are all too familiar to the listless boy waiting in solitude the arrival of his brother at college who is to spend the Christmas at home. The governess is away with friends, papa is in the city, the servants are busy, and the little boy, between his frequent visits to the window to look out into the gloaming for Fred's arrival, wanders wearily among the objects of interest brought from countries, mysterious and far away, to ornament a New York drawing-room. Regi knows the names of the lands from which they come, but that is all. If the samovar from Russia or the paper-knife from Arabia could be changed into some old Russian peasant or grave Arab, what stories they might tell for a lonely boy's amusement on Christmas eve! There is the chateleine from Germany, too, if it could be endowed with the memory of the man who made it, and had speech, what a wealth of fairy-lore it could unfold! But the articles are all dumb until Regi is asleep; but in his dreams each one speaks to him and tells him some famous old story which is still current in the land from whence it came. How these myths originated, how it happens that in lands so widely separated from each other they are found so different, yet with the same family likeness, are problems Regi is not called upon to solve; but this he and the young readers who are fortunate enough to have Mrs. Harrison's book for a Christmas present will find in years to come; the fairy battles, the grim giants, the princes and princesses are types in their way of his manhood's experience, of his struggles and defeats and victories. The volume is full, as a fairy-book should be, of curious and quaint illustrations. Pp. 299; price, $2. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

SUBSCRIBERS who have written to us respecting the volume of poems entitled "Stones for the Temple," noticed in these columns on November 19th, are informed that the book may be obtained by sending one dollar to the author, Mrs. Harriet W. Re Qua, Aurora, Ill.

BURMAH.

By Mr. Henry Soltau.

THE rapidity with which new countries are being opened up for the Gospel is extraordinary, and should be a great stimulus to all Christians at home rapidly to enter in and take advantage of these open doors on behalf of the Master.

For many years Christians in England, America and Asia have been praying to the Lord that He would open Upper Burma to the Gospel. Our prayers are now being answered, and, before we are ready for it, a province containing an area of about sixty-seven thousand square miles, provided with excellent water communication, and shortly to be supplied with railways, is placed in our hands, prepared for good works.

In Lower Burma there are now two railways—both starting from Rangoon, the port of arrival for the majority of vessels from England and India. One line leads to Prome, a large city on the Irrawaddy, half a day's journey by steamer from the frontier of Upper Burma; the other to Toungoo, along the valley of the Sittoung River, close to the south-eastern frontier of Upper Burma. Up the Irrawaddy River steamers ply between Rangoon and Mandalay, and between Mandalay and Bhamo, and towns of large and small population can be thus reached with ease and comfort. Towns and villages situated on the tributaries of this river can be reached by boat. The Burmese are good boatmen, and almost as much at home in the water as out of it.

The effects of English annexation of Upper Burma will be manifold and highly beneficial. In the first place, the inhabitants of the country itself will be released from a tyrannical and repressive government, for it must be remembered that "like king, like rulers." The smallest official is a miniature of his sovereign in that land. The people will now be able to till their lands in peace, to keep the money they have earned, to live at home, without being impressed for war, and to worship as they wish. The country will in time become quiet internally. The hordes of Dacoits will be exterminated, the majority of them, doubtless, returning again to their peaceable modes of life.

Immense numbers of immigrants will pour into the country; Chinese from Western and Southern China, natives of India from Madras and Bengal, Shans from the Independent States, and from Western China, and probably not a few merchants and manufacturers and engineers from England and other Western lands. New lines of communication will be made. Already we find railways are being talked of. Calcutta is to be connected with Mandalay, and Mandalay with Tai-li-foo in China. A highway will now be permanently opened, by which missionaries and travellers will be able to reach China from the West, and the immense distance that has had to be traversed by those wanting to evangelize Western China and Eastern Tibet hitherto will be reduced by nearly one half, while the fatigue and danger will be lessened far more.

The mission field will be enormously enlarged; for, in addition to the Burmese and Burmese Shans of Upper Burma itself, the neighboring tribes will be accessible as never before—Shans, Paloungs, Khyins, Ka-Khyens, Chinese, and all the various tribes of each of these races will now be easily reached; and many of these will be wanting instruction. You will at once have a demand for knowledge of English and of Burmese, and hence an opening for mission-schools. As another result, trade will revive and flourish.

Merchants in China have only been waiting for a strong government in Burma to send their goods in much larger quantities into that country, and to receive in return Western goods. There is not the least doubt that when the border tribes of North-east Burma, who have been the great hinderers of trade, see that the English Government are in power beside them, they will cease their raiding, and let the trade flow through their hills and villages. And there is no doubt that it will flow through; for, in spite of the enormous obstacles in their way, the persevering Chinese have annually endeavored to push their caravans, of from one to four thousand animals, through to Bhamo every dry season.

The population of Upper Burma cannot be correctly ascertained, as no census has ever been taken. The land is fruitful, but the population comparatively small. A poor person is a very rare sight in Upper Burma. In ordinary times, and the country is capable of sustaining a very heavy population. An estimate has been made of twenty-five persons to the square mile, which would give a population of about one and three quarter millions. This does not include the independent, or semi-dependent, Shan States.

The religion of the country is Buddhism of a remarkably pure character. There is no doubt that the deposing of the king and the advent of the English will produce a decided effect upon this religion. The visible head of the religion disappears, and the halo of sanctity that surrounded the palace, in the eyes especially of the inhabitants of Lower Burma, will be dispelled. Moreover, their priests will no longer be able to oppress the people as heretofore, and as they could still continue to do were Burmah merely a protected State. We have known them flog people for not offering food and other things to them; and they always take the place of officials and use the power of the civil officials for their own ends. All officials in Upper Burmah are under the eye of the priests, who communicate through the superior abbot or bishop direct with the court at Mandalay. This makes all the civil officials anxious to keep on good terms with the priests, and therefore places great power in the hands of the priesthood.

THE FIRST HEBREW-CHRISTIAN CHURCH IN AMERICA.

At last converts from Judaism to Christianity have on this side of the Atlantic a house of worship set apart and consecrated to their use. The First Hebrew-Christian Church in America was dedicated to the Trinne Jehovah on Sunday, October 11th, 1885. Dedictory services were continued on the evenings of the following week, closing the succeeding Sunday. Leading ministers of the different evangelical churches took part in the services, and choirs from sister churches volunteered their aid. This church is situated at 17 St. Mark's Place, near Third Avenue, New York City. It is undenominational, or, as its pastor, the Rev. Jacob Freshman (whose portrait appears on page 828), prefers to express it, all-denominational.

Mr. Freshman is a son of the late Rev. Charles Freshman, D.D., a Jewish rabbi, who became a convert to Christianity and afterward entered the Christian ministry. Mr. Freshman has from early manhood been a regularly ordained and useful minister of the Gospel. Becoming deeply impressed with a sense of the spiritual needs of the eighty thousand Jews in New York City, he finally relinquished his pastoral work in Canada, and four years ago came to this city to seek entrance to the minds and hearts of his Jewish brethren, and bear witness to the Gospel truth of the coming of the Messiah in the person of the Lord Jesus Christ. Believing that an undenominational church, welcoming all Christians and ready to help converts to whatever denominational field of usefulness they might prefer, would do the most good, Mr. Freshman began and continues his work without the support of any particular denomination or organization. His Advisory Committee is composed of leading ministers in the different evangelical churches, who, however, are in no way responsible for the financial necessities of the work.

The first regular Sunday service was held on the first Sunday of January, 1882, in Room 24, at Cooper Union. At the end of two months a Hebrew-Christian congregation was formed, and the meetings were for nine months held in the lecture-room of the Fourth Avenue Presbyterian Church, Dr. Howard Crosby pastor. There were many obstacles to be surmounted, however, and for some time the infant work found weary journeying in the wilderness. Israelites were converted, however. Baptisms into the Christian faith were signs and seals that the Lord blessed the work. Saturday meetings conducted in the Jewish Mission Hall, in English and German, were crowded, and the Sunday-school increased in numbers. After many prayers that God would give a building for a permanent headquarters for the work Mr. Freshman was providentially led to purchase the building recently dedicated for that purpose. Seven times the work had been obliged to move and seek new quarters. Now, after the exercise of much faith and trust, the shelter of an established home was secured. The building was purchased for $20,000, of which amount $5,000 was paid down, and at an expense of about $4,000 more it was repaired and remodelled. A mortgage of $15,000 was given to secure the remainder of the purchase-money. And not this burden alone, but the running expenses of the work also press heavily upon Mr. Freshman, who is not paid a salary, and has no reliance in his many necessities but the faithfulness of the God of Jacob. A paper called the Hebrew-Christian is published by Mr. Freshman; in it he acknowledges the receipt of money sent him for the Building Fund. Contributions for Mr. and Mrs. Freshman's use are marked "Personal" by the donors, and are acknowledged by letter. Contributions not designated in either of these ways are used for the running expenses of the work. Through Mr. Freshman's instrumentality four young Jewish converts have recently been placed in Christian seminaries to be prepared for Christian work. Incidents of the various departments of labor and testimonies of Israelites who have been converted would fill many columns. Many Christians find these Hebrew-Christian prayer and testimony meetings places for the renewal of their own spiritual life, and pronounce the work indeed the work of God.

There is just now a special need for the work Mr. Freshman is prosecuting. The Jews of New York and other large cities are abandoning their faith in considerable numbers. The ancient ceremonies and the dietary laws, and more than all, the loss entailed in observing Saturday as a day of rest, are all irksome to them. Some are becoming infidels who may be won to Christianity if they can be reached.

THE SILVER LINING.

A SERIAL STORY.

A Timely Rescue.

"We have more light now, though not the kind of light we came to seek," said Dr. Arnold, as he and his daughter quitted the hospital after their interview with Mr. Greville.

"It is very welcome light, papa," said Kate. "It makes our duty easier and more pleasant. Even if Clare had been the guilty woman we had reason to fear, we must have sought her and tried to reclaim her; but it would have been very painful to show kindness to her in such a case. Now there will be none of that feeling, and we can welcome her with open arms."

"When we find her," said Dr. Arnold; "but we are not any nearer that than when we commenced. I presume that your next step in the campaign is the police headquarters?"

"Yes, papa, let us go there at once."

There was something very beautiful in the earnestness and energy with which this Christian girl threw herself into the search for her missing sister. It is this concern for the welfare of others that makes the difference between the real and the nominal follower of the Friend of sinners.

The stranger in any of our great cities, as he passes the Christian churches and sees the expensively dressed worshippers descending from their carriages and entering the splendid edifices in which Christianity is preached, is apt to ask himself the question how many of these nominal Christians realize the essential spirit which has given to the Gospel its tremendous power in the world. The seats are filled, the Scriptures are read, the paid choir make the buildings echo with sweet music, a sermon is preached, and the congregation disperses; but how many of those who have joined in the worship have learned the lesson which the Divine Founder of Christianity reiterated again and again? In this day we have, to a large extent, forgotten who are our neighbors. "I have lived in this city five years," said a man. "I am not converted. I have been constantly in contact with Christian people, yet in all those years neither clergyman nor layman has ever asked me if I have a soul, or ever shown a spark of interest in my spiritual or temporal welfare. I have attended church regularly—sometimes the same church for a year or more—yet never once has a word of welcome been spoken to me, nor any indication given that my salvation was the concern of any one."

It was a terrible indictment, but its truth will not be questioned by any one who has made the experiment. The Pharisees compassed sea and land to make one proselyte, but they were condemned. In our day we do not make even that effort. Men enter our churches, meet us in stores and on the cars, and we never think of them as our neighbors in the sense Christ attached to the word. We know them by name: if they are well dressed we recognize them by a shake of the hand, and if they are poorly dressed by a patronizing nod; but they may be starving in soul and body, they may be fighting a fierce battle with temptation, or groaning under bitter woe, and no word of Christian interest or sympathy enters their ears. If they fall by the way the throng passes by on the other side. "I was sick and in prison, and ye visited me not; I was a stranger, and ye took me not in," will be the words of reproach that many a church-member of this nineteenth century will hear at the day of the great account. Well was it for this one poor stranger that into one heart the Master's teaching had fallen with practical power, and that she had one friend to pray and work for her rescue.

The police officer looked very grim and uninviting as Kate Arnold entered it, but she was ready to go into far worse places, if in no other way she could achieve her object of recovering the poor lonely wanderer.

"I have brought my daughter with me," said Dr. Arnold, as they were admitted to the presence of the official; "she will be able to give you a better description of the lady we seek than I could do yesterday."

The superintendent bowed courteously, and opened the book in which the verbal portrait was entered. He read it over, and Kate added such details as her memory suggested.

"We have found some traces of the lady," said the officer, "but they do not go far enough. We have learned that she applied for admission to several hotels, and was refused because she had no luggage nor could give satisfactory references. Since then all trace of her has been lost. She has not applied for letters, nor has she been recognized by any of our men."

"That is a very discouraging report," said Dr. Arnold. "Can you advise us how to proceed?"

"Perhaps Miss Arnold would not mind stepping into my private room for a few minutes; my clerk will show her our portrait album. There is a possibility of her recognizing one of the pictures."

Kate complied readily, and the superintendent, having closed the door of communication, said: "Dr. Arnold, this is a delicate matter to speak of before a lady, so I had to use a stratagem. My opinion is that you must look for this lady among the degraded sisterhood of the city."

"I think you are wrong there," said the doctor. "We have received information this morning which has changed my opinion of her. Yesterday I should have accepted your suggestion as the most probable one, but now I believe that she is in some decent way trying to earn an honorable livelihood."

"I hope so, I am sure. I did not intend to make any aspersion on the lady's character, for I know nothing of her. It is from the circumstances that I draw my conclusions. Just review them yourself. Here is a lady of some considerable beauty, without money, without shelter. Say that she tries to get work. What can she do? If she applies for a situation she can give no reference, and no one will employ her. She is homeless, has no friends, no influence, nor any knowledge of the city. You see that she cannot even obtain a room in a decent hotel. She is naturally in despair. Why, in such circumstances she is a ready-made prey. I tell you, sir, that even women with decent homes are tempted sometimes to leave them by the offers of dresses and jewels that wealthy debauchees dangle before their eyes. How must it be with a woman so beset as this one?"

Dr. Arnold's heart sank as he listened. It was all so sadly, so terribly plausible. "And if it be so," he said—"though God forbid it—what is the best way of rescuing her?"

"Ah! that I cannot tell you. I may help you to find her, but you will have to do the rescue work yourselves. My experience tells me that that is the most hopeless part of the business. The best way of finding her is for you to go to the places such women frequent. You may see her or hear of her. One of our men shall take you around any night you like to fix. You had better have the young lady along, but let her wait outside in a carriage. Do not take her into any place unless you discover the lady you want. If you should find her your daughter will be better able to win her over than you would. A man is seldom successful. I find, but another woman can do much."

"We will try it," said Dr. Arnold. "It is not a pleasant task, so we will get it over as soon as possible. We will be ready to-night, if that will suit you."

"Then I will send an experienced man for you at eleven o'clock. Have you recognized a picture, Miss Arnold?" This as Kate entered from the inner office.

"No, there is not one that bears any resemblance to her."

"Well, it was worth looking, because when we are in the dark we must try every plan there is. Sometimes we succeed by chance. I have proposed another scheme to your father which he will explain to you, and we shall need your help in that."

Punctually at eleven o'clock a well-dressed, genial man, who might have been taken for a merchant, or a doctor, or anything but the policeman he was, sent his card up to Dr. Arnold at his hotel, and a few minutes afterward ushered that gentleman and his daughter into a closed carriage, and they were driven across town. Broadway and other streets through which they passed were almost deserted, but presently the carriage stopped before a building brilliant with plate glass and electric lights. The detective and Dr. Arnold alighted, and the carriage was driven into a dark street opposite, and stopped at a place from which the driver could be signalled by the detective.

Dr. Arnold shivered with disgust as he was led through a bar to a large room in the rear, where hundreds of men of all ages, fashionably attired, sat around tables talking with women whose costly dresses and jewels proclaimed that in some stages of a sinful life money was lavishly bestowed. Liquors were on all the tables, the men were smoking cigars, many of the women were smoking cigarettes, and all seemed gay and merry. On a raised orchestra at the end of the room an excellent band was playing softly, while a woman in indecent costume was singing a French song.

"Look around carefully," said the detective; "no one will be surprised or think you impertinent."

Dr. Arnold did as he was directed, while the detective seated himself at a table and lit a cigar. "She is not here," he said, after he had surveyed the crowd.

"Then we will go. I will just say a word to the officer on duty as we go out."

"An officer?" said Dr. Arnold. "You do not mean to say that you give such a place as this police protection?"

"Oh, yes. The place is regularly licensed by the commissioners. Everything is according to law. We are bound to protect them."

"But it is a regular trap for the ruin of young men."

"Yes, thousands are ruined here every year, young men and older men; but it is licensed, all the same. Any new woman here lately, Murphy?" he said to the stalwart policeman standing near the door.

"No; no one in particular. No fresh ones, sir."

Entering the carriage again, they drove up-town, and at a corner, from which the roofs of three of the best-filled churches in the city could be seen, another halt was made. The detective and Dr. Arnold entered the lobby of a building of unpretentious appearance, paid an admission fee, and passed through swinging doors. The doctor started back in surprise. The dull, unattractive exterior had given no indication of the scene within. The floor was clear and brightly polished; magnificent chandeliers suspended from the ceiling lighted the spacious apartment, and around it, bright with mirrors and gilding, ran a gallery crowded with men and women. The sumptuous decorations, the pervading elegance and luxury amazed the English visitor, and he stood still in astonishment. A crowd was coming down each staircase from the gallery, and elegantly dressed women and men were taking their places on the floor for a quadrille.

"Now is your time, sir," said the detective. "Come up-stairs; you can see every one in the house from the gallery." They ascended, and Dr. Arnold looked over at the brilliant throng whirling in the dance. Then he was led through rooms opening out of the gallery, where at small tables parties of two or four sat at supper. "We will stay here for half an hour; we can see the entrance from here, and they will be coming in by the hundred now."

"Is this place licensed too?" asked Dr. Arnold.

"Oh, yes. It is all regular. I wish there was nothing worse. I could take you to regularly licensed places below Grand Street where there are robberies every night, and murders are not uncommon. Now keep your eye on the door, and I'll go and talk to our man down-stairs."

In a side street within sight of the building in which Dr. Arnold and his guide were sitting, the carriage in which Kate Arnold waited was drawn up near the sidewalk. The houses on each side have brown-stone fronts and high stoops. Though it was midnight the outer doors were not closed, and from the inner doors a warm, hospitable light was cast by the hall lamps shining through the red curtains that covered the glass. All was quiet, save for the sound of a piano and the occasional opening or closing of a door when a visitor entered or quitted a house. It seemed to Kate, as she sat wearily waiting, that visitors were strangely numerous in that locality for such an hour, but they were decorous, respectable people, judging from their appearance, and there was no drunken noise and revelry.

She waited patiently, observing these things and praying that success might attend their mission; but it was very dull, and she, being unaccustomed to late hours, was falling into a doze, when she was startled by a piercing scream uttered within a few feet of the carriage. It was a cry in which terror and despair seemed to reach a climax. Instantly Kate was upon her feet and looking out of the carriage window. There was not much to see. Only a woman, her head covered by a shawl, apparently without a dress, for a white skirt fluttered in the gas-light, and her white feet showed that she was shoeless. She was trying to free herself from the grasp of a stout, powerful woman, who was trying to drag her toward one of the houses.

"Help! Help!" shrieked the victim, while her captor seemed to be covering her mouth to stifle her cries. The poor creature seized the iron fence and held to it with the clutch of despair, crying aloud with all her might. A crowd gathered with that astonishing rapidity which is seen in all populous cities, and a policeman forced his way through to where the two women were still struggling.

"Here, quit that," he said. "Wot's the matter, you two?"

"She has robbed me; she is running away; I only just caught her," said the stout female.

"Oh! no, it is not so. Oh! pray save me from going back there. Take me anywhere, but don't let her take me back!" and the fugitive laid her hand on the policeman's arm.

"Come, you go back quiet," he said. "I ain't going to have a row in the street, and, besides, you ain't decent going around like that. You go back and get sober and behave yourself."

"Kate could bear no more; she opened the carriage door and joined the throng on the sidewalk. 'What is it she has stolen?' she asked of the portly woman, whose coarse features were distorted with passion.

"What is that to you?" was the hoarse reply. "Mind your own business."

"Better not interfere, madam," said the policeman. "It's only a family quarrel. They'll make it up before morning, I guess. Come," he said, with an admonitory touch of his club to the shrinking woman still trembling in the grasp of her captor, "you get in and behave yourself."

"Oh, if you have a woman's heart," said the terror-stricken creature, turning to Kate with a beseeching gesture, "save me from that place. I would rather die than go back." In her sudden movement the shawl slipped from her head, and by the light of the gas-lamp Kate recognized her brother's wife.

"Clare!" she cried. "Can it be you, Clare? We have been seeking you everywhere."

"Yes, that is my name. I do not know you, but surely, if you recognize me, you will protect me."

"It's a plot," said the stout female. "I'm not going to be done," and she seized Clare's wrist in her powerful grasp.

"What's all this?" asked a new-comer in an authoritative voice.

The policeman turned, and recognizing the detective, briefly explained that it was a row between two women.

"Oh! papa," said Kate, joyfully, catching sight of her father at the detective's side, "here is Clare, and this woman insists on taking her back."

"She has robbed me," said the woman, sullenly.

"Then you know where to go with your complaint," said the detective, throwing open his coat and exposing his shield. "I will answer for this lady, and if you'll go around to the station in the morning we will settle this matter, and you can answer a few questions on your own account at the same time."

Before she could fully realize that she was delivered, Clare found herself in the carriage, and was sobbing out her gratitude on her sister's breast.

(To be concluded.)

JOSIAH AND THE BOOK OF THE LAW.
S. S. Lesson for Jan. 3, 11 Kings, 22, 23: 2-25.
Golden Text, 22: 13. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

A Child King—His Zeal in Reform—An Auegan Stable—The Courage Required—The Discovery in the Temple—The Dearth of Scripture Knowledge—Unused Bibles—The Book Given to the King—A Prophetess Consulted—The King Reading the Law—His Personal Consecration.

KING JOSIAH, the grandson of the wicked but afterward repentant Manasseh, was only a child of eight years old when he came to the throne. At the age of sixteen he gave evidence of a change of heart (11 Chron. 34: 3), and four years later, when only twenty years of age, he became and began to purge his kingdom from the abominations of idolatry. His next act, in the eighteenth year of his reign, was to repair the house of God. Let us consider the circumstances under which he was placed. For years, during Manasseh's reign, idolatry had prevailed; until the whole land was saturated with it; probably all the leading men, politically and ecclesiastically, upheld idolatry; all the public officers and government appointments were connected with it; for after Manasseh had repented at the end of his life Josiah's own father, Amon, when he came to the throne, had revived all the practices of evil which had previously obtained. It was, then, a bold thing that a young man, who came to the throne as a mere child, should have attempted and carried out such a reform. But God hath chosen the foolish things of this world to confound the wise, and He had put it into Josiah's heart, and was making him a witness for his God, a child of God without rebuke in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation, among whom he shone as a light in the world (Phil. 2: 15).

While the temple was under repair a discovery was made. The high-priest, Hilkiah, said to Shaphan, the scribe, "I have found the book of the law in the house of the Lord." What, then, was there no copy of the Scriptures extant which was in use among the people? Alas! no. The things which were done in the land could not bear the light of the Word of God upon them. Scripture would condemn them, and so the enemy of souls took good care to keep it out of sight. One is at a loss to conceive how utterly all the ordinances of God must have been forsaken. It was the duty of every parent to teach the law to his children. "These words which I command thee this day shall be in thine heart. And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up" (Deut. 6: 6, 7). Again, it was commanded when the children of Israel should set up a king over them, "And it shall be, when he sitteth upon the throne of his kingdom, that

of this law in a book out of that which is before the priests the Levites: and it shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the days of his life; that he may learn to fear the Lord his God, to keep all the words of this law, and these statutes to do them." Such were the commands of God, such the provision for His people. But now, not only were the children ignorant of Scripture, but the parents also; not only were the people without the Bible, but the very high-priest did not know where to lay his hand upon a copy; and the king, whose first act should have been to write himself a copy of the law of God, did not so much as know of its existence!

It is strange to see, even in England, in which generally a Bible is to be found in every house, how little use people make of their Bibles! In many Christian homes only the one who conducts family worship has a Bible in hand, and the remainder of the family do not follow with open Bibles. Is it because they know their Bibles so well that they never are at a loss to find a passage, and so, having it all by heart, they do not need this help? Or is it from indifference? In numbers of churches of all denominations there are thousands who make no use of their Bibles during the service; they do not think of noting in their Bibles the connection of Scripture which the minister may bring out, so as to help them afterward in private Bible study. It is certain that those who are in the habit of carrying their Bibles to every service and meeting which they attend have always a knowledge of their Bibles which others have not. Our Scotch brethren, for instance, are, as a nation, the most intelligent Bible students on the face of the earth; they do not take things by hearsay, but you see them by hundreds in every meeting searching their Bibles to see if these things be so (Acots 17: 11).

When Hilkiah found the book of the law in the house of the Lord, he showed it to Shaphan the scribe, who first read it himself, and then came in and told the king of this great discovery; and then he "read it before the king." Josiah's heart was made ready; the Word of God took effect upon him. "It came to pass that when the king had heard the words of the book of the law, that he rent his clothes." But a mere feeling of grief, and nothing to follow, would have effected nothing. God wants

REALITY, NOT SENTIMENTALITY.

Josiah carried God's Word to God Himself. He commanded Hilkiah the priest, and Ahikam the son of Shaphan, and Achbor the son of Michaiah (or Micah, perhaps Micah the prophet), and Shaphan the scribe, and Asahiah, a servant of the king's, saying, "Go ye, inquire of the Lord for me, and for the people, and for all Judah, concerning the words of this book that is found." Had they been living in close communion with God, they would have gone to Him direct. There is no such blessing as when we take the written Word to the living Word, and inquire of Him what He has to say to us. Then He makes His Word spirit and life to us (John 6: 63), a something which is directly between Him and our own souls.

But this little band of messengers went to a simple woman, one who seemed to know more of God than did the high-priest, one who was a female evangelist of her time, "Huldah the prophetess the wife of Shallum the son of Tikvah." They communed with her, and so did God, and "she said unto them, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Tell the man that sent you to me, Thus saith the Lord," and then she confirmed all the predictions of evil which should come upon Jerusalem and the inhabitants thereof. But He who in wrath remembers mercy, added, "But to the king of Judah . . . Thus saith the Lord, Because thine heart was tender, and thou hast humbled thyself before the Lord, when thou heardest what I spake against this place, and against the inhabitants thereof, that they should become a desolation and a curse, and hast rent thy clothes, and wept before Me,

I HAVE ALSO HEARD THEE,

saith the Lord. . . Thou shalt be gathered unto thy grave in peace, and thou shalt not see all the evil which I will bring upon this place."

What should be done; evil was coming, and could not be averted; why not, then, make the best of the present, and act in the spirit of the world, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die?" (1 Cor. 15: 32). This is the thought of the fatalist. But the king had it from the Lord that some years of peace would intervene between the present time and the dreaded judgments which were to follow; and Josiah made use of this time for God in seeking to win as many souls as he could. He gathered together a great convention, consisting of all the elders of Judah and Jerusalem, irrespective of their religious opinions, and "all the men of Judah, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, both small and great; and he read in their ears all the words of the book of the covenant which was found in the house of the Lord." How he can have made them all hear is difficult to understand; it is possible that representatives of the people were with him in the temple, and that a great mass-meeting was gathered without, and that Levites and scribes went out and repeated the words which the king read to the multitudes.

But the king was not satisfied simply to read what God had said to them. He wanted their answer back to God. So he "stood by a pillar, and made a covenant before the Lord, to walk after the Lord;" thus beginning with a personal consecration. But he included the people, and they covenanted to walk after the Lord, and to keep His commandments, and His testimonies, and His statutes, with all their heart, and all their soul, to perform the words of this covenant that were written in this book. And all the people stood to the covenant; it was

A NATIONAL CONSECRATION MEETING, and something must, and did, come out of it. Public opinion was mightily influenced, a strong current of popular feeling was aroused for God and against idolatry. Josiah led the crusade in person. All which belonged to the worship of idols was brought out and burned in public. He took up the cause of social purity and broke down the infamous houses, and put down the unclean men. He left no stone unturned to purge the whole land from idolatry and from its polluting consequences. Altars, groves, images, without any regard to their artistic beauty, were condemned to destruction, and in the course of this utter cleansing of Jerusalem from idolatry he fulfilled the prophecy of the man of God in Bethel (1 Kings 13: 30, 31), and burned the bones of the idol priests upon the altar where Jeroboam had offered sacrifice. All the antiquities of the land which had the contaminating element of idolatry about them were mercilessly sacrificed. Traces of Solomon's idolatry, and of all his sinful successors who had turned away from the Lord, were done away. And then, when the city was cleansed, not till then, Josiah kept a passover in obedience to the book of the law which he had found. "Surely there was not holden such a passover from the days of the judges that judged Israel, nor in all the days of the kings of Israel, nor of the kings of Judah." Such is the effect of the Word of God received; the whole generation then living came under the blessing, and God was glorified.

MUCH has been said and written during the three weeks which have elapsed since his death about the life and character of Mr. Vanderbilt. It was natural that it should be so, for he occupied a very conspicuous place in the world. There was no such fortune in this or any other land in the control of one man as that which he possessed. Two hundred million dollars is a sum the imagination cannot realize. If piled up in silver dollars, coin upon coin, it would make a stack over three hundred miles high. If turned into paper dollars and put lengthwise it would put a girdle nearly round the earth at the equator. If invested as Mr. Vanderbilt knew how to invest it, the owner would have an income so large that he might spend twenty dollars every minute of his life, day and night, without reducing his capital. The possession of such a sum gave him a unique place in the world. Beside this, Mr. Vanderbilt was personally remarkable. In no pursuit are there so many competitors as in the pursuit of wealth, but he distanced them all. In 1877 he possessed one hundred million dollars; after eight years' work he had made it two hundred millions. Thus in two aspects Mr. Vanderbilt was remarkable, and he could not pass away from the scene of his triumphs and his supremacy unnoticed.

HARSH CRITICISM.

With much that has been said of him we have no sympathy. It has been represented that he was almost criminal in being so rich. There seems to be little basis for the imputation. Compared with other millionaires less successful than himself, Mr. Vanderbilt seems to have been singularly free from blame. The bulk of his money was made by serving the public for a consideration. The people wanted transportation; Mr. Vanderbilt gave it to them, and that he might get as large a remuneration as possible, he exerted himself to keep competitors from the field. The method may be condemned as selfish and greedy, but only indiscriminating persons will class it with the criminal methods by which some fortunes we could name have recently been built up. There are millionaires now living whose every dollar has been won by trickery. They skillfully manipulate the stock market until some guileless capitalists are tempted to invest, then there is another manipulation, and the victims depart stripped of their money. Or they weave a net about some financial enterprise that they may ruin it, and fill their pockets with the plunder that is scattered around in its fall. By the side of such methods Mr. Vanderbilt's operations were honorable.

The world has no just cause of complaint against Mr. Vanderbilt. He acted on its maxims, carried out its principles, used its weapons, and fairly gained its prizes. True, it is an anomaly that he should have had more money than he could spend, while other men are dying for want; but the world has insisted on following the devil's guidance and disregarding the laws of God, and necessarily it finds itself in a condition in which there are anomalies. What else could be expected? Mr. Vanderbilt did not pretend to be guided by the teachings of the Saviour; he did not even profess to be a philanthropist; he was simply a worldly man engaged in the world's pursuits, and he was consistent. It is the world that is inconsistent in condemning him. The players who sit around a gaming-table cast angry and envious eyes on the pile the winner is accumulating, but while he observes the rules of the game they raise no complaint against his winning. Sometimes, however, maddened by their losses, they do set upon him in unreasoning fury, and he suffers in person and pocket. Something like that may happen to the millionaires when the patience of the poor is exhausted. People have scoffed at God's law, and have laughed at the teaching of Christ; they have yet to learn that in the Sermon on the Mount is the only ground on which society can be held together. If they were only wise they would learn the lesson now, and not wait to be driven to it by the preaching of the Gospel of dynamite.

A CASE FOR SYMPATHY.

We know of no position more trying than that of a Christian man to whom great wealth falls. As he reads the words of the Great Teacher, as he realizes that his possessions are only a trust, he comes to understand the compassionate remark of Christ: "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God." The ordeal through which he must pass before he can do his duty is one that few men can endure. Multitudes have turned their back upon their Lord, and have gone away, "sorrowing because they had great possessions." The fact should lead us to a more temperate judgment than is generally uttered.

While, therefore, Mr. Vanderbilt's life is not one that can be held up as an example—for it was not a life of high purpose or noble achievement, nor can it be regarded as a warning—for it was successful in the end to which it was devoted, it was, nevertheless, a life in which much interest was taken by the people. A brief record of it will, consequently, we believe, be acceptable to our readers.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

William H. Vanderbilt was born on May 8th, 1821, at New Brunswick, N. J. He was therefore in his sixty-fifth year when he died on December 8th. His father, the old Commodore, was then keeping the inn at that place, which he had rent free. He had been married seven years when William was born. Three years before that time he had given up the occupation he had found very profitable of sailing sloops in the harbor of New York, and accepted service as captain of a small steamer plying between New York City and New Brunswick. Thomas Gibbons, the owner of the steamer, paid him $1000 a year salary.

The Commodore had little esteem for education, and William, therefore, had few advantages of that kind placed within his reach. He was, when still a boy, placed in a ship-chandlery to work, but, on attaining his eighteenth year, a clerkship in the house of Drew, Robinson & Co. was secured for him. Bank clerks did not in 1841 get the salaries they now enjoy, and when he came of age Mr. Vanderbilt was receiving only twenty dollars a week. He thought that was sufficient to get married upon, and he succeeded in bringing to the same conclusion the young lady to whom he was engaged—Miss M. L. Kissam, daughter of the Rev. Samuel H. Kissam, a clergyman of the Dutch Reformed Church, then residing in Brooklyn. They were married; and, as Mr. Vanderbilt had not saved any money wherewith to furnish a home, they went to boarding in East Broadway, at sixteen dollars a week for the two. Shortly afterward Mr. Vanderbilt's health failed, and it became evident that if he continued his occupation at a desk he would die. The Commodore came to the rescue. He bought a farm of seventy-five acres of unimproved land near New Dorp, Staten Island, and gave it to William to do the best he could with it. The young man and his wife removed there, and worked hard, but found the product of the farm but a narrow provision for the family. The Commodore thought he had done enough to give his son a start when he put him in possession of the farm, and refused to supply him with money to develop it. William did his best, but found that money must be had, and he mortgaged the farm for $6000. His father heard of it, and declared he would have nothing more to do with him, but the next day William received a cheque for $6000 from the Commodore, with instructions to "go and pay that mortgage off right away."

THE COMMODORE OUTWITTED.

William did not stand high in his father's estimation as a business man. The old man liked his son, but thought him simple, and too "soft" to make much progress in the world. It was therefore a pleasure to the son, and secretly a delight to the father, though he professed himself exasperated, when William beat the Commodore with his own weapons. William needed some manure for his farm and applied to his father. "You can have it at the market-price, a dollar a load," said the old man. The next day the Commodore was surprised to find that his son had taken the whole hillock. He was still more surprised when William tendered him a dollar in payment. "What do you mean by this?" asked the Commodore, holding the dollar out contemptuously. "That was the price you fixed," said the son; "I took a load, and that is the money for it." That was true, but the load he took was a scow-load. It was noticed that afterward the old man thought better of his son's business smartness.

A few years sufficed to demonstrate to the satisfaction of even the distrustful Commodore that his son was at least a successful farmer. Year after year the boundaries of the farm were widened, until finally they included three hundred and fifty acres instead of seventy-five, and the produce which was sent from it into the New York market brought into the coffers of the farmer no less than $12,000 annually above the cost of cultivation. Meanwhile the old Commodore was growing rich with unprecedented rapidity. His wealth was becoming enormous, and he watched his son narrowly to see if he could be safely trusted with the large fortune that must be bequeathed to some one, for the old man was proud of its bulk, and had no intention of dividing it up into small portions. His doubts were about William's shrewdness. He wanted to see him get "hard." Of his filial respect and dutiful disposition he had no doubt. One instance of it affected the old man deeply. It was when William

GAVE UP SMOKING.

The Commodore decided to take the whole of his family on a European trip, and built a steamer for the purpose. The trip lasted four months, and was one of the sensations of the year, not only in New York, but in all the ports at which the steamer stopped. One day, on the out-bound voyage, the Commodore and William were walking on the deck. The son had been fond of smoking since his youth, and as he walked with the Commodore he puffed blue clouds from his after-dinner cigar. "I wish you would give up that smoking habit of yours," said the Commodore abruptly. "I'll give you $10,000 if you do it." "You need not give me any money. Your wish is quite sufficient," answered the son, throwing the cigar overboard.

FIRST RAILROAD EXPERIENCE.

Three years after his return from Europe Mr. Vanderbilt made a beginning in the career in which he was to become famous. There was a railroad thirteen miles long on Staten Island, and the Commodore, who was then closing out his steamboat interests to invest in railroads, owned most of the stock. The road was a failure, and went into bankruptcy. Young Vanderbilt was one of the most prominent men on the island, and he became, through the wishes of the stockholders, led by the Commodore, the receiver of the bankrupt road. It was a narrow sphere in which to demonstrate the possession of a talent for railway management, but it served to acquaint him with some of the practical details of railway operation. The receiver speedily mastered all the points of the situation, cut down the expenses of the road, stimulated travel over it by encouraging excursions, systematized the business of the road, and in two years had it out of bankruptcy and was rewarded with the presidency.

In 1864 Mr. Vanderbilt spent several months on the shores of the Mediterranean in attendance on his youngest brother, George, who, while fighting in the Union army in the Corinth ampaign, was wounded, and contracted a fever which shattered his constitution. He was sent to Europe in the vain hope of saving his life, and William accompanied him. Consumption did its fatal work, and the elder brother returned alone.

HIS FATHER'S LIEUTENANT.

By this time the Commodore, who had been close observer of the Staten Island Railroad management, arrived at the conclusion that there was "something in Bill after all." He gave practical proof of the opinion by making him Vice-President of the Harlem Railroad, and his son thenceforth worked under his father's eye. He removed his family to New York. They occupied a substantial stone-front house at Thirty-eighth Street and Fifth Avenue, a gift from the Commodore to his son. In 1865 William was put into the Hudson River Board of Directors, the highest honor that could be conferred upon him, the old Commodore thought.

William was now secure in his father's confidence and good-will, and on the high road to fortune. The Commodore gave him all his real estate outright, paid him enormous salaries for the various railroad offices that he held, and let him into a share of all his successful investments and speculations. In half a decade the younger Vanderbilt was a millionaire, and at his father's death he was worth three or four millions in his own name.

HIS INHERITANCE.

Commodore Cornelius Vanderbilt died January 4th, 1877. The roads, with their perfect organization, passed from the hands of father to son without the slightest disturbance. Ninety-five of the hundred millions of the Commodore's property were given absolutely to his son. The rest of other heirs for a more equitable division of the estate is still fresh in the memory of all. A compromise was effected, and William remained in possession of his vast legacy. Little remains to be said of Mr. Vanderbilt's story in connection with his business enterprises. The father had gone through the more difficult task of building up the great system of nothing. He left it a piece of perfected mechanism. It was the son's part to keep the machinery in motion. That he did so ably and wisely is the universal testimony of all who had dealings with him. He extended his lines by lease and purchase, and became a large owner of telegraph stock and real estate. His colossal fortune grew of its own impetus, like a big orbball rolling down-hill. His income enormously exceeded his expenditures, and increased its capital year by year until now it is believed to be more than two hundred millions.

HIS CHARITIES.

Mr. Vanderbilt doubtless gave many sums of money to institutions and individuals of which the public never heard. Among those which were published was the $100,000 he gave in 1880 to build a Theological Hall for Vanderbilt University at Nashville, Tenn., to which the old Commodore had given $1,000,000. In 1881 he gave $500,000 to the College of Physicians and Surgeons in this city. The loan of $150,000 to General Grant, which Mr. Vanderbilt strongly urged the General to accept as a gift, is another well-known instance of his generosity. When Lieutenant-Commander Goringe found that the expense of bringing over the obelisk was $150,000, $50,000 more than he had contracted to transport it for, Mr. Vanderbilt paid the extra $100,000, and added $10,000 of his own motion. When this great railroad strike of 1877 occurred, he employed of the New York Central received $100,000 for refusing to join the strikers. We have already mentioned in our news columns his gifts to religious and philanthropic institutions made in his will.

His disposition of his vast fortune is more equitable than was that of his father. One half his estate is divided between his two sons, Cornelius (who is Vice-President of the Young Men's Christian Association) and William K. The other hundred million is divided among her members of the family.

RETROSPECT OF THE YEAR.

The year 1885 will not appear in our national history as an eventful year. There have been many occurrences in it to render it memorable, but of startling events, such as arouse the whole community and change the current of national life, there have been none. While other nations have been disturbed by war and apprehension of war and by civil commotion, we have been mercifully preserved in peace with other nations and in internal tranquillity. Whatever may have been his individual experience during the year, the patriotic Christian will not fail this day, as he recalls the public events of the last twelve months, to thank the Giver of all mercies for His protecting care of his beloved land.

IN POLITICS

The most prominent event has been the transfer of executive power from the Republican to the Democratic party after a quarter of a century of Republican administration. That the change was made peaceably and easily, without friction, is a significant fact that cannot fail to have been noticed by European critics, who by this time should have grown tired of foretelling the collapse of our republican institutions. Our own citizens, too, should not forget it, especially those who allowed themselves to be alarmed by the predictions of the orators in the Presidential campaign. It is no trivial sign of stability when, in obedience to the vote of the people, a great party surrenders the highest office in the world, with all its power and patronage, and gracefully gives place to its rival. The inauguration of President Cleveland is an event which both political parties may remember with pride. It is also worthy of note that the cry raised during the campaign of "We want to see the books," with the doubt it expressed, has led to no disgraceful revelations. The books have been seen and have been found correct. The legislation of the year has not been important. Various measures, such as the National Bankruptcy law, were discussed in Congress, but without practical result. The only really important measure was a further reduction in postal charges, which permitted letters of an ounce weight to be mailed at the same rate as that previously charged for half an ounce. The most prominent subject of political interest has necessarily been that of the appointments. The fact that the President has incurred unpopularity in his own party by his slowness in making changes, indicates that to a very large extent there has been a change for the better in our system, and that the spirit of Civil Service Reform is making itself felt. Much still remains to be done before the offices are regarded as places to be filled by efficient officers, and not as sinecures for partisan workers, but it is gratifying to notice that we are moving in that direction.

THE PUBLIC WORKS

Of the year are worthy of recollection. Chief among them was the completion of the Washington Monument, which was first projected in 1783, and the erection commenced in 1848. It was formally dedicated on February 21st, and the reproach of ingratitude under which the nation lay was removed. A triumph of engineering skill, which, though local in situation, is of national interest, was the explosion of Flood Rock, in the vicinity of New York, on October 10th. Beneficent works of that character are milestones in the nation's advance in civilization. The rescue of Niagara from the hands of speculators, and the acquisition of its neighborhood as a public property, is a smaller matter; but, as the great cataract is annually visited by Europeans, its emancipation may do more than is perceptible at first sight to raise our national character in foreign esteem.

CRIME.

As usual, rears its head in any survey that we take of the year's events. This year, however, there have been few of those appalling outrages which have made other years memorable. Probably the most disgraceful on the list was the unprovoked outrage at Rock Springs, Wyoming, on September 2d, when five hundred

Chinese miners were brutally attacked, and fifty of them murdered. The shooting of O'Donovan Rossa by Mrs. Dudley, on February 2d, and the knifing of Captain Phelan in Rossa's office, on January 9th, were crimes that indicate the difficulties a nation has to confront when it becomes a popular place of refuge for discontented foreigners. Then, too, we had disturbances incidental to the antagonism of capital and labor, but, happily, they were characterized by less violence than in former years. The riots in Cleveland, O., in July, the car-drivers' disturbance in Chicago, in the same month, and in St. Louis in October, were among the most serious of these. Though the excesses were comparatively slight, there were signs which could not but cause uneasiness that the relations of capital and labor are still strained, and that the teachings of socialistic agitators are producing dangerous fruit. The of the year have also been less shocking than those that have made other years a terrible memory. The fire in the Philadelphia Lunatic Asylum, on February 12th, in which sixteen demented creatures perished, the mining disaster at Wilkesbarre, on August 11th, in which twelve lives were lost, and that on December 18th, in which twenty-six miners were entombed, are among the most prominent of these sad events. There have been tornadoes, too, which this year have been very destructive. On June 12th, and again two days later, Iowa was visited by these dreadful storms, and the loss of life and property was deplorable. On August 3d, Philadelphia and Camden had a similar experience. On August 25th, Charleston, S. C., had a visitation, in which the shipping in the harbor was nearly annihilated, and property in the city of the value of a million dollars was destroyed. Washington Court House, a prosperous town in Ohio, was the next sufferer. The whole town was demolished, fifteen persons were killed, and over three hundred wounded. Another distressing calamity was the fire at Galveston, Tex., on November 15th, which burned sixty blocks of houses, destroyed property worth two million dollars, and rendered hundreds of families homeless. An appalling visitation of another kind was the epidemic of typhoid fever, in May, at Plymouth, Pa., caused by polluted drinking water. At one time sixteen hundred people were suffering from the scourge, and the deaths were numerous.

Turning to the

history of the year, there is much cause for thankfulness. It has been a year of quickened spiritual life in all the churches, and many hitherto cold and lifeless have shaken off their apathy and given themselves to prayer and labor. The Conventions conducted by Mr. Moody at Northfield, Mass., Brooklyn, N. Y., Washington, D. C., Richmond, Va., and other cities, have been fruitful in stirring up slothful Christians to active service, and it seems probable that the changed method of operations adopted by the great evangelist will lead to results more extended and more sustained than even those in which he has spoken directly to the unconverted. A more striking manifestation of Christian activity is the Advent Mission in the Protestant Episcopal churches of New York, because heretofore that denomination has refrained more generally than other churches from special efforts of this character. The noonday services in Trinity Church, at which bankers and brokers attended in large numbers, were a feature of the mission full of interest to the Christian observer. The Conventions on Holiness and Divine Healing also are a prominent characteristic of the spiritual life of this year. A fervor and intense yearning for nearness to God has been manifested at the conferences, which has impressed even those who were sceptical about the doctrines advocated. One event, however, which will render this year conspicuous in the annals of the Christian Church, is the completion of the Revised Bible, which was given to the public on May 21st, exactly four years after the Revised New Testament was issued. The new version of the Old Testament aroused less adverse criticism than did the New, the revisers having been more conservative than their colleagues in the great work. There are signs that the new version is growing in favor, and that as the older generation disappears it will continue to gain the confidence of the people.

IN CANADA

two causes combined to render the year memorable. One was the outbreak with unusual violence of the small-pox in Montreal; and the other the half-breed rebellion in the northwest in March. After inflicting serious losses, and causing the death of many worthy and brave citizens, the half-breeds were at length overcome, and Riel, their leader, was captured. Strong efforts were made to induce the Government to spare his life, but he was tried, condemned, and executed, much to the displeasure of the French citizens of the Dominion.

IN ENGLAND

the year has been one of turmoil, political excitement, uneasy apprehension, and social agitation. No sooner had the year opened than a dynamite outrage, the work of Irish miscreants, alarmed all London. That was in the underground railroad, but three weeks later—on January 24th—a more daring plot was successfully executed, and a portion of the Houses of Parliament was destroyed. Again, on April 23d, dynamite was employed, and one of the Government offices was wrecked. Beside this trouble, all England was distressed by dread of a calamity in the Sudan, where General Gordon was bravely holding out with a mere handful of troops against the hordes of the Mahdi. Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues left the Christian hero to his fate until the indignation of the people grew so intense that the Cabinet was threatened with loss of their offices. Then they sent an expedition badly equipped by a circuitous route to the relief of the city. The expedition performed prodigies of valor under cruel disadvantages. General Stewart, General Erle, Colonel Burnaby, and other distinguished officers and large numbers of men less distinguished, sacrificed their lives; and, when the expedition arrived at its destination, on January 28th, it found that Khartoum had fallen two days before, and Gordon had been killed.

The nation had not recovered from this calamity when it passed into a season of horrible dread of a war with Russia. Early in March it was announced that Russia was advancing on territory claimed by Afghanistan, and it appeared probable that Afghanistan itself would fall into its clutches. England, trembling for her Indian Empire, prepared to fight for the maintenance of the Afghan power, which is all that lies between English and Russian territory in Asia. Parliament voted $5,000,000 as a war credit, the reserves were called out, and war seemed inevitable. It was not until June that the danger passed away and England once more breathed freely.

Treading close upon the heels of this excitement came a political crisis. Mr. Gladstone's followers were divided among themselves. Discontent was growing all the spring, and on June 8th, in a division of the House of Commons, Mr. Gladstone was outvoted and resigned. He was succeeded by the Marquis of Salisbury and a Conservative Cabinet. During this month a new House of Commons has been elected with a momentous result. Mr. Parnell, with a compact body of eighty-six Irish members pledged on their oath to obey him implicitly, now holds the balance of power. Neither Liberals nor Conservatives can pass a party measure without Irish aid, and it is in Mr. Parnell's power to paralyze public business.

Beside these weighty causes for public excitement there has been a painful social agitation. It has long been known to social reformers that wealthy aristocrats and men of social standing have been guilty of gross immorality, and have actually dealt at recognized agencies, where, by paying a specified sum of money, young and innocent girls were supplied to them for immoral purposes. The social reformers for a long time agitated for the enactment of a law for the better protection of female children, but members of Parliament were among the sinners, and there being no public pressure, they refused to pass the law. In order to arouse public opinion the editor of the Pall Mall Gazette made a public exposure of the crimes, and immediately a storm was aroused which drove the members of Parliament to the performance of their duty. The Archbishop of Canterbury, Cardinal Manning, Mr. Spurgeon, Rev. Newman Hall, and other divines, indorsed the action of the journalist. Unhappily he suffered in the storm he had raised, and the vengeance of his enemies, whose backs were tingling from the strokes of his lash, fell upon his head. He was sent to prison for three months, and he is there now.

OTHER EUROPEAN NATIONS

have not escaped trial. The sudden rising in the Balkans is too recent to need detailed record here. Roumelia, on September 18th, threw off the Turkish yoke and united herself with Bulgaria, thereby setting Austria and Russia in antagonism that even yet may end in war. Greece, Turkey, and Germany watch the development of events with anxiety, and each stands with hand on sword ready to join in the fray. In France the elections have resulted in the downfall of the party organized by Gambetta, and society watches nervously the approach of a crisis in which the country will have to choose between a government by a monarchy or anarchy under the Commune. Spain has narrowly escaped a conflict with Germany. The latter Power seized one of the Caroline Islands to which Spain has a traditional claim, and the Spaniards for a few days were carried away by the war fever. Happily Germany agreed to submit the question in dispute to the arbitration of the Pope, and war was averted. Again, this year, Spain has suffered from an outbreak of cholera. It was more fatal than in previous years, and upward of nine thousand people died during the epidemic. Among other calamities reported from abroad was a disastrous inundation in China in September. The city of Canton was almost devastated, and upward of ten thousand persons were drowned. A second terrible visitation was an earthquake in Cashmere, which overthrew seventy thousand houses and killed upward of three thousand persons.

DEATH

has been busy during the year on both sides the Atlantic, and many whom the world revered have passed away. Foremost on the list of our own losses is the name of General Grant. In February, the country was shocked by the announcement that its most distinguished citizen was suffering from cancer of the throat. The whole people sympathized with him in his agony, and admired the patience and fortitude which he exhibited. All that medical skill could do for him was done, but without avail. On July 23d he died, and at his funeral the surviving generals who had fought under him, and those who had fought against him, met in friendly companionship in sorrow as they followed his remains to the tomb. Among other prominent men who have passed from our midst this year are: Vice-President Hendricks, General George B. McClellan, Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, Schuyler Colfax, Lieutenant Goringe, Robert Toombs, and W. H. Vanderbilt. The Church has lost the venerable Dr. Stephen H. Tyng, Dr. S. Irenæus Prime, Dr. Noah Schenck, Dr. Whedon, and many other loved and useful men.

Across the Atlantic the obituary list contains the names of the Earl of Shaftesbury, Earl Cairns, Lord Houghton, and Bishops Fraser, Moberly, Woodford and Jackson. The philanthropic Jewish centenarian, Sir Moses Montefiore, also at last passed away. On the Continent, too, there were several men of great name laid low. Victor Hugo, Frederick Charles, the Red Prince of Germany, and the King of Spain were the most prominent of death's victims.

THE MANGER.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon preached last Sunday Morning, December 27, 1885.

"Ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger. And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host."—LUKE 2:12, 13.

The Offender's Hope—The Two Doors of Christ's Life—Christmas Reunion in Heaven—The Door the Angels Forget to Shut—The Raft in Mid-ocean—The Ship of Perfection—Merry Christmas.

At midnight from one of the galleries of the sky a chant broke. To an ordinary observer there was no reason for such a celestial demonstration. A poor man and wife—travellers, Joseph and Mary by name—had lodged in an outhouse of an unimportant village. The supreme hour of solemnity had passed, and upon the pallid forehead and cheek of Mary God had set the dignity, the grandeur, the tenderness, the everlasting and divine significance of motherhood.

But such scenes had often occurred in Bethlehem, yet never before had a star been unfixed, or had a baton of light marshalled over the hills winged orchestra. If there had been such brilliant and mighty recognition at an advent in the House of Pharaoh, or at an advent in the House of Caesar, or the House of Hapsburg, or the House of Stuart we would not so much have wondered; but a barn seems too poor a centre for such delicate and archangelic circumstance. The stage seems too small for so great an act, the music too grand for such unappreciative auditors, the window of the stable too rude to be serenaded by other worlds.

It is my joy this morning to tell you what was born that night in the village barn; and as I want to make my discourse accumulative and climactic, I begin, in the first place, by telling you that that night in

was born encouragement for all the poorly started. He had only two friends—they His parents. No satin-lined cradle, no delicate attentions, but straw, and the cattle, and the coarse joke and banter of the camel drivers. No wonder the mediæval painters represent the oxen as kneeling before the infant Jesus, for there were no men there at that time to worship. From the depths of that poverty He rose until to-day He is honored in all Christendom, and sits on the imperial throne in heaven.

What name is mightiest to-day in Christendom? Jesus. Who has more friends on earth than any other being? Jesus. Before whom do the most thousands kneel in chapel and church and cathedral this hour? Jesus. From what depths of poverty to what height of renown! And so let all those who are poorly started remember that they cannot be more poorly born, or more disadvantageously, than this Christ. Let them look up to His example while they have time and eternity to imitate it.

Do you know that the vast majority of the world's deliverers had barnlike birthplaces? Luther, the emancipator of religion, born among the mines. Shakespeare, the emancipator of literature, born in an humble home at Stratford-on-Avon. Columbus, the discoverer of a world, born in poverty at Genoa. Hogarth, the discoverer of how to make art accumulative and administrative of virtue, born in an humble home at Westmoreland. Kitto and Pridaux, whose keys unlocked new apartments in the Holy Scriptures which had never been entered, born in want. Yea, I have to tell you that nine out of ten of the world's deliverers were born in want.

I stir your holy ambitions to-day, and I want to tell you, although the whole world may be opposed to you, and inside and outside of your occupations or professions there may be those who would hinder your ascent, on your side and mistled in your behalf are the sympathetic heart and the almighty arm of One who one Christmas night about eighteen hundred and eighty years ago was wrapped in swaddling clothes and laid in a manger. Oh, what magnificent encouragement for the poorly started!

II. Again, I have to tell you that in that village barn that night was born

GOOD WILL TO MEN,

whether you call it kindness, or forbearance, or forgiveness, or gentility, or affection, or love. It was no sport of high heaven to send its favorite to that humiliation. It was sacrifice for an rebellious world. After the calamity in Paradise, not only did the ox begin to gore, and the deer to sting, and the elephant to smite with its tusk, and the lion to put to bad use tooth and paw, but under the very tree from which the forbidden fruit was plucked were hatched out war and revenge and malice and envy and jealousy, and the whole brood of cockatrices.

But against that scene I set the Bethlehem manger, which says, "Bless rather than curse, endure rather than assault," and that Christmas light puts out vindictiveness. It says, "Sheathe your sword, dismount your guns, dismantle your batteries, turn the warship Constellation, that carried shot and shell, into a grain ship to take food to famishing Ireland, hook your cavalry horses to the plow, use your deadly gunpowder to blasting rocks and in patriotic celebration, stop your lawsuits, quit writing anonymous letters, extract the sting from your sarcasm, let your wit coruscate but never burn, drop all the harsh words out of your vocabulary—"Goodwill to men."

"Oh, you say, 'I can't exercise it; I won't exercise it until they apologize; I won't forgive them until they ask me to forgive them.' You are no Christian then—I say you are no Christian, or you are a very inconsistent Christian. You forgive not men their trespasses, how can you expect your Heavenly Father to forgive you? Forgive them if they ask your forgiveness, and forgive them anyhow. Shake hands I around. "Good-will to men."

Oh, my Lord Jesus, drop that spirit into all our hearts this Christmas hour! I tell you more than anything else—more helping hands, more sympathetic hearts, more kind words that never die, more disposition to give other people a ride, and to carry the heavy end of the load and give other people the light end, and to ascribe good motives instead of bad, and to find our happiness in making others happy.

Out of that Bethlehem crib let the bear and the lion eat straw like an ox. "Good-will to men." That principle will yet settle all controversies, and under it the world will keep on improving until there will be only two antagonists all the earth, and they will side by side take a jubilant sleigh-ride intimated by the prophet when he said, "Holiness shall be on the bells of horses."

III. Again, I remark that born that Christmas night in the village barn was sympathetic UNION WITH OTHER WORLDS.

Move that supernatural grouping of the cloud kings over Bethlehem, and from the special aims that ran down to the scene I find that our world is beautifully and gloriously and magnificently surrounded. The meteors are with us, and one of them ran to point down to the birthplace. The heavens are with us, because at the thought of our redemption they roll hosannas to the midnight sky.

Oh, yes, I do not know but our world may be better surrounded than we have sometimes imagined; and when a child is born angels chime it, and when it dies angels take it, and when an old man bends under the weight of his angels uphold him, and when a heart aches angels soothe it. Angels in the hospital take care of the sick. Angels in the cemetery to watch our dead. Angels in church ready to fly heavenward with the news of repentant souls. Angels above the world. Angels under the world. Angels all around the world.

Rub the dust of human imperfection out of your eyes, and look into the heavens and see angels of pity, angels of mercy, angels of pardon, angels of help, angels crowned, angels charioted. The world defended by angels, girded by angels, cohorted by angels—clouds of angels. Hear David cry out, "The chariots of God are twenty thousand. Even thousands of angels." But the mightiest angel stood not that night in the clouds over Bethlehem; the mightiest angel that night lay among the cattle—the Angel of the new covenant.

As the clean white linen was being wrapped around the little form of that Child Emperor, not a cherub, not a seraph, not an angel, not a world but wept and thrilled and shouted. Oh, yes, our world has plenty of sympathizers! Our world is only a silver rung of a great ladder at the top of which is our Father's house. No more stellar solitariness for our world, no other friendless planets spun out into space to freeze, but a world in the bosom of divine maternity. A star harnessed to a manger.

IV. Again, I remark that that night born in that village barn was

THE OFFENDER'S HOPE.

Some sermonizers may say I ought to have projected this thought at the beginning of the sermon. Oh, no! I wanted you to rise toward it. I wanted you to examine the cornelians and the jaspers and the emeralds and the chrysalis before I showed you the Kohinoor—the crown jewel of the ages. Oh, that jewel had a very poor setting! The cub of bear is born amid the grand old pillars of the forest, the whelp of lion takes its first step from the jungle of luxuriant leaf and wild flower, the kid of goat is born in cavern chandelied with stalactite and pillared with stalagmite. Christ was born in a bare barn.

Yet that nativity was the offender's hope. Over the door of heaven are written these words: "None but the sinless may enter here." "Oh, horror," you say, "that shuts us all out!" No. Christ came to the world in one door, and He departed through another door. He came through the door of the manger, and He departed through the door of the sepulchre, and His one business was so to wash away our sin that after we are dead there will be no more sin about us than about the eternal God. I know that is putting it strongly, but that is what I understand by full remission. All erased, all washed away, all scoured out, all gone. That undergirding and overarching and irradiating and imparading possibility for you, and for me, and for the whole race that was given that Christmas night.

Do you wonder we bring flowers to-day to celebrate such an event? Do you wonder that we take organ and cornet and youthful voice and queenly soloist to celebrate it? Do you wonder that Raphael and Rubens and Titian and Giotto and Ghirlandajo, and all the old Italian and German painters gave the mightiest stroke of the painters to sketch the Madonna Mary and her boy?

Oh! now I see

WHAT THE MANGER WAS.

Not so high the gilded and jeweled and embroidered cradle of the Henrys of England, or the Louis of France, or the Fredericks of Prussia. Now I find out that that Bethlehem crib fed not so much the oxen of the stall as the white horses of Apocalyptic vision. Now I find the swaddling clothes enlarging and emblazoning into an imperial robe for a conqueror. Now I find that the star of that Christmas night was only the diamonded sandal of Him who hath the moon under His feet. Now I come to understand that the music of that night was not a completed song, but only the stringing of the instruments for a great chorus of two worlds, the bass to be carried by earthly nations saved, and the soprano by kingdoms of glory won.

Oh, heaven, heaven, heaven! I shall meet you there. After all our imperfections are gone, I shall meet you there. I look out to-day, through the mists of years, through the fog that rises from the cold Jordan, through of solid pearl to that reunion. I expect to see you there as certainly as I see you here. What a time we shall have in high converse, talking over sins pardoned, and sorrows comforted, and battles triumphant!

Some of your children have already gone. I have buried some of them, and though people passing along the street and seeing white crape on the door-bell may have said: "It is only a child," yet when the broken-hearted father came to solicit my service, he said: "Come around and comfort us, for we loved her so much."

What a Christmas morning it will make when those with whom you used to keep the holidays are all around you in heaven! Silver-haired old father young again, and mother who had so many aches and pains and decrepitudes well again, and all your brothers and sisters and the little ones. How glad they will be to see you! They have been waiting. The last time they saw your face it was covered with tears and distress, and pallid from long watching, and one of them I can imagine to-day, with one hand holding fast the shining gate, and the other hand swung out toward you, saying:

"Steer this way, father, steer straight for me; Here safe in heaven I am waiting for thee."

Oh those Bethlehem angels, when they went back after the concert that night over the hills, forgot to shut the door! All the secret is out. No more use of trying to hide from us the glories to come. It is too late to shut the gate. It is blocked wide open with hosannas marching this way, and hallelujahs marching that way. In the splendor of the anticipation I feel as if I were dying—not physically, for I never was more well—but in the transport of the Christmas transfiguration.

What almost unmanly me is the thought that it is provided for such sinners as you and I have been. If it had been provided only for those who had always thought right, and spoken right, and acted right, you and I would have had no interest in it, had no share in it; you and I would have stuck to the raft mid-ocean, and let the ship sail by, carrying perfect passengers from a perfect life on earth to a perfect life in heaven.

Oh! I have heard the commander of that ship is the same great and glorious and sympathetic One who hushed the tempest around the boat on Galilee, and I have heard that all the passengers on the ship are sinners saved by grace. And so we hail the ship, and it bears down this way, and we come by the side of it and ask the captain two questions: "Who art Thou? and whence?" and He says: "I am Captain of Salvation, and I am from the manger." Oh, bright Christmas morning of my soul's delight! Chime all the bells.

MERRY CHRISTMAS!

Merry with the thought of sins forgiven, merry with the idea of sorrows comforted, merry with the raptures to come. Oh, lift that Christ from the manger and lay Him down in all our hearts! We may not bring to Him as costly a present as the Magi brought, but we bring to His feet and to the manger to-day the frankincense of our joy, the prostration of our worship.

Down at His feet, all churches, all ages, all earth, all heaven. Down at His feet the four-and-twenty elders on their faces. Down the "great multitude that no man can number." Down Michael, the archangel! Down all worlds at His feet and worship. "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will to men!"

Seven per cent Secure Investment: The sum of $2000 is wanted for a term of three years or longer, on mortgage, on a brick church with stone foundation (now permanently occupied), with accompanying land, which cost altogether about $400, in the midst of a prosperous town. THE YOUNG WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

In our issue of December 10th we reported the laying of the foundation-stone of the new building being erected in East Fifteenth Street, near Fifth Avenue, New York, for the use of the Young Women's Christian Association. This week, on another page, is a picture of the edifice as it will appear when completed. It is in the Queen Anne style of architecture, with a facade of rough-hewn stone and pressed brick, and will be five stories high. It will cover almost the entire plot owned by the Association, which is 75 feet by 103 feet. It will contain a large library and reading-room, a parlor, an employment office, and educational and industrial class-rooms, and will cost, with the furnishing, $125,000. No little skill has been displayed by the architects in the design of the building to render it suitable for the purposes of an association engaged in many and various forms of usefulness. It will be a substantial edifice, commanding in appearance, severely plain, as becomes an institution whose funds are needed for its Christian work, yet tasteful and elegant, as a building consecrated to God's service ought to be.

The need of such a building has long been severely felt. When Christian people give themselves to work for the Lord, and especially when they do not limit their efforts to the conversion of the souls of their fellow-creatures, but, following the Saviour's example, seek to help them in their temporal affairs, they always find abundant opportunities for labor. Religion and philanthropy are well-mated sisters, or, rather, when Christ's Spirit is rightly understood philanthropy is the offspring of religion, and the world is deplorably in need of both. There are no bounds to the beneficent work they can do, and that fact has been realized by the ladies of the association. Their philanthropy has been of the best and wisest kind. It did not consist in doling out money to the indigent, though in cases of sickness and misfortune, when a temporary pecuniary gift is needed, it has not been withheld; but the great object was to help the needy to help themselves. The ladies of the association organized free classes in phonography, type-writing, commercial arithmetic, writing, book-keeping, machine and hand sewing, cutting and fitting, photo-coloring, drawing, etc., established a library and reading-room, organized a bureau for obtaining situations, and another bureau for the employment of seamstresses, and in many other ways intelligently arranged for the promotion of the temporal well-being of the young women of the city.

It is not surprising that the association rooms became a busy place. There are thousands upon thousands of young women who need the assistance and counsel of such an association, and the vast army is ever increasing. Already the disproportion in the male and female population in New York is marked as it is in Massachusetts, and the young women of the country, like their brothers, are still thronging to the city. Young girls are here, some of them only fourteen years of age, wholly or partially dependent on their own exertions for their bread, and all alone among the temptations of a great city. At the association they found help, comfort, virtuous companionship, and good advice, and they went there in crowds. Last year instruction was given to 683 girls, 17,679 volumes were loaned from the library, 1225 positions were secured, and $1805.52 were paid to seamstresses, and this was only part of the year's work which was carried on.

How so much work was accomplished in so small and inconvenient a place as that hitherto occupied, it is difficult to understand. It must have been done under serious disadvantages, and it is sad to think that many who sought to participate in its benefits had to be refused for lack of room. The small class-rooms, ill-ventilated and sadly inadequate to the needs of both teachers and pupils, tried health and eyesight,

In the overcrowded library and reading-room many a weary seeker after rest and refreshment failed to find a place. There was only an apology for a reception-room, and no hall large enough for a public lecture. It was painful to have to refuse the earnest appeal for help from the young girls who had to be excluded from the classes, which already filled the rooms almost to suffocation. Last year, during the month of September alone, nearly six hundred of such applicants had to be turned away for lack of room and means.

Thus, a new building became a necessity, and at length sufficient funds were in hand to justify the managers in commencing the work. We understand that in all between thirty and forty thousand dollars was secured before a stone was laid. A large sum still remains to be raised, but it should not be a difficulty in a city so wealthy as New York. A more useful or a more Christ-like work cannot be imagined. It is a purely beneficent work, unselfish and undenominational, a work that appeals to every man, religious or irreligious, who has opportunity of knowing in his own home the blessing of pure and virtuous womanhood, and contrasting it with the degraded creatures who have fallen before temptation. If the Christian men of this city who are desirous of elevating its moral tone once realize that the most efficient means to that end is to befriend and Christianize its large female population, and if they then give to this agency in the ratio of their means and its merits, the treasurer, Mr. James Talcott, 108 Franklin Street, will soon be able to announce that the deficiency has disappeared and the treasury is full.

JABEZ INWARDS.

PROMINENT in the ranks of temperance reformers must be placed the name of Mr. Jabez Inwards, who was born in the year 1817, and who died December 21st, 1880, at the age of sixty-three years. He was for the first twenty-one years of his life a "moderate drinker." He signed the pledge at Dunstable, England, in 1838. His first lecture was given on February 10th, 1840.

As a lecturer he was deservedly popular, making no compromise with the enemy—strong drink—but denouncing its manufacture and use in the strongest terms. Indeed, his audiences could not fail to be impressed with the fact that he was terribly in earnest. His style was peculiar to himself, highly figurative and flowery, and at times towering above the reach of some of his hearers. He had a commanding appearance, a portly form, a genial face, surrounded by a long flowing beard, giving him the appearance of a full-grown lion; but the lion could be roused, and his voice heard, and power felt, when he had to meet with opposition or annoyance.

Mr. Inwards was a lay preacher among the Baptists, to whose tenets he was much attached. He is well known in the literary world, several volumes and pamphlets from his pen having been published, his last work being "Memorials of Temperance Workers." His style as a speaker and author may be gathered from the following extracts from "Alcohol, a Prisoner at the Bar":

"He is a thief, inasmuch as he has robbed England of her national glory; for, by his influence, she is known throughout civilized nations as one of the most drunken countries in the world, and though we are prepared to censure the vices of our fatherland, we will not give way to any one for the love we bear to our country. With one of our best poets we can say—

'England, with all thy faults, I love thee still.'

Yes, England has given birth to some of the brightest characters, whose names are enshrined in the literature of the world. What a pity that a country so fine, so populous, so powerful, should be straitened in its resources, and cramped in its efforts by this great destroyer. As we love our country we hate Alcohol; for where is the city, the town, or the hamlet where this poisoner has not poisoned the people? England's glory has been tarnished, her great men have fallen, her orators have been found in the gutters, her poets have been turned into sots, her pulpits have been disgraced, her sanctuaries defiled, and from the hearts of millions the song of praise has been hushed, and religion dethroned. Alcohol has not only deprived us of our national glory but has robbed us of our health! Oh, what a precious boon is health! Under its influence how harmoniously do all the wheels of the physical system revolve, and how pleasingly are all the senses of the system exercised. When the eye is healthy, how pleasant is the light? When the brain and the ear are right, how beautiful and melodious are sounds? How easily we can listen to the music of creation, the hum of the city, and the warblings of the denizens of the forest. How free is thought; the mind becomes etherealized, and the range of its vision extended. Body, blessing and mind-expanding health! To preserve thee, how careful we are! We build our houses, make our clothes, and rigidly adhere to the prescriptions of the professional and the learned, and yet, strange to say, while we are doing all these things we expose ourselves to the attacks of Alcohol, and by his influence millions are robbed of health, and are laid prostrate by his power."

THE EASTERN QUESTION AND PROPHECY.

By the Rev. H. Grattan Guinness.

The Days of Daniel Symbolize Years—The Appointed Time of the Gentiles 2520 Years—The First Step Toward Jewish Restoration in 1866—The Lunar Year the Proper Prophetic Measure—Jerusalem to be Liberated in 1889—The Closing Scenes.

To the statements made in the previous article, each of which is absolutely unquestionable, I add two more, universally and unhesitatingly admitted by the greater number of those who have studied the predictions of Scripture in the light of history, including Sir Isaac Newton and a host of other eminent men.

(1) That the days in Daniel's prophecy are symbols for years, "time, times, and a half," or three and a half years, or 1260 days, meaning 1260 years, and 1290 days similarly meaning 1290 years.

(2) That twice 1260 years, or 2520 years, are the appointed length of "the times of the Gentiles," or the interval between the commencement of the Babylonian captivity in the days of Jehoakim and the still future deliverance of Israel. This period is the great "seven times" of prophecy, the lifetime, if I may so say, of the fourfold image of Gentile monarchy, shown to Nebuchadnezzar. It is the period spoken of by our Lord in the passage, "Jerusalem shall be trodden down by the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles" be fulfilled.

To adduce proof of these two last statements would, of course, be impossible here. For the present I take these positions for granted, as they are indorsed by the wisest and most learned prophetic interpreters.

THE 1260 YEARS

of the prophecy we are considering is the latter half of this great week of years. It measures in Scripture prophecy and in actual history various great episodes of Jewish and Church history, extending from several different starting-points to several corresponding termini, as I may perhaps show in another article. In the prophecy we are now considering (Dan. 12) it leads up to the conclusion of the scattering of the power of the holy people; while with the addition of thirty years, making it 1290, it brings the deliverance of Jerusalem from "the abomination that maketh desolate" (Dan. 12:7, 11).

We have seen that the Year 1860 witnessed the first stage of the removal of Mohammedan power from Syria, and the formation of the "Universal Israelite Alliance." It may consequently be regarded as the first commencement of the reconstitution of the Jewish nation. It marks the first close of "the scattering of the power of the holy people," and the first loosening of the grasp of the Mohammedan conqueror on the Holy Land. It may be regarded consequently as in a sense the era of incipient Jewish restoration.

Now the question arises, How is this year, 1860, related chronologically, first, to Nebuchadnezzar's capture of Jerusalem in the days of Zedekiah, and, secondly, to the Mohammedan capture of Jerusalem in the time of the Caliph Omar? The answer is solemn, and profoundly interesting.

It is separated from A.D. 637—the date of the Omar capture by exactly 1260 lunar years, and it is separated from B.C. 587, the date of the Zedekiah capture, by precisely double that interval, 2520 lunar years, or "seven times" on the lunar scale. In other words, the Saracenic conquest of Jerusalem, A.D. 637, exactly bisects of the great week of "the times of the Gentiles," reckoned on the lunar scale. Any one can prove this by making the requisite calculations for himself, remembering that 1260 lunar years are only 1222½ solar, and that in adding A.D. to B.C. periods one year must always be subtracted.

Add the Omar date, A.D. 637, to the Zedekiah date, B.C. 587 (fifth month), subtracting one, and the result is 1222½; add a second 1222½ to the central Omar date, and it brings you to the incipient restoration date, A.D. 1860. This year, 1860, is therefore removed by "seven times" lunar, from the completion of Jewish desolation, in the eleventh year of Zedekiah; and it is "time, times and a half" from Omar's capture of Jerusalem.

INTENTIONAL MYSTERY.

It is owing to the fact that it is the lunar year which has been divinely employed in the chronological prediction that its fulfilment is not more commonly recognized. The Mohammedans, however, use the lunar year. Their calendar is exclusively lunar, as is well known. Hence it was appropriate that the lunar year should be used in chronological statement as to their history. Its employment is, moreover, one means by which a veil of intentional mystery has been thrown over the subject. This prophecy itself distinctly asserts that its own chronological statements were not intended to be clearly understood at the time it was given, nor for long afterward: "The words are closed up and sealed until the time of the end," and only godly students were ever to understand it. "None of the wicked shall understand, but the wise shall understand," i.e., in "the time of the end."

But to proceed. An addition of thirty years, or a prophetic month, to the main period of 1260 is, according to this prophecy, to end the reign of the final desolator of Jerusalem, to bring to a close Mohammedan rule in Syria. Now 1860, plus thirty lunar years, is 1889, four years from the present time. In that year, 1888-89, consequently, we may expect to see Jerusalem liberated from Turkish power, though it is impossible to say at present by what means or with what direct and immediate result.

The prophecy does not state that the full restoration of Israel will take place at that date, nor is it likely so to do;

THE RENAISSANCE

of a nation does not take place in a year nor in a decade. Like the fall of a nation, it has many stages, and it may stretch over a considerable time. The renaissance of Israel has already been going on for one hundred years or more; the removal of civil disabilities by emancipation bills passed by all the governments of Europe since the French Revolution; the consequent advance of the Jews in power, wealth, and learning, in numbers, influence, and social status, are proofs of the fact.

Much, however, remains to be done before a revived Jewish nation will be seen in Palestine;

but events move quickly in these days, and great changes come about in short periods. We say nothing here, be it observed, as to the date of the restoration of Israel—that great event will not probably have any date—it will mark an era, not a year, and that era is undoubtedly the nineteenth century. Jewish restoration has begun, and will go on with ever-increasing velocity. But the fact to which I call attention in connection with the present crisis is that an event which must have a material influence on Jewish restoration—the liberation of the Holy Land and Jerusalem from Moslem tyranny—seems, according to prophecy, due to take place in 1888-89.

THE FUTILE BRITISH PLEDGE.

In a Prophetic Conference convened by the Rev. M. Baxter last May in Exeter Hall, London, I pointed solemnly to this fact, and indicated 1889 as a probable year of crisis in the overthrow of Turkish power in Syria, in order to the restoration of the Jews. I pointed out that Lord Beaconsfield's "Anglo-Turkish Convention" treaty could not stand, because it was in opposition to the counsels of God. In it he pledged England to uphold the Turkish power in Asia, including, of course, Syria and Palestine. The omnipotent God, on the other hand, had determined that Palestine and Jerusalem should be freed, and freed speedily from Moslem domination; and what are statesmen that they should withstand God? The treaty is already broken, and no effort to maintain Turkey will be of any use.

It will be intensely interesting to Bible students to watch the development of the next few years. That we are living in the rapids of the last days no intelligent Christian can doubt. The final prophecies of Scripture are year by year fulfilling before our eyes; the sceptical generation which boldly denied the occurrence or possibility of miracle in the world of matter, is thus confronted with what is even more wonderful miracle in the world of mind; miracle in the realm of history. It is witnessing the fulfilment of predictions, made twenty-five centuries ago, by "holy men of God, who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Lady's Impressive Dream.—At a Recent Gospel service an incident was related of a lady who was the subject of a remarkable and impressive dream. She thought she saw an awful thunderstorm, which quickly passed away, and the moon shone forth with great brilliancy upon the then cloudless sky. As she gazed with wonder at the sudden change, the moon appeared to assume a variety of forms, eventually taking the shape of a hand, which she thought was the hand of God. It held a large pen, and wrote upon the face of the heavens her name, with the solemn words, "Prepare to meet thy God." Filled with terror she awoke, glad to find it was only a dream; but though a dream, it became in the hands of the Spirit of God as a nail fastened in a sure place. Wherever she went the words seemed to stand out before her. She felt God must be met, she knew not how soon, and she was unprepared; but in her distress, as thousands have done before, she flew to Jesus, the one appointed Saviour, and in Him found the true preparation for meeting God.

Advised to Burn the Bible.—A Young Woman came into our Gospel tent. She was very desirous of becoming a Christian, but her great difficulty was how to believe in Christ. When I asked her how she could not believe, "I do not know," was her answer. "I try to believe, but cannot do it." "Do you believe that Christ came into the world to save sinners?" "Yes." "Is He willing to save every one but you?" "No; I believe He is willing to save me." Then she asked, "Do you think Christ has given me a heart to believe? Do you not think He has taken His Holy Spirit from me?" "No," I said; "the very fact that you are anxious is a sure sign that He has not taken His Holy Spirit from you." After prayer she went home. Next night she was at the service again, and on speaking to her I found her exactly in the same condition as before. I said, "Well, you had better go home and burn your Bible." "Why?" she asked, with a look of astonishment. "Well, it does not appear to me that there is any use in you keeping it longer; for of all the truths and promises which God has given in it, none seem to be for you." "Oh, but I could not dare to do that," she said, bursting into tears; and then, rising from her seat, she went away home crying. Curiously enough, this proved to be the grand turning-point. Next night she came again, and it needed but a glance to see that a great change had taken place in her experience. She told me how much my words about burning her Bible had troubled her.

A Nun's Discovery.—The Rev. Mr. Gault said: "In a London church one of the most earnest and exemplary members is a lady who in her youth lived in a convent for a number of years. She had been placed there by her parents when very young, and therefore had never heard anything of the true salvation. But she somehow got hold of a book which told of Christ's sufferings for her, and the thought entered her mind, 'If Jesus loved me and shed His blood for me, why could I not go right to Him myself, instead of getting an angel or a saint to intercede for me?' Her whole mind was filled with this new idea, and when the priest came to visit her, she informed him of what she had been thinking, when he angrily commanded her to banish the thought at once; that it was only a temptation from the devil. She did not let it rest here, but went to another priest about it; he also told her that it was a wrong idea, and that it was sinful to entertain such a thought. But still, being a young lady of a determined will, she did not rest until she was expelled from the convent. She went to her father's house, but was turned from the door, being told that she was a disgrace to the family. Her faith in her new belief did not weaken, and having a good education, and being gifted with an energetic mind, she battled the world with no earthly friend; but God was her helper. She married a God-fearing man, and now both are devoted members of a Christian church."

A Rebellious Father's Dream.—Mr. Cruikshanks observed: "I knew a man who was very wealthy, and had all the comforts and enjoyments that money could procure or this life afford. But for all the material blessings that were showered upon him he was a hardened sinner. A little and much loved child was taken from his side. Instead of this bereavement drawing or driving him to God, he became very angry, and had harder thoughts of God than ever. When his friends tried to soothe him he angrily replied, 'Do you mean to tell me that God is a God of love? I do not believe it.' The memory of his child so much occupied his thoughts by day that he dreamt about her by night. He dreamt one night that he was pacing about his room in an angry and rebellious mood against God, and leaving the house, he walked to the edge of a stormy river. As he stood looking into the water he seemed to hear the voice of his departed child speaking to him through the storm. In gentle accents she called from the other side, 'Come right this way, father; it is beautiful over here.' He looked around in wonder, expecting to behold his child, but nothing was to be seen but the stormy billows and the bleak beach. Again he heard the voice calling to him, 'Come right this way, father; it is beautiful over here.' The poor father was almost distracted. How could he reach his child? He did not know the way; he could not find a bridge to take him across, and as he stood wondering what he should do the voice of Christ whispered in his ear, 'I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life.' He awoke and found it was only a dream, but it was the grand turning-point of his life. He found the bridge that would carry him across the stormy river of life to his child."

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION, $1.50.

Remittances by mail should be by bank cheques, Post-office orders, or Postal notes, whenever possible. If currency is sent it should be in a registered letter. Cheques and money-orders should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Making them payable to individuals often causes delay.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

NOTICE.

NEW subscribers who may not know the rules adopted by the CHRISTIAN HERALD are informed that it does not take advantage of the law regulating newspaper subscriptions. When the term expires for which a subscription has been paid, the name of the subscriber is dropped from the list unless a renewal has been received. Experience teaches that this system is a saving of trouble both to subscribers and the office. The first number of the new year will, however, be sent to all, as some who intend to renew but are prevented by the engagements of the holidays might otherwise fail to secure that number.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Bitter Attack on the President and Secretary Manning was made on December 21st, in the Senate, by Senator Beck, of Kentucky. It was based on a motion made by the Senator instructing the Finance Committee to inquire whether the laws regarding the use to be made of coin received for duties on imported goods had been heretofore obeyed, and if not to report such measures as would secure their enforcement. The Kentucky Senator surprised his colleagues by making the assertion that three fourths of the business troubles of the country were due to the fact that the laws on the statute books were not enforced by the officers of the Treasury Department. The Senator was evidently referring to the silver policy of the Administration, on which there is a direct antagonism of opinion; but the piquancy of hearing a Democratic Senator denounce the Democratic President and Secretary evoked manifestations of delight from Republican Senators, who on this particular question agree with the President rather than with his opponent.

A Stringent Measure for the Suppression of polygamy was reported from the Judiciary Committee of the Senate last week by Senator Edmunds. It provides that in prosecutions for polygamy, the lawful wife of the accused may be required to testify; that every marriage ceremony in the Territories shall be certified in writing, the certificate to be signed by each of the parties and by the officer or priest performing the ceremony; that all records of marriages kept by officiating functionaries shall be subject to inspection by United States officials, and refusal to permit this is punishable by fine and imprisonment; that it shall not be lawful for any female to vote in any election hereafter held in the Territory of Utah; that the President shall appoint fourteen trustees to regulate the Mormon Church, who are to report what property is illegally held by that Church, and the Attorney-General is directed to institute proceedings for the forfeiture of such property, which is to be disposed off, and the proceeds applied to the purposes of education.

A Report Confirmed by Authorities Belonging to both political parties circulated last week is an encouraging sign that the President is attempting to secure Republican assistance in exercising his power of appointing to office. It is to the effect that he asked the Republican Senators who have called upon him to give him any good reasons they may have for rejecting his appointments, in order that he may withdraw any nominations that are not proper to be made. The Senators appear disposed to meet the President frankly, and to co-operate with him in preventing bad men getting into office.

A Disastrous Attack on United States Troops by an Apache ambush was made on December 10th. A company of the Eighth Cavalry, numbering thirty-five men in all, were quietly marching through a rocky defile in the mountains at about two o'clock in the afternoon, when suddenly, without a note of warning, the report of a dozen rifles from the rocks above echoed along the mountains. The Indians had secreted themselves behind high rocks, and there laid in wait for the unsuspecting soldiers. The attack was so sudden, so well directed and timed, that the troops were thrown into a state of great disorder. Their horses became unmanageable, and the little cavalcade got away from the spot as quickly as possible, leaving the dead behind. Scarcely an Indian was to be seen, and only the smoke of their rifles told where the Apaches lay hidden. The survivors returned later, but found that the Indians had fled after firing without waiting to mutilate the bodies. Two officers and four troopers were killed, and two officers dangerously wounded.

The Miners Entombed in the Nanticoke Mine were not found last week. The rescuing party, on December 21st, had a narrow escape of their lives. An immense mass of sand and water fell near to them, and they had to run for their lives. Had it fallen ten minutes earlier one hundred and fifty-five men would have been killed instantaneously. The majority of the miners have abandoned hope of rescuing their comrades. It appears that they cannot be dug out. New obstructions fall as fast as the first are removed. The only means of reaching them is to sink a shaft from the surface as near as possible over the spot where they are supposed to be. The company have offered the relatives of the entombed men $40,000 on condition that they consent to have the search abandoned and the mine walled up. There is, however, still a demand for the shaft to be made, as the men may be alive. They have good air, and if they were able to kill a mule its flesh would supply them with food. There are twenty-eight men entombed.

The Temperance Party at Atlanta, Ga. Secured another victory in the courts last week. Twice the liquor-sellers have obtained a temporary injunction delaying the declaration of the result of the recent contest. The first injunction was dissolved, and on Thursday last the second came up before Judge Clarke, of the State Supreme Court, who refused to extend it. The result was, therefore, declared. It stated the majority in favor of Prohibition at 228. Judge Clarke's decision was sufficiently emphatic. He said: "The Court has no power to interrupt an election, which is one of the most sacred rights of the people. This is a Government of the people, and the benefit of any doubt should be in favor of the vote of the people. Eight thousand people spoke their wishes in this county on the 25th of last month, and it is a matter of the gravest moment for any court or power to attempt to set aside that expression."

The liquor-sellers intend carrying the question to the Supreme Court. A statement which reads like a joke on the liquor men is that Judge Pardee, of the Federal Circuit Court, who was to try the suit to have the election declared void, has appointed Judge McCay to hear the case for him. Judge McCay has already decided it once.

Distinguished Honors are being Paid to Lieutenant Greely in England. On December 21st he delivered a lecture before the Royal Geographical Society, and was enthusiastically received. The Marquis of Lorne presided, and among the attendants were the Princess Louise, United States Minister Phelps and Mrs. Phelps, Sir Leopold Clendinning, Captain Sir George Nares, Captain Clements Markham, and Captain Sir Allen Young, the distinguished Arctic explorers; the Rev. George Rawlinson, the historian, and others well known in literary and scientific circles. Captain Sir George Nares eulogized Lieutenants Lockwood and Brainard, of the Greely expedition, who succeeded in planting the Stars and Stripes further north than had ever before been reached by man. Sooner or later, he said, England would reconquer the first honors in Arctic discovery. The Marquis of Lorne spoke in a similar strain, and said that England was as proud of Greely as if he was an Englishman.

A Statement of Mr. Parnell's Demands for Ireland, differing in several important respects from any heretofore promulgated, has been sent to the New York Times under some appearance of authority. It is based on the model of Canada. It was supposed that the Governor-General would be the first official whose place would be declared vacant, but this statement makes it appear that a Governor-General as a representative of, and a channel of communication with, the British Government is desired. An Irish statesman like Lord Dufferin is wanted. The Irish Parliament to consist of one House only, elected by the people, and to have control of the police and taxation. The veto power to be vested in the English Parliament, not in the crown. England to maintain at her own cost such garrisons as she chooses on the coast for the defence of the country from foreign foes. The chief point of difficulty is that Ireland wants the loan of sufficient money to buy the landlords out. There is no demand for representation in the English Parliament. This scheme is believed to be one which Mr. Gladstone would indorse. The Conservatives are now opposed to any concessions.

A Renewal of the Truce between Servia and Bulgaria has been arranged by the International Commission appointed to demarcate the frontier line. The same mediation has secured the evacuation by the Servians of Pirot, the town taken at the commencement of hostilities. A press correspondent who visited the Servian lines reports that a startling lack of discipline is shown by the army, and that an outbreak among the troops is not at all improbable. The life of King Milan, the correspondent adds, is constantly threatened. Prince Alexander entered Sofia on Saturday at the head of six regiments of infantry, one regiment of cavalry, and three batteries of artillery. He was received with great enthusiasm by the inhabitants. The city was gaily decked with flags and at night brilliantly illuminated. Many banners bearing patriotic inscriptions were displayed at various points along the line of march. One of these read, "Honor and glory to the victors of Slivnitsa, Dragoman Pass, Tsaribrod, and Pirot." The Czar of Russia has resumed friendly relations with Prince Alexander, and the probability of the maintenance of the union between Bulgaria and Roumelia is thus increased. The only fears entertained are that Austria will take up arms, being convinced that sooner or later a conflict with Russia is inevitable.

Wanted: A Sub-Editor for a Weekly Religious Paper. Must reside in Toronto, Canada, and give testimonials as to decided religious character and ability. State whether a short-hand writer. Address Trumpet, 38 Queen Street West, Toronto, Canada.

Christmas Contributions to the Fund for supplying colored ministers in the South with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD were received last week to the amount of $9.50. They were as follows: From Ishpeming, Mich., $1.50; South-bridge, Mass., $2; Lockport, N. Y., $2; New Milford, Ill., $1; Deadwood, Dak., $2; Sheldon, Ont., $1.

The Blackmailer of the Prince of Wales was held for trial on December 23d. His wife was discharged. In the letters read at the preliminary examination the prisoner said that his co-conspirators were Irish-Americans, bound under oath to assassinate the prince. He offered to betray them and give evidence against them at their trial if the money demanded was paid him. The man is reported perfectly sane, and the movements of the police indicate that they place some credence in his story. He will be tried next month.

A Treaty of Peace between France and Madagascar has been finally concluded. The Queen informed the French commander that she would never consent to a French protectorate of the island. M. Freycinet thereupon sent a revised draft of a treaty which did not contain the offensive clause. That, with some modifications, Queen Ranavaloa accepted. The treaty recognizes the Queen as sovereign over the whole island, and she agrees to pay an indemnity to foreign residents for their losses. The French pretensions in Madagascar were to the effect that under one of the treaties said to have been made in 1841 with a Sakalava chief, France had a right of protectorate over the northern portion of the island from sixteen degrees south latitude.

Mrs. M. Baxter and Mrs. Stroud Smith have been conducting meetings in Freeport, Ill., in which the first Methodist and the Baptist congregation united. It pleased God to bless the word to many. Souls were saved, believers quickened, and some also obtained physical healing. Mrs. Baxter and Mrs. Smith held meetings three times a day on Tuesday and Wednesday, December 22d and 23d at Aurora, Ill., in the Galena Street Methodist Episcopal Church. The last meeting was very much of a praise meeting, and the testimonies to blessing received during their visit were very numerous and blessed. Several of the ministers of various churches in Aurora attended the meetings, and expressed their gratitude for the work which God had been doing. Mrs. Baxter has been preaching at Kalamazoo, Mich., this week, and will assist in Dr. Cullis's Convention in Newark, N. J., commencing January 7th.

Mr. Noble's Meetings at Dayton, Ohio, were much blessed. A convention under the auspices of the W. C. T. U. and the Woman's Christian Association was held in the United Presbyterian Church on December 17th and 18th, in which Mr. Noble took part, and the clergymen of the city and prominent laymen delivered addresses. On December 19th a children's service was held in the rink. Mr. Noble spoke each evening in different churches in the city. On Sunday, December 20th, he addressed large audiences in the rink. The Dayton Religious Telescope says that Mr. Noble's addresses were full of good sense, underlying them and filling them was a profound strength and plan, and a depth of real sympathy of thought and utterance which touched the hearts of men.

The Cincinnati Young Men's Christian Association held a meeting of rejoicing on December 17th. It celebrated its thirty-seventh anniversary on that day. But a still more important occasion for rejoicing was the fact that the heavy debt which had rested so long upon their property has been removed. Within the preceding two weeks, through the munificent generosity of Mr. David Sinton, the property has come into the possession of the association with a clear and unincumbered title. Already the officers and managers are contemplating the purchase of a more desirable property in a better location. The association now numbers over one thousand members, is in the best of spirits, and was never before better equipped for aggressive work. During the whole of its existence it has never before been clear of debt. It now owns a fine building, which is already growing too small for its work.

A Mysterious Lady has Excited Considerable curiosity lately in Newburg, N. Y. On December 17th she presented herself at the poor-house, and asked to be admitted. She was very beautiful, was decently dressed, well educated, and willing to work. She was received, and easily earned the cost of her board as a seamstress. As she firmly refused to disclose her identity, efforts were made to find her family and friends. It was not until December 23d that the mystery was solved. It was found that, though only eighteen years old, she was the wife of a man of fifty, a respectable farmer, to whom she was married in October last. When the farmer took her to his home after the marriage, the wife objected to his keeping a favorite dog, of which she was in dread. As the farmer would not part with his dog, the young wife left him, and having no home went to Newburg and took refuge in the almshouse. Evidently the man could not have loved his wife much or he would have parted with his dog for her sake. We are naturally surprised that he did not, yet every day we see men brought near to a union with the Saviour which is never consummated, because there is something they treasure and ought to give up, but will not (Matt. 19: 22).

A Poisoned Mustache Has Caused a Death in Ohio. The Cleveland Plain Dealer, recording the recent death of a well-known grain-operator at Toledo, O., states that he died from a lingering sickness which puzzled his physicians. After his death many of his acquaintances, who had not seen him after he was taken ill, were surprised to notice that his hair and mustache were almost white. The man during his life had been noted for the glossy blackness of both. Looking closely at the hair, it could be seen that it had been dyed, and evidently he had been for years in the habit of dyeing it. A search led to the discovery of the hair-dye, and it was found to be a deadly poison. The symptoms which had puzzled his physicians were at once explained. He was in the habit of drinking large quantities of hot tea and coffee, and every cup strained through his mustache carried to the stomach minute portions of the poison with which it was saturated. The symptoms were precisely those the poison always produced when taken in small quantities. It was a fearful penalty to pay for the pleasure of looking younger than he was. A far worse penalty is often involved when men seek to give a false impression of their character. Some of these appeared in the early Church, as they appear in greater numbers in our day. The apostle warned them that they were in danger of death eternal (1 Cor. 11: 29, 30).

A Life Was Saved by Two Telegraph Operators on December 19th. Early in the morning of that day a young lady residing at Big Indian, N. Y., swallowed by mistake a large dose of laudanum. The parents of the girl went at once to the railway station to telegraph the nearest physician, who lives three miles off, to come quickly. The operator working the Big Indian wire in the main office of the Western Union Telegraph Company in New York, having overheard the message summoning the physician, asked the Big Indian operator about the case. Learning the situation of affairs, and appreciating the necessity of immediate medical treatment, he consulted with two brother operators on duty at the time, who had graduated from a medical college in New York. These two operators then told the Big Indian operator what remedies should be applied, and gave full directions as to treatment. Following their directions, powerful emetics were administered, which proved effective. They also prescribed vigorous rubbing to keep the girl awake. The physician, who arrived an hour later, said the girl's life could not have been saved had not the New York operators prescribed for her. It was prob-idental that the operators did not belong to the class of people who are averse to meddling with matters outside of their calling. Had they been like some Christians, who leave the work of saving souls to the clergy, the girl would have died (Num. 11: 29).

A Fortune Was Offered for a Wink of the eye, and rejected by a conscientious official some time ago. A contemporary, in the course of an article on finance, mentions that a broker heard a rumor that two great companies were negotiating an amalgamation. He perceived that an immense sum of money might be made by the purchase of shares at that day's rate if the amalgamation should be carried through. He knew a poor clerk in the employ of one of the companies who would know the exact truth about it, and he went to him, and telling him what he had heard, asked if it was true. "I cannot tell you without betraying my trust," said the clerk. "You need not tell me," said the broker. "If it is so, just wink your eye. I can make $300,000, and I will give you half." The clerk replied: "I cannot give you the information in any way," and the broker went away in a rage. A few days later the amalgamation was announced, and the broker, furious at having missed a good thing, reproached the clerk. "I did my duty," was the reply, "and my conscience approves. That is enough for me." In these days, when so many are ready to sell their very souls for money, it is impossible to think too highly of a man so conscientious (Matt. 16: 26).

How Patience May be Acquired was Explained recently by a dying hospital nurse. One of the New York Charity Commissioners was making his round at Bellevue Hospital, when he came to the bedside of a man dying of consumption, who for eighteen years has ministered to the wants of patients in that institution in a way to merit the commendation of all his superiors. He was considered one of the most expert "bandagers" in the world, and was often called upon to give instructions to the doctors and others in this work. In conversation with the Charity Commissioner the dying orderly said: "I feel that I have always done pretty well with the patients that have come under my charge, but now that I am stricken down myself I think that perhaps I did not have patience enough with them. If those in charge of sick people in hospitals knew what it was to be sick themselves I think they would deal more gently and leniently with those whom they have to tend." How many times has the principle underlying the dying man's words encouraged souls wounded and bleeding from sin. The great High Priest can be touched by the feeling of their infirmities (Heb. 2: 17, 18).

A Curious Old Legend is Narrated by a Citizen of Montreal, who says that it was popularly believed among the uneducated superstitious inhabitants of the city in his boyhood. He heard it from his nurse, who in that way accounted for the high winds which rage around the parish church in Notre Dame Street. She said that Satan, in person, was one day walking along Notre Dame Street with a clergyman, boasting of the extent of his power in that neighborhood. As they disputed they came to the church. "Come in," said the preacher, "and I will show you that here you will lose all your power." The devil consented, but as he was accompanied by a wind, he turned to the latter, and said: "You stay there till I come out." As the devil has not made his appearance, the wind has been hanging about there ever since. The legend does not say how it was that Satan did not return, and the believer is left to surmise that he was there stripped of his power, or that he found an absorbing occupation within that has kept him busy ever since. The latter would probably be the reason if there were any truth in the legend and if that church is like other churches. The Gospel seed, wherever sown, is fatal to Satan's power, and he is too crafty to let it germinate without making an effort to uproot it promptly (Matt. 13: 19).

BEATITUDE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Blessed is the man that endureth temptation; for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love him."—JAMES I: 12.

Happiness and Blessedness—A Contrast—Who are the Blessed?—I. The Blessed Man in the World—He Endures Temptation—Not from Policy—Sins that Kill each other—He is Humble—Fearless—The Back Door of Hell—II. The Blessed Man After Death—He Receives a Crown—The Crown of Life—The Olympian Crowns—A Central African Bulb.

THE text is a Beatitude. It begins with blessed. We should all like to be blessed. What a more than golden word that "blessed" is! It begins the Psalms of David; there is sweetest poetry in it. It begins the sermon of the Son of David; it is the end of all holy teaching. "Happiness" is the earthly word; "blessedness" is the heavenly one. Happiness may prove to be a superficial appearance; but blessedness is deep as the abyss. Happiness ripples like a flowing brook; but blessedness is a springing well. Happiness may be wholly human; but blessedness hath the divine element in it. Happiness is transient; blessedness is eternal. Happiness may lie in our own conception of things; blessedness is God's verdict. God's truthful statement of a man's condition. Happiness may prove but tinsel; blessedness is solid gold. Oh, to be blessed! Blessed of the Lord which made heaven and earth!

WHERE ARE THESE BLESSED MEN?

There are such still upon the earth, for the text saith, "Blessed is the man;" it speaks not of a phantom, but of a man; it treats not of an ideal man, but of one who is tried and made to endure temptation. I hear in this verse the echo of the music of many a psalm which was chanted by the saints hundreds of years before. James took pen in hand concerning blessed men, and of the like persons David long before had sung, as of men well known to him.

Where are these blessed men? Can we be of their number? Is there any way by which we can enter their ranks and become members of their glorious peerage? Blessed men! Henceforth we will not rest until we are initiated into this sacred fellowship.

Great mistakes are made as to the persons who are happy and blessed. Some suppose that the wealthy must be blessed; but if their lives were written, it could be proved to a demonstration that some of those who have had the largest possessions have had the very least of blessedness, especially when those possessions have brought with them the curses of the oppressed and the wailings of the down-trodden. It must be an awful thing to have tons of cankered gold and silver pressing upon the soul, and burying the true life beneath the accursed load. Ay, and when wealth comes justly it often brings such care, such burdensomeness with it, that it is well described in the Scriptures as a load of thick clay. No; look for blessedness, for it gleams not among the nuggets. It cannot be gotten for all the treasures of the miser, or the wealth of nations.

But, surely, it is to be found in positions of eminence and power. These are greatly coveted, and men will sell their souls to win them; but I suppose from what I have read of history that if I were to select the most unhappy set of men beneath the vault of heaven one would only have to select statesmen, emperors, and kings. Surely on the day of his installation the great man may well say, "Farewell peace!" Not the high but the holy are blessed; not those who sit with the great, but those who serve with the good are marked out of the Lord as blessed.

Nobler natures feel no greed for gold, and pine for no distinction of rank; but they count those blessed who know, and are stored with wisdom. Surely to pry into the secrets of nature, and read the pages of philosophy must be pleasure of a lofty kind. Hence ambitious youth burneth the midnight oil, and the oil from the marrow of life as well, hoping that in search and study the mystery of blessedness will be discovered. But is it so? Doth he that increaseth knowledge increase joy? Doth he not the rather add to his sorrow? In another school than that of Plato we must learn in whatsoever state we are therewith to be content. If you want blessedness, hear Him speak who knows. That is, hear the Holy Ghost speak by the mouth of His servant James: "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation." The subject for to-night shall be the blessed man in his worldly state, and, secondly, the blessed man in the world to come.

BLESSED MEN IN LIFE.

I. We are going to find him out first in this present world, and consider him in this present life. Let us behold the blessed in this life. "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation." It does seem very startling at first sight that the blessed man should be described in this way. Notice, it does not say, "Blessed is the man that is tempted," nor "Blessed is the man that is beset by temptation." No. "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation." That is to say, the man who bears up under it, survives it, is not led aside by it, but endures it as gold endures the fire.

Look, sirs, suppose we are professing Christians to-night, and, as such, think that we have genuine faith in Christ; that we have a bright hope of heaven; that we have a pure and fervent love to God; that we have in ourselves received the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit, and that we are certainly the children of God; this is a flattering belief, and tends greatly to our present comfort; but suppose none of these have been tried. It would be a very presumptuous and unwise thing for us to pronounce ourselves blessed; for when such trial shall come—and come it will to us all in life or in death—suppose all our happy signs and cheering tokens should fail us. We cannot say that we are blessed till our graces have been tried and proved; and when they have been tried and proved, and we have endured the test in God's great proof-house, then are we blessed, but not till then. Untried faith is questionable faith. Is it faith at all? Was there ever in this world a believer altogether without trouble, or a grain of faith which had undergone no trial?

TEMPTATIONS COMMON.

Every need to have a religion which is tested every day in the week, and which stands up in good stead because it can endure the test. You are blessed if you have a religion which God gives, which God tries, which God sustains, which God accepts. As an uncultivated garden is no garden, so untrod godliness is no godliness. A faith that will not bear strain and test is no faith. A love that cannot endure a temptation is no love to God at all. See, then, he is not blessed who is screened from temptation, but he is blessed whose faith, and hope, and love, and every grace will bear the trial.

In these times, we need not wish for more temptations, for they are all around us. Men who live in London need not go across the street to meet the devil. The very atmosphere of a great city is close and hot with the reek of sin. As flies in summer, so will temptations torment you, go where you may. Men of business, you need not ask for temptations; they are thick in every trade; they multiply like gnats. They swarm in the factory, the counting-house, the exchange, and the shop. The Christian man in public need not sigh for temptations; they will not be ashamed to solicit him in the open streets. This age tests the backbone of every Christian. A man had need be a man at such an hour as this. We must not be dwarfs nor spiritual consumptives now. We have come into the very thick of the fight, and woe to that man who cannot endure temptation; but blessed is the man who can bear it even to the end.

And they are blessed among other things for this reason: because they have endured temptation through their love to God. Read the text again, "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation: for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised"—to them that endure temptation? No, "to them that love Him." So that those who endure temptation rightly, endure it because they love God. They say to themselves, "How can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?" They cannot fall into sin because it would grieve Him who loves them so well, and whom they love with all their hearts. To abstain from sin for any reason is, so far, good; but yet, you may abstain from sin from a motive which will lend no virtue to your abstinence. Some abstain from sin from fear of men, or from hope of gain; as the thief is honest when he sees the policeman, and the beggar becomes pious when a dole is to be had at church. One sin will often kill another sin, as the miser shuns profligacy because he is too mean to spend his money riotously. But to abstain from sin because you love God—ay, that is the thing. After the tried man has stood against temptation, God says of him, "Now I know that thou fearest Me," as He said concerning Abraham after He had tried him. "Now I know that thou fearest God." This approval of God breeds a holy delight in the soul. The soul becomes conscious of the approbation of God; and I venture to say that any man who has felt that approbation in his heart knows the beginning of heaven.

HE IS THANKFUL.

There comes a number of things to help to make such a man blessed; for he has great thankfulness in his soul. "O God," he says, "I thank Thee that I have been kept while passing through those temptations." He is as glad as one who has been taken out of a burning house. I have known what it is to escape from a strong temptation without falling into it, and I think that I have felt as grateful to God as a man would be who had seen a shark after him, and had been almost between its jaws, and had just slipped away as he heard the monster close his mouth with a snap. I remember standing under a building which was in course of erection and seeing a mass of stone fall from a great height just in front of me. What a thud it made! How narrow was my escape! How I started! But what joy filled my heart! So it is when one is delivered from temptation—from temptation which began to overpower the heart. As David said, "My feet had almost gone; my steps had well-nigh slipped."

Besides, another feeling comes over him—that of deep humility. "Oh," says he, "what a wonder of grace I am! However is it that I have escaped such peril? With such a base nature as mine, how have I been kept from destruction? I shall to-morrow perish and fall unless the Lord Himself be still my helper." Putting his trust in God, that sense of his own nothingness, accompanied with a sense of his perfect security in God, makes him feel exceedingly happy. A little rabbit, hunted and pursued, rushes through a narrow crevice under the rock and enters the place where he has his burrow. How quiet he is when he is once there! He hears many noises, but he knows that he is quite safe; not because he is so big or so strong, but because he is so little and so weak, that he has been able to stow himself away under the rock where nobody can get at him. Such a feeling is blessedness to the child of God—to be nothing, but for Christ to be everything to him; to be weak to the last degree, but for God's strength to be his everlasting security. Hence such a man who has been hunted by temptation and driven into the cleft of the rock Christ Jesus, enjoys a very singular and remarkable blessedness.

And, once more, he enjoys a fearlessness of heart. It must be an awful thing to go about the world and feel, "I fell under that temptation the other day, and I would not have it known for all the world. I fell into that vile deed on such and such an occasion; and if it were known, where should I be?" A guilty conscience is the back door to hell. But he that knows that, before God, he has stood though tempted, and that though often assailed he has never been vanquished, can walk through the world and care for no man. He stands like a rock in the midst of the raging billows, for God has given him steadfastness of soul; and is not that blessedness? If it is not, I cannot tell what is. Young men beginning the Christian life, pray that you may be helped to endure temptation, for in that endurance lies blessedness, like a pearl within a rough oyster-shell.

So ready are we to sin, that to prevail over one temptation is a great joy; to have overcome many temptations is a multitudinous blessedness; to have overcome them all will be an infinite heaven. The poet Spenser seems to anticipate that we shall all be overcome if the battle last long enough; just as a famous politician was wont to say that every man has his price. At any rate, it will be a great rapture to fight out the last conflict and conquer in it. Oh to be victorious in our last Armageddon! It will be a joy worth worlds to disprove the Spenserian stanza which I have alluded to, which may well make the boldest tremble.

"But all in vain; no fort can be so strong,
No fleshly breast can armed be so sound,
But will at last be won with battery long,
Or unawares at disadvantage found.
Nothing is sure that grows on earthly ground,
And who most trusts in arm of fleshly might,
And boasts in beauty's chain not to be bound,
Doth soonest fall in disadvantageous fight,
And yields his caitiff neck to victor's most despite."

With this dark prophecy ringing in our ears, we can truly call him blessed who endures right on, and never starts aside, let the test be what it may.

THE BLESSED MAN AFTER DEATH.

II. Just a few words on what the blessed man is to be by and by. "When he is approved, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love Him."

He shall receive a crown. Of course the allusion is to the Grecian games. See how the man runs! Every muscle is strained. There is not a part of his body but what is violently exercised. He tries to pass his fellows. He flies to the goal; he reaches it; and then he receives a crown. A crown of laurel, or of ivy, or, perhaps, of parsley, was put upon his head. It had no value in itself. The Greeks were so little honest that a man could not have kept his crown in his house if it had been worth a penny. Strong rooms and iron safes had not then been dreamed of, and therefore they gave the athletic Greek a crown of fading leaves; and yet many men threw away health and even life to gain that paltry wreath. Though it was intrinsically worthless, it had about it a meaning which made each leaf inexpressibly precious to him who labored for it and obtained it. Now, if we live by God's own grace through faith in Christ, a life that shall be full of purity and holiness, God will give us a crown, not of laurel, nor of parsley, nor even of gold and rarest gems, but a "crown of life" that He has promised to them that love Him." Very wonderful, is it not, that God should reward our poor endeavors? Yet so He will.

There is a crown for me. Does it make you laugh? I trow I seldom think of it without beginning to laugh. Shall you and I wear crowns? Shall it even be that our poor limplings will yet win the race—that our staggering struggles will yet overcome, and that we shall be crowned? Oh you dear Christian people that live in poverty and obscurity, I have a reverence for your heads which are already anointed with grace, for your heads that are yet to be crowned with glory. You run—often run better than the greatest and most observed of your fellow-Christians; and you shall not miss your reward. There is a crown laid up, not only for Paul, but for all them that love our Lord's appearing."

Now go an inch farther in the text: "A crown of life." What must that be! What is a crown of life? Life does not mean existence. Why, they say that when God promises eternal life to Christians, it means that they shall eternally exist. They always must eternally exist, because God has made their souls immortal; but there is no blessing in eternal existence; on the contrary, it may curdle into a curse. The blessing is in eternally living; and what is living? It is not mere existing. In fact, existence, though it be essential to life, does not enter into the meaning of life, nor so much as come near it. To live means to be in health, to be in vigor, to be in force, to be in joy, to be in right and fit condition, to have one's whole self in order, and to enjoy all that surrounds you with all that is within you. God will give to all His people by and by such a crown of life. Life shall crown all. All your life shall be crowned; and all the crown shall be life! "A crown of life."

THE CROWN.

Does it not mean, however, as well—is it not a sort of Hebraism for a living crown? The crown they gave in the Olympic games soon faded. That bit of parsley, or olive, or laurel, was soon turned into faded leaves. But you shall have a living crown; that is to say, it shall never be taken from you, nor you from it. When you sun grows pale with weariness; when his bright eye grows dim with age; when yonder moon shall reddens into blood as her brightness is overshadowed, then shall your crown be as resplendent as ever. When time itself shall cease to be, and visible things shall die, and death itself shall be swallowed up, yet you shall not cease to be blessed, for you shall receive a living crown—a crown of everlasting life, which cannot know an end.

But listen once more. Did you ever try to indulge a speculation as to what the crown of life shall be? I mean this: You have a bulb in your hand of an unknown plant. I have had several lately from Central Africa. The missionary said, "Put it in your stove-house;" and I did. It did not look to me worth a half a farthing; it was an uncomely root. But it has developed large green leaves; it is growing rapidly; and "it doth not yet appear what it shall be."

I am speculating upon the color of the flowers, and the form of the fruit. I guess by the delicate velvetness of its leaves that it is going to turn out something very remarkable; but I cannot prophesy what it will be. Man by nature is that uncomely bulb. When he dies, you know what a poor dried-up bulb he seems to those who lay him in his coffin. Yet even here, when God gives spiritual life, what a beautiful thing the Christian is!

THE REAL EVOLUTION.

You gentlemen who believe in evolution, as I do not, tell us what a man will come to when God has sanctified him fully by His grace, and he has passed through ages of blessedness. What will he be when his life develops into the crown of life? We make poor guess-work of it. But I will tell you what I mean to do. I pray you follow me therein. I mean to go and see what this crown of life is like. We do not know what we shall be, but we have heard a soft whisper say, "When He shall appear, we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is."

Come, let us go to Jesus. First, let us haste away to His cross, and unitedly look up, and say, "We trust Thee, Jesu." Then, from His cross let us come down and take His yoke upon us, and learn of Him, and say, "Jesu, we will follow Thee." Then, let us go with Him into the thick throng of temptation, where Satan shall try us with wealth and honor, or with necessities even unto hunger, as he tried our Lord; and there let us stand and say, "We will wrestle with temptation, O Lord Jesus, even as Thou didst." O Lord, when we have thus done, we will die with Thee; and if Thou comest not soon, we will lie asleep in Thee; and when Thou sayest, "Awake," we will answer, "Here we are." We will live with Thee forever and forever; and Thy joy shall be that crown of life which the Lord has promised of His own free, rich, sovereign grace to them that love Him.

May every person in this congregation wear that crown! May you soldiers in your red coats over yonder win this crown, and wear it forever! May you all be more than conquerors, for Jesus Christ's sake! Amen.

AN OPEN-AIR SERVICE INTERRUPTED.

"I was down in the Rookery last night, said a young man, talking to two others as they came out of church one Sunday evening. 'It was a dreadful place. I never saw in my life so many drunken men in one neighborhood. The language was awful.'"

"Yes, I've heard it is a pretty tough quarter," said another of the trio. "I never went there. It's best to avoid such places, I think. They're always got some kind of fever, or pest of one sort or another, among them."

"You're right," said the third; "there's no good to be done. You only get ridiculed if you speak of religion, and some of those fellows have a ready wit that is difficult to stand against."

"I was thinking whether some of us might not go there on a Sunday morning and try to hold some kind of service," said the first speaker, a youthful looking fellow, an honest workman, only recently come up from a country village, whose clothes were evidently the work of a tailor of original mind not under the constraints of fashion. He was a young convert full of zeal, and, as his companions thought, not overburdened with discretion.

"I should not like to go," said each of the others.

The young man dropped his subject, but he thought a great deal about it afterward and all that week. He tried to persuade others of his Christian friends to undertake the work, or to assist him, but in vain. The place had a bad name, and no one felt drawn to it. He prayed about it a good deal, and finally, the next Sunday morning he went alone. With some difficulty he borrowed a chair and began to sing. A crowd soon collected, and when he had finished the hymn he commenced an address, wisely opening it with an anecdote. It was a plain, simple speech, but it was listened to without interruption, until a shoemaker with his apron still on, showing that Sundays and week-days were alike to him, shouldered his way through the crowd.

"Sing us a song, boy," he said, in a voice thick with many potations. "Sing a song; we don't want preaching here."

"I've been singing, and I'll sing again presently," said the young preacher, breaking off his discourse to meet the interruption.

"No, sing now. 'Let's have a song. You won't, eh?' noticing a shake of the young man's head. "Then I'll sing," and extending his hand and starting a ridiculous jig with his feet, he commenced a rollicking bar-room song in an unsteady voice.

A general laugh went round the crowd, and there were a few cries of "Shut up!" but as the people did not go away the preacher held his ground. The song was soon over, and then the preacher claimed his turn.

"That's fair," said one of the men. "Go home, Charley, and sober up."

But Charley would not go home. He was more disposed to resent the insinuation of his being drunk, and a fight was soon impending. That was too serious to be allowed, so, as a diversion, the young preacher started the hymn, "We sing of the realms of the blest." The drunken shoemaker at once turned around and looked at him intently. The man seemed puzzled. The preacher watched him closely, not knowing what he might do next. But what was his surprise when, at the end of the third verse, Charley took up the chorus and sang, "But what must it be to be there?" with power and feeling, if not with sweetness.

"Say, where did you learn that hymn?" Charley asked, when the young preacher, after a few parting words of prayer, descended from the chair and carried it to the owner. "I used to know it. My poor old mother taught it me."

The soft place in Charley's heart was found. The young man walked home with him, and heard a great deal about Charley's mother. There were other hymns he could sing that the shoemaker remembered, and before the young man went away he had received and accepted an invitation to come again. Services are now being held in Charley's house.

THE SILVER LINING.

A SERIAL STORY.

Two Disciples.

It was scarcely possible for Clare to realize that she was rescued. For many days she lay prostrate with nervous fever, during which in her disordered fancy she lived over again the period of her captivity. Mrs. Arnold and Kate sat by her bedside, and from her incoherent words learned something of what she had endured. At times she failed to recognize them, and would plead with them in piteous accents to let her leave the house. It was saddening to think that such pleadings were but repetitions of the words she had uttered to hardened women from whom all trace of the glory of womanhood had departed. "I am not what you think me," she would say. "Let me go; I would rather die than become vile." Her paroxysms became distressing whenever the soothing mixture which Dr. Arnold prescribed for her was offered to her. "Never," she said, "I will never taste it. You tried to drug me before." Then Kate would call her by her name, and lay her hand gently on the throbbing brow, and soothe her as she would a child.

As she gathered strength of mind and body she was able by degrees to relate her story. It was a story that hundreds of women in New York tell to-day who did not receive help in time, as Clare did. She shuddered as she told how the restaurant-keeper visited her and made his shameful proposals; how, day after day, heedless of her indignant refusals, he came again and again; how her clothing was taken from her that she might not escape, and rich, gaudy apparel was supplied to her; how, at length, failing to overcome her by arguments and threats, the coarse woman who kept the house tried to drug her into insensibility, and only failed because Clare's nervous strength—the strength of a woman struggling for what was more precious to her than life—was greater than the other's mere brute force. And finally of her resolve to escape, even if she lost her life in the attempt.

It was not until she was able to sit up that she was told of the events that had taken place. She knew nothing of her husband's imprisonment and death nor of Mr. Greville's injuries and danger. Gradually and cautiously, for Dr. Arnold was apprehensive of the relapse another shock might produce, she was informed of the sad occurrences and of her own widowhood. She sat and wept silently during the recital, and did not speak for some time after it was ended. She was evidently thinking deeply, and was not without self-reproach.

"I wonder you do not hate me," she said at last. "It is all my doing; this great sorrow would not have fallen upon you if it had not been for my impatience. I could not bear Frank's words, and I thought that I could earn a living for myself and be a burden to him no longer. But I was foolish and ignorant; I should have been patient with him, for he was very worried, and perhaps he did not mean all he said. Can you ever forgive me?"

"We do forgive you," said Kate, to whom was intrusted the task of telling her. "We love you."

"How is that? I do not deserve your love. It would have been better, far better for you, if Frank had never seen me. I have brought you nothing but trouble."

"Indeed, we love you, dear Clare," said Kate again. "You must grow well and strong to go back with us to England. I am expecting you to be my sister, for I shall be very lonely now."

"I can never forget how you saved me," Clare said with a shudder, grasping Kate's hand. "But for you I should have been carried back to that dreadful place, to worse than death. I owe you my life. Why did you seek for me so untiringly?"

"Dear Clare, I could not give up the search; I could not forget that you might be miserable, though I never had an idea how miserable you really were."

"But still I do not understand. If I knew of people being miserable, I would help them if I could, but I should not feel called upon to go out of my way to do it, or put myself to much inconvenience. You must be made of very different material."

"No, dear, just the same. God has been very good to me in showing me how His Son came to the world to live and die, that He might save us from eternal death. That is the difference between us. You cannot realize that without being compelled to forget yourself for others. What Jesus did for us we can never do for any one, but there is much that we all can do, and when we see an opportunity, we do it for His sake. You said you owed me your life. You don't; but I know what you meant. You thought that if ever I should be in such danger that you could save me only by giving your own life for mine, it would be your duty to give it."

"Yes, I meant just that, and I would give it," said Clare, earnestly, throwing her arms around Kate's neck and kissing her.

"I believe you would," said Kate, returning the caress. "That is how you will feel when you understand how Jesus has loved you, and with infinitely better reason."

"You speak of Jesus as though you had known Him. It is all strange to me. I scarcely ever thought of Him in that way. I am very ignorant, dear, but you will teach me, will you not? Of course I read the Bible when I was at school, and we had to go to church regularly; but it was all a form to me. Jesus seems to me like Socrates and Plato and Galileo and other far-away men. I admired Him as I admired them, but He was not any more to me than they."

"That is because you do not see how His life and death concern you. If He had come to you in that dreadful house and taken you out and made you happy for all your future life, you would have loved Him with all your heart. He would have been more to you than a great Teacher then. But He did far more than that for you, and He waits now for you to understand that, and He will be your Friend and Protector forever."

Clare sat lost in thought, unable to realize the truth, so simple, yet to the unenlightened heart so incomprehensible. It was not possible for her to grasp it at the moment, but the seed was sown, and the days of Clare's thoughtlessness and frivolity could never more be repeated. Henceforth she must seek the light until she found it, and that light would be her guide until death. No more could be said then, for Dr. Arnold entered the room, and with him, leaning upon his arm, a gentleman to whom, as he said, neither of the ladies needed an introduction.

Both ladies rose and gave Mr. Greville a warm greeting. It was the first time he had been allowed to leave the hospital, and his steps were still weak and uncertain. He was distressingly feeble, and only the fact of Dr. Arnold's medical skill being recognized at the hospital, and his promise to devote himself to the care of the patient, sufficed to procure Mr. Greville's discharge. He was now to reside in the hotel with Dr. Arnold and his family, and if sufficiently strong when the time for their departure arrived, he would accompany them to England.

The arrangement suited the young man on other grounds than those disclosed to the hospital authorities. There were still working in his breast the thoughts which had so strangely moved him on the night when he was struck down. His was a wasted life so far, as he told himself over and over again. With abundant income, with health and strength, and with a mind of above the average capacity, he was doing nothing that would stand. A life passed in the gratification of self, in frivolous enjoyment, and what are called innocent pleasures, was a barren life, as he saw, and he wished to do something better. The strong, practical mind of Dr. Arnold had exercised a charm over him which he could not but see was healthful, and he was possessed with the conviction that in him he would find a wise guide. So, when the doctor proposed that he should spend some time with him in the combined capacities of patient and guest, he accepted with alacrity.

The party had nothing to do now but to await the arrival of Helen and her lover, who, with their aged friend, were now daily expected to land at San Francisco. The time was spent pleasantly and profitably. It was to Dr. Arnold a congenial task to discuss with his young friend the problems which were exercising his mind, and to show him the true and only way of making his life a blessing to the world. Greville was an earnest inquirer, and, unlike his former self, he was gentle and teachable as a child. On only one point did he show firmness, or, as Dr. Arnold called it, obstinacy. He was resolved that he would not prosecute his assailants whose brutality had so nearly cost him his life. The police were sanguine of arresting them with Greville's assistance. Two suspicious characters, frequenters of the cigar store at which he stopped on the night of the outrage, were known to be well supplied with money, which the police had reason to believe was the money taken from Mr. Greville's pockets when he was struck insensible. But Greville refused to identify them, and even shrank from speaking on the topic at all. He was shutting the past out from him, and desired nothing more than to forget it and all its sad associations.

Of the future he would gladly talk, and always with the same object—how to make the best of his life. Dr. Arnold was delighted to have so earnest a seeker under his care, and hour after hour he would sit listening to Greville's questions, and answering them as God led him. He insisted on Greville reading the four gospels attentively, and it was upon those and the effect the teaching of Christ would have upon the world, if it became the law of the world, that the conversation generally turned. To the young man the Sermon on the Mount seemed an impracticable philosophy, but to the physician it was the only hope the world had of existence.

"What do you think, Miss Arnold?" Greville asked one day suddenly of Kate, who had been a silent listener to one of the discussions.

"You are already overmatched, Mr. Greville," Kate said. "You show temerity in inviting another antagonist into the field, even one so weak as I."

"I thought I was inviting assistance," he said. "Oh, no! To my mind there is nothing so grand, so noble, as a life of self-sacrifice. I agree with Papa. Self-assertion and contention for one's own rights and one's own dignity do not demand half the strength that it does to sacrifice them. The man who takes Christ's teaching as the law of his life is the noblest man on earth, and when all the world so accepts it, we shall have the paradise of which the evolutionists dream."

"Ah! I see I shall get no help from you," said Mr. Greville, in mock despair. But afterward he thought that there might be the best of all help for him to be gained from Kate. The perfect frankness and the clear, earnest conviction with which she spoke, made a deep impression on him. He saw that she had by her own intuition, or in some other way, reached a sublimity of life to which all his philosophy had failed to help him. "What," he asked himself, "might it not be possible for a man to accomplish who had at his side through life a woman so grandly devoted as this?"

Not many days afterward the expected arrivals came, and after a day or two of rest the whole party were on shipboard, homeward bound. There is probably no better way of becoming thoroughly acquainted with a friend than on a sea voyage. The very monotony and the strangeness of the surroundings show what are the inward resources a traveller possesses. Leslie Raymond stood the test well, and before the vessel arrived at Liverpool he had secured Dr. Arnold's willing consent to his marriage with Helen. They would be near to Ralph and Jean in their Australian home; and though it was a disappointment to the good physician and his wife that their daughter would not live in England, it was pleasant to think of the little family colony on the other side of the world. So consent was given, and in the old home where the good physician had lived his life of usefulness, and which was endeared to his children by long years of happiness, preparations for the marriage were commenced.

But it came about that the preparations must be duplicated. Kate sought her mother a few days after their arrival, and blushing told her that Mr. Greville was then closeted with her father, and the rest of the confidence was whispered in ears that had always been the receptacle of Kate's joys and sorrows.

So there were two marriages instead of one, and the old house would have been dull indeed after the birds had flown had it not been that in Clare the good physician and his wife found a daughter whose every thought seemed to be occupied with schemes to promote their happiness. It could not but be that the vicissitudes of their lives should leave their mark upon both of them. They were older for their trials, yet their confidence in God, and their thankfulness to Him for all the mercies of the way by which He had led them were unabated.

As fellow-travellers at the close of a day's march talk over the incidents of their journey, and recall their setting out in the gray dawn, their vigorous progress while they were still untired, their faintness under the noonday sun, the rain and wind and storms, the rough and broken places over which their feet had stumbled, and the peaceful evening when, weary and foot-sore, they came to a place where they would sleep, so the Christian physician and his devoted wife looked back over their lives. It had not been all pleasant. Sorrow and bereavement, anxiety and disappointment, had fallen to them as they fall to all of Adam's race, but in their old age they looked back with thankfulness. God's promises had never failed them; in every trouble they had looked to Him and He led them; in every sorrow He had supported and comforted them; every night of weeping had been followed by a morning of joy, and in every cloud that had overshadowed them they had been able to see that God had put a silver lining.

THE END.

JEREMIAH PREDICTING THE CAPTIVITY.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 10, Jer. 8: 20-22, 9: 1-16. Golden Text, 8: 20. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Weeping Prophet—Abundant Cause for Sorrow—The Christian's Place for Weeping—Suffering's Valuable Fruit—The Last Hope Gone—Bearing the Burden of the Guilty—No Place for Despair—The Good Man Powerless—Christ's Tears Over Jerusalem—A Picture of National Corruption—The Yearning Father—His Despaired Warnings.

JEREMIAH was truly a weeping prophet. He began to prophesy in the days of the wicked Amon, who succeeded Manasseh; ceased during the blessed days of Josiah, and recommenced in Jehoiakim's days. The evil of the king's life, joined with the fulfilment of God's predictions of judgment, called again for his peculiar ministry of weeping at a time when faith could claim no longer that the wrath of God against His people should be averted, and Jeremiah, like the Lord Jesus six hundred years later, could only sit down over against the city and weep for what he could not hinder. There is in the Christian's life; a real fellowship with Christ's sufferings. Not a sentimental weeping, not a got-up feeling which ends in nothing but a taking God's side and feeling with Him how much rather He would have spared the rod if He could. This cannot hinder us from always rejoicing, if we are seeing things in God's light. The deepest blessings lie hidden under visible judgments. We may sorrow deeply when a poor criminal has brought upon himself the judgment of the law, has been convicted, and committed to prison. Yet in how many cases has the Lord answered a mother's prayers for her prodigal, and saved him within the walls of a prison! In all the mourning of Jeremiah he never once ventured to say that God was in the wrong; "Righteous art Thou, O Lord, when I plead with Thee, yet let me talk with Thee of Thy judgments" (Jer. 12: 1). And how much can we, who look back, see to rejoice over in the captivity of the children of Israel! More was done for the evangelizing of the then known world by the faithful testimony of Daniel and his companions, and the conversion of Nebuchadnezzar, than had been done during all the ages of Jewish history! Let us therefore be careful that when we sorrow we may not sorrow "even as others which have no hope" (1 Thess. 4: 13).

There was a tone of utter despair about the prophet's cry: "The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved." The last chance had been lost, Josiah had indeed served the Lord faithfully, a reprieve had been obtained, the evil should not come in his days. If his successor had followed God as faithfully as he, would not the Lord, who spared Nineveh, have repented of the evil? Surely yes. But now this last and Jeremiah saw the people of God delivered into the hand of unbelievers, the worship of the temple, God's only witness in the world, suspended, the land which God had promised to Abraham and his seed forever, if they would obey His voice, now subject to the caprice of a Gentile and idolater, and the prophet's heart sank within him; he saw all as lost, he saw no hope for Israel; "the harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved." The prophet had no personal fears, he knew he was a child of God; but he understood how he could not disunite himself from Israel. If "one member suffer, all the members suffer with it" (1 Cor. 12: 26). "For the hurt of my people I am hurt; I am black; astonishment hath taken hold on me." The shame which the king, the priests, and the people ought to have felt was keenly felt by Jeremiah; he was alive and sensitive to very much to which the children of Israel were utterly callous. Jeremiah saw the dignity of their position in the world as God's witnesses, and it tore his heart-strings to have that post vacated, and that there should be no national recognition of God in the wide world. Jeremiah felt as Eli and his daughter-in-law did when the ark of God was taken (1 Sam. 4: 18, 21), or as Ezekiel in his vision when

THE GLORY OF THE LORD DEPARTED, first from the temple, and then from the city of Jerusalem (Ezek. 10: 18; 11: 23). Who can picture the sorrow of his heart when he cried out, "Is there no balm in Gilead [testimony] is there no physician there? Why, then, is not the health of the daughter of my people recovered?"

Thank God, we can never be in the hopeless despair of the prophet Jeremiah, for "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law" (Gal. 3: 13); we may be "perplexed, but not in despair" (1 Cor. 4: 8) so long as we are trusting in Jesus. There is, thank God, a balm in Gilead. Jesus is the remedy for every trouble, the Way out of every difficulty. Really placed in His hands, and trusted to Him, there is nothing He cannot cure. Thank God, we have a Physician for spirit, soul, and body. While we were under the law we might well weep and despair with Jeremiah, yet, under the Gospel, we see Christ condemning sin in the flesh, that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. While, under the broken law, nothing but impossibility, despair, and judgment stands before us, in Christ we see everything possible, everything full of hope, and death itself lit up with resurrection. We see Jesus, instead of condemning us, coming when we are willing, to cleanse us from all sin and to repeat His own holy life in us by dwelling in us.

But Jeremiah knew nothing of this; it did not belong to the dispensation under which he lived, and so he continued his ministry of sorrow. When God makes us alive to that which grieves His heart, it is that we may bear it to Him to be remedied; but this resource was denied to Jeremiah. God commanded him: "Pray not thou for this people, neither lift up a cry or prayer for them; for I will not hear them in the time that they cry unto Me for their trouble." "Pray not for this people for their good. When they fast I will not hear their cry; and when they offer burnt-offering and an oblation, I will not accept them" (Jer. 9: 14; 14: 11, 12). There was nothing left him but to weep, and he cried: "O that my head were waters, and mine eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night for the slain of the daughter of my people." No wonder Jeremiah felt thus when Jesus Himself, the "mighty to save," yet found Himself in Jerusalem "as

A MIGHTY MAN THAT CANNOT SAVE"

(Jer. 14: 9); and so he sat down over against the city, and wept over it, saying, "If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes. For the days shall come upon thee, that thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side, and shall lay thee even with the ground, and thy children within thee; and they shall not leave in thee one stone upon another; because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation" (Luke 19: 42-44).

The prophet's heart was bitter, his eye was upon the evil which he could not remedy, and he felt it was utterly unbearable; he wanted to go away anywhere; "Oh that I had in the wilderness a lodging place of wayfaring men (the humblest accommodation); that I might leave my people, and go from them!" What was it that ground down his heart as with a millstone weight? Moral depravity! "For they be all adulterers, an assembly of treacherous men. And they bend their tongues like their bow for lies; but are not valiant for the truth upon the earth, for they proceed from evil to evil, and they know not me, saith the Lord." What a picture of the state of things in professedly Christian England—adultery, fornication, lying, patronized by Government; and justice "not valiant for the truth, but persecuting those who are

VALIANT FOR THE TRUTH!"

Surely England's downfall must be at hand, for the foundations of national morality and uprightness are out of course. God told the prophet the sad story which he knew already: "Thine habitation is in the midst of deceit; through deceit they refuse to know Me, saith the Lord." And then, as though taking counsel with His confidential servant, He says, "How shall I do for the daughter of My people? . . . Shall I not visit for these things? saith the Lord: shall not My soul be avenged on such a nation as this? But the Lord's visitation and His vengeance is so different from that of man; it is not the avenged party indulging his personal feeling in the humbling of his enemy. Oh, no; for God loves His enemies. He is the grieved Father yearning over the rebellious child. He says: 'Behold I will visit them and try them.' His judgments are like the fire to the gold, not destroying, but bringing to light all which is precious. There is the deepest love in His greatest severity." Judgment is, indeed, "His strange work" (Isa. 28: 21), and yet He must execute it upon His rebellious children.

In Lev. 26 and Deut. 28 He had declared, if His people would not hearken to His voice, "I will scatter you among the heathen, and will draw out a sword after you; and your land shall be desolate and your cities waste. Then shall the land enjoy her Sabbaths as long as it lieth desolate, and ye shall be in your enemies' land; even then shall the land rest, and enjoy her Sabbaths," and thou shalt be "removed into all the kingdoms of the earth." God's Word must be fulfilled; His people had rebelled, and Jeremiah must be the mouthpiece of God in foretelling that this was at hand; he must say at the command of God, whatever it cost him: "I will make Jerusalem heaps, and a den of dragons; and I will make the cities of Judah desolate, without an inhabitant." But God pauses lest one should come under judgment who has not provoked it, and asks: "Who is the wise man, that may understand this? And who is he to whom the mouth of the Lord hath spoken that He may declare it?" If there is one exception—one hearkening ear, the Lord will find it out. But there could be no longer excuse for delay; the word must go forth, the die was cast, and the judgment pronounced: "Because they have forsaken My law which I set before them, and have not obeyed My voice, neither walked therein; but have walked after the imagination of their own heart, and after Baalim, which their fathers taught them. . . . I will scatter them also among the heathen, whom neither they nor their fathers have known; and I will send a sword after them, till I have consumed them." It is a sad lesson, one for every rebellious child of man; for God must yet be just where men will not accept His mercy.
